Dedicated to all my readers! With more than a million copies sold and a million words written (and counting), this world is still going because of you.

This series has been through a lot of changes over the years but one thing is certain, each story is filled with romance, magic and happily ever afters.

When I first started writing these books, I had no idea how big the world would become. Now, here we are all these years later and I have so many more to tell.

Enclosed are TWENTY-ONE novels + a short story. All told from the Seven Magics Academy world. This series includes modern-day reimagined fairytales of Snow White, Cinderella, and Jasmine, to name a few.

More more than 3600 wondrous, exciting, magical, and swoon-worthy pages for you to enjoy.

Thank you for reading my books!

HE ISN'T A KITTEN

"I'VE HAD several seriously sexual daydreams about the new guy. Have you seen him, Snow?" Cindy fanned her face with her hand while she spoke.

"Cin, too much information. I don't need to hear about your boy crazy fantasies."

We forced our way down one of Salem Academy's busy hallways as we spoke. Directly in our line of sight appeared Jesse, a guy from the football team.

He was handsome, except for the fact that I'd known him since elementary school and knew he was a walking turd.

He winked, and I blanched, thinking for a split second that he'd winked at me.

"Cindy. Babe. Looking good." He made a point of checking her out.

"Don't you know it," Cindy said, giving him a coy smile.

He hadn't been winking at me but at Cindy. I wasn't wink worthy.

Whatever.

I was fine with that. I had plenty to deal with, and worrying about what guys thought of me wasn't one of them.

Except that wasn't totally true.

We exited the throng of bodies to my locker. I turned my combination and lifted the latch, letting my backpack fall off my shoulder.

Most of my books were online, saving me from shoulder and back pain, but occasionally some assignments required a good old-fashioned book.

I unzipped my backpack, took my social studies book and my chemistry book, and jammed them into my bag before slamming the door.

"You can never get too much information about hot guys, and let me just say, wow!" Cindy rested her petite frame against the locker next to mine. Her bright baby blues twinkled in anticipation.

I hefted my backpack onto my shoulder. "Apparently, he's cute?" I asked, closing my locker.

She snorted. "Cute? No! He isn't a kitten. He's dazzling. I'm talking completely gorgeous, and he has a voice that could melt chocolate."

"Sounds delicious," I said, laughing.

We wound our way back into the mob of students on our way toward the gym.

Cindy had a way with words. It'd been like that since the first time we met in kindergarten when she traded me her cream cake for my apple. "I don't think you should eat the apple, Snow White."

We'd been friends for more than ten years.

She was different than me in every way, except for our eye color.

She was the epitome of a waif while I towered over her at five foot eight.

She had blond hair that hung to her hips and was always perfectly styled.

My hair was coffee brown and stopped just below my ears.

Her clothes looked like they'd come straight out of her latest fashion magazines. It was the same with her nails, makeup, and jewelry, including the heart-shaped stud in her belly button.

Me?

Well, let's just say I didn't own any makeup, and my clothes consisted of baggy jeans and sizeable old tee shirts, thanks to my seven best friends and their hand-me-downs.

My nails were stubby, and my ears weren't even pierced. Honestly, I wondered if Cindy found me embarrassing sometimes.

It could've been because she felt sorry for me.

The same year she and I met, I jumped out of a swing, cutting my arm on something on the ground.

At the hospital, it was determined I had hemophilia, a rare blood disorder. Which basically means my blood doesn't clot like other people's.

After that trauma, most school activities and recess became out of the question. Thankfully, my hemophilia was one of the milder cases.

A girl walking by bumped into my shoulder.

I glanced at her, but she just kept walking.

Rude!

I shook my head, noticing that Cindy was looking at me. "What?" Then remembered the guy.

"He sounds nice." I shrugged. What did she want from me?

"Snow!" Cindy stomped her foot. "Nice isn't even a proper word. It's in the same arena as fine, good, okay, and pure." She shuddered, clinging to her sparkly blue notebook with even more fervor.

"What's wrong with pure?" I asked, unable to help laughing at her indignation as we turned a corner before heading down a set of stairs.

She jogged down the steps to keep up. "Nothing if you're Snow White." A look of amused disgust sat on her face.

I pulled the locker room door open. An immediate whiff of steamed perfume smacked my nose. It was extra hot in there as well as muggy.

Cindy followed me in and sat on a bench while I changed into my workout clothes.

I would've been self-conscious had it been anyone else since I tended to bruise easily, and there was always at least one or two on my body. They looked worse than they were.

I was thankful for my body because I knew I could do more than a lot of people.

Growing up, my mom hadn't coddled me per se, but she had been extra cautious.

Once my mom died and my dad remarried my stepmother, all caution went out the window. She thought I needed to be whipped into shape, which was why I was currently dressing for track practice.

"I can't believe your dad and stepmother are still forcing you to participate in this nonsense. Haven't they seen you run? You're an accident waiting to happen, and you don't have to wait long." She tenderly touched a more recent bruise above my knee.

I huffed. "Rude!" But it was the truth.

I ran like a herd of super klutzy elephants or a drunken rhino.

Hence, the bruises. I wasn't graceful or fast. It was just sad.

Still, my dad and stepmother had agreed to buy me a laptop if I participated. I think they hoped I'd get some rhythm or become less bumbling if the coach gave me some pointers.

Both Coach Sorensen and I knew there wasn't a snowball's chance I'd become more agile anytime soon, but he understood why I tried so hard.

"For the sake of a laptop, I'll let you stay on the team," he'd said. "But I couldn't let you participate even if I wanted to. Not with your issues."

That was fine with me. With our mutual understanding, I went to every practice and every meet, holding up my end of the stupid deal.

I knew my dad thought the idea of me running track was foolish, but he kowtowed to my stepmother, and I didn't want to make waves.

Sadly, my disgraceful running behavior had made me the brunt of several jokes.

"Hide the dust bunnies, Snow's on the loose. We don't want her to fall." Unfortunately, that one had been making its way around school lately.

But others popped up every so often.

"What's the difference between Snow and a tree?" they'd ask.

Answer: "A tree sways, Snow falls."

And another: "What do a leaf and Snow have in common?"

Answer: "They both fall."

The lamest one of all: "Why'd the chicken cross the road?"

Answer: "Because he was afraid Snow would fall on him." The jokes weren't really funny or even that creative, but they were shared within my earshot on a regular basis.

"Want to hear the latest joke?" Cindy asked, as though reading my mind.

I gave her a look I hoped said, no freaking way!

"It's actually kind of fun-ny," she said in her sing-song voice.

I plopped down next to her and slid on my shoes. "Do I have a choice?"

OceanofPDF.com

YEAH, THAT'S FUNNY

"SNOW? C'MON." She smacked me playfully on my super white knee.

I couldn't help but notice how sun-kissed and perfectly shaved her legs were compared to mine. I'd missed a spot or two - or three - in the shower this morning.

Sighing, I nodded reluctantly and pulled up my tube socks.

"What's the only thing that runs slower than Snow White?"

I double-knotted my shoelaces, waiting.

"Come on, ask."

"Fine." I grimaced, leaning my elbows on my thighs. "What?"

A strangled snicker escaped her glossed lips. "A snowman," she said, laughing hysterically. "Get it? Because it's snow, and it can't run because it has to legs."

I forced a smile. "Yeah, that's funny." Standing, I slammed my locker with more oomph than intended. The noise reverberated through the locker room.

I wasn't angry.

No point.

It was true.

Running and me were like oil and water, or rocks and battery acid; we didn't mix.

Still, I didn't enjoy hearing the jokes very much.

"I'll see you later." I stood, clutching my fists at my sides.

"Hey, we still watching a movie tonight?" She took hold of my wrist, her voice pouty, and I knew I'd hurt her feelings.

That wasn't my intention. She hadn't come up with the joke, after all.

Without a doubt, I knew she wouldn't do that.

"Of course. Want to meet at the regular spot around nine?" I asked, trying to relax the strain out of my face.

A brilliant smile lit her up. "Yep, I'll see you after my shift at Bertilini's. Invite the guys if you want."

The guys she referred to were my next-door neighbors, who also happened to be my best friends.

Their names were Bart, Sebastian, Daniel, Dorian, Gabriel, Heathcliff, and Salvatore.

They lived in a mansion with an old professor by the name of Adam Henry.

I called him Professor Pops because that's what the guys called him.

He wasn't their real father as far as genetics went, but I'd never seen a man love his sons more than Professor Pops loved his adopted boys.

Sometimes I got a little jealous since my dad and stepmother were gone a lot - like right now.

They were in St. Bart's doing what, I had no idea.

Staying away from me, probably.

"Cool. See ya." I raised a hand in farewell and pushed open the door that led out onto the field behind the school.

"Au revoir," she returned, waving.

I smiled to myself as I went outside.

It seemed French was the latest foreign language Cindy decided to study in her free time. She'd already tried to learn Italian, Chinese, and Spanish.

Chewing a nail, I headed down the stairs. One of my steps was too big, and I started to fall forward. Stretching out my arms, I braced for the inevitable, closing my eyes out of habit.

Skinned hands and bruised knees, along with embedded pavement rock, would be a part of my very near future, along with a possible trip to the ER.

But the fall never came.

Someone had a hold of me.

He or she smelled like sweat and spicy cologne: oranges and cinnamon, maybe.

The chest felt taut, and the hands seemed large. I was betting a guy caught me.

Slowly I peered through my lashes.

Dazzling hazel eyes watched me. His lips turned up in a half-smirk.

"You should be more careful. That fall would've hurt."

"You're singing to the choir, buddy," I said, blushing as I flopped around like a dying fish.

Then made matters worse by trying to stand and smacked him in the mouth with my forehead.

A drop of rosy, red blood immediately formed on his bottom lip.

He helped me onto my feet, amusement dancing in his eyes.

I was shocked he didn't immediately run away.

All guys did.

"Sorry about that," I said, studying his handsome features.

His hair was a sandy blond, and he was tanned.

I absently noticed that he was at least six inches taller than me, making my heart do an excited pitter, skippity-skip, pat since most guys were either shorter or as tall.

I'd always had a thing for taller guys, not that it mattered. I'd never had a real boyfriend, and I was pushing sixteen.

"It's okay," he said, a strange look on his face.

I couldn't figure it out but guessed it fell somewhere between abhorrence and shock.

I touched his lip with my thumb and wiped the blood on my shorts.

Yeah, not the most enchanting of moves. "No, it isn't. Really, is there anything I can do? Help you find the nurse? Get you an ice pack?"

I guessed that since I hadn't seen him around before, he must be the new guy all the girls had been gossiping about.

Not that I could blame them.

Salem, Massachusetts, wasn't very big, and most of the families had lived here for generations, so a new student propelled the school into a frenzy the way blood excited sharks.

"Nah, I'll be fine." I noticed his black shorts hung low on his hips, and, if it wasn't for the white tank, I might've seen more than I'd bargained for.

As it was, I was able to see a lot. Muscles rippled down his arms. He had a trim waist and great-looking legs.

I blushed brighter, guessing both cheeks were now the color of radishes.

"Okay." I glanced at his running shoes. "Are you on the track team?"

"I hope so. Coach is having me try out."

Oh, no. If he didn't do well, it'd be my fault.

"Good luck," I said, looking up.

"Thanks, but I don't need luck." He smiled, showing two straight rows of white teeth. Reminded me of a toothpaste commercial. "You wanna watch me?"

"Yes, sure." I smiled back.

He didn't seem upset or hurt, and his lip wasn't even swollen.

"I'm Chace Charming," he said as we headed toward the field.

I snickered, and he gave me a sideways look.

"It's nice to meet you, Charming. My name is Snow White."

One glance was all it took to know he understood what was so funny.

"What were our parents thinking?" he asked. "I've considered having my last name changed. But if you can deal with yours, I guess I can deal with mine."

He bumped into my side. I would've gone flying, except faster than I thought possible, he grabbed hold of my arm and held me vertical.

"I know, right?" I couldn't help the punch of excitement running through my veins.

I was glad Chace and I walked together because I tripped two more times before he led me to a bench, where I gave the coach a thumbs-up and happily sat for the duration of practice.

KIND OF SEXY

I DIDN'T HAVE my driver's license yet. Two more months and then it was look out world, figuratively and literally.

What I did have was an old purple Schwinn, which was what I rode to meet up with Cindy.

The night air was clammy - the kind that made me wonder why I bothered to shower that day - and the sky sparkled with crisp stars and a full moon.

The perfect night for magic, I thought only half wistfully and snorted.

But I did live in Salem, after all.

If magic were going to happen anywhere, it'd be in our town.

Our regular spot was a movie rental place called Warehouse Video.

Classic movie posters were plastered on the windows, and a neon sign hung along the top.

It actually said AREHOUSE VID thanks to several missing light bulbs, but I liked it that way. It was "our house."

The place probably would've closed up a long time ago, but the owner's son got the brilliant idea to add a coffee shop.

The inside reminded me of what I thought a seventies disco would look like, and it smelled like stale popcorn and frothy coffee.

It was fantastic. At least I thought so.

The adults? Not so much, which is probably why I loved it.

Cindy and I had been coming here since we were thirteen.

Carefully getting off my bike, I grabbed the bike chain, stuck it in between two spokes of my front tire, and locked the other end to a chipped green concrete post.

The parking lot was full of cars and teens.

I searched for Cindy or her blue Altima but couldn't see either.

Gabe, one of my seven besties, was there, though, leaning against his silver CRX.

A flock of girls surrounded him.

He must've said something funny because they all laughed.

I smiled and shook my head.

His eyes found mine, and I sucked in a breath, stumbling backward. My hands and butt hit the pavement at about the same time.

Gabe pushed through the girls and rushed over.

"Jeez, Snowflake, if you wanted my attention, all you had to do was wave. This falling all over yourself, for me, is unnecessary."

He stood there with his hands on his hips, smiling at me, looking stunning.

He knew about my blood disorder, but he also knew not to fuss over me because I didn't like it.

He leaned down. "I mean seriously." His gorgeous green eyes were filled with humor.

Gabe was good at teasing me - the best of all the brothers - but I'd recently developed a serious crush on him somehow, and I took everything he said way too personally.

"Ha-ha. Could you help me up, please?" I asked through gritted teeth.

He put a hand around my waist and his other out for me to grab.

Heat spread over my face and down my neck at his touch.

I couldn't look at him.

If I did, I'd get a close-up view of his beautiful face and dark brown hair that curled slightly, perfectly, in a way that made me want to touch it and wrap my fingers in it.

This whole crushing on my best friend really wasn't working for me.

I pulled my hand from his once I was standing. "Thanks, Gabe. But you better get back to your groupies, they're getting impatient."

I moved away, trying to focus on the sting in my hands and not the strange tingle in my heart.

He pulled me back toward him by tugging on the waist of my baggy jeans before forcing me to face him.

He was an inch taller than me, so we were practically eye-to-eye. His green eyes were serious, searching.

I looked away toward the girls, still hanging out around his car. "I need to find Cindy."

"Snowflake, wait. Are you bleeding? Let me see your hands." He grabbed them, flipping them over.

A couple of rocks were still embedded in the palms, and he tenderly brushed them away, but thankfully there wasn't any blood.

Each place he touched caused a jittery flutter in my stomach like I'd had one too many espresso shots.

I tried to pull my hands away, but he held them firm.

"I'm fine, Gabe," I said, flustered, and made the mistake of glancing up. My breath hitched.

"You're constantly falling because of these clothes. If you'd wear something that fits instead of," he paused and wrapped his fist in my blue American Eagle tee shirt, pulling me close, so close I could smell his cologne.

It was my favorite, like clean sheets that'd been dried on a hot summer day. "This shirt used to be mine."

A wondrous smile ignited his lips and spread all the way to his eyes. "Actually, that's kind of sexy."

"Gabe quit it." I tried to pull away, knowing my face burned red hot.

He wrapped his hands around my waist, coming in close.

His breath tickled my cheek, warm and delicious. It smelled like minty toothpaste. "You aren't always going to think of me as a brother. Someday, Snow. You'll see me the way I see you," he said in my ear, his lips brushing against my hairline before releasing me.

He gave me a wave and started walking. "See ya, Snowflake."

Stunned, I watched him go.

Did he have feelings for me?

I really needed to talk to Cindy.

Right on cue, she tapped me on the shoulder and jumped in front of me. "So, are the guys coming over for the movie?"

Cindy overflowed with bubbly happiness.

"I don't think so," I said, sneaking a peek at Gabe.

He'd returned to his car and the flock of girls. They were giggling again. That was one of the reasons I was glad Cindy hadn't dumped me for cooler friends.

Sometimes I needed girl time, and she was my only girlfriend.

Her face fell. "Did you invite them?"

I gripped her elbow, and we walked into the video store together. "I did invite them, told them to meet at my house at ten-thirty. They might show."

I decided to change the subject. "Are you going to crash at my place tonight?"

"No, my parents are taking me to the Cape this weekend."

It was my turn to frown as we perused the old video cases. "How come you didn't tell me?" I really needed to discuss Gabe.

"I just found out, silly." She smiled. "Besides, I'm sure the guys will keep you company."

I hid a sigh. There was no way I could talk to the guys about my feelings for their brother. That'd be gross.

"Let's find us a scary movie, something that'll let me snuggle up with Gabe. I hope they show." She swiveled around, and I knew she was searching for Gabe because that was what I did.

I paused mid-stride.

Abruptly my mind registered what she'd said. "Wait. What? Gabe, why Gabe?"

WHAT ABOUT CHACE

THERE WERE SIX OTHER BROTHERS, all of them good looking.

Besides, I thought Cindy liked the new guy, Chace. "What about Chace?" I asked, desperate for her to tell me she was joking.

Her glossed lips pouted, and her perfectly lined eyes got all dreamy.

She looked like one of my stepmother's fairytale figurines.

"Nah, I'm over him." Cindy headed toward the horror section and started browsing.

I followed, studying her too-perfect features as she picked up a movie. I plucked it from her hands and put it back on the shelf.

After several movie denials, she crossed her arms. "All the girls like Chace. Besides, I talked to him and - " She didn't finish but shrugged. "He isn't for me."

I had a feeling Chace hadn't gushed over her, which was what most guys did, including my guys, my best friends.

"Besides, Gabe is gorgeous and so sweet."

She'd noticed he was sweet. When? How?

Had he done something to impress her recently?

This was just not good. I had a crush on him.

"How about S - " She held up the movie case.

I grabbed the movie from her well-manicured hand, cutting her off. "Please, no. Not that one again. That movie is terrifying." I shuddered.

The first five minutes, with the girl hanging in the tree. Ugh, the whole movie gave me the heebie-jeebies.

"What about a love story, like Titanic or The Greatest Showman?

That one has Zac Efron, and I know you like Zac Efron." I wiggled my brows, trying to be enticing.

She paused a moment, debating, then shook her head. "Not if the guys are coming. We need gory death and kissing, and jump scares."

I groaned inwardly.

Should I tell her I had a crush on Gabe too?

Even as I thought about telling her, I cringed.

If Gabe knew Cindy was interested, there'd be no contest.

I glanced sideways at her.

She was wearing a baby blue mini skirt with a sleeveless white peasant shirt.

On her feet were strappy silver sandals, which matched the thin silver bracelets dangling from each of her tiny wrists.

Her hair was down and curled to perfection. Her honey skin had that just-lotioned look.

I glanced down at my black Converse and gripped my tee-shirt the way Gabe had. He'd said it was sexy that I wore his old shirt.

I seriously doubted that.

Maybe if I told her how I felt?

"Cin," I started.

"Aha, this is the one." She held up the case. It felt like something inside me deflated.

"Okay," I agreed without looking at it. I was too stressed and sad to care.

GATSBY, my gray rescue cat, snuggled next to me. He purred softly like he didn't have a single worry. I absently stroked his ears while I tried to block out the frightening images on the TV screen.

Cindy hadn't chosen Scream, but Urban Legends, another horror movie from the nineties.

We weren't sitting next to each other.

I was sprawled out on the leather couch, and Cin sat in the burgundy high back.

She had a bowl of plain popcorn on her lap and a diet soda placed precariously on the brown-carpeted floor.

The family living room was medium-sized and outfitted with furniture that would be considered eclectic.

Nothing matched, but it didn't matter.

The couch, chairs, end tables, coffee table, TV, lamps, and curio cabinets seemed irrelevant compared to my stepmother's fairytale figurine collection.

On every surface stood, or hung, a statuette or painting. I'd counted once.

There'd been over six hundred figurines placed around the house, and the number kept increasing.

I mean, talk about extreme.

Cindy thought it was funny.

She especially loved the Cinderella figurines, probably because she looked identical to them.

Young girls would stop her in the mall and ask if she was the real Cinderella.

My stepmother agreed and even gave her a Cinderella figurine for a birthday.

What was weird, though?

Out of all the figurines, paintings, pillows, dishtowels, and clocks, there wasn't a single Snow White.

There were several castings of the Seven Dwarves, the Wicked Queen, Prince Charming, and even an apple, but no Snow White.

I'd asked her about it once when I was eight and realized she was missing. "My darling," my stepmother said. "I don't need a Snow White figurine because I have you."

At the time, I thought it was sweet and tried to hug her, but now, I don't know, it just seemed strange.

"For goodness' sake, Snow. Open your eyes. You're going to miss the best part," Cindy hollered, throwing a piece of popcorn at me.

It smacked me in the forehead. I tried to glare.

She giggled, which sent me into a laughing fit.

"There isn't a best part in this movie. It's icky, and it makes me feel icky." That was the truth, the reason I hated horror movies.

I didn't like how I felt while I watched them, and especially after.

The film was almost over. Cindy would leave, and then I'd be alone in my old, creaky house with only my cat for company.

"Are you kidding? Watch this. It's classic." She pointed at the screen as she talked with popcorn in her mouth. "Here it comes."

I couldn't and scrunched my eyes closed, wishing I had earplugs to block out the screaming, the spine-chilling music, and the terrible acting.

As I lay there, working to think about anything but the death and mayhem going on the screen, something bizarre happened.

An image popped into my head and began playing like a movie.

I tried to shake it, but it was as though my brain had been hijacked.

A man stood in the trees behind my house. I got the feeling he waited for me to do something.

Several of the guys - Sebastian, Bart, Salvatore, Heathcliff, and Daniel - plowed out of my back door and wrestled with each other as they trampled down the stairs.

They laughed heartily.

I followed along with Dorian, but Gabe wasn't there. They were tossing something back and forth, and I was trying to intercept it, desperate for whatever they were keeping away from me.

Suddenly they all stopped, and their faces turned grave.

Sebastian had the thing I was trying to get in his hands. He and the others circled me. There was a coppery stench in the air, and it made my mouth water.

Sebastian opened his hand.

The thing, whatever it was, beat rapidly, and blood dripped from his fingers.

The guys began speaking together, their voices monotone: "Lips red as rubies, hair dark as night. Drink your true love's blood; become the Vampire, Snow White."

"I want it." Taking the bloody thing in Sebastian's hand, I brought it to my lips.

It beat faster and faster.

At that moment, I knew it was a heart, the heart of my true love, but that didn't matter.

Sinking my teeth into it, I tasted the blood, felt it run down my throat, like liquid pleasure and I shuddered.

A cackle rang through the night, and profound darkness entered my body.

"Now, you are mine," the voice said.

I screamed, grabbing one of the decorative pillows from the couch, and covered my mouth.

Startled, Cindy threw the popcorn bowl in the air.

Fluffy kernels scattered everywhere.

Gatsby gave me an evil eye, rose, and casually jumped off the couch.

He sniffed a popcorn kernel before darting from the room.

"Merde," Cindy swore in French. "It isn't that scary."

She skulked off her chair and started picking up the mess.

I crossed my arms, embarrassed. "Sorry," I whispered, unable to stop the trembling in my limbs or the chattering of my teeth.

BUTTERFLY KISSES

"GATSBY, C'MON KITTY," I called quietly into the darkness that was my backyard.

From my porch, I searched the night, waiting to hear the soft patter of his running feet.

After five minutes, he still hadn't come. Obviously, he must still be upset with me over the screaming fiasco.

I stepped back inside, shutting the screen door while keeping watch.

Cin had left already with a quick hug and a promise to call Sunday afternoon when she returned from the Cape.

The guys hadn't ever shown, and Gatsby didn't seem to want my company either.

Stifling a shiver, I wrapped my arms around myself.

I wasn't cold so much as unsettled. The disturbing dream thing, along with that scary movie, had me all messed up.

Instinctively I searched the trees beyond my yard, studying between the low hanging branches that smelled of peppermint, their leaves soft as butterfly kisses.

Would he be out there? The man who watched me in the dream.

A noise like crunching leaves pulled my head in its direction. My pulse picked up speed like a thumping rabbit.

Something moved out there - something I couldn't see.

Opening the screen door, I called for Gatsby again. "Here, kitty kitty."

The sound of my own voice made me nervous.

The noise grew more intense.

I'd let the screen door slam behind me and now reached back, grabbing the handle. Opening it, I put a hand to my throat. If it was the man, what should I do?

I wouldn't be safe in the house. I so needed a cellphone.

I was about to turn when two guys stumbled out of the trees and fell onto the grass, laughing uproariously.

A scream escaped my lips before I could stop it.

I clamped a hand over my mouth, realizing it was just Salvatore and Bart.

That's what my eyes told me; the rest of me was frozen in fear.

I wanted to laugh with them. They'd only been teasing; it's what they did.

I'd done it to them on more than one occasion: snuck into their yard and scared them.

"You should see your face," Salvatore said, rising and coming toward me. "I should've taken a picture." Tears were streaming down his face from laughing so hard.

Bart was in a similar state.

I still couldn't move.

In the dream, Salvatore had been holding the bloody heart, the heart of my true love. The brothers had been tossing it around like they were playing catch before a game.

I shook my head, remembering I'd tasted the heart.

A rush of pleasure rushed through me, and I swallowed back the disgust and guilt.

"How-how could you?" I stammered, tears filling my eyes. "You know I'm all alone. You could've been a psychotic murderer."

I rushed into the house, letting the screen door slam behind me.

I'd seen their stricken faces and knew they hadn't meant to do any harm, but I couldn't act rationally.

Sobs wracked my body, and snot dripped from my nose.

I was losing it, and I had no excuse.

I ran past my parents' unused bedroom and the bathroom in the main hall until I reached my bedroom.

Flinging open the door, I launched myself onto the bed and buried my head in my purple pillows. My dad, being gone for so long, plus knowing Cindy liked Gabe and the weird daydream, was fuel for my pity party.

The guys scaring me ignited it, and now there would be no stopping the floodgates.

All my sadness, my loneliness, my pent-up hurt, and fears seemed to crash into me.

Wave after horrible wave.

Why had my mother died?

Why had my father remarried such a cold, uncaring woman, and why did they have to leave me alone all the time?

Why did my dad choose her over me?

Why was I such a dork?

The questions went unanswered, probably always would.

My life was what it was, and most of the time, I accepted it, even enjoyed it.

Right now was not one of those times.

I'd fallen into my enormous chasm of hurt and allowed myself to sink in.

"Care for one more in your pity party?"

At the sound of his soft voice, I stiffened.

There was a thud, and then I felt the bed give as four soft paws jumped up.

"Gatsby invited me. I hope you don't mind if I join you?"

Two feelings swirled through my heart at once: relief and embarrassment.

Relief, because I was happy he was here. I didn't want to be alone.

Embarrassment because I was a blubbering mess, and he would see me, and I'd never be able to look him in the face again.

"Gabe, what are you doing?" I asked, casually wiping my eyes and nose on my pillowcase. Gross? Sure. But it was better than him seeing me covered in snot.

The bed dipped as he sat.

His warm skin so close to mine sent tingles through my belly.

"I told you Gatsby invited me, and I never miss a pity party, especially not one thrown by my beautiful best friend, Snowflake."

There was amusement in his voice.

He was trying to make me feel better, but that wasn't the point of my feeling sorry for myself. I wasn't supposed to feel better. It was about misery, and that's what I wanted.

Him saying I was beautiful just added to the many waves of hurt.

It wasn't true, and having him rub that in didn't help.

"Go away," I said.

He answered by scooting closer, and I felt my body respond hungrily to his nearness.

"I'll go away when I know you're feeling better. Professor Pops knows I'm here. He also has Salvatore and Bart on bathroom duty tomorrow. He wanted me to be sure to tell you that."

"Huh," was all I could utter, though I had to smile.

"Serves them right." I sniffled.

He shifted his weight and pushed me over slightly, then I felt something fall over me. It was the quilt my mother made.

Tears filled my eyes again, and I squeezed them shut.

"Now, I'm just going to lie down next to you until you fall asleep. I've already locked up the house, but I'll lock the back door when I leave, okay?" He spoke softly.

Gatsby growled before there was a thud. Gabe dropped him to the floor.

The bed shifted as Gabe got comfortable.

Then there was only his breathing.

I held mine for several long seconds.

He meant it.

Gabe was just going to lie there with me.

I took a deep breath and relaxed.

The moment reminded me of our overnighters when we were younger, sleeping out on the trampoline in our sleeping bags.

The seven of them and me all started out at typical distances from each other, but by morning we'd all slid into the middle - a pajama-clad mashup of arms and legs.

I'd always been the first to wake up, lie there, listen to them inhale and exhale, and wish that was how we could be every night - my brothers and me sleeping under the stars.

Only now, I didn't see them that way anymore.

They weren't my brothers, but gorgeous men and the one next to me had my pulse pounding in my ears.

I took a deep breath, thinking about our overnighters.

They'd ended once my stepmother came into the picture.

She'd pointed out that they were boys, and all boys only had one thing on the brain.

As I listened to Gabe now, I wondered what was on his mind.

After a while, I fell asleep.

In my dreams, there were arms wrapped protectively around me, my back tucked against his chest, legs intertwined.

I heard a whisper. "Snow, my Snow. You aren't alone."

My heart soared with happiness in the dream.

"Gabe, don't leave me," I whispered back.

"Never, Snowflake."

SNOWFLAKE

THE SUN PEEKED through my sheer purple bedroom curtains, its brightness burning my eyes. I was on my side, facing my alarm clock, which said seven o'clock.

Gabe's steady breath tickled my neck.

A weight pressed against my hip - Gabe's arm.

All that had happened last night came crashing back, and he was still there, in my bed with me.

I slowly rolled onto my back.

Gabe shifted.

A smile curled his lips.

"It's a bit early for a Saturday, Snowflake." His words were low, heavy with sleep.

Sensual, my mind uttered, and my heart responded by beating rapidly.

Before I could give him a comeback, my nose registered the sultry smell of bacon. "Someone's cooking," I whispered.

"Do you think it's the psychotic murderer? He's going to feed us before he slays us?" he asked, mischievous.

I punched him in the arm. "You heard me last night?"

"Snowflake, I think the whole town heard you." He opened his eyes then.

Two beautiful pools of green searched my face, lingering on my lips before focusing on my eyes.

My skin warmed, and I looked away.

"I love it when you blush," he said softly.

"You do?" I couldn't believe he'd stayed, and we were lying next to each other.

All night.

Did he like me?

What about Cindy?

Should I tell him she had a thing for him?

His hand rested on my stomach, and I wondered if he could feel the electricity buzzing beneath.

"Snowflake, I do." He rolled onto his side, and I did the same, his fingers creating goosebumps as they moved back to my hip.

Our noses practically touched, and I suddenly worried about morning breath.

I hadn't brushed my teeth and turned in my lips, pressing them together.

He started laughing. "What are you doing?"

"I haven't brushed my teeth," I said, cupping a hand over my mouth.

He pulled my hand away. "Don't care."

"Yeah, but what about your morning breath? It might singe my eyelashes," I said, finally coming up with a snappy comeback.

He laughed and rotated off the bed. "You have a point. Let's go see what the psychotic murderer is cooking along with that bacon."

I grinned, thankful, and disappointed that the moment had ended.

"I'll be down in a minute."

He raised his eyebrows in question, and I glanced in the direction of my bathroom.

"Ah," was all he said as he went to the door.

A bolt of agony shot into my heart. I didn't want him to leave.

I'd clung to him in my dreams last night.

Awake, I didn't want to stop.

I needed him, with his incessant playfulness and thoughtfulness.

On top of that, well, he was hot.

"Gabe," I called, hearing the tremor in my voice.

He turned back, concerned. "Yeah, Snowflake?"

"Thank you." I looked down, unsure.

My feelings for him were new, and a part of me wished I could go back to just being his best friend.

He walked around the bed to where I stood and gripped my tee-shirt, which used to be his in his hand, making a fist and pulling me to him.

He lifted my chin with a finger, but I kept my eyes down, focusing on his masculine hands that were big, but not too big.

"Are you going to be okay?"

I nodded, unable to understand why tears stung my eyes.

He pulled me into his arms, and I reciprocated with a fervor I didn't know I possessed.

Tucking my face in his neck, I held on as though my life depended on it.

We stayed that way until I heard snickering from the doorway.

"Professor Pops wanted me to tell you both to come down for breakfast."

It was Bart. He stood there, looking super uncomfortable.

I cleared my throat.

Gabe whispered, "Never, Snowflake." Gave me a pointed look.

My heart leaped into my throat.

Maybe last night's words and the way he'd held me hadn't been dreams.

"Promise?" I examined his face, his eyes, to see if he was serious.

In answer, he kissed my cheek, and my whole body melted like butter. "Promise."

"Hurry up," Bart said and disappeared.

Gabe squeezed my hand before exiting my bedroom.

And I sighed.

AFTER HANDLING the necessities - change of clothes, brushing my teeth and hair, and a bathroom break - I ran downstairs.

All the guys were seated around the kitchen island and at the table. I couldn't help but smile. Having the kitchen bursting with delicious smells, and most of my favorite people filled me with total happiness.

"Hi," I said, sitting on the oak dining chair next to Dorian.

The guys were piling their plates with waffles, eggs, and more eggs, and cantaloupe, and strawberries.

Taking a dish, I scooped some of the fruit onto it.

Professor Pops came over and plopped a waffle onto my plate. I looked up. Grateful he'd done so much.

"Thanks, Professor, but I'm a vegan. No eggs or milk for me." I grimaced, feeling bad, but I couldn't bring myself to eat anything meat or meat-related.

I picked up the waffle, but Professor placed a hand over mine and patted.

"I know all about it," he said. "These waffles were made without eggs, and I used almond milk instead of regular."

His gray eyes twinkled like he'd lived a thousand lives and knew everything about everything.

"Oh," I said, setting it back on my plate happily.

Neither my dad nor my stepmother would've been so thoughtful.

"Thank you."

"You're welcome," he said, the skin around his eyes crinkling as he smiled.

The notion that he'd come over and cooked for me was incredible and another testament to the reasons I adored him and his sons.

They were extraordinarily good, decent men because that's the example Professor Pops set for them. I had to wonder how he and the guys had gotten in and where all the food came from.

My refrigerator held yogurt, apples, raw almonds, and orange juice, and I had some vegan, whole-wheat pasta, and tomato sauce in the pantry, but that was about it.

I wasn't going to ask him, though.

That would've been rude.

Besides, I was too busy stuffing my face with fruit covered waffles.

Gabe sat at the island, his back to me, so I didn't get a chance to talk to him during breakfast.

There'd been a lot of grunting and chewing going on after Sebastian uttered a quick prayer, but not much else.

The food was divine.

Salvatore and Bart had apologized, clearing the air.

Afterward, I helped Professor Pops clean up the kitchen. When it was just the two of us in the kitchen, Professor Pops filled the large sink with hot water and dish soap.

A perfectly good stainless-steel dishwasher had been installed next to the sink, but he wanted to hand wash the dishes.

"You know, we could throw these in there." I pointed at the dishwasher.

"True, but where's the fun in that?" He wriggled his eyebrows, and I giggled.

Pops handed me a plate.

I dried it and placed it in the cupboard.

"Your sixteenth birthday is in two months," he said out of the blue.

"It is," I agreed, curious about where he was going with his question.

"Have you made any plans yet?"

TRAIN TO BOSTON

I STOOD beside Professor Pops and took another plate he handed me. It was hot, and I hurriedly dried it.

"Not yet. My parents won't be back from St. Bart's for a while, so I'm not sure."

He didn't say anything right away.

I looked up.

His jaw flexed, and his eyes were scrunched as though he had to concentrate on washing the plate.

Professor Pops had thick gray hair. He was tall and lean.

I figured he'd probably been very handsome when he was younger. As it was, I'd say he was distinguished.

He had on a pair of tan slacks, a red and white checkered button-up shirt, and a tan sweater with dark suede patches at the elbows.

On his feet were loafers, and in his left breast pocket were silver wire-rimmed reading glasses.

He was the epitome of what I believed a Professor of Religion should look like.

Well, a professor of any kind, really.

After I put away the dried plate, I came back for the next one.

"It isn't a big deal. Maybe I'll invite the guys and Cindy over to watch a movie. That'll be fun."

He blew out a breath, and I deliberated if I'd made him mad.

"Professor?" I asked tentatively.

He dropped the plate in the soapy sink, letting it splash and turned to me.

Taking the towel from my hands, he dried off his and then placed it on the counter.

"Snow, I know I'm not your father, but I've come to look at you as an adoptive daughter over the years. I'm very fond of you." His eyes glowed as he spoke.

"I know," I said, my insides tingling with the sweet warmth of his genuine love for me.

But I was curious as to what he was getting at.

"I really appreciate that. Thanks again for making me breakfast."

We waved a hand dismissively. "I intend to call your father and stepmother," the words came out like they were laced with acid, "and ask their permission, of course, but if you let me, I'd like to throw you a birthday party at my place. Something big, grand, something that declares to the world what an amazing young woman you are."

At the last part, he squeezed my shoulders affectionately.

Unbidden tears crept into my eyes, and I quickly blinked them away.

What was up with me?

"That is very kind of you but you don't have to," I said, my voice trembling with emotion.

"I would be honored if you'd allow me to. This old man hasn't ever had the chance to throw an extravagant birthday party. All the boys ever want is pizza and some sort of activity."

"An activity sounds great," I inserted hurriedly.

I didn't want him to have to go to all the trouble.

"No, please. Let me do this. May I?" He took one of my hands and held it between his. They were soft and warm.

"Okay," I said, a little shyly.

"Excellent." He patted my hand. "Now, about Gabe."

I swallowed a lump I hadn't known existed in my throat. "Gabe?" I squeaked out.

"Yes." He nudged me over to the table, and we both sat. "The boy -" he began but couldn't finish.

The whole group forced their way into the kitchen, and one of the guys cleared his throat, interrupting whatever Professor Pops had been about to say.

Dorian spoke. "We were wondering if we could take the train into Boston."

Professor Pops released my hand. "That sounds intriguing." He looked from Salvatore to Bart. "Bathrooms must be cleaned first. Then you may go. Just be home before midnight."

Pop handed Dorian some money he'd pulled from the wallet in his back pocket.

"You have your cells if there's an emergency?" he asked though it was apparent he knew the answer.

They all nodded, and I hid a smile behind my hand.

They were men. The youngest were Gabe and Dorian, and they were both seventeen.

Four would be graduating from the academy this year, but they knew Professor Pops cared for them a great deal and would never intentionally disrespect him.

A twinge of longing surged through me.

"Want to come, Snowflake?" Gabe asked, eyeing me.

The guys all added their assent.

I searched Gabe's face.

Did he really want me to tag along?

It seemed that he did.

"Sure. Sounds fun."

"Cool."

The brothers took off, leaving Professor Pops and me alone again.

I wanted to bring up Gabe and ask him what he was going to say, but I couldn't figure out how.

AFTER SHOWERING and blow-drying my short hair, I searched for an outfit that wouldn't embarrass the guys.

It frustrated me to realize I cared, and it was all Gabe's fault.

Before last night - before his words, and kindness, and his snuggling without trying anything, and kissing my cheek - before any of that, I hadn't given what I wore a second thought.

In the past, I just put on any old thing.

Not even the gorgeous Cindy Croswell and all of her helpful hints had done any good.

It. Was. Gabe.

He'd said I was sexy, and he'd made me feel sexy, so I wanted to be sexy.

I growled in frustration.

"Ugh, what's happening to me," I hollered at myself, throwing on a pair of baggy faded jeans and a vintage Def Leppard shirt.

At least the sleeves were a light blue that matched my eyes.

That seemed girly.

I didn't have makeup, but I did have cherry lip balm. I applied some after brushing my teeth again and fluffed my hair a little.

"Cindy would be so proud," I mocked my reflection in the mirror.

Adding a pair of black Converse and a black leather belt, I grabbed my wallet and headed next door to Adam Henry's house.

Calling Professor Pops' house a house - well, it was a downright lie.

The thing was a sprawling mansion.

An acre of land separated my house from his, but the mansion sat on ten acres.

The amenities included a tennis court, a basketball court, a heated swimming pool that could be indoor or outdoor, a three-hole golf course, a putting green, and the house.

My house looked like the servant's quarters.

Maybe it had been a long time ago.

I dinged the bell and waited.

You'd think a butler would answer the door, but no.

It was Salvatore. His shiny black hair was wet and pulled into a tiny ponytail.

"Rockin' the pirate look, I see," I said as I stepped into the foyer.

Almond colored eyes registered shock, as did his gasp and the way he dramatically put his hand on his chest.

I couldn't help the laugh that started in my belly and bubbled into my throat.

"Where's your poofy shirt and pantaloons?" I asked, following him into the kitchen.

He had on a getup similar to mine, baggy jeans, and a vintage shirt. His tee-shirt was black and had AC-DC across the chest.

Pulling open a door on the large side-by-side stainless steel refrigerator, he grabbed a soda and popped the top.

"You want one?"

"Um, duh," I responded, to which he grinned and tossed me one.

I flung up my hands in an effort to at least block the can, but a hand reached in front of me and grabbed the can from the air.

"Dude," Dorian grumbled. "Did you forget who this is?" he asked, pointing in my direction with a thumb.

YOU'RE JUST JEALOUS

I SMACKED Dorian in the arm. "I totally had it. Right Salvatore?"

He responded by chugging down his soda.

"Uh-huh, sure you did." Dorian looked freshly showered too.

His sandy hair was still wet and slicked back.

He always dressed so nicely, and today was no exception: a light green polo with dark jeans and a brown belt that matched his shoes.

"You're so pretty, Dorian." I grabbed the can of soda from him and cracked it open.

He smirked. "Don't I know it."

One by one, the guys sauntered into the kitchen, each handsome in his own way, each dear to me.

These guys were my family.

I'd do anything for them, and I knew the feeling was mutual.

After last night's freak-out, I figured the guys might act weird toward me, but it was the same ol' same ol', and for that I was grateful.

Gabe walked in last.

He looked just as he always did - gorgeous brown hair, mischievous green eyes, olive skin, and a body of lean muscle - but everything was different too.

Those arms held me last night.

He'd made me a promise, and as he walked toward me, I knew he meant it.

The closer he got, the warmer my body became. Ignoring his brothers, his lips brushed against my face, as though resealing the promise he'd made earlier.

One of them - Sebastian, I think - did the whole fake cough thing. "Jerk."

"Yeah, you're just jealous. Get over it," Gabe responded.

Jealous, I thought.

No way.

But as I scanned the faces of the brothers, I realized something.

Sure, they were family, but we weren't related, and they saw me as a potential girlfriend, not a sister.

How long had this been going on?

Had I really been so oblivious?

I knew I was turning red, and I lowered my face, intently studying the soda can.

But I'm not even pretty, I thought, mortified.

Heathcliff cleared his throat. "Let's go. The train leaves in twenty minutes. Hopefully, we'll make it." He grabbed a set of keys off the hook on the wall that said, coincidentally, KEYS.

Eight of us in one car; this ought to be interesting.

Turned out to be four of us in two cars. Heathcliff drove the red Audi, and Salvatore drove the black Mercedes SUV.

Gabe sat in the back with me, and Dorian sat in the front next to Heathcliff.

Heathcliff had been right.

We made it, but not by much.

As soon as we were in, the train pulled away.

The ride into the city was fun but uneventful.

There was one brief moment when I got the distinct impression someone was watching me. The little hairs on the back of my neck and on my arms stood up, and I got a sick feeling in the pit of my stomach.

Trying to be nonchalant, I searched for the cause, but didn't notice anyone acting strange or, at least, not odd towards me.

Shrugging it off, I listened to the guys and their interesting conversations about sports, cars, and women.

THERE WAS something magical about Boston.

Puritans founded the city in 1630, so perhaps magic would be considered blasphemous, but that was the word that came to mind.

After Salem, this big city was my favorite place.

A hum, or a vibe, pulsed through the city, uniting its occupants.

We started at Boston Common.

Salvatore brought a Frisbee, and we played on the grass for a while.

The air was humid, hot.

After an hour, we were all sticky and in need of liquid refreshments.

The eight of us went to a local coffee shop for a cold drink.

After that, we split up.

Sebastian, Salvatore, Bart, and Daniel decided to get out of the heat and see a movie.

Heathcliff informed us Professor Pops had asked him to drop something off. It was all very secretive.

Dorian, Gabe, and I said we'd keep him company.

We took Tremont Street to State and decided to stop at the Faneuil Hall Market Place.

It was packed with people and all sorts of shops, from clothing to jewelry to food to purses.

The guys each bought themselves a slice of pizza, which smelled so heavenly I almost rethought my food choices but settled on an almond fruit smoothie.

We purchased tickets to see a play contending for Broadway called Chasing Disaster later that night. It was a musical about the life of Sylvester Stallone. Stallone and a musical didn't seem to mix, but we wanted to give it a shot.

The sun had begun to set, making the glass buildings glow as though they were on fire.

Heathcliff led us into an alley that, at one time, hundreds of years ago, had been a cow path.

Sunlight dappled the brick buildings high above, but down near us, darkness prevailed, as did the dank smell of rotting trash and fish.

I breathed through my mouth with little relief.

"Where are we going, Heath?" Dorian asked, a hand over his nose.

Gabe shoved him. "You're such a baby." He glanced at me, worry creasing his forehead. "How are you handling this?" he whispered.

I put a hand over my nose and mouth. "Gotta say, Dorian has the right idea. The smell is atrocious."

Gabe nodded.

Heathcliff didn't seem to be bothered by it. He kept looking from a piece of paper in his hand and side to side at the old doors almost hidden in the walls.

The alley seemed to go on forever, and I wondered how much longer we would be here.

Finally, Heath stopped and scratched his head.

"I think this is it." He knocked, and we waited.

After several seconds a young Asian boy in navy shorts and a white tee shirt answered the door.

He appraised us before asking in perfect English, "What do you want?"

I felt the hesitation in the brothers. They all had their shoulders hunched except Heathcliff.

"Hello," Heathcliff said, giving the boy a smile. "Adam Henry asked me to bring something to Kenmei-sensei."

The boy stepped back as though Heath had cursed.

"One minute." The door slammed, and there was high-pitched shouting in Japanese.

We looked at each other.

I shrugged, tucking my hands into my front pockets. After several more minutes, an elderly Asian man opened the door.

He wore clothes similar to Professor Pops.

"Adam Henry has something for me?" He bowed slightly.

Heath, Dorian, Gabe, and I returned the bow.

Professor Pops had been teaching the boys about different cultures since they were little. Sometimes he'd teach me, too, and for that reason, I knew that it was a sign of respect to return the old man's bow.

Heath pulled a folded paper from his back pocket. "Are you Kenmei-sensei?"

A smile ignited the man's face. "Hai."

Heath handed him the paper. "This is for you, then."

With slightly shaking hands, Kenmei took the paper and unfolded it. He studied whatever was on it.

The four of us shuffled back and forth, waiting patiently, but I thought I'd gag if I had to stay in the alley much longer.

The smell was more than awful.

Finally, Kenmei looked at Heath and then set his gaze on Dorian and Gabe before his eyes rested on me.

A prickling fear surged along my spine.

Looking into his dark eyes was like looking into the Universe.

If anyone asked, I would swear I saw stars and planets rotating within.

"You are not one of Adam Henry's sons." It wasn't a question.

I shook my head, placing my hands behind my back in fists. "No,

I'm just a friend of the family."

"A good friend," he added.

"Yes," I agreed, working to keep the overbearing fear crawling along with my appendages in check.

His stare worried me, and I glanced down at my feet, realizing I stood in a puddle of murky yellow water.

Shifting, I moved closer to Gabe.

He placed a hand at the small of my back, and I relaxed.

"Come." Kenmei stood back, his hand gesturing that we enter. "Adam is expecting an answer. Won't the four of you come in? My grandson, Hiro-san, will make you some tea."

WATER DRAGONS

HEATHCLIFF ANSWERED as though he'd been holding his breath. "We'd love to."

"Excellent." Kenmei moved inside. "Apologies for the smell. It keeps away the undesirables."

"No problem," Heathcliff said.

After the four of us were inside, Hiro appeared seemingly out of nowhere and barked, "Take off your shoes," as he closed the door.

"I'll be right back," Kenmei said when he reached the end of the hall. "Show them into the dining room and get them some tea," he added, speaking to Hiro.

Hiro bowed. "Yes, Grandfather."

Kenmei disappeared.

I rolled up my pant legs because the ends were wet and removed my shoes as I waited for my eyes to adjust to the dimly lit room.

It'd been dusk outside, but for some reason, it seemed darker in here.

I could barely make out that Gabe and the others were removing their shoes as well.

"Follow me, please, and don't touch anything." Hiro shook his pointer finger at us slowly but seemed to be looking directly at me.

Did I have "klutzy" stamped across my forehead?

Probably, I answered with a sigh.

I followed Hiro.

Gabe and the others followed me.

We seemed to be taking the same route Kenmei had gone.

It looked like the only way to get anywhere.

The floor was covered in plush Oriental carpet, the design intricate.

The walls were covered in cream paint.

Lights ran along with the ceiling, but elaborately painted lamps covered them, which was why the room emitted only a slight reddish glow.

Pictures of ancient-looking people, water dragons, and creatures that looked like they'd been pulled from nightmares hung randomly on the walls.

The air smelled like incense, which was much nicer than the rancid garbage stench outside.

As we padded along, I got the distinct impression I was being scrutinized.

Paranoid much?

It was just that I was in a strange place. It was unnerving.

Abruptly the hallway ended, and we had to either turn to the left or the right.

Hiro led us to the right.

Not too far after that, he stopped in front of double paper-looking doors. Sliding one open, he ushered us inside the room.

A shiny onyx table that could seat at least twelve sat majestically in the center.

Black leather chairs surrounded it.

In the middle of the table sat a rock and bamboo water fountain, gurgling contentedly. Directly above, hung an enormous chandelier.

I couldn't see the ceiling, though.

It just seemed to go up and up and up without end.

That had to be a trick of the light.

Hiro patted a chair at the head of the table.

"You, girl. Sit here. The rest of you can find a spot wherever. I'll be right back." Without another word, he left.

We looked at each other and laughed.

"That kid has more confidence in his little finger than most people have in their whole bodies," Dorian said, taking a seat.

We all agreed.

"I wonder why he wanted me to sit here?" I asked, cautiously pulling out the chair and sitting.

"Probably because you're cute," Gabe said, and the others agreed.

He winked at me.

I blinked, unsure of what was happening.

Gabe shook his head, a half-smile on his lips.

"Snowflake," he muttered, grabbing my hand between his and massaging it.

Heathcliff looked from me to Gabe. "What's going on with you two? Are you a couple now?" He seemed irritated, and I flinched at the question, surprised.

Gabe would have to answer this one because I didn't know either.

Gabe gave Heath a pointed stare. "You've known about my feelings for Snow for quite some time. It wasn't until last night I had a suspicion she might feel the same way about me."

His feelings?

I was in shock but worked to keep my emotions hidden behind a blank face.

Gabe turned to Dorian. "You guys don't have a problem with me asking out Snow, do you?"

Hey, what about me?

As much as I was sure my feelings for Gabe were obvious, shouldn't he have mentioned this to me first?

Dorian shook his head. "It's cool with me, man," he said but his tone was off. Like he didn't mean it.

Heathcliff turned his attention to me.

"How do you feel about all of this? About you and Gabe?" he asked.

I blew out a breath. "I'm not sure," I said, pulling my hand from Gabe's and biting a nail.

Of course, I liked him, but this conversation didn't sit right.

Gabe's green eyes penetrated mine.

"I think we should talk alone, don't you?" I asked in a whisper, though it echoed around the room.

His eyes fell, and I wondered if I'd hurt his feelings.

"You're right," he agreed.

Hiro walked in with a silver tray that was almost as big as him.

On it sat a white teapot and several cylinder-shaped cups.

He set it down to my right.

I watched as he poured the tea in four cups and handed one to each of us.

"Drink," he said. "Grandfather will be with you shortly."

Then he was gone.

I picked up the cup, and the others followed.

I sniffed it, letting the steam hit my face, and it was then that I realized it was quite chilly in here.

The tea smelled good, like ginger and other spices. Carefully, I took a sip and swallowed. The heat hit the back of my throat, and I felt it go all the way down to my stomach.

Contentment fanned through my insides like the sun on a hot day.

I took another sip, then set down the cup.

"Is that sugar?" Heathcliff asked.

I opened the container and looked.

"Sure is. You want some?" I picked up the white container and handed it to him.

My eyes suddenly seemed weighted down with lead. I struggled to keep them open.

I watched Heath put one, then two, then three scoops of sugar in his tea.

Dorian did the same.

By the time Gabe reached for the sugar, my eyes had shut.

What was happening to me?

WHEN I OPENED MY EYES, I knew I wasn't in the dining room anymore, but lying on a satin-covered bed.

Thick white curtains sealed me in like leftover spicy tofu in a takeout box.

Sitting up, the slick red sheets fell into my lap, revealing I wasn't wearing my clothes anymore.

Instead, I had on a black silk nightgown with thin straps.

What in the world, I thought, too bewildered to be nervous.

I'd been tired.

Perhaps Kenmei had put me to bed.

But where were the guys?

I needed to get out of here.

Hopefully, they were okay.

We still had a musical to attend.

"Gabe," I called out, trying to find separation in the curtains.

"Hello, Snow White." It was a male voice, low and soft.

It sounded familiar, but it wasn't Gabe's.

"Who's there?" A little more vigorously, I ran my hands over the velvety softness, searching for an opening.

I heard a click, and the room was blanketed in darkness.

"W-What's going on?" My voice didn't sound like my own but was raised an octave.

This was what terror felt like, I told myself, standing up on the mattress, trying to pull the curtains from the frame.

"Where's Gabe? Where's Kenmei?"

"Relax, beautiful. You've been marked by her highness, and the queen always gets her way."

"Marked? What do you mean by that?" My lips quivered.

OceanofPDF.com

DEADLY SERIOUS

"LET ME SHOW YOU."

Even freaked, I noticed a twinge of regret or remorse in his words.

Focusing on that was pointless, though.

Escaping.

Leaving the room in one piece. That was priority number one.

I'd moved from one side of the bed to the other, trying to get out.

Without meaning to, I stepped off the edge and between the curtains and the mattress.

When my foot hit the floor, a sharp pain zinged my knee, but I barely noticed.

Swinging my other leg around, I placed it on the floor, scooted onto all fours, and climbed out of the curtains.

Free! I let out a sob of relief but quickly covered my mouth as I stood.

If I couldn't see, then maybe he couldn't either.

Wiping my eyes, I stuck my hands out in front of me, feeling for the wall, or a chair, or a door, and took a cautious step forward.

My knee gave, and I whimpered. "This isn't funny," I said, my teeth chattering.

A moment later, I bumped into something. It was pliable yet solid.

Apprehensively I touched it, trying to figure out what it was.

It wasn't a door or a chair.

But a person.

His jaw was square, his hair soft and thick, shoulders broad and muscled. His chest was taut.

When my mind realized what my hands were doing, I screamed and took a step backward. Strong hands grabbed me by the waist.

"Snow," he whispered. His breath brushed against my cheek and smelled of ginger tea.

A wave of relief washed over me.

It had to be one of the brothers.

"Who is this?" He hadn't really sounded like Dorian, Heathcliff, or Gabe, but he'd kept his voice low, so the possibility of it being one of them still existed.

I reached up and touched his face with my hands.

It wasn't Gabe. Of that, I was confident.

Heath was tall, like this guy, but he didn't have scruff on his face.

Dorian was taller than them both and certainly as brawny as the man in front of me.

"If you're trying to tease me, I'm not laughing. I hurt my knee, and I'm scared." Another sob grabbed my throat, but I clamped it down.

I hoped my honesty would reprimand him, and he'd turn on the lights.

"I'm not teasing. This is deadly serious." His grasp on my waist shifted as he pulled me firmly against him with one arm.

His other hand slid into my hair.

With a firm yank, he pulled my head back, exposing my neck.

I sucked in my breath, preparing to scream.

My eyes were adjusting to the darkness, and I could see the red tinge in his eyes.

They glowed the way Kenmei's had.

"What do you want?" Fear pulsed inside my ears.

"To taste you." He opened his mouth.

So close to him, I watched his canines grow.

Without thinking, I sent my good knee into his groin.

A look of humorous surprise sprang into his eyes before burning anger replaced it.

His teeth sank into my neck, my skin parting like a boat gliding through water.

When he started to suck, everything became hazy, like a dream.

My body suddenly ached for his touch even as my mind revolted.

I heard myself sigh and pushed my neck deeper into his mouth.

The man shuddered, and the pull of my blood from my body became more vigorous.

Then there was darkness.

I WAS BEING SHAKEN.

"Snow. Snow. Wake up."

With a jolt, I shot up in my chair. My head had been resting on the table.

My eyes were blurry.

The light from the chandelier glared.

All my thoughts were on the man with the glowing red eyes and the way he'd been drinking my blood.

Yearning and loathing swirled through my organs.

A scream gurgled out, and I grabbed at my throat.

"What's wrong?" Gabe asked, his face contorted with worry.

Wiping my eyes, I scanned the room.

Kenmei, Hiro, Heathcliff, Dorian, and Gabe stared at me with a mixture of apprehension and worry.

Standing, my chair shot out and knocked to the floor.

"What's going on?" I don't know why, but I focused all of my anger on Kenmei.

"Some psycho bit me," I screamed, slamming my hands on the table. It shattered right down the middle.

The guys stood as the table leaned toward them, and the white cups slid to the floor.

Kenmei bent and whispered something to Hiro.

The boy nodded and ran off.

Gabe put his hands out. "Snow, it's okay." He studied the table, dragging a hand through his hair as though he were trying to come to grips with what had just transpired.

I'd broken a freaking table with my bare hands, and I should've been terrified, but I was unable to rein in the burning anger.

Loud pounding noises, like a hundred drummers banging the bass, sounded inside my head. The rhythm made my blood boil.

I touched my neck in the place where the man had bitten.

I could feel the raised scar tissue.

"Aha!" It had really happened. Somehow.

That knowledge thrilled me in a strange, crazy way.

"Look," I said, grabbing Gabe's hand and pressing his fingers to my neck.

So close, I smelled his shampoo and his deodorant.

Ginger tea tinged his breath.

I also smelled something else. It was fragrant, musky. Kind of like air on a rainy day.

Was it fear?

Placing a hand on his chest, I realized the banging bass in my brain was Gabe's heart, and the other pounding was the beating of the others' hearts.

"Can you feel the scars?" I asked Gabe, trying to contain my need to shout. "Or see a bruise? There must be a bruise, at least."

He leaned away slightly, his green eyes wide. "No."

He tried to look at my neck, but I pushed him away, frustrated.

"No? How can you not feel it? Where's a mirror?"

Bowing slightly, I stopped in front of Kenmei. Tilting my neck toward him, I swallowed my overwhelming panic, brushed away tears, and fought my ferocious anger.

"Do you see anything?" I asked through clenched teeth.

He kept his face neutral. "There is something supernatural surrounding you. I felt its presence the moment you appeared on my doorstep."

That wasn't an answer, but I couldn't push my wayward tears back any longer and sank into the chair Hiro had occupied a moment ago.

"What's happening to me?"

The little boy, Hiro, peeked around the corner. "Shiryo! Shiryo! Shiryo!"

The word filled me with panic. "What's that? What's he saying?"

Heathcliff, Dorian, and Gabe had come to stand behind me.

I knew it because the rapid pounding of their hearts grew closer.

"Shiryo. What does that mean?" Dorian asked, only slightly more calmly than me.

Kenmei gave Hiro a reproachful look. "Did you do as I asked?"

"Yes, Grandfather. Adam Henry is coming."

Heathcliff sprang into action. "I'd better leave a message with the others that we might be a while." He took his cell from his pocket and excused himself from the room.

Kenmei dragged in a deep breath. "Shiryo is Japanese for ghost, spirit, or revenant."

As he spoke the last word, he looked directly at me. His explanation sank deep into my veins.

Revenant.

I rolled the word over in my mind.

"What exactly is a revenant?" Gabe asked. His voice shook with emotion, and I looked back.

He smiled, but it didn't reach his eyes.

Our short-lived romance was over before it'd begun.

I could sense it.

But he promised, I thought, agony crushing my heart.

"After I tell you, you boys should head home. This may take a while."

"We aren't leaving her," Dorian added, coming to stand protectively beside me.

"I understand." A sad smile lifted Kenmei's lips. "A revenant is a changeling. Not quite human and not quite a vampire."

At that word - vampire - all hell broke loose.

The guys started shouting simultaneously about lies and fairytales.

I pulled my knees to my chest and put my forehead on my kneecaps.

Tears dripped from my eyes onto my jeans.

I'd let the brothers figure this one out.

BLOODLUST TEA

I SPENT another hour in the chair, hiding my face, barely listening to the conversation between Kenmei, Dorian, Heathcliff, Gabe, and Hiro.

Professor Pops finally arrived along with the other four brothers. With his assurance that he'd fill them in later, he sent them home.

Then Kenmei led Professor Pops and me into another room. It was small, more like a closet, with just an organized brown desk and three straight back chairs.

Professor Pops patted my back kindly. "Tell us what happened, and don't leave anything out."

I relayed the events, including the embarrassing fact that I'd found pleasure in the guy biting me, sucking my blood.

Professor Pops and Kenmei exchanged a knowing look.

"Do you understand what happened?" I asked Professor Pops.

He cleared his throat and studied his hands.

His nervousness scared me worse than anything.

"Snow, I've known for some time that you'd been marked. I expected she would wait until after your sixteenth birthday to send him," Pops said. "That's normally when the first exchange happens."

He glanced at Kenmei. "I'd hoped, between Kenmei and I, we could find a way to keep it from occurring." He blew out a breath. "We've failed."

"What does the bite mean? It did actually happen somehow, right? I didn't dream about it?" Part of me wanted them to say it was just make-believe while another part of me knew it was real and that everything was about to change.

"Yes, it happened. No, it wasn't a dream. The vampire queen has potent magic. While the boys believed you were asleep, you'd actually gone into another realm. The hunter, a drone vampire, bit you. He is special, also marked by her." Pops paused a moment.

"The hunter has been given the specific task of changing you into a vampire. Do you remember anything about what he looks like?" he asked.

I shook my head. "Only his red eyes."

Answering my questions only filled me with more. Who was this queen? Why the hell had I been marked? And what did any of it mean?

Professor Pops gave me a meaningful look. "I can almost see the inquiries in your head. They will be answered. Of the utmost importance is for you to realize you're changing, and you'll be craving blood."

"I see," I said, not really seeing at all.

I'd never liked meat.

Never.

At the thought of killing an innocent animal, I winced in disgust, so the idea of craving blood seemed unimaginable and completely far-fetched.

Vampires weren't real.

Was this some elaborate joke?

As I asked myself the question, a wiggle of wanting hummed in my throat.

The beating of Professor Pops' heart called to me like an indulgent song.

Strange - I couldn't hear Kenmei's.

Out of everything, that's what I blurted. "Why can't I hear his heart beating?" I pointed accusingly and immediately felt ashamed.

Pointing was disrespectful. "Sorry, Kenmei-sensei." I bowed my head.

They both flinched in surprise. "You can already hear the beating of a heart?" Professor Pops asked.

"Yes, I hear yours, but I don't hear his." I bobbed my head in Kenmei's direction.

"Kenmei's heart isn't like ours," Professor Pops said seriously.

"What? Why not?" I was stunned and discreetly pinched myself.

My life had gone from average, boring even, to the supernatural, in a matter of seconds.

"The world, as you've known it, is about to be altered most remarkably. Now that it has begun, there is no going back, I'm afraid." Professor Pops touched my cheek with his thumb, stroking it.

"I hoped it would never come to this, but I'm prepared nonetheless." He glanced at Kenmei.

"Are you ready to learn, Shiryo-san?" the old man asked softly.

"Okay." That was all I could utter. I didn't seem to have a choice.

BY MYSELF IN THE BATHROOM, I stared at my reflection. "You are a revenant," I whispered.

Even she wasn't buying it. I didn't appear any different.

I figured I'd have a bruise on my neck where he bit me, but I didn't. It'd been two hours, seventeen minutes, and - I checked my watch - eight seconds since the guy with glowing red eyes sank his extra-pointy canines into my throat.

One hour, forty-five minutes, and twelve seconds since Professor Pops and Kenmei told me what being bitten meant.

Was I worried I'd grow fangs and start shunning the light?

Damn right I was.

According to Kenmei, that wasn't going to happen - at least, not in this phase. Over the next several weeks, I'd gain strength, agility, and a penchant for blood.

Yay, I thought sarcastically, gagging.

Professor Pops and I were still at Kenmei's.

Obnoxious Hiro had gone to bed.

I didn't feel tired, not really.

From my expression, clearly, I was in shock.

No one could blame me.

It wasn't every day one was bitten and changed into a make-believe being, only apparently, they - we - weren't make-believe.

Evidently, revenants existed, as did vampires, fairies, unicorns, and many other creatures, I'd rather not think about.

I turned on the faucet in the bathroom, patted some water on my face. The cold temperature soothed.

"Snow, are you alright?" Professor Pops asked after lightly knocking on the bathroom door.

I jumped.

My first thought was, No! I'm freaked beyond my wildest imagination, and I want to go home and hide under the covers.

"Sure. I'll be out in a minute," I said out loud.

"Just know I'm here," he said.

I washed my hands and turned out the light. He waited for me on the other side of the door. I knew because I heard the slightly accelerated beating of his heart.

A twisting need rose in my throat, but I pushed the wanting down, the craving tolerable. Resting my hand on the knob, I turned it slowly.

The first thing Kenmei had given me after the revenant revelation was an herbal tea. It consisted of chaparral, red clover, bloodroot, mistletoe, the eye of newt, unicorn horn, and fairy dust.

It didn't taste the best, but it was bearable.

Professor Pops had explained I needed to drink the tea twice a day: once in the morning and once in the evening to control my bloodlust.

I still had a hundred questions.

"Why me?" I asked when I opened the door.

Pops stepped back, then cleared his throat.

"Come and sit. Let's talk." A sea of guilt washed over his distinguished features but, before I said anything, he turned away.

I followed him into the tiny office. A bowl of steaming rice and vegetables sat in front of my chair on the edge of the desk.

"Is this for me?" I hoped so.

My stomach growled with hunger.

"Yes, Shiryo-san. I had these cooked up for you. I hope you're hungry." Kenmei's fathomless eyes shone brightly.

"Thank you." I scooped up the bowl and ate with the fork provided.

The aroma had my mouth-watering, but the flavors fell flat.

After I finished, I placed the empty dish on the table, satiated but not satisfied. I also realized I'd eaten in silence and that Professor Pops and Kenmei watched me expectantly.

"Sorry, were the two of you going to eat?" They didn't have food in front of them.

"No. We are curious as to how you're feeling." Professor Pops asked.

My face grew hot. Did they want to know if I intended to jump them?

Attack them for their blood?

Was I?

BEES IN A HIVE

AT THE THOUGHT OF BLOOD, my mouth watered. I ignored it. "I'm fine," I said to Professor Pops, grinding my teeth.

"The food tasted wonderful. Please tell your wife thank you," I added, studying Kenmei.

It was a lie.

The rice and vegetables had tasted like ash, but I had the distinct impression it wasn't because of his wife's cooking skills; more that my body had already begun its transformation.

He nodded. "I will."

"Now, let me answer your question," Professor Pops said, crossing one of his long legs over the other.

I peered at him, slightly confused.

"You asked why she chose you."

"Oh, right. Yes." I leaned back in the chair and clamped my twitchy hands in my lap.

"First, a little history." He crossed his legs, his reading glasses perched on the edge of his nose.

"Okay," I said, noting it'd become my word of the day.

"The vampire queen has been alive for thousands of years. By our best guess," he eyed Kenmei, "we'd say probably since the world began. Every hundred years, she must change bodies. Regardless of, or because of, her immortal properties, like a snake that sheds its skin, she too must escape the old body in favor of a new, healthier one."

I shuddered at the image of skin peeling away.

"When the queen is within twenty years or so of her need to shed, she sends out drone vampires."

I must have had a confused expression on my face.

"Think about bees in a hive," Pops said. "There is one queen who commands roughly fifty thousand bees, and ninety-nine out of every hundred are workers. They are also female. Then there are the drones, which are the males. Their job," he shifted uncomfortably. "They are required to do the queen's bidding - whatever that might be."

He flinched as though he were in pain.

My curiosity piqued.

"Doing otherwise is nearly impossible and detrimental," Pops finally finished. Then hurried on. "Within the hierarchy of the vampire queen's hive, within her army, are many, many more females. The male drone vampire's job is - " he trailed off and cleared his throat before continuing, "slightly different."

"Correct," Kenmei said, taking over. "The drones are sent into the world, searching for the most exquisite female humans. Once they find one, they mark her."

Professor Pops leaned close; his hands hovered near my right arm.

I knew what he hoped to find. I had a dark birthmark near my shoulder in the shape of a star.

It appeared around my fifth birthday.

I'd been getting dressed one morning and believed the mark to be a bug at first.

Worried, I'd shown my mother. She'd said it was nothing to worry about. "A kiss from magical fairies," had been her answer.

At the thought of my mother, tears gathered on my lashes.

"May I?" Pops asked.

I pulled up the sleeve. "So, a drone vampire marked me?" I heard the raw pain in my voice but pretended it didn't matter and moved my shoulder, so he and Kenmei saw the mark.

"Yes," Kenmei said, his face growing soft.

"Why don't I remember?" I let go of my sleeve and tucked my hands under my legs. Keeping my eyes down, I stared at my white tube socks - hand-me-downs from my neighbors.

"You were young, and the mark was most likely placed on you in your sleep," Professor Pops said.

At his words, something clicked.

"How do you know about all of this?" My stomach clenched.

Was Professor Pops' friendship only pretend?

Was he somehow involved?

Kenmei answered by moving his shirt. Where his shoulder met his arm, an evil-looking blade had been tattooed.

"What does that mean?" I asked after looking and sitting back. My heart raced rapidly, which made me happy. At least I still had one.

"When a drone vampire is marked to be a hunter by the queen, she marks him with one of these." He touched the blade hesitantly before covering it.

"D-did you mark me? Are you the one who bit me?" Fear flooded my veins. I stood, jumped over the desk, and pulled open the door before I grasped what I'd done.

"No, Shiryo-san." He shook his head once.

Both Professor Pops and Kenmei rose in unison, as though their movements had been synchronized.

Professor Pops had his arms out, a look of pleading on his face.

"We were a part of the queen's hive many, many years ago, but we left. For me, it's been more than five hundred years. For Kenmei - " He paused, glancing at the man.

"More than six thousand years," Kenmei said.

My hand dropped from the door handle. "Six thousand years? You're so old."

I also remembered the man who'd bitten me was much taller than Kenmei, his body firmer, younger. The way he'd smelled - like Heaven, my mind whispered.

I closed my eyes, trying to regain focus.

He bowed. "Yes, Shiryo-san. I was the first hunter. With my help, the queen transferred into a new body, the original Snow White."

I didn't want to believe but I had to ask. "Are you saying that the Snow White from the old movie was real?" I needed to sit before I fell.

On rubbery legs, I walked back over to my chair.

"Yes, Shiryo-san. She was real and very beautiful, just as you are. Though the story was more of a Brothers Grimm tale, and even they were way off."

It seemed strange to have someone say I was beautiful.

I didn't think I was ugly, just plain. I looked down, studying some nonexistent lint on my jeans.

"Am I the only one the vampire queen is after?" I asked after a few long moments of silence.

Kenmei smiled. "You are one of many. Hundreds. Adam Henry and I have made it our life's mission to help the marked."

"I am your Protector," Professor Pops stated.

I caught what Pops said but couldn't fathom the meaning behind the words at the moment.

Instead, I fixated on what Kenmei had said.

"There are hundreds? She only needs one body. Why not just take mine or one of the others right away? What's she waiting for?" I asked.

The two men looked at each other and something I didn't understand passed between them.

"A lot must happen for the body of a marked one to be ready. Many will die," Kenmei said.

Well, that sounded ominous.

"For the vampire queen's magic to work, the revenant must drink the blood of her true love," Professor Pops went on.

The memory of my dream where I'd tasted the heart, and its blood filled my mind.

It'd been the heart of my true love.

A warm hunger rushed through my body, and I shuddered.

Professor Pops noticed. "What is it, Snow?"

"I dreamt of a heart. Of tasting blood."

Both men started.

I somehow perceived their panic.

"Tell us everything. Leave nothing out," Kenmei said.

I told them about the guys and that I'd known the heart had been that of my true love, but I hadn't cared.

When I finished sharing, Pops and Kenmei didn't speak for what seemed like forever.

"What did the boys chant?" Professor Pops finally asked.

HOT PINK BRA

I THOUGHT A MOMENT, then repeated the words, "'Lips red as rubies, hair dark as night. Drink your true love's blood, become the vampire, Snow White.'"

As I spoke, thick darkness packed the air.

It was as though the queen entered me.

"This is worse than we believed," Professor Pops uttered.

"Yes," agreed Kenmei. "It seems the vampire queen may have a distinct interest in this one. Perhaps it's her name or her beauty. I must admit, Snow does have something extra special."

The tremor in my hands traveled into my arms and down my body.

"Is there nothing we can do? Because, I don't want that. Her, to take over my body. No!"

Professor Pops patted my hand. "Yes, of course. But we've shared enough with you tonight. Let's get you home."

I wanted to yell and tell him I needed to know everything right then, but I didn't.

He picked me up, like I weighed nothing.

"I can walk," I said, though my legs were wobbly, but Pops wouldn't hear my complaints, so I relaxed, tucking my head against his chest.

Kenmei said something about the tea, and he set my shoes on my lap.

I thanked him and closed my eyes.

When Professor Pops stepped into the alleyway, I recognized the odor.

"Were you one of her hunters too?" I whispered.

"Yes, Snow, I was."

Part of me wanted to be afraid, but I couldn't.

He'd been nothing but good to me. "Why did you leave?"

"The same reason Kenmei did.

I fell in love with one of the marked." His voice sounded sad.

"Does that happen a lot?" An idea or an impression wiggled its way into my mind.

I tried to grab hold of it, understand it, but too much had happened.

Too much information weighed on me.

"Yes, it does."

I got the feeling he wanted to say more. "What happened to the one you loved?" I asked, fearing the answer.

"She died."

"I'm so sorry, Professor Pops."

"As am I, Snow White. As am I."

I fell asleep, the pounding of his heart, the warmth of his arms, and the movement as he walked, making it too difficult to stay awake.

When we stepped off the train, my strength returned.

Professor Pops led me to a waiting car.

Though I didn't see his face, I heard Gabe.

Had he been waiting by the car?

"Will she be alright?" Gabe asked.

"I hope so. That's what we're here for."

WHEN I WOKE, my immediate reaction was anxiety.

This isn't my room, I thought.

The bed was king-sized and made out of brushed pewter.

The sheets were white, as were the comforter and pillowcases.

The walls were covered in posters of the Patriots - Dorian's favorite football team.

For the briefest moment, I wondered why Gabe hadn't let me sleep in his room.

Then he walked in, a mug of something steaming in his hand, and all thought left me.

I focused on the emerald green of his eyes and his smile.

"Hi," he said, sitting on the bed next to me.

Seeing his teeth made me think of morning breath and the fact that I hadn't brushed last night.

Covering my mouth, I sat up. "Hi, back."

He laughed and moved my hand. "So, you're a revenant? How are you handling the news?" He held out the mug, its steaming contents were dark and uninviting.

Taking it, I pressed the cup to my lips and took a small sip.

"Yep, that's me: Snow White, the revenant. And I'm handling the change," I paused, gauging my real feelings. "Fine." I shrugged.

I wanted to tell him everything, including that I heard his heart thumping, the sound of it pumping blood through his veins, and that it smelled better than any chocolate, and how I longed to reach over and taste him.

Instead, I swallowed a large portion of bloodlust tea.

"Good." He studied me a moment before brushing a piece of hair from my face. "You up to going to school?" he asked, standing.

I searched for a clock, trying to hide the warmth caused by his touch. "Is it Monday already?" Where had Sunday gone? I must've slept through it. "Can I go to school? Isn't Professor Pops afraid I'll eat someone or something?"

Gabe laughed. "Drink your tea, and you should be fine. That's what Pops says."

He walked to the door. "There are towels and girly stuff in Dorian's bathroom, including some clean clothes." He inclined his chin toward the open bathroom door.

"Don't freak out," he went on. "But yes, the shirt I chose for you is pink, and it's in your size and not four sizes too big."

I pulled back the covers and got out of bed. My socks had been removed, but I'd slept in my other clothes.

"Gee, thanks," I said, throwing a pillow at him. It smacked him in his face, and he fell, hitting his head against the wall with a thud.

I gasped and ran over to him. "Gabe. Gabe. Can you hear me?" I grabbed his arms and shook.

He moaned, and his eyes blinked open. "That was intense." He sat up.

"I'm so sorry. Remind me never to throw a pillow again." I noticed a dent in the wall behind him where his head made contact and swallowed down the tea coming back up.

"You've got some arm." He massaged the tender area of his head.

His amplified heartbeat pounded like a drum in my ears.

A delicious scent saturated his pores, like honey.

Without meaning to, I leaned into his neck and drew a deep breath.

His hands pressed against my shoulders, determinedly pushing me away. His expression was guarded.

I shook my head. "You good?" I asked, working to cover up what I'd almost done.

"Yep, great." He jumped up as if to show how good he was. "You mostly caught me off guard. But you'd better finish your tea." He eyed the mug warily.

"Right."

"Hurry and get ready. Pops made breakfast."

I nodded and closed the door after he was gone.

In the bathroom, I searched my reflection for changes.

Opened my mouth and checked my teeth for needle-sharp fangs.

Flexed my muscles.

They looked the same.

"You're still you," I said, pulling off my shirt and turning on the hot water.

AFTER MY SHOWER, I dressed rapidly.

Gabe had picked out a pink shirt with GO GREEN across the chest.

I liked it and the jeans.

They were fitted and sat low on my hips.

What I had issues with were the cotton hot pink bra and undies.

For one thing, they fit perfectly.

Not that I had a lot going on up top.

I was a good solid B cup.

How would they know, though?

Also, the undies were my style, except for the color.

I usually wore white underneath everything.

"Do I want to know?" I asked my reflection.

No, I definitely did not want to know.

Some things were better left unsaid.

After sliding on a pair of socks and a new pair of Converse, I brushed my hair and gathered my dirty clothes.

From the back pocket of my jeans, a piece of paper sailed to the floor.

I bent and picked it up.

"What's this?"

PLEDGED TO DESTROY HER

FONDLING THE PAPER, I unfolded the paper and read:

DEAREST SNOW,

You have been bitten by your hunter and are now a revenant.

Congratulations!

The strong survive, and only one will have the pleasure of becoming my new host.

Now is the time to play. Build up your strength.

Enjoy all your new body has to offer.

Find your true love.

Get your fill of him physically, emotionally, spiritually, and then kill him.

You must do so by your eighteenth birthday.

I believe in you, Snow.

You are passionate, and that is why I've marked you.

The sooner, the better.

Yours,

The Vampire Queen

MY HANDS SHOOK. The letter had been written by her and in - I sniffed the red ink and instantly knew it was blood.

Dread surged through me.

She could be anywhere, yet I knew nothing about her, not even what she looked like.

Quickly I went downstairs, the letter still clutched in my hand.

The aroma of toasted bread greeted me, and I hurried into the kitchen.

The guys were in varying degrees of feeding their faces, but when I walked in, they all froze.

I ran a hand through my still-wet hair.

"What's wrong?" Gabe came over immediately.

I held out the note.

"Please say you guys played a trick on me." I tried to laugh, holding out the paper.

Gabe took it and read it.

I watched the color drain from his face.

Professor Pops came over.

From his shirt pocket, he pulled his wire-framed glasses.

Gabe handed him the letter.

After reading, he set it on the counter, replaced his glasses in his pocket, and wiped a hand over his face.

"Do all the marked receive a note from her after they've been bitten?"

His face looked bleak. "In past centuries, I've heard that more than one of the marked have received something similar. I must speak with Kenmei and the others."

The brothers circulated the paper.

Had I not been panicked to the point of passing out, I might've laughed.

"How many others are there? And are you all drone vampires who've left the queens hive?" I asked, focusing on Professor Pops' navy button-up shirt.

Pops kept his voice low. "There are several, though none are as old as Kenmei and I. Not all of us are hunters. Some are workers. Some are supernatural creatures, born of the seven magics, and they know of the queen. All of us have pledged to destroy her."

I tucked my hands in my back pockets and started pacing.

"Can you, though? She's been alive for thousands of years. You've been fighting against her for, like, forever. What hope is there that you can accomplish this? I mean, really?"

I felt terrible for stating it so bluntly, but facts were facts. Might as well get them into the open.

"You're right, of course. The task seems bleak, but we believe we've figured out a way."

"How do you plan to stop her?" Gabe asked, moving farther from me.

That stung.

I guessed he was rethinking his crush on me.

The whole "kill him" line in the note was pretty disturbing, and then there was my dream. Gabe hadn't been with his brothers.

Was he my true love?

At the thought, my heart picked up speed.

Whoever he was, my true love's blood had tasted better than anything I could imagine.

My knees quaked, weak.

"Yes, how do you plan to stop her?" I repeated, forcing back the thoughts I'd been entertaining of tasting Gabe's blood.

Professor Pops regarded me. "You must receive true love's kiss, first."

Gabe perked up. And my face got hot.

"So my true love's heart will turn me into a vampire, and true love's kiss will what?" I cleared my throat.

"His kiss will free you, and you will once again become completely human," Professor Pops looked triumphant.

I wasn't convinced. That seemed too easy.

"Awesome," Daniel shouted.

He was usually so quiet. We were all stunned and turned to gawk at him.

"Well, it is," Daniel added.

"Why don't you eat something, Snow? The waffles are vegan." Professor Pops seemed distracted, plucking his reading glasses from his pocket and rereading the letter.

I grabbed a waffle and took a bite, but it tasted like paper. I knew what I wanted - blood.

But that was out of the question.

Angry, I shoved the rest of the waffle in my mouth and chewed.

The brothers watched me.

I was too upset to be embarrassed, and if they had a problem with that, they could suck it.

"What?" I finally asked. "We've got to get to school. I'm hurrying," I said, after chewing and swallowing all of my food.

"Should she be going to school?" Heathcliff asked, his words hesitant.

"Yes, yes. Go to school. Keep an eye on her." Professor Pops waved in my direction. "After school, go to track practice and then come here. I need to get your input on some birthday plans."

He glanced at me over his glasses, an incomprehensible look in his eyes, and I was shocked. It was like he wasn't even worried that I was changing - and craving blood.

"If you're sure." I rinsed my plate in the sink, thinking he had more trust in me than I did of myself.

"I am. Now, if you'll excuse me, I've got to make a few calls." He walked out of the kitchen without a backward glance.

"Birthday plans?" Dorian asked.

I shrugged again, beyond confused by the way Professor Pops was acting.

"Professor Pops wants to throw me a birthday party here." How could he still be considering my silly birthday?

Did he expect me to go on with my life like nothing happened?

"Whoa, your letter has Pops worked into quite a tizzy," Salvatore said, sliding up to me. He grinned, and I guessed he wasn't afraid.

In fact, he wanted to kiss me.

It was weird that I could tell, but it was pretty obvious since his focus rested on my lips.

He licked his, moistening them.

"In fact, I think this will be fun." Salvatore placed his hands on my arms a little uneasily, like he was getting ready to press his lips against mine.

"What are you doing, Salvatore?" I asked snickering.

This close, it was like I could taste his aftershave, the sweet syrup on his breath, and the fabric softener on his clothes.

I didn't want a kiss, but to sample his blood and I shuddered at where my mind headed.

Ugh.

"Well, if true love's kiss will turn you back into a human, I say it's our duty, no, our responsibility as your friends, to kiss you." Salvatore smiled, leaning in, so the scent of his blood overwhelmed me.

Gabe shoved Salvatore. "Get away from her!" He breathed heavily, his hands formed into fists at his sides.

"Dude, you're so touchy," he said to Gabe. Then he waved and took off toward the garage. "I'll catch you later, Snow."

I laughed. At least he joked with me.

Gabe was just overprotective and growly.

Gabe followed after Salvatore. "I'll drive Snow."

I regarded the guys. "Guess I'm getting a ride with Gabe."

They chuckled, and each patted or slugged my shoulders or ruffled my hair.

Absently I noticed each of them had a distinctive scent, and it wasn't their cologne. It was their blood.

"See you at school," Dorian said.

"Right, see ya." I hurried after Gabe, doubting school was a good idea.

DO I TELL CINDY

INSIDE THE SCHOOL, Gabe walked me to my locker. When we arrived, he stopped and touched my arm. Shivers danced along my sensitive skin.

"I've got to get to class. See you at lunch." He squeezed my hand, and I squeezed back.

A gnawing nervousness swelled as I watched him walk away.

I was nervous about being without him.

My first class was chemistry, and I was totally unprepared for the quiz on Matter.

I also had an assignment due in Algebra II and verbs that needed conjugating for Spanish.

While I emptied my books into my locker, I made a mental promise to talk to my teachers about extra credit or a way to make up the work.

"Bonjour, Snow. Where have you been?" Cindy asked, using the French word for hello despite the ring of agitated irritation I detected in her words.

"Hey, Cin. Your French is coming along nicely," I returned, wondering if she'd discern anything different about me.

Closing my locker, I turned to face her annoyance, which I knew I deserved.

She'd said she'd call me on Sunday when she got back from the Cape, but I hadn't been home.

When I'd picked up my backpack from home this morning, I noticed several messages flashing on our dinosaur of an answering machine.

I gathered they were from her, but I hadn't listened to them.

"Sorry. I - " I paused.

Did I tell her?

Professor Pops hadn't said I should keep what happened to me a secret.

But seriously, if I did, she'd probably think I'd gone batty.

"I spent the weekend over at Professor Pops' with the guys." I closed my locker and moved toward my first class.

"Lucky," she pouted. "I went to a party with my parents. Totally lame." She rolled her eyes. "But one kind of weird thing happened. I'll have to tell you about it later."

"Can't wait."

She looked gorgeous as ever.

Dark jeans, a sky blue cashmere sweater, strappy black wedge heels that made her almost as tall as me and showed off her perfectly french pedicured toenails.

Her hair had been pulled into a high ponytail and bobbed when she walked.

I smelled chemistry class way before reaching it, a combination of vinegar, sulfur, sugar, and sweat.

The odor was strong and stung my nose, but it wasn't strong enough to block the scent of so much blood.

Even with the bloodlust tea, I still might sink my revenant teeth into someone.

I clenched my free hand into a fist, only half-listening to Cin talk about the drama from the party over the weekend and the random guy she hooked up with.

When we entered class, Cindy took a seat.

We shared a table second row from the front and next to the wall full of windows.

After dropping my backpack on the floor, I propped a window open and dragged in a long, cleansing breath.

"Snow, what are you doing?" she asked.

"Needed some fresh air is all," I said, sitting on the stool next to her.

Unzipping my bag, I pulled out my notes, hoping I could do a quick review before Mr. Wallace passed out the quiz.

"It's cold. You should - " Cindy stopped, and her knee pressed into my thigh. "New guy," she hissed.

"Really? He wasn't here on Fri - " I lifted my eyes just as he stopped in front of me.

"Hey, Snow. Is this seat taken?" He pointed to the chair in front of us, which was empty and had remained vacant since Bobby Melville got sent to the principal's office for burning his partner, Sammy Snells, with acid and ended up expelled.

I shook my head. "Hey, Charming. No. Go ahead."

"Cool." He sat and inclined his chin toward Cindy. "Hi, Cindy. Did you have fun at the Cape?"

I heard her swallow before answering and was surprised.

It shocked me to think of Cindy as nervous. I thought she said she wasn't interested.

"Oh, yeah. It was a blast," she answered, twisting her ponytail around her fingers.

A light breeze blew in from the window. Thankful, I pulled in another large breath of air and froze.

My teeth, the ones Kenmei and Professor Pops said I wouldn't need to worry about for a couple of weeks, extended into fangs and pricked the inside of my mouth.

Electric butterflies danced in my stomach, and my body yearned for blood - Chace's blood. I felt my eyes grow wide in terror.

"Snow?" Chace rolled his seat over, touching my arm. "Is everything alright?" He appeared concerned, as did Cindy.

"What's the matter?" she asked, eyeing me with a look that said, please don't embarrass me.

"I've got to go." I grabbed my backpack and dashed from the room. Knocking into our teacher, Mr. Wallace in the hall and mumbling a quick, "Sorry," I ran.

Thankfully, it was mostly empty.

Only a few stray students rushed by, the same as me. I dashed into the nearest girls' bathroom, locked myself in a stall, and dropped my bag.

With a ragged sigh, I leaned my forehead against the door.

Tears leaked onto my cheeks.

I closed my eyes, letting them fall.

"Snow." My name seemed to be threaded on the air.

Opening my eyes, I witnessed what my body had already confirmed.

I was no longer in the bathroom but in a lush forest.

The sun shone bright, and I knew I'd entered another realm and that I'd been brought here because of the vampire queen's magic.

Would I meet her this time?

There was so much I didn't comprehend.

I slowly turned in a circle, taking in my surroundings, and noticed I wasn't wearing my jeans and tee-shirt any longer, but a deep red cotton dress.

The sleeves were short and lined in black ribbing, as was the round, scooped collar, and the dress's hem went to my knees.

My feet were bare.

It surprised me that I wasn't afraid.

I was bitten in this realm.

The hunter took my blood and turned me into a revenant, so fear should've been what I felt.

"Hello," I murmured, carefully stepping over a boulder, moving in the direction of a babbling brook.

As I walked, I sensed a presence: The hunter's.

That knowledge didn't frighten me either. Instead, excited anticipation filled my stomach with butterflies.

I bit my lip. "Where are you?"

The scenery shimmered in the early morning light, and dewdrops glistened on bright green leaves and spongy moss.

The air flourished, fragrant with flowers in lavender, rose, butter yellow, and blue. They bloomed in abundance.

Chipmunks, rabbits, and deer examined me. Their ears perked, and their noses wiggled, sniffing for danger.

"It's been too long since I've savored you." Each of his words came out laced with longing and sent jolts of longing through my veins.

"Let me see you." I remembered how I'd felt when he drank from me, and I trembled at the possibility of another round.

He stepped from behind a large tree.

A thick brown hood shaded his face, so all I saw were his glowing red eyes.

He wore a brown leather vest that enhanced his broad shoulders, rippling biceps, and trim waist.

His pants were made of cloth and hung low on his hips with a leather belt keeping them secured.

A large knife sat in a sheath and was attached to his belt.

Dark brown boots covered his feet.

At the sight of him, my body tensed.

Not out of fear but desire.

I wanted his arms around me. I wanted his lips on my neck, his mouth drinking from me.

"What is your name, hunter?" I asked, my voice shaking with need.

WHAT YOU DESIRE

"HERE I AM CALLED CHRISTOPHER," he replied gruffly. He stepped away from the tree and into the sunlight. I still couldn't see his face.

"If you're a vampire, why doesn't the sun burn you?" I asked, curious.

My hunger for his blood seared so strong, it took every ounce of effort I possessed not to attack him.

"The queen's magic is very powerful. I have no fear of the sun." Another step.

I moved toward him, our steps like a dance, a deadly dance, one I didn't want to win.

If I reached out my hands, I would've touched him, but I didn't.

He smelled earthy, like clover and honey.

"Are you going to bite me again?" The words left my mouth, and I instantly knew I wanted him to.

"I will if that is what you desire." He sounded so calm, but his heart raced.

Another step.

Our bodies practically touched, but we kept our hands to our sides.

"If you're a vampire, why does your heart beat?" I asked startled.

"More of the queen's magic," he replied his words like a soft gust against my face.

"Can I bite you?" I'd blurted the question before my brain had time to filter it.

That was my deepest desire, though.

The need pounded through my veins.

At my request, he raised his head, exposing the flesh at his neck. I licked my lips, squinting to see his face. Still, all I saw were his eyes, and they appeared surprised.

"Yes," he said, in a voice that quivered.

I slipped my hands into his hood, caressing his neck.

His pulse quickened.

In one movement, he lifted me, and we were eye to eye. This whole business of biting and being bitten was new to me, but I was eager to learn and leaned in, desperate to taste him.

"Wait," he said huskily.

But I didn't want to.

I opened my mouth, allowing my fangs to extend as he walked backward until his back pressed against a tree, then he slid down, so he rested at its base.

I readjusted my body sideways as I sat in his lap.

His red eyes glowed with desire, and he slanted his neck toward me.

My hands were still on him, and he was so warm, his skin soft, like the supple leather vest he wore.

"Christopher." I said his name so I wouldn't say what I was really thinking, which was that I wanted to be drinking from him now.

His hands made their way into my hair, his body asking, the way mine had the other night. But he paused. "Are you sure you want to do this?"

His question brought me up short. "Yes." Then I thought of a question. "Is that bad?"

At that moment, I didn't care.

If it was bad, then I wanted to be bad.

His blood called to me like a siren's song.

"No." He sounded pained.

My fangs retracted some.

"Why can't I see your face? Do I know you?" He sounded familiar.

"If you drink from me, I can show myself; otherwise, the queen's magic won't allow it." I caught the tone, the pleading.

Physically he desired me, but there was a hesitation, almost an insistence that I resist.

I wavered, and my fangs retreated some more.

Instead of answering, he sucked in a breath before pulling me to him, his lips claiming mine with a hunger similar to what I was feeling.

As one, our lips moved together.

Like we were two halves of the same whole.

It made sense. He was a vampire, and I was changing.

Never once did I consider him my true love.

I didn't know him.

What I craved was purely physical.

But I had a moment's pause.

Even if I didn't know it yet, could he be my true love?

Could kissing him remove the curse or whatever that had settled on me when he marked me?

Did I have a say, or was my true love already embedded in my DNA?

Christopher bit my bottom lip, bringing me out of my thoughts.

Turning, I took his face in my hands and kissed him hungrily - even hopefully.

If he was my true love, this would all be over.

Even as I thought that I knew it wasn't so.

Still, that didn't dampen my desire for him, and when he pressed open my mouth and dove in with his tongue, I shuddered at the new sensation, tugging him closer.

It was my first real kiss, and if I could've popped a foot, I would have.

As it was, I sighed, running my hands along his shoulders and down to his chest.

He groaned softly, our lips separating as he trailed kisses along my jaw to my ear.

As our hands roamed each other's bodies, it occurred to me that I was making out with a guy I didn't even know.

Oh my gosh, what was going on with me?

What about Gabe?

I pushed back, searching his face, and lifted a hand to slap him. But he didn't deserve my anger. I was mostly angry at myself.

"How dare you?" I asked, not really meaning it, and I jumped up, walking away, my hands clutching at the folds of my dress.

What was I doing? I dragged in a quick breath, desperate to control my irregular breathing. "I need to get out of here."

He sauntered over, this time with confident determination.

I saw the predator in him.

Felt it too.

A tangible force.

"Not yet."

Taking my face in his hands, he tilted my head, so he had access to my neck.

Like before, I watched his fangs grow.

My heart sprinted so fast I thought it'd come out of my chest.

When his teeth met my neck, I responded eagerly, unable to help myself.

It shouldn't feel so good, but it did.

My hands ran from his fingertips up his arms, past his shoulders, and into his hood.

I wanted to see his face. I wanted to see him.

With effort, I focused on tugging it off.

A laugh rumbled deep in his chest, and then I heard his voice in my mind as he vanished from my view.

"Seek out your true love," he said. "You, beautiful Snow, are the key to defeating the queen."

IMMEDIATELY, I was back in the girls' bathroom. The smell gave it away, even before I opened my eyes.

Someone was in the bathroom with me.

There was a knock on the stall door.

"Snow, are you alright?"

It was Dorian.

I picked up my backpack, thankful he'd found me.

Opening the door, I considered him. He stood with his feet apart, his arms at his sides as though waiting for battle.

Concern filled his features.

"I'm fine," I answered, trying to reassure him. "What are you doing in here? You're so not a girl."

That was true.

Dorian had become quite good looking over the years.

No longer a gangly teenager, but a tall man covered in lean muscle.

I pushed past him and walked to a sink, casually peering at my neck in the mirror.

Newly healed scars glared back.

"I watched you come in here. After ten minutes, I thought I'd better make sure you weren't drinking the blood of some poor, unsuspecting female." His eyes gleamed with amusement.

"Do you see anything on my neck?" I asked, slanting my neck toward him.

He shook his head. "Did something happen again?"

I WANTED HIS BLOOD

I DIDN'T WANT to lie. "Yes. I went into the other realm. He, the hunter, was there." I washed my hands and patted a wet paper towel over my face.

"I don't know if it's a good idea for me to be here."

At my words, his eyes grew wide in mock terror, and he circled his neck with his hands.

Lifted one brow comically. "Thirsty? Do you vant to suck my blood?" He spoke with the lively silliness of an old-fashioned vampire from a black and white movie, but the worry in his body was evident. Palpable.

I sighed, turning and leaning my butt against the sink.

"I am worried I might bite someone. Your blood pulls at my bloodlust, but not too bad," I said so he wouldn't be afraid.

His face fell.

Dorian actually seemed sad that I didn't want his blood.

Which wasn't true, anyway.

Of course, I wanted his blood.

It smelled intoxicating.

"Oh," he stepped closer, his features changing from teasing to seriousness. "If you ever do need some - blood, I mean - you're welcome to mine."

I gasped. "Do you even know what you're offering?"

Anger lanced within my brain.

How dare he tempt me? His naiveté made me want to bite him, inflict a little pain, a little reality check.

But then I wondered, would he enjoy it the way I had.

There was one way to find out.

Professor Pops hadn't told me not to bite humans, and Dorian offered.

I decided to give my new fangs a whirl.

"Come here, then," I said.

He gulped, and his pulse picked up speed.

"Nervous?" I asked, a smidge glad.

"A little," he admitted, but I saw he would hold true to his word.

I placed my hands on his appealing neck and pulled him down, much the same way I'd handled Christopher not too many minutes ago.

Tentative at first, I touched my lips to his neck.

He let out a soft groan.

Whether it was from fear or anticipation, I didn't know, and in the next moment, I didn't care.

My fangs extended, pricking his neck.

Before I could taste him, the door flung open.

Dorian tucked me into his chest. "Just a minute," he said, his voice heavy.

I quivered in a fury at being interrupted, but I didn't want anyone to see my fangs, so I took a deep breath, inhaling the delicious guy smell that was the handsome Dorian.

My fangs retracted.

Peeking up, I searched Dorian's eyes.

A tight smile sat on his lips.

I smiled back before gazing around him at who'd so rudely interrupted.

"What the hell is going on, Snow?" Complete shock filled Cindy's face, and I laughed.

"Hey, Cin," I said with choked amusement.

It wasn't that I found the situation funny so much as I had all of this anxiety stored up, and it was finally coming out, and I couldn't help myself.

Dorian recovered and swung around. "I was making sure she was okay. Our Snow needed a hug, that's all." He regarded me. "You're good, right?"

"Yes, thank you, Dorian." I closed my lips, trying to hold in the laughter, but that didn't help.

My conscience gnawed with guilt.

I'd kissed Christopher and nearly drank Dorian's blood.

But I liked Gabe.

I was changing in more ways than one, and it was happening so fast.

Dorian escaped the bathroom without a backward glance.

Cindy huffed and stomped her foot. "What's gotten into you?" She walked to the mirror and checked her reflection.

I faced her, rolling back my shoulders. "Oh, Cin. It's a long, crazy story."

She gave me the eye, the one that questioned my motives, the one that got right to the center of me.

"I want to hear all about it. First, Mr. Wallace wanted me to tell you you're supposed to go to the office for a tardy slip. He said you're not allowed in class without it. I've got to get back." She ran her hands through her ponytail.

"Chace seemed concerned. He even took off after you did. For a minute there, I thought you were in his arms." She let out a sigh.

"See you in a few. Au revoir," she added as the door closed behind her.

I straightened my shirt and picked up my backpack. Cindy's strong perfume lingered, and it dawned on me. Cindy's blood hadn't inspired even a little bit of hunger. "Huh."

In the office, I called Professor Pops and explained briefly what'd happened - the way my fangs grew and how I'd gone to the other realm where the hunter, Christopher, bit me again.

I left out Dorian offering himself.

The confession would be pointless, and I didn't want what he'd done getting back to Gabe or the other brothers.

Professor Pops spoke with the school's secretary, excusing me from the rest of my classes.

He picked me up in front of the school, his distinguished face lined with worry.

In the cupholder between the seats sat a carafe.

"Bloodlust tea?" I guessed as I buckled my seatbelt.

"Drink up. I made a double dose in the hopes that will help." He eyed me warily.

I took a sip and grimaced. It was intense, but I finished it all. When I placed the empty container back in the holder, Professor Pops nodded his approval.

"I know all about your hunter, Christopher. He is very good at what he does. I'm sorry I must say this, but at this point, propriety be damned." He gave me a quick look, probably to determine my level of shame.

"What is it?"

"He's skilled in the art of seduction. I also know he has an unlimited lust for power. He wants to be the vampire queen's second."

Hearing his words, I became angry.

Well, more like hurt.

I guess I wanted to believe Christopher reacted to me the way he did not because it was his job, but because he felt something for me.

Ugh.

I would not be that girl!

We rode in silence all the way to his mansion. Professor Pops pulled into the driveway, parked, and we got out.

After I followed him into the house and sat at a barstool in the kitchen, he gave me a sad smile. "Your revenant abilities are developing far faster than most, and I think I know why."

As he spoke, he peeled a banana and tossed it into a blender.

Then he pulled some almond milk from the refrigerator and some ice from the freezer, adding them to the blender as well.

Finally, he added some sugar and a dash of vanilla.

He turned it on, the noise drowning out everything running through my head.

Several seconds later, he turned the blender off and poured the smoothie into a tall glass.

"Here you go," he said, handing it to me.

"Thank you." I sipped, wishing for something else.

He handed me a napkin.

After I wiped my mouth, I asked the most straightforward question. "Why?"

He took a deep breath. "First, answer this question. Did you crave Cindy's blood? Or another female's blood at any time this morning?"

I thought a moment. "No, I didn't."

Professor Pops blew out a breath. "Your best friends are seven boys, young men who are desirable and who find you desirable."

At those words, I blushed. "Nu-uh," I said.

He patted my hand. "You may try to hide it, Snow, but you are very, very beautiful. Truly one of the fairest in the land," he added, his features softening.

My face felt like it was on fire. "What does that, or the fact that my best friends are guys, have to do with anything?"

OceanofPDF.com

GLADLY BE YOUR BOYFRIEND

PROFESSOR POPS WAITED until I got it. Then went on, "Not every teenage girl is in a situation like yours - seven young men vying for her attention."

"We're just friends, though. And they're not 'vying.'" That was ridiculous. I took another drink, thankful I had something to do.

"You may not have noticed it yet, but I believe every one of them would gladly be your boyfriend if you allowed him. I've seen the way you and Gabe act around each other. Something is going on with you two."

I stared into the drink. "I wanted something between us but, ever since I was bitten, and with the note this morning, he's been different." I took another gulp, worried about whether I should mention what Christopher said, but I couldn't bring myself to blurt it out.

Professor Pops sighed, rubbing his hands over his face.

It seemed he'd aged a hundred years in the past few days.

"I think it's time I tell you about the Seven Magics Academy."

I fiddled with the glass, unable to meet his gaze. I'd never heard of such a place, and I didn't know whether I wanted to.

"I've been training the boys since I adopted them," he went on. "Gabe, though he's younger than most of them, was actually my first student."

I nodded, remembering the day I rode my new bike along Professor Pops' circular driveway and fell off.

Before I could start to cry, Gabe ran out, all legs and arms and thick curly hair, and helped me up.

"You'll be okay," he'd said, brushing off my knees. "Shake it off."

"The academy is a place for them to learn about the supernatural, train, and gain strength. They've been learning - though they didn't know it at first - how to help, hunt, and kill supernatural creatures of all kinds in case any of them came after my boys or, more specifically, you."

I lifted my glass to take a drink and stiffened. "Why would anything else be after me?"

Professor Pops came around and stuck out his hand.

"Come with me. I need to show you something."

I set down the glass and rose, hesitantly placing my hand in his. "What?" I asked, my nervousness easy to hear.

"You'll see. Consider this your Seven Magics Academy induction ceremony."

I snorted. "Can't wait."

He led me down the stairs to another door, which he unlocked.

Apprehension fluttered along my belly. "So, I'm going to take classes on staking vampires?"

"Afraid not, Snow." As he tucked the key to the basement door back inside his shirt, I realized in all the years I'd known Professor Pops and the guys, I'd been over to their house a lot, but never once had I thought about going into the basement. Never once had I been below the main floor. Had that been because of a spell? Was it magic?

Once he had the door open, he glanced at me. "Come," he said, going in.

I hesitated. It was dark and smelled muggy, like dirt and wet cement.

"You'll be fine." He flipped on a light.

I went in cautiously and immediately wished I hadn't.

My legs turned to jelly, and I found myself on my knees, though my first instinct was to bolt back up the stairs.

"Snow, it's okay," Pops said quietly. "Think about the Harvard Museum of Natural History. They have skeletons and animals stuffed to make them look real and alive. The same applies here. Think of this as a museum for the supernatural."

He helped me stand.

What I really wanted was to take a Brillo pad to my brain.

As much as I wanted to run away, I wanted to move in for a closer look even more.

Sort of like when you see a car accident on the road. You feel revolted and drawn to it at the same time.

The room reminded me of a gallery, with so much to see I wasn't sure where to begin. Scanning the room, I went from one fairytale beast to another.

"Why? What? How did you get these down here?" I asked, trying not to sound afraid.

He chuckled. "It was easy. I'm a professor of religion at Harvard. I'm always studying strange phenomena. Or miracles, if you'd prefer. To the rest of the world, these creatures are miracles."

"Makes sense," I said, moving toward a creature that looked like a tiny angel, its feathery white wings pinned open to a corkboard.

Its skin sparkled like glitter, and it wore a white tunic and white sandals that laced up its very human-looking legs.

Its hair was long and blonde with streaks of red.

"A downy fairy," Professor Pops said, coming over and bending so that his face was even with mine.

"She died more than five hundred years ago. I haven't seen another like her."

I searched his face, having noted the sadness in his voice. "If you haven't seen another like her, how do you know she's a downy fairy?"

"Very perceptive you are, young one." He winked.

I snickered at the Yoda impersonation.

"We were friends. She told me about her kind and their extermination. She died in the service of our cause. I was there when it happened."

"Oh, I'm sorry, Professor Pops." And I was. She was beautiful, and I felt her loss deep within though I didn't understand why.

"It's alright. I've had many years to mourn her. She was a good friend, a valiant warrior, and she died for what she believed in. It was honorable."

"How did she die?" I asked, intrigued.

"That is a story for another time," he said straightening.

Underneath the platform where the corkboard rested was a drawer.

Professor Pops touched a knob, and the latch released.

Inside was a leather-bound book.

He reached in and pulled it out.

In the center of the room stood a thick, plastic-looking pedestal.

Professor Pops walked over and set the book on it, then he waved me over.

When I stood in front of the book, the first page turned on its own.

"First lesson of the Seven Magics Academy," Pops said, eyeing me. "You must never touch any of the pages in the books in this room. Touching them will increase their speed of deterioration."

"Then, how?" I began, putting my hands at my sides so I wouldn't accidentally touch one.

"Like this." He smiled, then leaned in close to the book. "Chapter One," Professor Pops said.

The book instantly flicked to the page that said Chapter One.

"Page one hundred thirty-six," he said again.

Immediately, the pages flipped until they reached the said page.

"Wow," I uttered.

"Exactly. Inside this book is everything you'll ever want to know about fairies, including the downy fairy."

He motioned around the room.

"Under or beside each creature is a book that will teach you what you need to know about them, including how to help them, hunt them, and kill them."

I couldn't help the shiver that ran down my body.

I didn't want to kill anything.

"But some creatures are good, right?" I asked, nervous.

"Every creature can be good or evil. Just like with humans, they have their freedom to choose."

"Got it." But it was creepy.

At least a dozen make-believe creatures were enclosed in glass, on pedestals, or standing around the room.

Something called a locanis looked like a werewolf.

There was also a little sprite, a massive troll, a black unicorn, and an enormous dragon.

All of them were intriguing, and I wanted to study each one.

Most compelling was a very human-looking guy with glowing red eyes.

"A hunter," I said, enthralled.

STAKE CHRISTOPHER

"THAT'S RIGHT," Professor Pops agreed, placing the leather book back in the drawer under the downy fairy.

"Follow me," he said, moving to another door and unlocking it.

He went inside.

It was small compared to the room we'd come from and filled with weapons.

Professor Pops walked over to a pointy wooden stake.

"You mentioned staking a vampire." He picked the stick up and handed it to me.

It was heavier than I imagined it should be.

"Yes. Just jab it in the heart, right?" I held it, so the pointy end faced him and raised it above my head.

Professor Pops chortled. "These work if you have the element of surprise, or if you're skilled at hand to hand combat. But, tell me, could you stake Christopher?" His face was serious.

The idea repulsed me. I'd sooner stake myself, and that shocked me.

"No," I said, as comprehension filled my mind. "Are you saying he's got me under a spell or something?" Irritation started to build, but I pushed it down.

Professor Pops had said Christopher was a master manipulator.

"It's called compulsion, and it's what I would have done in his place." Professor Pops took a long, thin sword from where it sat on the wall.

He pulled off its sheath, revealing its glimmering metal.

Even from a few feet away, it looked sharp.

I dropped the hand, holding the stake, and went over to him. "So, how do I kill vampires?" I honestly didn't think I'd be able to do it, but we were in the weapons room.

It seemed he wanted to share.

"Hopefully, you won't ever have to, but a drone vampire must lose his head to be killed." He placed the knife at his neck.

A sliver of blood trickled.

When he moved it away, the slight cut healed instantaneously.

Wow.

"And a worker?" I asked.

"They can be killed by either a stake to the heart or having their heart removed altogether."

"So the sun doesn't hurt vampires? That's just fiction?" That seemed odd since books and movies showed vampires could be killed by the sun.

"Vampires aren't make-believe, but real. And these vampires were created with magic. That magic protects and fortifies them." He swung the sword.

"Stake or rip their heart out. Got it. But what if I chop off a female's head?" I imagined a writhing body searching for its head.

"The body and the head will reattach unless they can't find each other."

He shrugged. "It's rather disgusting to watch, but a fact nonetheless."

"Yeah, that's icky." I stepped away, heading over to the stake. "What about a hunter?"

He brought up his pointer finger and shook it.

"Hunters are more difficult because they possess a more significant portion of the queen's magic, which gives them the added bonus of the power of persuasion. Most female vampires don't have that power. In females, that ability is unique to Sharra and possibly you, since you're marked."

"Great," I mumbled.

"Like the workers, the only way to kill a hunter is by removing his heart. It beats thanks to the queen's magic, so it must be cut from the body and separated from the other organs."

"That's gross," I muttered.

"It is, truly. With the queen's gifts, the hunter can change the color of his eyes and even shift his appearance slightly."

"Crazy. Can any of the vampires be destroyed by light?" I was still having a hard time believing sunlight had nothing to do with vampires in reality.

"No. Sunlight does nothing to vampires."

I took a deep breath. "How can she be killed, then?"

He knew I meant the queen.

Sharra.

"If you can get through her fifty thousand workers and drones - " He trailed off. "Honestly, we aren't sure, but we believe she can be killed during the moments she's shedding her old body and claiming the new one. We think that's when she's at her most vulnerable."

"You think? You believe? I gotta say, Professor, I'm not filled with confidence right now. I have one chance in fifty-five thousand. Those odds are seriously stacked and not in my favor."

I walked over to a gun. It appeared to be made of solid silver.

"For werewolves?" I asked, changing the subject as I wrapped my brain around what I was up against.

He shook his head, placing the sword back on the wall and picking up the gun. "This is for unicorns. A shot between the eyes will kill it."

"I didn't realize unicorns were hard to kill," I said, taking a step back.

"Unicorns are magical creatures, Snow. They don't die easily. There aren't many of them left, and most are in the service of the vampire queen."

My throat went dry. "But they don't want me dead, right? If they work for her, then they'll want to keep my body safe."

"That isn't necessarily true. We've heard rumors of dissensions within her realm. Some believe the queen is too old and should step down. Others have stolen magic from other creatures and are trying to usurp her. Many believe if all of the marked are killed off, she'll die." He set the gun down and crossed his arms.

"Is that true? Would she die?" I walked over to some miscellaneous weapons: a club, an ax, some smaller knives, and a spiky looking ball with a chain attached to the end.

"In theory, yes, she would die when her body gave out."

"Couldn't she take any body? Why does it have to be the fairest? If it came down to it, if she has the magic, couldn't she use a dog, or a bee, or any living thing as her host?"

I turned when he didn't respond right away.

He appeared thoughtful. "Technically, yes, she could, but she's grown accustomed to humans. And in choosing an animal or an insect, she would lose the power she so desperately desires. In the time I spent in her service, her hunger for power was quite apparent. I believe she'd rather die than be diminished to something other than what she is, what she's become."

"Okay, so say those who want her power do kill all of the marked. Can't the hunters just mark more?" I picked up the ax and swung it a few times.

UNOFFICIAL LESSON

"Of course," Professor Pops said. "But they have marked the best of the best in this generation. If she has to choose a lesser human, her power will diminish. It isn't only about what's appealing on the outside. Just as important is what's on the inside. The purer the person's soul, the better."

It made some sense.

I couldn't help but wonder if Cindy had been marked as well.

Her beauty certainly far outweighed mine. "So, those who want the queen's power will come after me?"

My lesson with the professor was turning out to be more difficult than chemistry.

"It would seem logical now that you're marked, which is why you must train." He paused. "Though I do worry about your hemophilia."

"I don't think that'll be an issue anymore." I shrugged and returned the ax to its holder.

"Oh? How can you be sure?" He came toward me. "Have you noticed more changes?"

"Well, let's see. I threw a pillow at Gabe, sending him flying across the room. I broke a table for goodness' sake."

I glanced down at my shoes. "Yeah, I'm changing, all right."

He nodded. "That is why you must become familiar with all of the creatures in that room," he said, pointing out the doorway. "There isn't an official Seven Magics Academy, except here in my basement, but you must learn more about the world you now belong to. And you must learn how to defend yourself. A war is coming, Snow. I know you didn't ask to be part of it, and it seems unfair, but you're involved. And from what I can tell, the queen has put special emphasis on you."

A devastating weight seemed to sit on my shoulders. The word war felt too big, too overwhelming.

"Do you think the others know the vampire queen has singled me out?" I pressed the tip of a finger against one of the spikes.

"I'm not sure. I would think not." He moved back over to the sword, took it from its horizontal storage clamps on the wall, grabbed another, and handed it to me.

"Let me give you some background on these swords."

"Sure," I said taking the one he held out. The weapon was sheathed and lighter than I thought but Professor Pops always had a history lesson about something.

Still, my mind was elsewhere, and Professor Pops must have realized it.

"What are you thinking, Snow?" he asked, instead of sharing information.

"How do you kill a revenant?" I lowered the weapon to my side, questioning whether he thought about killing me.

I didn't want to die, but what if I hurt people?

It was there, within me.

The hunger.

The need.

"Snow," he said, his arms going around me.

I stepped into them.

Pops pulled me against his chest in a fatherly hug. "First, let's talk about the positives of what you're changing into."

Swallowing the strangled cry in my throat, I returned his embrace. It had been a long time since my dad had hugged me.

I hadn't realized how much I missed him.

"First, you are or will be, a lot stronger than a regular human. Most marked who are bitten say they feel like they have superpowers."

"So, I'll be less klutzy?" I sniffled.

Professor Pops chuckled, and I couldn't help the smile that curled up on my lips.

"Let's not count on it." He stroked my head with his free hand, and I drew in a deep breath, enjoying his smell: Old books, paper, and cigars.

After several minutes I pulled away and considered him. "I'll be stronger, which will make it more difficult for me to die, but I can be killed the same as any human." It was a statement. One that I knew, as I spoke, was correct.

"Exactly." He held the blade, still sheathed in a black cover, in both hands. "This is called a jokoto or katana, which is now the universal term."

From the wall, he took a smaller sword that rested under the long one. "This is a wakizashi." He moved into a fighting stance, showing me how to hold them.

"Samurai used these swords together during battle beginning in the seventh century." He indicated with his head that I should take a smaller one from off the wall.

I did, keeping them both in their covers, though he removed his.

Awkwardly I bent my knees and angled the swords.

He nodded and started to move, crossing his right foot over his left.

I mimicked as best I could.

"The long sword is for enemies at a distance. The shorter for when the enemy gets inside." He parried, maneuvering the blades as he battled an invisible foe. "Like this."

I tried to follow but ended up tangling my hands together.

"Very good."

I laughed. "Really?"

Professor Pops smiled and turned to put his weapons away.

"Samurai believed the katana held their soul and would only use them as a last resort. They would use the bow and arrow first, then a spear and, finally, if they had to, their swords."

He moved behind me and began adjusting my stance.

Several seconds later, he had me in the proper position.

I felt like a rag doll.

"Every day, after finishing your regular schooling and after track practice, you will attend the Seven Magics Academy. Either myself or one of the boys will train you. Dorian is excellent with the swords. Gabe is the best bowman, and Salvatore is brilliant at all of them. Though, if one of those three isn't available, any of them is more than exceptional."

I sighed. "Okay."

"After a couple of hours of training, you will spend an hour learning about the different creatures in the other room until you're acquainted with each one."

I stood. "What about homework? I'm struggling with chemistry."

He waved his hands dismissively. "You'll find your human studies will come much more easily, and you will breeze through them without much worry."

"I'll have to see it to believe." The prospect excited me.

I struggled with several subjects, especially English, Science, and Phys-Ed.

"I think you'll find many regular human activities will come easier, and you'll want to spend more and more time in your new world." Professor Pops took the swords from me and placed them back on the wall next to the other set.

"Are you sure I'll be okay going to school?" I thought about chemistry and what'd almost happened.

"WE'LL GIVE you a double dose of the tea twice a day, then send you to school with a dose for emergencies." He walked out of the room, and I followed.

Then he locked the door.

While I waited, I stared at the female vampire behind the glass case. Her eyes were red and still seemed to glow.

"What happens if I do drink a human's blood?" The words came out without thinking about them first.

Professor Pops stood next to me. "I understand your needs, perhaps better than anyone. Human blood will increase your powers, making you stronger in every way except one."

He pointed at my heart.

"The more blood you drink, the more like a vampire you'll become. It's like anything in life; if you work to keep yourself as human as possible, that part of you will remain, will be the strongest. If you consume human blood the way a vampire does, that part of you will become the strongest."

I nodded. "I understand." I wanted to tell him I craved blood and that I'd almost drunk from Dorian today.

I opened my mouth, but nothing came out.

Embarrassment over the almost erotic nature of my desires held me back.

They seemed overwhelming, and I wasn't sure how to control them.

Pops patted my shoulder. "Don't misunderstand me. Craving blood is part of who you are now. The time will come when you will drink."

He paused, and his eyes dilated, and I saw a flash of what he must've been like as a hunter.

The image scared me, but the look left his face almost as quickly as it'd appeared.

"There are two things you must promise me," he said.

I swallowed and cleared my throat. "What?"

He held up a finger. "Promise me you won't drink from the same human twice."

A second finger went up. "And two, promise me you won't drink for more than ten seconds. Any more and there is a possibility you'll kill the human from blood loss or your blood lust. Can you do that for me, please?"

I suddenly felt parched. The idea of consuming blood caused my muscles to tense with need.

"Snow?"

"I promise," I agreed, though, at that moment, I would've agreed to anything.

He hadn't given me the green light to bite, but he said it was bound to happen.

I wanted it to happen sooner rather than later.

"And Snow?" I focused and was met with his piercing eyes.

"Yes?"

"Gabe - " he said, but was interrupted.

Again.

"I'm what?" Gabe stood in the doorway, looking smug.

I ground my teeth. Why were the guys constantly interrupting Professor Pops when he mentioned Gabe? It was almost as though they had a sixth sense or something.

"Hi, Gabe," I said shyly. It was weird seeing him in this room full of supernatural creatures.

Professor Pops cleared his throat, and I met his gaze. "Why don't you go home tonight, get caught up on your schoolwork, and rest? Come over tomorrow, after I've talked to the boys and your training will begin."

I nodded.

Gabe gave Professor Pops an unreadable look. "Will she be safe?" he asked, his face tight with unspoken worry.

I wanted to be upset with Gabe for asking the question but I had to agree.

"I'm fairly certain no one will come after her until she turns sixteen." He raised a hand and rubbed it over his face. "Which reminds me, what's your favorite cake flavor?"

I blanked. I hadn't had a cake since my mother died. They served cake at her funeral.

Then and there, I decided I didn't like cake.

Plus, as a vegan, that meant no eggs, and most cakes were made with eggs.

"Um," I glanced at Gabe, though I had no idea why. "Can you make a cake without eggs?"

"Someone can. I intend to hire the best," Pops said, crossing his arms. "What'll it be? Chocolate? Vanilla?"

A twisted smile spread over my face. "Red velvet."

Gabe and Professor Pops laughed.

"Perfect. I'll get on it. And your favored color?"

I didn't have a favorite color. I'd always liked purple because of my mom.

Gabe answered for me. "Her favorite color is purple."

I glanced away briefly and then at Professor Pops. "Purple is fine, but I've always really liked glittering red."

"Excellent. See you tomorrow, Snow." Professor Pops waved us away as he went back toward the downy fairy.

"I'll walk you home," Gabe said, his smile tight.

I sensed his concern and something else.

Probably fear.

Gabe was afraid of me.

That made me sad, but I didn't know how to change his mind and help him see that I was still me - still his Snowflake.

"SINCE WHEN DID you start liking red?" Gabe asked as he headed down his massive driveway.

The sun was setting. Somehow, I could already see the stars. Like all these years I had bad eyesight but suddenly I was given glasses.

We walked side by side at a slow pace toward my house.

I offered him a sideways smile. It gave me butterflies to know that Gabe paid attention.

Glowy, tingly, happiness bloomed in my chest.

"Since the first time I saw Dorothy's shoes on The Wizard of Oz. Probably at age three or four." I stuffed my hands into the front pockets of my jeans. "Then my mom died, and most of the stuff I kept of hers was purple, so I sort of adopted it as my favorite as well."

"Huh," Gabe grunted.

"I'd guess your favorite color is - " I considered what it might be, enjoying the mouth-watering scent of him as we went.

His car was silver.

His room looked like a shrine to the Celtics, but he wore a lot of white and blue.

"Either green or blue," I said.

He smirked. "You were thinking about my room, weren't you?"

I nodded.

"I guess it's green." He took my hand and stopped, so I faced him.

His heart pounded rapidly.

With gentle fingers, he caressed my cheek, stroked my hair.

"I've always loved the color of your hair," he whispered.

I looked away, kicking at nothing on the ground in front of me. "You have?"

OceanofPDF.com

I LIKE YOU

HE PLAYED with the ends of my dark hair, twirling a strand in his finger. "It changes color in the light. Sometimes it's black, other times there seem to be blond highlights. It's magical." He released my hair and lifted my chin. "Like you, Snowflake."

"I'm not." My cheeks burned at the compliment.

The bloodlust grew by a couple of degrees.

Would Gabe offer his blood to me the way Dorian had?

At the thought, my heart began to match Gabe's beat for beat.

"Snow," he said with hesitation.

Curious, I searched his face.

"I've liked you for a long time," he said.

"I know. I like you, too." I returned eagerly.

The final embers of sunlight gleamed through the thick trees, causing rays of light to streak onto a portion of Gabe's face.

Half of his face was shadowed, and the other half seemed to glow.

"No, I mean, like-like you," he said.

Comprehension dawned, and I nearly smacked myself in the forehead with the palm of my hand.

"I wasn't sure. I thought you thought of me as just a sister." The guys had mentioned I was Gabe's girlfriend at Kenmei's but Gabe and I hadn't talked about it officially.

Nervousness swirled in my stomach.

He took hold of my hands. "I think of you in ways much different than I would a sister." A mischievous gleam shone in his eyes.

I giggled nervously, glancing at my shoes.

He leaned in, and I realized he was about to kiss me - which reminded me I'd kissed Christopher today, which reminded me I almost drank from Dorian today, which made me feel gross.

I was all for being a confident woman and taking what I wanted.

And I still wanted Gabe. But I wasn't sure it was a good idea to act on those wants.

"I've got to go." I turned and ran. Fast. And I didn't trip once.

With speeds faster than I was prepared for, I unlocked my front door.

Gatsby was there, weaving between my feet and meowing like he was mortally wounded.

"Hi, kitty. I know you're hungry. Sorry, boy." I scooped him up and scratched behind his ears the way he liked.

Today he squirmed in my arms, unhappy. I put him down. "Okay. Okay."

Grabbing his bowl, I filled it with kitty kibble and set it on the floor.

He rushed over and started eating.

I poured him some water, washed my hands, and snatched some almonds from the refrigerator to snack on while I did my homework.

In quick succession, I got my math assignments done, conjugated my Spanish verbs, and studied for my chemistry and social studies quizzes.

Then I made myself some whole-wheat pasta and watched the latest episode of Survivor.

Gatsby jumped on the couch and into my lap.

I was glad he'd forgiven me for ignoring him in the last few days.

Around ten o'clock, I went to my room, washed my face, and changed into my flowered flannel pajamas.

Once I was in bed, and Gatsby had situated himself near my feet, I turned off the light and closed my eyes.

Immediately I was whisked away into the other realm.

Her realm.

I stood on a balcony in a large white castle.

From my position, I could see the beautiful countryside.

It was dusk. The descending sun bathed the landscape in twinkling light.

I wore a long deep burgundy dress with dark grey ribbing, its skirts so abundant that they swished when I moved. The sleeves were short, and the bodice tight.

The shoes I wore pinched as I made my way into the room.

The first thing I noticed was a large headboard attached to an enormous bed. Lush gold bed coverings and pillows covered it.

The windows on either side were stained glass.

In one corner of the room was a large round mirror, and I gasped at its familiarity.

This was the mirror, the one the Wicked Queen used in Snow White.

I stepped in front of the glass, studying my reflection.

The person looking back was stunning. Her black hair piled high, her lips blood red and skin luminescent as the moon.

I turned, and she copied. I lifted my hand, and she did the same.

"It's me," I said, awed.

"My beautiful queen. You truly are the fairest in the land."

My hand froze in midair.

The voice was Christopher's.

I noticed him now, seated in a chair, dressed in lavish clothing: black pants, black boots that extended over his knees, and a burgundy jacket that matched my dress.

As before, a dark cloud blurred out his face.

No matter how many times I blinked or stared, the features of his face wouldn't become clear.

And I remembered he'd said before that the queen's magic wouldn't allow me to know who he was until I drank his blood.

"Why am I here?" I asked, watching him through the mirror's reflection.

He rose, and my breath hitched. Because from within the mirror, I saw his face. He had blond hair that had been combed off his forehead, making his hazel eyes vibrant against his tanned skin.

We belonged together, a voice inside my head uttered.

Excitement fluttered along my skin.

Fireworks bombarded my heart.

"Why can I see your face?" I asked as I turned away from the mirror.

Immediately his features blurred behind thick darkness so I could only see his red eyes.

I returned my gaze to the mirror and his features were clear once again.

Christopher smiled. "The mirror reveals the truth, Snow." He came toward me, stalking me.

I wondered if there'd ever been more willing prey.

I wanted to taste him, try his blood.

Professor Pops' words came into my mind: "Never drink from the same human twice and never longer than ten seconds."

Christopher took my hands and led me to the bed. I didn't like that his face was hidden from me again, but my longing for him rocked strong enough in me that I dismissed it.

He laid me down, and then he lay down next to me.

"You want me, don't you?" It was a question, but he knew the answer.

YOU SAVED ME

I HEARD the confidence in Christopher's voice.

"Yes," I said, my voice shaking.

"Go ahead, then." He tilted his neck in my direction.

My fangs grew.

Running my tongue over the sharp ends, I moved closer, grabbing hold of him and pressing my lips against his warm throat. I sank my fangs into his skin, enjoying the sensation of his skin parting.

Tentative, I sucked.

When the first drops touched my tongue, I panted, sucking harder.

I had nothing to compare the pleasure I experienced as his blood filled my mouth, ran down my throat, and filled me in ways I never believed existed.

To my mind, there wasn't anything better than that moment, which was saying something, since I was a fruit and veggie girl.

After a time, Christopher spoke my name. "Snow."

I felt drunk with his bewitching blood as I lifted my lips from his neck.

He smiled, his hazel eyes shimmering with hunger.

"Do you recognize me now?" he asked.

I did. "You're not Christopher but Chace Charming? You saved me from an awful fall." It'd been him all along?

He smirked and pulled me on top of him. "My turn," he said.

I tilted my neck back, giving him full access, and let out a moan as his teeth parted my flesh, and he drank.

Uneasiness formed in my belly, knowing the hunter was none other than Chace Charming, Salem Academy's newest hottie.

Professor Pops had said Christopher was a master manipulator.

Plus, he'd mentioned that a hunter's magic could alter parts of himself, including how he looked.

Chace-slash-Christopher must've sensed my apprehension.

He rolled us, placing me under him, his lips never leaving my neck.

I sighed, giving in to the immeasurable pleasure of the moment.

I didn't care one way or the other.

In his arms, drinking from him and him drinking from me was bliss, and I never wanted it to end.

"Christopher," I whispered, running my fingers through his hair and raising my head so I could taste his blood while he drank mine.

AFTER A LONG TIME, we lay beside each other, my head resting against his chest. He played with my hair.

I tried to sleep, but I was too buzzed.

"Do good and evil exist?" Christopher asked.

That was out of the blue.

I lifted myself up and searched his face for a hint of humor.

He was serious.

"I believe so," I answered, nodding.

He kissed my forehead and sat up, crossing his well-defined legs.

I wasn't ready to be done, but I wanted to know where he was going with his question.

Reluctantly I positioned myself so that I sat opposite him on the bed.

We were still in the castle in another realm.

Lush throw pillows littered the floor and surrounded us like piranha swarming their food.

Until a few moments ago, I'd been too busy enjoying Chace, aka

Christopher, aka my hunter, and hadn't cared about anything else.

Now that he'd spoken, lots of unanswered questions surfaced, and guilt pounded within my breast.

Like, what was the name of this realm?

Why did he keep bringing me here, and where exactly was here?

Christopher seized my hand. "Sweet, beautiful Snow," he said, caressing my knuckles. "In my years serving the queen, I've learned one thing. Words like good and evil are relative terms."

"What do you mean? To kill someone is evil." I crossed my arms, waiting to hear how he'd BS his way out of that.

"What if that someone is the enemy in a war? It's kill or be killed. Would he be considered evil for protecting himself, his loved ones, his home, his country?" He grinned sweetly, running his fingers up my arm. It was distracting.

My mouth fell open at his question.

I wanted to say yes, but Professor Pops had explained I would be learning how to kill supernatural creatures, that we were on the brink of war.

If I killed to protect myself, would that make me evil?

"Ugh, okay. Where are you going with this?" I wasn't sure I wanted to know.

He chuckled and climbed off the bed, adjusting his clothes.

When he finished, he lifted me onto my feet.

"In Buddhism," he began, "good and evil don't exist, per se. Instead, there is kusala and akusala. Kusala is considered to be intelligence, contentment, beneficial, and a remover of affliction. Akusala is, quite simply, the opposite, or ignorance, causer of affliction, and so on. Which boils down to this: what is evil to one person may be good to another. Life and everything in it is about your perception."

Christopher's words stung my mind.

I wanted him to explain further, but a sudden and infuriating beeping interrupted.

My alarm clock.

Upon opening my eyes, my hunter and the other realm vanished. With a sigh, I reached over, shut off the clock, and rolled onto my back.

I hadn't slept.

At least I didn't think so.

The entire night was spent with Christopher; we hadn't done more than talk, kiss, and bite each other's necks, but the experience left me breathless.

I tried to imagine bringing Christopher into my silly little girl's room and snorted.

Lavender walls held up posters of bunnies, kittens, and puppies.

Across from my bed was my chest of drawers, also lavender, and atop it sat unused perfume bottles.

Above them hung a corkboard filled with pictures of Cindy and me, as well as pictures of my best friends - the guys.

To the left of my dresser was my bathroom and, next to that, lived my closet.

"Ugh, I'm so over purple," I muttered, climbing out of bed and heading into the bathroom where bright purple towels hung on a rack next to a bright purple shower curtain.

I turned on the water and undressed while the water warmed.

Stepping in, I let the spray soothe away my tension.

I couldn't help thinking about the past four days.

In that time, I'd managed to become a revenant - not quite human, not quite a vampire.

I'd slept in the same bed with Gabe, one of my best friends on whom I'd developed a crush.

Nearly bitten Dorian.

And kissed, drank from, and kissed some more my hunter, Christopher.

Sheesh!

I wasn't that kind of girl; well, I hadn't been for the past fifteen years.

Sure, I'd had sleepovers with all seven brothers in the past, but still. I'd never felt such lustful cravings or been so wanton as I was with Chace, aka Christopher.

He brought out feelings in me, needs I hadn't realized I'd been missing.

At the thought of him touching me, kissing me, whispering tenderly to me, my belly fluttered.

"I don't have time for this," I grumbled, rinsing off and getting out of the shower.

I DON'T DO DRESSES

I DRESSED IN FADED JEANS, a red Ed Hardy tee shirt with a dragon slithering across the front, and my Converse.

In the full-length mirror near my closet, I noticed several bruises on my neck and stepped closer for a better look. In the center of the bruises were twin marks closed over by scar tissue.

It seemed I hadn't changed as much as I'd hoped.

No one had been able to see marks after Christopher bit me the first time, but I wasn't so sure about these bruises.

Going to my dresser, I pulled open the top drawer and took out a silk and cashmere scarf in baby blue.

My dad and stepmother had given it to me for Christmas last year because they said it matched my eyes.

After pulling off the tag, I wrapped it around my neck several times, so the bruises were hidden.

"Today is going to be a regular day," I grunted, catching my reflection in the full-length mirror beside my dresser.

It couldn't get any weirder.

I'd become a blood-drinking supernatural creature, for crying out loud.

"Ugh! Come on, kitty," I complained, opening my bedroom door.

Gatsby stretched, jumped off my bed, and followed me downstairs.

As soon as I entered the kitchen, a brief knock sounded at the back door, followed by Heathcliff, Bart, Gabe, and Dorian.

They were a breath of fresh air, full of exuberance, and raw energy.

"Hey, Snow," Dorian said, closing the door behind him.

Gabe carried a large book.

He held it like its contents were leprous, and I had to grin.

"Hi, guys."

Heathcliff and Bart returned my greeting as they made themselves at home, rummaging through my fridge and cupboards, grumbling about how I had nothing good to eat.

Bart started a pot of coffee, and Heathcliff, ever the responsible one, put some water on for my tea.

I quickly got Gatsby his kibble and some water.

When the cat was happily eating, I turned my attention to Gabe.

"What ya got there?" I sat on a barstool and swiveled closer to him.

He glanced around sheepishly before heaving the book on the counter.

Moments before I saw the cover up close, I'd imagined it to be a book from Professor Pops' Museum of the Supernatural, and worried Gabe stole it.

No one was to touch those pages.

Turned out the book was nothing mystical, just page after page of whimsical dresses by the designer Vera Wang.

I was most definitely not a fashionista.

On the contrary, I didn't even really know what the word meant, only that Cindy used it a lot when showing me clothes from her magazines; but I had heard of Vera Wang and knew she was a big-time designer.

Whoa!

"Professor Pops asked me to bring this to you so you could go through it and pick out a dress."

I laughed uncomfortably. "I don't do dresses."

The guys paused what they were doing, as though they were shocked I didn't want a dress by the incredibly talented Vera Wang.

I rolled my eyes. "Fine. A dress for what?"

Everyone resumed what they were doing. Goofballs!

"Your birthday party, silly," Bart said, pulling my hair.

"Dude," Gabe yelled.

"Boys, chill," I said, putting a hand on each of their chests.

The individual thumping of their hearts momentarily distracted me.

It didn't make my mouth water, just caused me to pause.

That was an interesting new twist.

I focused my attention on Bart.

"Why do I need a fancy dress for my party?"

He snickered as he pulled an envelope from his back pocket and handed it to me.

"You've created a monster by allowing Pops to be in charge of your party, and there's no turning back. Salvatore is taking three hundred of these to the post office as we speak."

I took the envelope.

Glancing at each of the boys, my emotions spiraled from curious to concerned to downright freaked.

"What is it?" I asked though I figured it was an invitation to my birthday party.

My hands shook as I turned the envelope over.

Sealed with red wax with SW stamped in it. "Cool," I mumbled, breaking the seal and removing the thick white cardstock.

Embossed in black and lined with silver were these words:

YOU ARE CORDIALLY INVITED to attend

A Masquerade Ball

Honoring the sixteenth birthday of

Snow White

November 17th, beginning at 7:30 pm.

There will be dinner and dancing.

Formal dress required.

MY MIND COULDN'T GET over how fancy the invite sounded.

"A masquerade ball. Is he serious?" I asked, suddenly wishing I'd told Pops no to a party.

See, I didn't dance.

The last time I tried, I tripped over my partner's feet and broke his wrist.

Needless to say, we still weren't speaking, and the not-so-graceful event happened in junior high.

At the idea of dancing in front of a bunch of people, terror caused my upper lip to tremble.

"What is Professor Pops thinking?"

"We tried to talk him out of it," Bart said, and I could tell by the looks on their faces that he was serious.

The rest muttered incoherent words that I took to mean they weren't excited about the party concept either.

With pouts and irritated glares, they shuffled around, getting mugs for the coffee along with creamer and sugar.

The kitchen smelled divine - not that I was ever a big coffee drinker, more of a hot cocoa girl.

But the aroma filled me with nostalgic memories of my mom, making me miss her all the more.

"Here you go," Heathcliff said, setting a mug of murky liquid in front of me.

I was about to decline but got a whiff of it. It wasn't coffee, but tea - my bloodlust tea.

"Thanks." I smiled.

Their blood wasn't a distraction this morning.

I wondered if that had something to do with me drinking Christopher's blood last night.

Self-consciously I tugged the scarf farther up my neck and caught Dorian watching me, his eyes flickering to my neck, the scarf, and my mouth.

His examination told me what he thought.

A slow tendril of heat started in my belly and worked its way up. I silently prayed he wouldn't say anything, at least not in front of his brothers.

LOVE YOUR SHIRT

"NO PROB, SNOW," Heathcliff said. He went over and poured himself a cup of coffee.

Gabe cleared his throat, and I turned my attention to him, taking a sip of tea.

"So you need to pick out a dress in the next couple of days and let Pops know," he said.

"If it's any consolation, we'll be wearing tuxes," Heathcliff said, irritated, reading the terrified look I was sure coated my face.

I giggled at his agitation, swallowed some tea.

"You'll look amazing in a tuxedo." I rotated to include Bart, Dorian, and Gabe. "You all will."

I pulled the book closer and flipped through the pages.

All of the dresses were beautiful, airy, and light.

I couldn't imagine trying to move around in something so elegant.

The guys crowded around, each commenting on which one they thought would suit me best. I cringed at wearing any of the dresses and considered speaking to Professor Pops.

Gatsby jumped onto a chair and onto the counter, rubbing his body along one of my arms.

"Hey, boy. What do you think of all this?" I set him on the ground.

The guys were still occupied with dresses - well, probably the models inside the dresses - and I smiled.

"I love you guys," I blurted. They looked over, each with various shades of amused expressions. I laughed, mortified by my sudden outburst.

"Love you too, Snow," Bart and Heathcliff returned.

Gabe gave me a curious look.

Dorian came over, and stage whispered as he tugged on my scarf: "Love you, too."

I shoved him away, trying to keep my heated cheeks from showing. His blood stuck out from the rest and seemed to sing me a sexy song.

Surprised and slightly mortified, I cleared my throat.

I didn't want Gabe thinking it was Dorian's comment that made me redden, and I certainly didn't want to tell them it was because of what I'd hidden under my scarf.

Casually I fixed it, so the soft blue scarf better covered my neck.

I'd sooner die than explain the bruises they would think were hickeys. And technically they were.

"Love your shirt, too," Dorian added, poking his pointer finger into my chest. I looked down, and he flicked me in the nose.

"You're such a - " I paused and watched his eyes dance. "You're a total tease," I finished.

Dorian grinned from ear to ear. "It's all part of my charm." He lifted his brows and winked playfully.

"We'd better get to school," Bart said, tugging my hair again.

"Right, you need another tardy like you need a punch in the face," Dorian said, slapping him upside the head.

Bart yelped, and they started play fighting, though after what Professor Pops had said about their training, I noticed it wasn't quite so much play as I first thought.

"Have you finished your tea?" Heathcliff asked.

I gulped down the last of it and nodded. "Yep," I answered. "Who's training me today?" I hoped Professor Pops had talked to them, and they knew what I meant.

"Me," Dorian said, rewarding me with a piercing stare.

My mouth went dry. "Good."

I'd have to train with these hickeys on my neck.

What would Dorian say?

Why hadn't Gabe volunteered?

Sneaking a glance at him, my heart sank.

Something was bothering him.

He wasn't teasing.

Had he already grown tired of me?

Not that I could blame him.

Even though he didn't know it, I certainly hadn't acted like he and I might be a couple, especially last night, when I made out with Chace.

"Great," I added, suppressing a sad sigh.

"We gotta go," Heathcliff said, grabbing Dorian by the arm.

"See ya later, Snow." Bart followed them out.

I waved, giving Gabe a questioning look.

"Did you get stuck taking me again?" I turned the pages of the book, but my eyes kept finding Gabe's.

"I volunteered," he answered, picking my hefty backpack off the table and lobbing it onto his shoulder. "Come on."

Following him out, I locked the door and shoved the house keys in my pocket.

"I think we should talk," Gabe said once we were buckled in his silver CRX.

"Sure," I said, eyeing him, comprehending the seriousness on his face.

My stomach clenched.

Did he somehow know about my escapade with Christopher?

Or Dorian?

"You and I," he paused, turning on the car. "You know I like you, right, Snow?"

I gulped. He hadn't called me Snowflake.

"I hope so, Gabe. We've been friends for a long time. If you're pretending, then you deserve an Oscar." I hoped my teasing would lighten his mood.

He smirked. "You know what I mean."

I forced back a sigh. "I do." This conversation wasn't going to end well.

He pulled out of my driveway, heading toward school.

"Since your bite, and what occurred in your dream, and the note. Well, you have a lot going on." He glanced over.

I nodded, waiting for him to finish, my hands clenched into fists in my lap.

He let out a giant breath. "I think we should put whatever might be happening between us on hold." His hands gripped the steering wheel until they turned white.

Tears dampened my lashes.

Casually, I tried to wipe them away.

He was right.

I needed to focus on training.

Also, I had a situation with Christopher. A sensual situation.

But wow, hearing Gabe say the words hurt.

I deliberated whether he somehow knew what I'd been doing last night, if he could tell a hunter vampire kissed me thoroughly, drank from me multiple times, and that I liked it.

Actually, I more than liked it, I delighted in it.

Ugh!

Pushing my back into the black leather seat, I cleared my throat. "I agree. We'll still be friends, right?" The words sounded strained, not like me.

Gabe didn't seem to notice. "Right."

We rode in silence until we got to school.

As soon as he put the car in park, I bolted without saying goodbye.

I needed some fresh air and some space.

SYMPHONY OF HEART BEATS

MY BODY TEETERED between conflicting emotions: excitement and sadness.

Excitement because I'd see Christopher in a few minutes, though I had to call him Chace in school.

And sadness because I still had feelings for Gabe.

He'd promised he wouldn't leave.

Memories of the night he'd stayed with me surfaced, weighing down my heart. I missed that Gabe. He hadn't exactly left, but he didn't want me anymore either.

Sighing, I pulled open the front door to Salem Academy, home to more than sixteen hundred students, and realized I held my breath so I wouldn't smell blood.

Slowly I exhaled and snuck a timid breath.

A delicious blood-tinged aroma swirled with sweat and perfume.

A symphony of hearts beat all around me, but I didn't have the slightest twinge of a craving.

Something had changed.

Was it the double dose of bloodlust tea, or drinking Christopher's blood?

I'd have to ask him when we had a moment alone.

If I could look him in the eyes without turning red.

I made my way through the overflowing commons and to my burgundy locker.

After dialing in the combination, I opened it and switched books from my backpack to my locker and ran to chemistry, barely acknowledging the posters announcing the football game coming up or the Halloween dance taking place soon.

Cindy and Chace were already in their seats, chatting like BFFs. Seeing Cindy being so flirty and Chace responding - well, it annoyed me.

I dropped my backpack and my pencil on the table in a huff.

Cindy gave me the eye, one of her perfectly plucked eyebrows arched in irritation. "Hey, Snow. In a mood?" She smacked her bare knee against my thigh.

"No," I grumbled, stealing a look at Chace.

He rolled his chair toward me.

"Hi." He had a tone that told me he was thinking about what we had done last night.

My cheeks burned hot.

"What's going on?" Cindy asked, tugging on my scarf.

That girl was way too intuitive.

She could read people from a hundred feet away, through concrete and twenty feet of dirt.

Sheesh! "Nothing," I said from behind my hands, jerking my scarf.

I realized we hadn't had a chance to really talk since she'd gone to the Cape. She said she needed to tell me something but still hadn't.

There was a lot I could tell her as well. But then how did I start a conversation revealing I was a revenant and might become a vampire?

"Hmmm-mmmm," Cindy responded, and I knew we'd be having a prickly discussion later. I debated what I should tell her. It wasn't like I could say, "Yeah, so last night, Chace took me to another realm where we made out and drank each other's blood for a few hours. It was awesome and so sexy. By the way, I'm halfway to becoming a vampire, so there's that. Ha ha."

Chace made a noise that sounded a lot like a groan, which caused my cheeks to burn brighter than fireworks on the Fourth of July.

Before Cindy or Chace said or did anything else, Mr. Wallace came in and saved the day. I'd never been happier to see a teacher.

That gladness was short-lived.

"During today's lab," Mr. Wallace began. "We'll be determining the relative reactions of copper, magnesium, zinc, and hydrogen. You'll work with a partner, as usual."

Mr. Wallace glanced in our direction. "Mr. Charming, since you are without a partner, and," he searched the room, let out a grunt, and continued, "since Sheila is absent today, why don't you work with Missssss," he drew it out, like a snake debating which prey to devour.

Cindy sat up, straighter in her seat, and I knew she wanted him to pick her.

Finally, he continued, "White. Mr. Dooley, you and Miss Croswell will partner up. Everyone else, you have your partners, so get busy."

Cindy deflated and scowled. "I don't want to partner with Eddie. He smells like onion rings."

"Maybe that's because he works at Onion Ring Heaven," I whispered, stifling a nervous giggle. I stood as Eddie looked over, his braces-filled smile taking up most of his freckled face. "Be nice," I said in her ear.

Cindy harrumphed. "Merde! This isn't fair. And you owe me an explanation about what's going on between you and Charming. Lunchtime!"

"For sure," I said, wiggling my eyebrows and moving over to Chace.

Cindy laughed, and I felt better about leaving her with Onion Ring Eddie.

I picked up my chair and placed it next to Chace.

He already had the droppers and was in the process of organizing the test tubes.

"You've done this before, haven't you?" I asked.

He grunted. "Once or twice. Lovely scarf, by the way."

I fiddled with it, making sure it still covered my neck, and sat on the stool, watching him.

He looked seventeen or eighteen, but I was curious about his real age.

I didn't know much about vampires, but I did know they weren't supposed to age.

At least that was part of the myth.

Would I age as a revenant? I wanted to ask Chace, but chemistry class wasn't the place. I supposed I could ask Professor Pops.

"Well, you'd better let me do something," I hissed as Mr. Wallace made his way around the room.

"I can think of several somethings I'd like you to do." Chace's voice had gone low and was filled with sensual implications.

I colored. "Knock it off. Cindy already smells a story. The girl is like a Bassett Hound on the trail of her favorite bone. She's probably already figured out we kissed and is planning our wedding, including the cake and my wedding dress." I moved one of the beakers, put a droplet of iodine in it, and scrawled the results in my notebook.

He sat on the stool next to me, fixing me with an amused gaze. "Wow, she's impressive."

I tried to scowl. He didn't know her the way I did. That was how her mind worked. "We haven't even been on a date," I whispered.

"I suppose we can't consider what we did last night a date?" He wore his signature smirk.

MY QUEEN

MY INSIDES QUIVERED at his question. "No!" I mean our making out and blood swapping could be considered a date, I guess.

"Are you embarrassed by me, Snowflake?" Chace asked.

"Don't call me that," I growled, smacking him on the arm.

Only Gabe was allowed to call me that.

Besides, what did he think was going on?

Were we an item?

"Whatever you command, my queen," he inclined his head slightly.

Self-conscious, I searched the room and caught hold of Cindy's perceptive glare. "What the hell?" she mouthed.

I shrugged and turned back to Chace. His words, "my queen," made me think of another question. I, technically, wouldn't be his queen. My body would, but her spirit would be inside mine. Right? I filed the question in the thickening folder labeled Seriously Wacky Stuff.

"You need to stop."

Chace laughed. "Fine. I will. For now." Then he winked. "Can I call you Frosty?"

I lifted my brow. "You can call me Frosty when Hell freezes over, m-kay?" I gave him a sinister look but laughed too.

The whole conversation was silly.

"Snow," he spoke my name like we were lovers. "Want to hang out after school today? We can see what sort of skills you've developed." He gave me a conspiratorial look. "The way we've been trading blood, I've no doubt you'll be as strong as I am in no time."

"Will I?" I nudged his shoulder with mine.

"You'll be amazing."

I really did want to hang out with him, but I had track practice, revenant training, and then homework. "Hey, didn't you make the track team? I'll see you at practice."

"I'll come only if you promise to run. I want to see if you can manage once around the track without tripping." He laughed.

"Harsh," I murmured. But I wanted to see if it were possible, too. "I have - " I paused. Would he know what hemophilia was? Not that my blood issue would matter once I became a vampire.

"What?"

"Well, after track, I have to do stuff." I couldn't say supernatural training. Professor Pops wanted me to go over to his house after practice.

I'd be learning how to kill different supernatural creatures, including hunter vampires like him.

Did I want to tell Christopher aka Chace aka the hunter?

Something told me I shouldn't, mainly since he worked for the vampire queen.

And that's when the lightbulb went on.

Holy apple butter on toast!

Christopher worked for the vampire queen!

Why hadn't that really sunk in before now?

I hadn't asked Professor Pops what would happen if I drank the blood of a hunter.

Chace glanced over, his gaze unreadable. "You're training with Adam Henry after practice."

"Yes," I nodded, unable to say any more.

How did he know? So many questions.

"Don't you want to see me again tonight?" His words sounded hollow, sad.

"Of course," I said, touching his arm and regretting the maneuver immediately.

Professor Pops mentioned Christopher possessed the ability to put me under a spell.

Did he have me under one? If he did, did I care?

I really wanted to see him alone again - to kiss him and taste him.

Gabe was out of the romantic picture.

He said we should just be friends.

No reason to feel guilty.

Lips red as rubies, hair dark as night. Drink your true love's blood. Become the Vampire, Snow White.

The words filtered across my mind like they came from me. But I hadn't thought of them.

I shuddered.

My true love?

It wasn't Christopher.

At least I didn't think so.

But did I lust after him?

Yes. Yes. Yes. I cleared my throat.

"Want to come over to my house after training, around nine-thirty?" My heart sped up faster in anticipation. "In this realm," I added in a soft voice.

"We could talk. Watch a movie. Hang out." It'd be fun.

He smiled, and the movement reached his eyes, filling my stomach with giddy joy.

"Great idea," he said.

"Charming is a name that suits you. Did the queen give you the name?"

He chuckled. "No, it's the one I was born with."

I searched his face, checking to see if he was joking. It didn't look like it.

"Hmmm," I said, dropping iodine in another beaker.

LUNCHTIME fiNALLY ROLLED AROUND, and I briefly considered evasive maneuvers, like hiding in the girls' bathroom.

I hadn't decided what to say to Cindy about Christopher - Chace - and me.

Deny. Deny. Deny.

I searched the Commons area for her, but she hadn't arrived.

Shrugging, I grabbed a greyish lunch tray, placed a salad on it along with a juice, paid the cashier, and headed over to our usual table near the windows.

The sun shone through them, bright and cheery, and I squinted. Beyond grateful vampires and even revenants weren't affected by the sun.

"Hey, Frosty."

I jumped and spun around.

My gorgeous blond-haired hunter towered over me, a playful grin lighting his features.

"Rude," I squealed very girlishly and much more loudly than I anticipated.

Several heads swung in our direction.

They were probably stunned that klutzy, boyish Snow White could act girly, or that the handsome Chace Charming would choose to grace me with his presence.

At those thoughts, my whole body heated.

They had no idea what I'd done with the incredibly hot hunter.

Chace's eyes narrowed.

"Let's sit," he said, walking over to my table.

I obeyed, letting my hair fall into my face.

Once we were sitting, I scanned the room for Cindy.

A part of me hoped she wouldn't show.

Another part of me worried.

If Cindy was one thing, she was a creature of habit. If she had a change of plans, she would've told me.

Salvatore and Sebastian walked in, both sporting sour expressions when they saw me.

I waved enthusiastically.

They returned my welcome, but it wasn't with any excitement.

"They're upset that I'm sitting here," Christopher said, his voice filled with humor.

CHEMISTRY TOGETHER

"OH, WELL, THEY SHOULDN'T CARE." I signaled them to come over, casually tightening my scarf.

They nodded.

A thought struck me, and I started to panic. "They don't know who you are, do they?" I hissed, keeping my eyes glued on the guys' movements.

"No. At least I don't think so." He shrugged. "But then they are Adam Henry's sons, so anything's possible."

I heard what sounded like a note of awe in his words and wondered why.

The guys picked up their food and headed over. I searched their faces, trying to discern whether they knew.

I didn't think so. If they had, they probably would've been a lot more hostile.

"Hi, guys," I said, feeling suddenly nervous. Thankfully we were still in the lunchroom at school. If the guys wanted to punch out Chace, at least they wouldn't do it here.

"Hey, Snow," Salvatore said.

"Heyah," Sebastian added, taking a huge bite of pizza. "Aren't you going to eat?"

I glanced at the unappetizing salad sitting in front of me. "Not hungry," I responded, keeping my eyes fixed on a wilted carrot. I was, in fact, hungry, but it wasn't for the tasteless salad.

I wanted Christopher's blood.

I gave him a sideways glance, and he smiled meaningfully.

"You should eat. You need your strength for - " Salvatore paused and glanced over at Chace. "Later," he finished.

I opened the juice and took a drink to appease him.

"How do you two know each other?" Salvatore asked between bites of food, indicating Chace and me with a pointer finger.

"Oh," I said, unsure about how to respond.

Chace saved me. "We're in chemistry together. Plus, the track team."

Salvatore and Sebastian swapped comical looks.

"Have you seen Snow run?" Salvatore asked.

"Not yet. Maybe today." Chace grinned slightly; a secret smile I knew was meant for me.

The guys busted out laughing.

Dorian and Bart joined us at the table.

"What's so funny?" Bart asked.

Dorian wore an angry frown.

I watched his eyes linger on my lips, move to my neck, and glance at Christopher.

Did he know? "Charming," he nodded. "What brings you to our table today? I believe there are ten or fifteen girls desperate for your attention. No sense hanging with us guys."

Christopher smiled. "There's one girl at this table. The only girl I'm interested in." He glanced at me, and I was sure my face turned the color of ripened cherries.

Salvatore sputtered out his milk.

"You're in dangerous territory here," Dorian growled.

I watched the way each guy tensed with animosity and decided an intervention was necessary.

"Has anyone seen Cindy?"

"I haven't seen her since math class," Dorian said, shifting his gaze from Chace to me.

"Not since chemistry," Chace added.

The other brothers agreed they hadn't seen her since morning.

"Great. Why don't I have a cell phone?" I grumbled, picking up my juice and taking another sip.

Almost as one, all the guys whipped out their phones.

"May I?" I took Dorian's as a way to appease him, giving him a look.

"Fine," he hissed in mock sarcasm, and I smiled.

Unlocking his phone, I dialed Cindy's number.

It went straight to voice mail, and I left a message after the beep. "Hey, Cin. Just wondering if you're okay. Call me. Oh, I'm on Dorian's phone because, as you know, my dad and stepmother won't give me one. So call him, 'kay?"

After I hung up, I texted a similar message to her number and handed Dorian back his phone.

"Thanks, Dorian."

"I'm sure she's fine. Probably just got hung up talking to some guy," he said, then took a bite of pizza.

I nodded, trying to act convinced.

The guys finished their lunch and took off, leaving Christopher and me alone once again.

"You don't need to worry about your neck." He sounded nonchalant and a little smug.

"Really?" I touched my scarf.

He pulled on it, tugging it away. "Yep, the bruises are gone," he said, giving me a half-smile.

I yanked the scarf from his fingers. "Do I even want to know how you knew they'd be gone?"

"Doubtful." He tossed a couple of fries in his mouth.

I noticed he ate several bites of cheeseburger along with more fries. "How can you stand to eat that?" I asked, scrunching my nose in disgust.

He laughed. "You get used to it. I need to pretend to be a normal human boy." He smirked and bit into another fry.

I looked around. "It's so gross. I think it tastes like ash. I haven't been able to enjoy food since right after you bit me." I tried to look frustrated and angry, but thoughts about how it'd felt the first time, his lips on my neck, and each time since, only filled me with longing.

His eyebrows pinched together but just as quickly relaxed. "You really are exquisite, Snow. I knew you were extraordinary from the moment I first saw you, but I never realized how much until these past few days."

"You could tell just from biting me the other day?" I was confused.

"No, I'm talking about the very first time. When you were young."

Whoa. Whoa. Whoa.

Had he been the one?

"You're the hunter who marked me?" I didn't know how I felt about that.

It was his fault I was on this path but the vampire queen's. He just did her bidding.

Chace dipped his head and took a large bite of burger.

I watched him chew, biting the inside of my cheek, nervous.

But there wasn't any reason to be.

I knew the answer. It was him, which meant several things.

He was older than seventeen or eighteen, and he'd been watching me for a long time.

"Do you know how my mother died?" I blurted.

If he'd been around that long, surely he must've seen her.

At that moment, the bell rang. He stood.

"I'll see you at practice," he said, not answering my question.

Before I could ask again, he took his tray, merging into the thick student traffic, and was gone.

OceanofPDF.com

FAILED HIM

I WATCHED my classmates exit the commons area, doing my best to be okay with mine and Chace's history. The hunter was new to me but I wasn't to him. Pops said hunters marked us when we were young.

Since Christopher/Chace marked me, how long had he been around? Or had he just recently returned to bite me?

So many questions. None of them could be answered right now.

Should I consider him a stalker? Not that I could call the police. And Pops was aware of him. He'd told me to be careful.

As I walked over to dump my tray, I decided I had no idea what I was getting myself into with him.

THE fiNAL THREE classes of the day were torture. Not because I wanted to drink the blood of my fellow classmates.

No.

I was agitated and couldn't stop thinking about Cindy, about revenant training, and about Christopher coming over. My thoughts made it hard to focus on schoolwork.

I had a feeling if Professor Pops knew what I'd been doing, he'd be upset, or at least concerned.

But he'd fallen in love with his marked.

Now that I was spending time with Christopher, I wondered what that meant. Had Professor Pops bitten her, and she him?

Had she died because of their love?

I knew Professor Pops would tell me, but raising the subject would be difficult.

I felt like I'd already failed him.

Christopher would have the answers, but would he be honest?

I sighed. I had to at least try.

In the girls' locker room, I changed out of my jeans and tee-shirt and into black shorts and a burgundy shirt.

After tying my shoes, I headed out to the field.

So far, it'd been an unseasonably hot fall with little rain.

It looked like that was about to change.

Thick storm clouds filled the sky, and thunder rumbled in the distance.

The rest of the team appeared oblivious and stretched on the field. They never waited for me, probably because I never participated.

Christopher sat in the front, a pretty girl on either side, his legs extended in front of him, his hands touching his toes as the team captain counted slowly.

I stopped, admiring him, trying to see any of the telltale signs proving he was a vampire. He had angular features, his body muscled, especially his arms. I suddenly remembered Kenmei showing me the blade tattooed on his arm - the mark of a hunter.

Where was Christopher's? I stepped closer, trying to see it.

Christopher wore a black tank, so it should be easily visible. He glanced up, giving me a smirk.

I smirked right back.

"Hey, Snow, move out of the way." It was Jackie, the team captain. Apparently, I was blocking her view of Salem Academy's newest hottie. Blerg.

I stepped to the side and around to his back. I couldn't see it on either arm near the shoulder.

"Looking for something?" Christopher asked, laughter in his voice.

"Where is it?" I crouched down and touched his arm in the vicinity of the place I'd seen the tattooed blade on Kenmei.

At my touch, the blade appeared on his shoulder like magic.

I jumped back, falling on my butt.

Everyone laughed.

"What a surprise. She just tripped over nothing and fell," someone said.

Jackie gave me a wicked smile. "Shocker."

Christopher leaped up and pulled me into his arms. I buried my face in his chest, ashamed of my less than graceful fall.

"Knock it off," he shouted.

Rage radiated from his body so that he was practically pulsating.

So close to him, my heart started beating rapidly.

He smelled divine, and I knew he tasted even better.

"How dare you?" he roared at my teammates, his breathing heavy.

"Chill," one of the guys said.

"Yeah, Chace. She's used to it," Jackie added.

They were right.

I looked up and placed my hands on either side of his face. "Christopher," I whispered. "It's okay. I'm fine." My voice trembled at the depth of his emotions.

After several seconds, his features softened, and he looked at me. "I'm sorry you were startled. I should've known something like that would happen."

"It's no problem. A brisk enough wind can trip me up." I smiled softly, hoping to ease his temper with a reminder of my klutziness.

It worked.

He beamed a glorious, heavenly smile, causing my breath to hitch in my throat.

"Maybe you should wait a few more days to run; give your abilities more time to kick in." He sported an amused expression.

"Are you questioning your earlier assessment that I'm exceptional?"

He snorted, and I decided to show him, show them all.

"I'm going to run, and I'll be fantastic." I jogged backward a few steps, heading over to the coach.

The coach got out of his chair. Ran a hand over his rugged face. He was probably preparing for a serious injury.

"Hi, coach," I said lightly and kept going.

"Ms. White. What's going on in that head of yours?" He crossed his arms, waiting.

"I'm running today. Just wanted to give you a heads up. Figured you might have a coronary otherwise."

He gasped in mock disdain. "I appreciate your concern, though I'm more worried about you."

"Eh, I'll be fine. You'll see. I might even surprise you." I wriggled my eyebrows, and he laughed, shaking his head.

"Guess it's a good thing I've got 911 on speed dial." Coach pulled his cell from the front of his burgundy polyester shorts and showed it to me to prove he was serious. "Be careful," he added.

"I will," I replied and headed back over to Christopher, jogging in place. Our eyes met, and he looked like he wanted to say something.

"All right, everyone, four times around the track. Go!" Coach's voice rang loud.

"Ready?" Christopher asked, his voice low, pleased.

"Oh yeah."

At that moment, the sky opened up and proceeded to soak me, Christopher, and the rest of the team.

CATCH CHRISTOPHER

I YELPED, covering my head with my hands as my shoulders rose to my ears. Water dripped from my bangs onto my nose and cheeks.

The air smelled wet and of peppermint.

An eerie gloom gathered around the field in the form of fog.

"Coach, are we going in?" someone shouted.

"Yeah, coach, we can't run in this."

"Are you men and women, or mice?" Coach roared over the rain, tipping his burgundy cap lower on his head.

There was collective grumbling as we all made our way to the track.

Christopher touched my arm lightly. "Catch me if you can, Frosty." He grinned and took off.

I watched him, his fluid body moving in perfect strides.

As I watched Chace run, it was like his feet barely skimmed the ground. Wiping the hair off my face, I started to run.

One foot in front of the other. I could do this.

This time I knew it. I sensed the changes.

When I'd run in the past, my body would tense, my knees would freeze, and, according to Cindy, it looked like I had a board shoved up my derriere.

It felt wrong, and I had no doubt, it looked wrong.

But as I ran now, the crisp rain slapping against my skin, my body seemed to relax as though it were settling in for the first time - ever.

It felt good! I felt good.

Taking a deep breath, I picked up speed, trying to catch Christopher.

Each person I ran past gasped or made a snide comment.

I ignored them. I was on a mission.

Catch Christopher. He was the prey, and I was the hunter now.

That was the refrain I chanted with each step.

Catch Christopher. Catch Christopher. Catch Christopher.

When I was within ten feet of him, a sharp prickling sensation struck me in the back of my left knee, and then the right. I paid it no attention.

But seconds later, a tingling heat spread from my knees, up to my thighs and down my calves. Seconds after that, my legs stopped working altogether.

My right cheek and forehead smacked the track.

An explosion of stars writhed before my eyes, and there was a loud pop.

Nothing from the waist down worked, but damn my face stung.

"Ouch." I pushed up on my hands, lifting my upper body off the ground and shaking my head.

Red liquid spilled into my right eye and splashed onto the asphalt before diluting with the rain.

For most of my life, I'd been trained to worry at the sight of my blood. Now wasn't any different.

"Snow! Snow!" Christopher came up to me and stopped, kneeling in front of me. Through the pouring rain, I heard his fear. "What happened? Can you stand?"

A sob escaped my throat. "I can't feel my legs."

It didn't make sense.

What had happened?

"I'm going to check your spine. Hold still."

I tried to do as he said, but I started shaking uncontrollably.

Whether from the chill of the rain or the fall, I didn't know.

I heard him curse. "Your spine is fine. I'm going to turn you over and lift you. Ready?" He ripped off his soaking tank. "Hold this against your forehead. You're bleeding."

"Duh," I said, but nodded, taking his drenched shirt and pressing it against my head.

With incredible gentleness, he turned me onto my back. "All good?" he asked.

"I think so."

He lifted me, and I wrapped one arm around his neck. "I've never been so grateful for rain in all my life, Frosty. Hang on. I'm going to get you someplace dry and safe."

I closed my eyes, tucking my head into his chest.

And he ran. Super-fast.

I heard Coach shout after us but Christopher didn't stop.

And that's when I figured out what he meant about the rain.

It distorted things, which meant he could play dumb when and if someone questioned how he could run so quickly.

The rain beat against my body like icy pebbles, and it hurt.

I pressed my eyes shut tighter.

I couldn't help but wonder where he would take me.

Maybe to my house.

He obviously knew where I lived. Or his.

I had no idea where he lived.

Did he go to the other realm every day after school?

It was so weird to think about another dimension.

I had so many questions.

After several seconds - or minutes - the rain stopped, and I felt the sun warming my skin. Birds sang, their song bouncing back and forth above us.

I opened my eyes.

Christopher's gaze bore into me, filled with concern.

"I'm going to lay you down."

"Okay," I answered, feeling unexpectedly shy.

He squatted, and I felt my back brush against something soft. Gently, he moved his damp shirt from my forehead. "Healed already." He grunted approvingly.

"I'm going to roll you onto your stomach." One of his hands touched my shoulder. "Ready?"

"Yes," I whispered, trying to gauge from his expression how bad off I was.

Tenderly, he turned me.

I moved my arms upward so that I could rest my chin on my hands.

He'd laid me in some mossy grass.

Running my fingers over it, I was amazed at how soft it felt. In front of me sat a small brown cottage built of wooden logs.

The front door was closed.

A medium-sized glass window sat on either side of it.

The roof looked to be made of tree branches and steepled along the top, so it looked like an upside-down V.

On either side of the cottage was a lush forest filled with trees, ferns, and colorful flowers.

I could hear the rush of a stream nearby and guessed he must've brought me to the other realm.

"I'm going to check the backs of your thighs. You felt a sting behind your knees?"

"Yes, I did." Had I told him about the stinging sensation right before I fell?

OceanofPDF.com

I DIDN'T THINK SO.

After several moments I heard him suck in a breath.

"What? What's wrong?" I asked, trying to turn my head so that I could see him.

One of his large hands appeared. Something was pinched between his thumb and first finger.

I squinted, and suddenly my eyes adjusted like the lens on a microscope. A tiny arrow, no bigger than a sliver. "What. Is. That?"

"It's a pixie's arrow. The tip has been dipped in a toxin. I need to make a poultice to draw out the poison. The ingredients are nearby, but I'll be out of sight."

"Don't go," I cried.

He ran his hands through my wet hair. "You'll be safe here. Only a creature whose heart is pure can pass through the enchantments I've put around this place." He came near so that I could see him. "You'll be fine," he added.

"Where are we?" I asked, changing the subject, trying to keep him with me a little longer.

Christopher's eyebrows furrowed in a way I was beginning to understand meant he was anxious.

"We are in Sharra, the realm of the vampire queen." He quickly kissed the top of my head and rushed away.

"Hurry," I called after him softly. I turned my head, resting my uninjured cheek on my hands. He'd answered one of my questions.

The name of this place was Sharra.

"Sharra," I mouthed. Then repeated it a little louder.

"Sharra." I liked the sound of it.

One question down, one hundred twenty-three more to go, I thought as I stared into the forest.

A beautiful bush, filled with all different pastel-colored flowers, grew directly in my line of vision.

The leaves seemed to be moving.

I took a deep cleansing breath, knowing Christopher would do all in his power to fix me up.

But how did I know that?

I thought about it.

He was my hunter, which meant he had to keep my body safe at all costs. It wouldn't do if I died.

"He will come back," I whispered, focusing on the colorful bush.

Something strange happened.

The flowers separated and began to flutter upward, like butterflies taking flight.

It was beautiful.

Once all of the flowers left the bush, the branches looked stark, empty, like a barren tree in the deep of winter.

Alarmed, I wondered why the flowers had abandoned it.

The petals continued rising and headed toward me.

Astonished, I tilted my head to keep watching.

A bubble-gum pink flower fell onto my arm. I shook it, trying to get it to drop, but it wouldn't budge.

Then a periwinkle blue flower landed farther down my arm, near my elbow, followed by a mint green one.

I peered closer, and the flowers moved. Under the petals were little bodies attached to little heads.

Surprised, I gasped and shook my arm wildly. The creatures stayed in place, their little arms and legs tickling my skin.

Finally, I gave up.

"What do you want? I asked, trying not to sound as afraid as I felt.

There was a slight tinkling sound, and I peered closer. Two female and one male creatures peered back. Their bodies the color of the petals or, I guessed, their wings, and they were dressed in matching clothes.

Both girls wore shimmering dresses, and the guy wore pants and a shirt.

"You look like Peter Pan," I said.

He placed his hands on his hips, also reminding me of Peter Pan, and I laughed. "What are you? Fairies?" I asked.

"We're pixilettes," one of the females said in an elevated, barely audible voice and proceeded to shake her tiny finger at me.

"Pixil-ettes," I repeated, admiring how cute they were, but also slightly worried about why they were standing on my arm.

"That's right. We're in charge of the changing seasons in Sharra, as well as reseeding in the spring and the fall."

The same female bowed, placing one hand over her chest and the other out behind her before flying and landing on my nose. "I'm Arianna."

The periwinkle and mint colored pixilettes fluttered onto my nose next to her.

My eyes started to cross, and the tinkling sounded again.

The male slapped his knee.

"What? Are-are you laughing at me?" I asked, trying to be upset, but they were too cute.

The male bowed. "Apologies. My name is Eon."

"And I am Pava."

"Nice to meet you. My name is Snow." I stacked one hand on top of the other, and rested my chin on top of them both, working desperately not to shake my head and uncross my eyes.

Seemingly all at once, hundreds of pixilettes hovered behind the three I'd met.

Pava turned her toes in. "We'd like to help you. Would that be alright?" she asked timidly.

"You know what's wrong with me?" I asked, stunned.

"We do. And between us, we have enough to reverse the effects of the poison," Eon said.

"I'd be most grateful. Thank you!"

The three pixilettes on my nose flew off and backward.

With relief, I closed my eyes, giving them a chance to realign before opening them.

"Christopher - the guy that was here with me - he left," I sucked in a sad breath and cleared my throat. "He went to get ingredients for a poultice. Should someone tell him?"

"We know Christopher," Eon said, turning and flicking his arm.

The way he moved made me think that he might be someone of great importance.

Three pixilettes flew off in the direction Christopher had gone.

"Right," I agreed, feeling tears prick the backs of my eyes.

I was so new to all of this.

My life had shifted radically in the last few days, and I felt overwhelmed.

Inches from my nose fluttered little creatures with bodies the size of moths.

Until a few minutes ago, I hadn't known they existed.

Arianna's pointy features softened. She flew over and lifted a tear from my lashes, balancing it in her hand.

She placed her other hand on my forehead and patted. "Hold very still, and keep your eyes closed until I tell you," she said kindly.

EAT YOU FOR DINNER

I BIT MY CHEEK.

Christopher told me nothing could pass through the enchantments unless they had a pure heart.

That meant these pixilettes wouldn't hurt me, didn't it?

I nodded at Arianna and closed my eyes.

For what seemed like hours, I couldn't feel anything, only heard the occasional tinkling, which I now knew was the pixilettes laughing.

I also smelled oregano.

They are seasoning you and intend to eat you for dinner, I thought sourly.

The sensation started to come back into my legs.

It felt like pins and needles were doing a tap dance on my thighs.

I wanted to rub them or shake them to get rid of the pain, but Arianna told me to hold still. Gritting my teeth, I stayed steady, and my mind drifted until I was someplace else.

"CHRISTOPHER CHARMING, GET IN HERE!" The voice sounded muffled.

I looked down at myself and saw I was transparent, like mist.

Reaching out to touch my arm, my fingers went right through me.

Gasping, I swung in a circle, trying to figure out where I'd gone.

I stood in a garage, which I guessed meant this ghostly part of myself was no longer in Sharra.

The garage door looked rusty and unused. The room was cluttered with boxes stacked to the grungy ceiling, a couch covered in a dusty sheet, and other odds and ends.

The walls were aluminum and rippled.

On one wall hung a pegboard with tools, including hammers, a handsaw, drills, and more. Piles of different sized wood rested against the garage door and lay on the concrete floor next to strange-looking steel machines.

Sitting at one of the machines cutting a small piece of wood was Christopher, wearing a striped shirt with a wide collar and brown corduroy pants that belled out at the bottom.

"Charming," I called out, my voice hesitant.

He didn't acknowledge me, but then he hadn't acknowledged the woman who'd yelled at him a moment ago, either.

"I'm going to count to three, and then I'll add on to your chores," the muffled female voice hollered.

Christopher growled. "Coming." Tucking whatever he worked on in his pocket, he started to walk toward me.

"Christopher," I said again.

He didn't stop but went right through me.

I didn't feel a thing.

Freaky!

I turned and watched him open a warped brown door and go through.

"What?" I heard him call before he slammed it.

Alone, I stared after him. "What am I doing here?" I slowly spun in a circle, searching for answers.

Stepping up to the door, I tried to wrap a hand around the knob, but I couldn't grab it.

"Argh." I put a flattened hand against the door.

It disappeared.

So, I stuck my arm, followed by my head, through the door.

Yep, going through objects wasn't a problem for me.

On the other side, I looked around.

The house was small, run-down.

Empty of pictures or any sort of decoration.

I headed into the kitchen.

The decor was retro seventies at its most elegant - orange cupboards, a pea-green refrigerator and stove, and white linoleum flooring.

There was a half-eaten sandwich on the counter next to an empty marbled green glass.

No one was in the kitchen, but I heard talking to my left, so I followed the sound through a wall and into the living room.

I'd never seen so much plaid.

Christopher stood at the foot of a woman lounging on a faded orange recliner.

She handed him some money, which he stuffed in his back pocket.

"Get me a pound of ground beef and a pack of cigarettes - whichever ones are on sale. Don't dawdle." The woman speaking had medium length blonde feathered hair, a heap of blue eye shadow on her lids, and wore a mustard yellow sundress.

She must have been beautiful at one point.

Now she seemed hardened and wrinkled.

"Well, don't just stand there! Go!"

"Yes, ma'am." Christopher's shoulders slumped as he turned and walked past a large front window, plaid curtains pulled back to let in the dying daylight, and opened the front door.

Once it closed, I went through it and stopped at the top of a small concrete landing with three steps leading to a cracked pathway that turned into the sidewalk.

The grass was yellowed, the color of dried hay.

Random toys were scattered about making me wonder if Christopher had younger siblings. He picked up a bike and pedaled so fast, he was nearly at the end of the street before I realized he'd left.

"Christopher, wait!" I called.

I didn't need to worry, though.

My body floated after him as though I was a balloon tied to a string attached to his wrist.

As I glided along, I watched the cookie-cutter houses pass by.

A group of kids played baseball in a park, their banter easy to hear.

Then Christopher turned a corner and houses disappeared, making way for stores, including a 7-Eleven and a liquor store.

He rode across a large parking lot toward what I guessed was a small grocery store called The Apple Store.

Christopher jumped off his bike, letting it fall with a clang to the ground, and ran in.

He went toward the back, past a group of guys in black leather jackets.

For the first time, I was glad no one could see me.

Christopher gave them a wide berth, but I was mesmerized and watched as they pointed at Christopher and began to laugh.

My heart skipped several beats, and warning bells went off in my head.

"Be careful."

Christopher already had the meat and moved on.

The guys sauntered along after him, pushing each other and scaring customers they walked past.

Christopher picked out a pack of cigarettes from a stocked shelf - not a shelf behind a counter or locked glass, the way cigarettes were stored now, but out in the open where anyone could grab them - then made his way down an aisle filled with magazines and books.

I cringed slightly, thinking he'd head for the comics or worse, naked women.

I so didn't want to see that.

Instead, he picked up a woodworking magazine and flipped through the pages.

When he came to the page he wanted, he set the opened magazine on top of the meat and cigarettes and pulled out the piece of wood he'd been working on.

I leaned over his shoulder and noticed it was a carving of a bear. The one in his hand looked almost exactly the same as the one on the page.

Wow, I was impressed.

Christopher had talent.

NEW BORN VAMPIRE

SUDDENLY THE MAGAZINE flew out of his hand with a thwack, followed by the sounds of voracious laughter.

Christopher's shoulders tensed, and he turned.

"What's the big idea?" he asked, and I perceived his barely contained rage.

The large guy in the middle stepped forward, the others flanking him.

There were five.

Even in ghost form, my heart started pounding in my throat, making it difficult to understand what was said, but I gathered they wanted a fight.

That didn't seem fair, five against one.

The leader shoved Christopher, causing his shoulder to smack against the magazine rack. He righted himself and adjusted his shirt.

The muscles in his shoulders relaxed, and he smirked.

I knew that smirk.

"You'll pay for that," Christopher said quietly.

The leader's mouth dropped. "I doubt it, dickhead."

"How about we step outside and find out." Christopher's tone was smooth, in control. Did he understand what was happening? Did he want to fight them?

Christopher looked seventeen or eighteen but the guys picking the fight were older. Maybe in their twenties.

"Ooooh, he's got balls," one of them said.

The rest laughed, playfully shoving their leader.

A look of surprise skimmed across the leader's face before he hardened his jaw. "Let's go."

"I've got to pay for these first. Meet you outside in five?" Christopher held up his hand, his fingers spread wide.

Did Christopher want to die?

He acted like they were meeting to hang out, not like they were about to fight.

"We'll be waiting," the leader said.

"Yeah, and don't try to run away. We'll find you," a guy with a missing front tooth said.

"Oh, I won't be running away, but you're going to wish you had." Christopher stepped past them and got in line to pay.

The jerky guys loudly made their way outside and disappeared into the parking lot.

I was terrified for Charming.

What was his plan?

Would he try to sneak out the back?

Once he'd paid and the meat and cigarettes were bagged, he walked out the front door.

It was almost dark, and I didn't see the leather-clad guys immediately.

For a split second, I thought they'd left.

Not the case.

Christopher set the bag next to his bike and made his way over to them.

The leader took off his jacket, removed the cigarette sitting behind his right ear, and handed it to one of the other guys, then put his arms up, his hands in fists.

Christopher shook his head and chuckled but didn't move.

He just stood there with his irritatingly handsome smirk.

"Move," I shouted, fear causing my voice to raise two octaves.

Large overhead lights flicked on.

The leader circled Christopher. "Come on, dweeb, you talked the talk inside. Let's see you walk the walk." As the leader spoke, he moved to punch Christopher in the kidneys.

Quicker than lightning, Christopher spun around, grabbed the leader's hand, and flipped him over, so he landed on his back.

The move knocked the wind out of the guy, and he grabbed his chest, trying to suck in some air.

His friends let out shouts of outrage and surprise, and then they all went after Christopher as one.

A barrage of punching and kicking, swearing and spinning, followed by the cracking of bones and howls of pain.

Everything happened so fast I couldn't keep up, but it looked as though Christopher was winning.

He obviously knew how to take care of himself.

Relief washed over me until I saw a flash of steel.

One of them had a gun.

"You think you're a badass," the guy holding the gun said, his breath coming in ragged gasps, the arm not holding the firearm cradled against his stomach and blood streaming from his nose.

Everyone froze, including Christopher.

Sickness wound through my belly.

"C'mon, don't," another guy said. "That's going too far, man. Put it away."

"Yeah, we can't kill the kid," the leader added. Blood dripped from his left eye.

"Don't hurt him," I shouted, my hands wringing against my sides. "Help!" I cried, even though it was useless.

If anyone was in the parking lot, they already left or were hiding.

"Who says?" the guy holding the gun whispered, his voice filled with seething fury.

The gun went off with a loud pop like the cork of a champagne bottle, and Christopher dropped.

"You idiot!" the leader shouted.

"Let's get out of here," the guy with the gun said, kicking Christopher in the shins.

They took off running, and I floated, helpless, as a large pool of Christopher's blood emptied onto the asphalt.

"No. No. No," I wailed, tears streaming down my cheeks.

I'd never felt so useless in all my life. I closed my eyes, shaking my head.

"If I'm dreaming, let me wake up," I choked out between sobs.

When I opened my eyes, I hadn't moved.

Sirens sounded in the distance. "Yes, hurry. Maybe he's still alive."

"There, there, young one," a soft, musical voice soothed.

She seemed to appear out of thin air.

She and two others wore black cloaks, large hoods covering their heads.

As one, they glided over to Christopher and me. Frantic, I placed my body in front of him to block her, but she went right through me and knelt beside Christopher.

"Leave him alone!" I cried and was rewarded by a glare from the woman.

She was breathtaking.

Her lips were red as blood, her long hair black as a starless night sky, and her skin glowed the color of moonbeams.

"Come. We must turn him quickly," she ordered, and the other two figures knelt beside Christopher.

The first one gently gathered Christopher's head in her arms, tilted him so that his neck was exposed, and bit.

Vampires, I thought.

The other two sank their canines into each of his wrists.

A moan escaped Christopher, and he arched further toward the first vampire's mouth.

I understood. I'd done the same thing when Christopher first bit me.

A vampire's bite was sensual regardless of whether or not the person was love-starved.

Seconds later, they withdrew, and the first spoke. "Rise!"

Christopher's eyes opened, and I inhaled. His irises glowed red.

"We must go," the first commanded, taking one of his hands.

Right then, I knew who or what she was.

The vampire queen.

STAINED WITH HIS BLOOD

A CONFUSED LOOK clouded Christopher's features, but he nodded, and they all vanished into the night.

I expected to be pulled along after him, but that didn't happen. My ghostly body remained near the blood. The vampire queen, the other two women - probably worker vampires - left.

And I remained.

Alone.

For some reason, kusala and akusala, those strange words Christopher spoke to me last night, came to mind.

Had those boys been evil, and the vampire queen good?

Did she really save him?

Sure, he still walked and talked and breathed.

But at what cost?

Had he become an empty shell?

A plaything for the queen?

Is that what I would become.

No!

I was more than what my body would become.

Christopher was too.

He cared about me, didn't he?

Frustrated, I crossed my arms, wondering why I was still there.

I was about to take my misty carcass back to Christopher's house when I noticed something familiar in Christopher's blood.

The wooden bear he'd carved.

Hovering so that my nose almost touched the statue, I peered at it carefully.

It was stunning work, so precise, right down to its claws and the pupils in its eyes.

Deep down, I knew that was the reason I witnessed what happened.

Christopher needed the carving for some reason.

I reached with one hand and grabbed for it. My fingers went right through. I tried again. Again. Again. And again.

"Ugh, please. What do I need to do?" I pleaded.

A tiny thought budded in my heart.

Relax.

I snorted and tried again, with both hands this time.

My hands floated through.

"Awwwww!"

I'd never been so frustrated in all my life.

Relax.

"Fine."

I breathed through my nose, held it a second, and let it out through my mouth.

Relax.

I breathed in, held, and blew out.

The muscles in my shoulders loosened.

The tension left my stomach.

I reached for the carved bear, the buttery wood stained red with Christopher's blood, and picked it up.

"Yes!"

A LIGHT, irritating tapping repeated between my eyebrows near the bridge of my nose.

"Snow. Snow White. You can move now. We have removed the toxins."

Arianna.

I was back in Sharra.

"Christopher," I gasped, and stood, searching urgently for him.

I needed to see him for myself.

A flurry of pixilettes pulsated around me, my quick movements startling them.

"Sorry," I said, breathing heavily.

I stepped forward, and a wave of nausea rocked my body, making me dizzy.

"Easy, Frosty." Warm hands encircled my waist, and his soft chuckle tickled my ear. "I'm here."

I sank into him, pushing down a fearful cry.

Christopher.

My mind still clung to the awful experience I'd just witnessed.

"I saw you," I said, my voice hushed.

"Saw me?" he repeated, touching his fingers to my forehead.

I turned in his arms and put a hand on his neck.

The ache for his blood burned in my throat.

"I watched you fight those awful men, and one shot you."

His hands tightened, but I kept going. "I watched you become a vampire."

He winced and pushed my head against his chest. "Shush. You've had a traumatizing day."

I forced my head up. "No. Don't shush me. I'm telling you I saw her. The vampire queen. She's the one who changed you."

I wasn't sure how I knew, but there wasn't a doubt in my mind I'd seen the face of the vampire queen.

He dismissively shook his head, his gorgeous hazel eyes hooded, and his lips pursed in a smirk.

His attitude angered me and aroused my hunger.

I wanted him, his blood, the way the queen took it.

And before I could think further, I lunged at him, sinking my now extended, needle-sharp teeth into his warm, inviting throat.

His arms circled me more tightly, holding me while I drank his blood.

When I'd had my fill, I pulled back.

"Better?" he asked.

"Sorry," I said, knowing I'd taken without asking.

"Don't be. Feeling better?" He held me at arm's length, looking me over.

"Yes." I felt great. His blood did something to me. "But what I saw - "

He held up a hand, looking around. "We can discuss it later. Right now, you're supposed to be at Adam Henry's." My face was cupped between his hands. He kissed me gently. "I'll wait here until you get back, okay?"

"But how?" I paused, searching our surroundings, and realized we were standing in my kitchen. My head whirled, and I nodded. "You'd better be," I returned.

Christopher's eyes flicked to my throat.

"It'll be my turn when you get back," he said, his voice low, husky, his thumbs stroking my skin, sending tingles all over my body.

My stomach quivered in anticipation.

"I'd like that." I turned to leave but remembered the wooden bear.

Opening my hand, I was slightly shocked to see I still had it.

Most of it was covered in burgundy so dark it was almost black.

His dried blood.

"What are you doing? Why aren't you - " He stopped, touching my hand. When he saw what I held, he sucked in a breath. "Where did you get that?"

"I told you I was there."

He crumbled, sagging to his knees. "How?"

I kneeled in front of him. "I don't know how or why, or even where I was, only that you were there, and, after she and the others left with you, I saw this lying in your blood and picked it up." I held my hand out. "For you."

He took it between his first finger and his thumb. "Thank you," he said, his eyes watery. Seconds later, he pulled me into an embrace, his arms crushing me to him. "You have no idea what this means," he whispered against my hair.

The force of his words, the ache, and urgency gave me some idea and caused me to tremble. "You're welcome, Christopher."

As quickly as he hugged me, he released me. "Go. We have a lot to talk about when you get back." He stood and pulled me with him.

"Okay, but stay down here. No snooping." I didn't want him to see my childish room.

"What don't you want me to find?" he asked, planting a swift kiss on my mouth.

Gatsby made an appearance and started howling, winding between Christopher's legs and then mine.

OceanofPDF.com

BOSSY PANTS

"MAKE yourself useful and feed my cat," I said in mock irritation.

He quirked a brow.

"Just don't go in my room," I added.

"Fine. No snooping." He playfully swatted my butt. "Hurry. The sooner you get there, the sooner you'll be back."

I yelped my cheeks hot. "Dude." I left, running at lightning speed over to Professor Pops' house without tripping once.

WHEN I KNOCKED on the door to Professor Pops' house, Daniel answered immediately. "Bout time, Snow. Gabe's been chomping at the bit."

"Gabe?" I asked. Fear raced through me. "I-I thought Dorian was training me today."

"Change of plans. You better get down there."

"Right, thanks, Daniel." I hurried, jogging down the stairs and past the Museum of the Supernatural, into the room filled with weapons. Gabe's angry gaze found mine and slammed my feet to a stop.

"Where were you?" he demanded.

"Hey, chill, bossy pants. I'm here now," I said, releasing some nervous energy.

His expression softened. "Sorry. I was worried."

He held the longer sword - what had Professor Pops called it? A katana? - in one hand.

Then came around and stood extra close so that his body hugged mine.

"Let's begin." He took my right hand and placed the sword in it.

I bit my cheek, suddenly nervous.

He doesn't want you. He doesn't want you. He doesn't want you.

The words sounded over and over in my mind.

"Your heart is beating so fast. Are you craving my blood?" His face was so close to mine; I could feel his five o'clock shadow, not to mention the pounding of his pulse.

And I realized he was scared.

Of me.

That knowledge hurt.

"No, I'm nervous about being so close to the blade," I lied.

He swallowed, a loud gulping of his fear.

Why choose to train me if he was afraid?

Gabe might as well shove that pointy stake into my heart.

Stepping away, I turned. "How about you demonstrate the correct way to hold it, and I'll copy you?"

I watched his jaws clench. He nodded.

"Spread your feet shoulder's width apart."

I did as he said.

"Now, bend your knees."

As I bent them, he walked over, set the sword on the counter, and then came over to me.

Yeah, it's still just me. Your best friend. Sheesh!

"Like this?" I asked scowling.

He pressed a hand against one of my butt cheeks. "Tuck that under and hold in your lower abdomen."

I tried to do as he said, but it felt weird. What was up with two guys touching my butt within a few minutes.

"Come on, Snow. It's not that difficult," he said, his voice harsh.

Anger snapped to attention and bloomed like a rose in my chest.

Why was he acting so rude? "I've never done anything like this before, so forgive me if I'm not a pro in two point five seconds, Gabriel."

"Well, hello there, Snowflake." He smirked, and I realized he'd been goading me on purpose.

He picked up his sword and took another off the wall, handing it to me. I took it and glared.

"During battle, anger is good, necessary in fact, but it must be controlled." He started to circle me, and my senses heightened.

I copied the way he held his blade and followed him.

"If you can learn to control your anger, you'll be a force to reckon with," he said.

I snorted. "What about tripping over my feet?"

He stopped. "C'mon, Snow. This is serious. You've got to be prepared. The hunter is working to make sure you become the next queen. And others," he waved his unarmed hand upward, "are planning your demise. Either way, your life could end soon - unless you fight for it."

The poisonous arrow Christopher pulled from my leg crossed my thoughts.

Gabe was right.

"Ugh. Fine," I snapped. "Stop chitchatting and show me what to do!"

WE TRAINED for an hour and a half before I finally started to get the hang of how to stand with my butt and stomach tucked in.

I figured out how to hold the blade correctly - not too tight, not too soft, and move with more agility. I didn't stumble or cut myself once.

Even Gabe was impressed.

By the time we finished, Gabe lightened up, and though the training was intense, I felt like, on a personal level, he and I were better.

Maybe back to being friends.

"Good job, Snowflake," he said, placing the blades on the wall when we finished. "You surprise me."

"Gee, thanks," I replied, my voice thick with sarcasm, but the compliment made me happy.

He tossed a white hand towel at me.

I caught it and patted my forehead.

The front of Gabe's grey shirt clung to his flat stomach.

His arms and neck glistened with sweat.

I'd worked just as hard as he had, but I hardly perspired.

You're a revenant now, that's why.

For some reason, the thought made me smile.

Yes. I. Am!

Gabe lifted a brow, questioning my sudden silly grin.

He draped the towel around his neck and hung on.

Even sweaty, he was handsome.

"I've got to hit the books, so I'll see you tomorrow," he said.

My smile deflated. "Oh, okay. Later."

As he walked by, he patted my arm.

Great, we're back to awkward.

I followed him out, and Gabe locked the door.

"I'll be by to take you to school in the morning," he said, sounding odd.

I wanted to shake him, forcefully require him to get over his weirdness, and bring back my best friend.

Instead, I waved to his retreating back.

After he left, I browsed around the Museum of the Supernatural, casually checking out each creature, but I'd already decided which one

I wanted to research first.

The hunter.

I hadn't forgotten the look on Christopher's face when he saw the carved bear. It'd been a mixture of excitement, fear, and joy.

That had to mean something, didn't it?

I wanted to see if the answers to my questions, including why finding something belonging to Christopher before he'd turned, could be valuable.

I opened the drawer next to the statue of the hunter vampire, pulled out the book, and placed it on the strange podium in the center of the room.

"Chapter one," I said, and the pages flipped until they reached the correct page.

ORIGINAL VAMPIRES

ON THE FACING page was a full-color picture of a young man.

He looked to be of Asian descent, with deep olive skin, black eyes, and long black hair.

He posed regally in a navy-blue robe decorated with intricate designs.

He seemed familiar.

Something about the eyes.

Under the picture was a caption: Kenmei Yamata.

"Kenmei," I murmured, and started to read aloud:

"Before the time of man, vampires ruled the earth. They lived in harmony with all creatures, great and small: the trolls, and the goblins, the pixies, and the pixilettes. The dragons of the air and of the sea.

"The griffin and the mermaid. The elf and the dwarf.

"After a thousand years, one vampire rose up from the rest, her magic more potent than all others. She was beautiful, the most beautiful in the land.

"Creatures fell at her feet to worship her. She was also greedy, hungry for power, her heart filled with enmity for all.

"She subjected others to her authority and became the vampire queen.

"But some resisted, and war broke out. Both sides suffered abundant losses.

"In the end, the vampire queen and her followers were forced into hiding.

"Then came the time of man.

"Discovering their usefulness, the queen created the first hunter." I paused, mulling over what I had learned.

"Kenmei was the first hunter," I whispered, remembering the conversation between Professor Pops, Kenmei, and me.

"That's right," Professor Pops said, and I jumped.

I hadn't heard him come down.

Recovering, I closed the book. "So, vampires lived before humans?" I asked swallowing. "They didn't start out human?"

"If by human, you mean like we are now, then no." He shook his head, moving closer to the book.

"Appendix A," he said.

The book quietly flipped toward the back, its pages stirring the air with the smell of old paper.

When it stopped, I unconsciously recoiled from the pictures on the page, finding it difficult to grasp what I saw.

"What are those things?" I finally asked.

The creatures had dark and hairy bodies.

Their arms and legs were the same lengths, similar in proportion to an ape.

Large pointy claws extended from their appendages, and spreading from their backs were sets of glittering web-like wings.

That wasn't even the oddest part.

Their heads were human, covered in smooth skin the color of a baby fawn.

Cherubic, I thought.

The faces of angels.

Each one seemed more attractive, more exquisite than the one before.

The eye colors ranged from blue to violet, to yellow, to orange. The hair growing from their heads matched their eye color, as did their lips.

"Those, Snow, are what vampires looked like in the beginning."

"They're creepy, yet somehow regal. It's weird." I crossed my arms, desperate to hold in my emotions.

Professor Pops chuckled, and the warmth of his laugh calmed me. "I understand." He placed a hand on my shoulder.

"That's enough for today. Why don't you head on home? Gabe said you did well during training."

"He did?" Maybe he was more comfortable with me than I thought.

"Yes, he did. Now get some rest, and I'll see you after school tomorrow."

"Okay. Plus, I've got a lot of homework to do." Christopher flashed across my mind, and my legs turned to mush.

Jogging toward the bottom of the stairs, I stopped before going up. "See ya, Professor Pops."

"Actually, one more thing."

"Yes," I said, turning. Maybe he decided to share more.

His countenance changed to sadness, or maybe concern. "As your protector, I'm here for you. No matter what. You understand that, right?"

Did he somehow know what I was doing with my hunter? I hoped not.

How humiliating.

I didn't want to discuss that - my feelings for Christopher - with Pops or anyone else.

Thankful for the low lighting in the room, I gulped. "Yes, thank you. It's good to hear the words. I'll remember."

His tense face calmed. "Good." He rubbed his fingers against his jawline, making a scratching sound. "And - " he paused, and I stopped breathing.

Did he expect us to talk now? I couldn't. No way.

But I didn't need to worry.

His features softened, and whatever he'd been about to say died before he spoke.

"Have you had a chance to look through the book of dresses I sent over with the boys? Did you notice the red one near the back? That's the one I'd pick for you."

Confused, I racked my brain a moment until I followed.

He was talking about my birthday party. I hadn't spotted a red dress, but then I hadn't gone through the entire book yet. I wanted to tell him the red dress would be perfect just to get the whole ordeal over with. I did not understand fashion.

But, if Cindy found out I had an exclusive book full of couture dresses and hadn't let her look through it? My life would be over.

"Near the back?" I repeated, placing a foot on the bottom step.

"That's right."

"I'll be sure to check it out and let you know in the next couple of days. Will that be okay?"

"Of course." Professor Pops waved me away, and I took the remaining stairs two at a time.

On my way out of the house, I said good-bye to five of the seven brothers.

Dorian and Gabe weren't around, which reminded me that I hadn't heard from Cindy since chemistry.

I really hoped she was okay.

Outside, I glanced at the stars, each one so bright, like the moon. Inhaling the crisp night air, I tried to calm myself.

The thought of being alone with Christopher did things to me - to my heart and low in my belly.

I crossed through our yards, hurrying through the thick trees and brush.

When I reached the stairs leading up to my back porch, I noticed several lights in the house turned on - upstairs, too.

He'd snooped.

My heart skipped several beats as I flung the door open.

"I'm back, Chri - "

For a moment, I think my heart stopped.

Sitting at the dining room table were my dad and stepmother.

"Hello, dear," my stepmother said, a cruel smile lifting her lips. "Surprise."

OceanofPDF.com

TWICE A DAY

"DAD. VIVIANNE. YOU'RE HOME." I wanted to rush over and hug my dad, but my stepmother's scowl held me in place.

Where was Christopher? Had he heard them come home and left? I hoped so.

"Hi, Snow-Angel," Dad said slowly, clearing his throat.

He looked good, more in shape, though he still dressed like an undercover TV cop - Hawaiian shirt, cargo shorts, and socks with sandals. He was tan with natural blond streaks in his otherwise dark hair.

His face crinkled near his eyes from smiling. He and my stepmother sat across the dining table from each other, dozens of bags piled between them.

Apparently, there'd been shopping on their trip.

Gatsby darted from under the table and wound around my legs, yowling for his dinner.

"Don't you feed him? He's too skinny," Vivianne said.

She wore a pair of white shorts and a light blue tank. One tanned leg was crossed over the other, and her wedge-sandaled foot bounced rhythmically.

She was a lot younger than my dad, closer to my age than his. Not a single wrinkle marred her perfect complexion.

Each platinum blond hair on her head rested in place.

"Of course I do. Twice a day, every day." I grabbed Gatsby's kibble from under the sink, poured some into his bowl, and then refilled his water.

Finished, I went to my dad, who rose from the table and shuffled his feet awkwardly near the counter.

"How was your trip?" I asked, hugging him and inhaling his sandalwood aftershave. The scent filled me with comfort and reminded me of a time before my stepmother entered the picture.

Vivianne placed a hand on my shoulder. "Good. We're only here a short time. Then it's back to work." She hooked a finger in my shirt. "Why do you insist on wearing boy clothes?"

She said boy as though it tasted like acid on her tongue.

I pulled away. "They're comfortable."

She balked, walking over to the table. As she dug through the bags, I eyed my dad.

"You have to leave again so soon?" I asked.

"Not for a few weeks. By the time we go, you'll be sick of us." He hugged me again, and I held him tightly.

Our house didn't show it, but my dad was sort of a business mogul.

Cindy said our family had more money than God.

I'd done an Internet search on my dad once and discovered he owned a private jet, kept a building in Boston, and owned more than a dozen vacation resorts all over the world.

But I'd never seen his offices, been to his resorts, flown on one of his planes, or, well felt rich.

Dad didn't act like a wealthy man.

Didn't dress like one either.

Even though our house was small and hidden by trees, it had been built in a pretentious neighborhood in the early eighteen hundreds.

The smallest on the block, most people around us, like Professor Pops, had purchased the land, torn down what stood on it, and rebuilt, which meant that mansions surrounded our little house.

And then there was my stepmother's strange love of all things fairytale.

The décor inside our house could be mistaken for a gift shop rather than a multimillionaire tycoon's residence.

Dad had been around more before my mom died. Now he rarely stayed home longer than a few weeks at a time.

"I could never get sick of you. I miss you when you're gone," I whispered. No doubt I'd be sick of Vivianne, but certainly not my dad. I loved him. When he was around, I felt content and happy. Hugging him tighter, I swallowed a sigh.

Vivianne cleared her throat. "How's Track going? Won any races yet?" Her expression was one of amusement, and I bit back a retort.

"Not yet, maybe soon." I shrugged. My dad and stepmother weren't around enough to know if I'd grown less klutzy, so I had no problem letting them believe that their insistence that I be on the track team was paying off.

"Really? You've figured out how to put one foot in front of the other without tripping?" she asked, giving my body a once over.

"I - " I didn't know how to respond.

It wasn't like I could spill about becoming a revenant.

Viv especially would freak and talk my dad into sending me to an asylum.

Don't get me wrong.

Dad had a backbone.

For some reason, though, he always bent to her will.

"Leave her be," my dad growled, his eyes flashing with anger.

I would've cheered except he immediately turned contrite.

"I'm sure Snow is doing a fine job in Track. Aren't you, Snow-Angel?"

I brushed my bangs out of my eyes. "It's getting better," I replied, nodding to my dad.

"Happy birthday, Snow."

Her words surprised me. It wasn't my birthday for a while still.

"Thanks," I said, glancing at my dad again. His smile was tight.

Viv held a formal lavender dress in her hands.

I had no idea what the materials were called, but the spaghetti strapped bodice was shiny, and the bottom half reminded me of a fluffy lavender cloud. T he dress sparkled as though diamonds frolicked within the layers. A broad grin spread over her face.

"What do you think?"

Tentatively I stepped forward, touching the little lavender rose belt cinched around the waist.

"It's beautiful." I didn't want to overly encourage Viv. "Where am I going to wear this?"

She huffed, exasperated. "Mr. Henry told us about the birthday party he's planned for you." She turned and walked back to the table.

From a bag, she pulled out something wrapped in tissue paper.

"Hold this," she said, handing my dad the dress.

After he took it, Viv carefully removed the white paper, producing a stunning mask, decorated in glittering beads of lilac, teal, and fuchsia the same shades as several soft-looking feathers that protruded from one side. The beading around the eyes was black.

"Mr. Henry said the party theme was a masked ball." She touched a delicate feather. "This mask is from Milan and cost more than most people make in a year."

KEEP YOUR HAIR ON

MY DAD GRUMBLED, uncomfortable. He didn't like to talk about money.

"You'll look lovely. The black beading will bring out your stunning blue eyes," Viv added, ignoring him.

I reached out, drawn to the colorful beading.

Viv slapped my hand away. "Wash your hands first." She took the dress from my dad. "I hope this fits you. It's hard to tell under all those baggy clothes."

"What size is it?" I asked, drying my wet hands on a towel.

"Tut-tut. Go try it on."

I took the dress and went upstairs. There wasn't a tag or a size in the dress.

Viv probably didn't know.

When I entered my room, I casually peeked around before closing my door.

"Christopher. Charming, are you here?"

I checked my bathroom, the shower, my closet, even under my bed. He wasn't there. My stomach sank.

He must've left. I hoped he'd come back later - after they went to bed.

"Snow! Hurry up," Viv shouted from below.

"Okay." I tore off my clothes and cautiously stepped into the dress, zipping up the side. I went to the full-length mirror and twirled side to side, watching the dress glimmer.

It fit perfectly.

"Snow!" Viv hollered again.

"Keep your hair on," I muttered, opening the door.

At the top of the stairs, I paused.

Viv noticed me first.

"Snow, you look amazing." She clutched her hands together.

"Yes, you do. Like royalty," Dad chimed in.

Viv gave him a dark glance. Then she scowled in my direction.

"Come down. Let me see you close up."

I walked down the stairs.

Before I reached the bottom, her hands were on me, pulling and tugging.

I hoped she didn't rip any of the material.

"It isn't perfect, but you'll do," she said when she finished. "I wouldn't want anyone at the party thinking we're cheap."

I wiped the grin off my face and nodded. I didn't bother mentioning that Professor Pops had brought me a book filled with Vera Wang designs and that I would be wearing one of those dresses if any dress at all.

"Well, I'm tired. I'm going to bed." I gave Viv an awkward hug. "Thank you for the dress. It's gorgeous. I love it."

I wasn't completely lying. If it had been another color, it would've been perfect.

She patted my arm. "Of course." She moved back over to the bags, rifling through them again.

Dad pressed me to him.

"Thank you, Dad."

"You're welcome, Snow-Angel. Good night."

"Night." Before I started up, Viv brought over a hanger nestled in a garment bag along with the bag that held the mask.

"Put the dress in here and make sure the mask is somewhere safe." She pressed them into my outstretched hands.

"I will."

Gatsby followed me upstairs and jumped on my bed. He curled himself into a ball, his blue-grey eyes watching me.

"Do you think you're underfed?"

He licked his mouth.

"Definitely not," I answered for him. "You're a perfect size. Quite handsome."

I hung up the garment bag and placed the sack holding the mask on the shelf above my clothes.

Carefully I stepped out of the dress and hung it up inside the garment bag.

After pulling on a cherry tank and a black pair of PJ pants, I brushed my teeth, washed my face, and climbed into bed. I tucked my hands under my pillow.

My fingers brushed against something.

Rolling to my stomach, I lifted the pillow.

There was a red gem in the shape of a teardrop attached to a long silver chain. It was about the size of my thumb.

Under the necklace rested a piece of paper with a note scrawled on it. I flipped on the lamp next to my bed.

I read it:

Frosty, I'd intended to wait until your birthday party to give you the necklace, but I may not be able to make it. So, I'm giving it to you now. The gem is filled with magic, like you. Wear it always, please. It'll keep you safe. I'll see you soon.

Your hunter,

Christopher.

I READ the note several times. Each pass caused my heart to constrict in pain.

He wouldn't be able to make it to my party?

It was more than a month away.

Would he be gone that long? I eased the delicate chain over my head, watching the gem glint against the filtered light.

"It's beautiful," I whispered.

Gatsby came over and rubbed his head against my hand, purring.

I scratched him behind the ears.

"I'll be fine, kitty."

Folding the note, I tucked it under the lampstand and turned off the light.

Gatsby nudged me, a not so subtle hint that he still wanted to be petted.

With a sigh, I accommodated and thought about the last time I'd seen Christopher.

We'd been in my kitchen.

He was excited, stunned, and happy about the wooden bear.

"What's going on?" Weary after a long day, I closed my eyes.

My mind wandered back through all I'd done. School. Track. Going to Sharra. Meeting the pixilettes, weapons training, and then my dad and stepmother.

It felt like I'd lived a week in one day.

I hadn't done any homework, though.

Not good.

Hopefully, I'd be able to get it done tomorrow during classes.

"SNOW WHITE, COME CLOSER." Her voice seemed to whisper inside my mind.

The room was round with walls made of rectangular rocks.

A darkened window prevented any light from entering.

The vampire queen sat on a large throne decorated in jewels that twinkled in the light from the candelabras.

All around the room sat others - all women.

They seemed angry. Their rage barely contained. Their eyes gleamed a golden yellow like the sun.

Had she brought me here?

"Is this Sharra?" I asked, working to keep my focus on her and not the others. They frightened me, their gazes following my every move.

The queen smiled, flashing her sharpened canines.

She was so beautiful it hurt.

The images I saw in the book at the Museum of the Supernatural invaded my mind - ape bodies and bat-like wings with their faces human-looking.

She'd looked like that at one point.

I wondered if those kinds of vampires still existed or if they all died.

OceanofPDF.com

REVEALING THEIR FANGS

"I SEE Christopher has been enlightening you. Yes, this is Sharra, a realm of my creation," the vampire queen answered.

A long, old-fashioned gown hugged her curvy body and spread out around her in tones of emerald and pine. Black ribbing crisscrossed the bodice.

Her raven-black hair was done up in hundreds of curls, a diamond tiara peeking out in front. An emerald choker captured her neck.

Thick black lashes framed iridescent blue eyes, and her lips shone red as blood, as did her long manicured nails.

"Come closer so I can look at you."

My body responded to her alluring voice, and I moved forward.

Would she take me now?

Had my time run out already?

I wasn't prepared.

At least, according to Professor Pops, I still needed to drink my true love's blood.

As one of the marked, that was how I was to change.

Gathering confidence, I lifted my chin.

"What do you want?"

My question infuriated the other vampires.

They launched out of their chairs, hissing and revealing their fangs as they stalked toward me.

There was no escape.

I was surrounded.

A quick look at the queen revealed she was smiling.

Did that mean she was through with me?

She wanted her vampires to tear me to shreds? To drink me dry?

But I wasn't ready to die. Not even close.

"No. Stop," I shouted, glaring at her with determination.

It dawned on me suddenly that I was still in my PJs, but I didn't have time to be self-conscious.

The vampires closed in, circling me.

They were so close I caught their cloying, too-sweet scent, but they didn't attack.

It was like they were trying to scare me, not actually eat me.

Their tactics were working. I was scared, and I crossed my arms over my face.

In that same instant, a red light exploded from my palms into the vampire nearest me. She burst into flames.

"Whoa!"

Those closest to her screamed and ran when some of the flames touched them, their bodies blackening.

The others froze, their beautifully fanged faces filled with apprehension.

"No, don't hurt them!" the vampire queen shrieked.

I almost laughed though nothing about the situation was funny.

She had been bluffing.

I BOLTED UPRIGHT, throwing off the covers and frightening Gatsby.

"Sorry, boy," I whispered, trying to calm my racing heart.

Heading into the bathroom, I filled a cup with water and chugged it down.

A movement from behind startled me, and my heart pulsed.

Something was in my room, near the window.

And like an idiot, I moved closer.

It was a squat creature, like a big blob of mud with yellow cat eyes.

"Are you real?"

It opened its mouth. A bright pink tongue licked two slits that I figured could be its nose.

"She sees me," it said in a raspy voice.

"Yes, I see you. Is there someone else here?" I quickly scanned the room.

Gatsby stood on my bed, his back arched, and hissed.

"Magic, my queen. The girl possesses magic." Moving more rapidly than I believed possible, it opened my window and jumped.

"Wait!" I called going to the window.

The creature bounded across my back lawn like a giant toad and disappeared into the thick brush that lined the property.

THE NEXT MORNING after getting ready, I went downstairs and was surprised to find Vivianne in the kitchen, cooking breakfast. She had on a pair of sweatpants with the word SEXY in bold letters across her butt and a matching hot pink hoodie.

Her hair was pulled back in a ponytail.

"Pancakes sound okay?" she asked, smiling. She seemed so young.

"Um, sure." I'd been vegan since Viv and my dad married.

I wondered if she'd made the pancakes vegan friendly. Something told me she'd fixed them her way.

And, really, did it matter anymore?

All I wanted was blood. Christopher's blood.

Regular food no longer appealed to me in any form.

At the thought of Christopher, I touched the gem teardrop under my shirt.

A dark expression darted across Vivianne's features as she gave my clothes the once over. Faded jeans and a sky-blue tee shirt.

The Pillsbury Dough Boy winked from my chest.

It took an enormous effort not to ask her what her problem was.

This was one of my favorite shirts.

"Have a seat." She indicated a stool under the counter with the spatula in her hand.

"Thanks, Viv. You didn't need to do this. I could've made myself something."

Like my tea. I'd put the bloodlust mixture in a white stoneware canister with the words Brown Sugar across the front and left it on the counter.

I moved a loaf of bread, and a mustard yellow bowl filled with red apples and sat.

"Have you seen the brown sugar canister?" I asked, opening the cupboards.

She didn't answer, and I turned to catch her watching me, her face unreadable.

"Yes, dear. I threw the contents in the sink and tossed out the canister. It stank." Viv shrugged.

"Whatever you had in there couldn't have been any good. I know you're a health nut, and I'm fine with that, but I won't have you doing drugs in this house."

How did she get to drugs?

"They were herbs. For a tea I need." I ran over to the sink, but it was empty.

Fear swallowed me.

I didn't know if my lack of lust for blood was because I drank from Christopher or the tea, and I didn't want to find out.

Come to think of it, I hadn't had any of his blood or the drink in over twenty-four hours.

I breathed in and was relieved to realize that, though I could smell her blood, it didn't cause a craving.

"Sure, whatever you say. I know how the kids are now. They think because that stuff is legal, it's okay to do whatever you want. But not in this house. Not while I'm around." She gave me her signature, wicked smile. "Sorry, Snow." She indicated a plate where she'd just put a pancake. "Why don't you sit and eat?"

IGNORE HIS BEATING HEART

I WAS furious and ground my hands into fists, forcing back the words I wanted to say.

"No, thanks. I've got to get to school." I grabbed my backpack from the dining table and ran out the back door.

At the bottom of the stairs, I remembered I hadn't fed Gatsby.

No way was I going back in there, though. He'd be okay.

Maybe my dad was right. I'd be glad to see him go because it meant he'd take Viv with him.

I crossed the yard, making my way to Professor Pops' house. I hoped he was home. I needed to explain the tea situation.

Hopefully, he could get some more from Kenmei. Seconds after I knocked on the door,

Bart answered.

He wore dark jeans and a white button-down shirt. His blond hair was still a little damp, probably from a shower.

"Hey, Snow. Come on in."

"Thanks." I stepped into the high-ceilinged foyer, admiring the enormous sparkling chandelier while he closed the door.

"Is Professor Pops around? I need to talk to him."

"Yep, in the kitchen. Don't freak out, but there's a meat extravaganza in there. We didn't know you were coming." He looked guilty.

I laughed. My veganism was moot at this point anyway.

"It's okay. I know you guys eat meat." Then I leaned away, trying to ignore his beating heart. "Besides, with me being a revenant and everything, I probably shouldn't worry about the whole vegan thing anymore, ya know?"

"True. I forgot." He sauntered into the kitchen, and I followed him.

The smell of cooking meat - bacon, sausage, and eggs - pummeled my senses, and I bit back nausea. Maybe I was still Vegan after all.

"Look who it is," Bart said, taking a seat at the sleek table filled with food.

Eight sets of eyes bored into me, each man in various stages of consuming their breakfast.

"Hi, guys." I raised my hand, giving them an embarrassed wave.

"Snow," Professor Pops rose, placing his napkin on the table. "Is everything okay?"

I shook my head. It wasn't, for several reasons, many of which had to do with my stepmother.

"Can I talk to you privately a second?" I didn't want to worry the guys, have them think I'd become a blood-sucking crazy pants who would try to bite them, or worse.

"Sure," he said, glancing back at the boys. "There'd better be two slices of bacon left when I get back."

He was a vampire. How could he like the taste of food? Didn't he still need blood? Oh, the questions. My head hurt.

"Let's go into my study."

I followed him down the airy hall and into his office. "What's happened?" he asked, closing the door.

"Nothing. Yet." I absently stroked the old wooden desk next to my leg. "It's just my dad and stepmother came home last night."

That wasn't how I meant to open. I'd planned on getting right to the point. I needed bloodlust tea.

Professor Pops let out a frustrated huff. "How is that going?"

"Viv threw away my bloodlust tea," I blurted, worried he would be mad.

Warmth soothed his features though there was some irritation.

Vivianne tended to cause that reaction in people.

"That woman." Pops went around to the business side of his desk and sat in a sizeable camel-colored leather chair.

"Have a seat," he said.

I obeyed and watched him dial a number on his cell phone.

"Kenmei-sensei. It's Adam." There was a pause, and a smile flitted across his lips. "I'm well, old friend." Another pause. "It seems we require some more of your special tea." Pause.

His lips pressed together in a thin line. "Yes." Pause. "Great. I'll send one of the boys by to pick it up later today."

A longer pause. "Are you sure?" Pause. "Great, I'll see you then." He hung up the phone, rested his hands on the large calendar on his desk, and gave me a wary look.

"Kenmei-sensei will bring the tea by later today. He's also asked that he be the one to train you this afternoon."

Nervous flutters pirouetted across my tummy. The man was scary, but my fear came from more than knowing the oldest hunter would be training me.

I was also worried about school.

"Great," I said, knowing I should go, but I wasn't ready.

"Will you be alright at school?" His intense gaze bored into me.

"Yes. I think so. Thank you, Professor Pops." I forced myself not to fidget under his contemplation.

For some reason, Christopher's face appeared in my mind.

He wouldn't be in chemistry or at lunch or track practice.

I swallowed sadly.

In the past few days, he'd become my ally, my friend, the only person I wanted to be around.

"Excellent." He came around to the door. "Take care."

I readjusted my backpack. "I will." My voice belied the apprehension I harbored.

He smiled kindly. "Don't worry. You'll be fine. I'm sure of it."

We made our way back into the kitchen.

The guys were mostly done eating and were packing up to leave.

I searched for Gabe, but he'd gone.

"Dorian, will you give Snow a ride to school?" Professor Pops asked.

"I'd love to." Mischief twinkled in his eyes.

That was how Gabe used to act.

I thought of the night Gabe helped me up after I fell in the parking lot at Warehouse Video.

That wasn't very many days ago - maybe five?

It felt like a lifetime.

As I followed Dorian to the garage and got in his beefy black Mustang, my thoughts turned to Cindy.

"Did you ever hear back from Cindy?" I asked as he started the car, and it roared to life.

Distress or sorrow crossed his face but was gone immediately.

"Yes. She's fine. I believe a dude was involved like everyone thought. No biggie."

Dorian was lying.

Why?

The teardrop gem warmed under my shirt, and I grabbed hold of it.

"Really?" I asked, not sure how to call him on the lie.

"You heard from her, her actual voice?"

OceanofPDF.com

I WANT YOU

"I'VE TALKED TO HER, SNOW." Dorian's voice betrayed the sarcasm oozing over his words.

His heart pounded - steady, but was it faster than usual? I wasn't sure.

Taking a deep breath, I caught a whiff of his aftershave.

He smelled good. Clean. Appealing.

His blood sang me a sultry song.

My mouth watered.

I'll be fine, I told myself, covering my nose and mouth with my hand.

"You alright, Snow?" He glanced at me. His eyes full of concern.

"Sure. I rest my hand over my nose and mouth all the time," I mumbled, irritated.

Illumination dilated his eyes. He knew what I needed, what I wanted.

The way the muscles in his thighs and shoulders tensed told me as much.

My face heated and I looked away, out the window at the houses and trees zipping by.

"Snow, I told you if you ever needed blood, I'd gladly let you take from me." The car slowed, and he pulled over to the side of the road.

He shut off the engine and scooted beside me.

"Go ahead," he said, his voice soft.

Shocked, I watched him, studying his face, my eyes lingering on his lips.

He swallowed, and my gaze shifted to his fully exposed neck. His pulse beat loudly, begging me to take what I wanted.

Mesmerized, I took hold of his arms, and my canines grew.

"Dorian." I heard the word leave my mouth but didn't recognize my voice.

In answer, he placed his hands on either side of my face.

"Please. I want you to," he said, his words heavy with emotion.

I inhaled through my nose, enjoying the appealing scent of his skin.

He smelled different than Christopher.

Simple.

Earthy.

It was more than that, but I couldn't place the smell.

I just knew it had my mouth watering.

Before I realized what I was doing, I slowly licked his neck.

Tasting his skin.

Dorian pressed his neck against my tongue, his pulse beating faster. His movements sent a lightning bolt of lust low in my belly.

My teeth lightly grazed his neck, and Dorian's fingers moved to my hair, tangling in the strands.

"Yes. Oh, please. Yes."

He tugged me onto his lap, and my lust grew.

His scent was heady, intoxicating.

Professor Pops said I'd drink from a human, and Dorian was begging me to.

How could I resist? Why?

At that moment, I made a decision. I would taste Dorian's blood.

I ran my fangs along his neck, ready to sink them in -

A red light shot between us like a flash of lightning.

We both jumped, and I screamed.

Dorian's eyes remained glazed a moment longer before he snapped out of it. He cleared his throat, shaking his head.

"What was that?"

"I'm not sure," I responded, pressing my back into the seat, clutching my hands into fists. "We'd better get to school. We don't want to be late."

I worked to calm my desires.

He glanced at the clock. "You're right, but remember, I'm here if you need me."

He slid back over to his side of the car, turning on the engine before pulling back onto the road.

"Thank you, Dorian." I leaned my head against the window and caught sight of someone in the side view mirror.

Dressed like a hunter in fairytales - brown trousers, brown leather boots, a forest green shirt opened at the collar.

Around his hips was cinched a leather belt, another strapped over his shoulder.

The face was hidden in the shadows, but the way he held himself seemed vaguely familiar.

My first thought was of Christopher, but I brushed it aside.

It couldn't be him.

Had the man seen what I'd almost done?

Would he have tried to stop me?

Panic glided up my spine.

Dorian gave me a sidelong glance. "I'll be training you after school today."

"Cool," I said, forcing my lips into a smile.

No sense telling him I'd actually be training with Kenmei.

He'd find out soon enough.

DORIAN EYED MY FORK

DORIAN HAD BEEN RIGHT about Cindy.

She was already in chemistry, sitting in her seat.

She glanced up as I ambled past our table.

"Konnichiwa," she said.

My eyebrows lifted in question, though for some reason I understood she'd said hello - good afternoon specifically - in Japanese.

Ohayo gozaimasu meant good morning.

My heart lurched with anxiety.

Maybe the pendant?

"That means hello in Japanese," she said, her face filled with pride. "I'm soooooo over French. The language is," she paused and shrugged before continuing, "boring."

I hid a smile.

Once the newness of a language wore off and started to get tricky, she moved on.

"Hey, yourself," I responded. "What happened to you yesterday? I was worried." I sat on my stool.

She looked irritated a moment but waved it off. "I had some stuff to do."

I snorted, only slightly irritated.

"Flirting with a boy kind of stuff?" I asked, pulling out my binder and book and flopping them on the table.

She twirled some of her blond hair in her fingers and winked. "So, what's going on with you and Charming?" She nodded toward his empty chair, and my heart dropped into my stomach.

He was gone.

I didn't know where, but he'd said he wasn't coming back for a while.

"Nothing." That was true enough now that he was gone.

Cindy let out an exasperated grunt and rolled her eyes. The girl was way too perceptive.

"Fine, I like him, but it's nothing big." I felt for the gem hanging under my shirt and wrapped my fingers over it.

I crave his blood, but that's it. Really.

"Wait, I thought you liked Gabe," I said, confused by her jealousy. She was giving me whiplash worse than I was giving it to myself.

Annoyance squished her features for the briefest moment. "I'm over him, too." She opened her notebook.

I laughed nervously. "Oh, well, have you seen Chri - Chace?" I might as well pretend I didn't know he left.

"No." She shook her head for emphasis. "Haven't seen him." Her voice caught as she spoke the words.

She was lying.

Before I could control my expression, my eyes scrunched together, accusing.

"What?' she said. "I haven't seen him since yesterday." Cindy turned away, fiddling with the ragged edges of her notebook paper.

The bell rang, and Mr. Wallace, ever the timely teacher, walked in and started class.

He passed out an assignment and began talking, but I wasn't listening.

When the bell rang to end the class, Cindy was out of her seat and at the door before I'd picked up my backpack.

Taking a deep breath, I walked out of the room alone.

AT LUNCH, I sat in my usual spot. The guys made their way over.

Gabe and Cindy entered the cafeteria together and got in the lunch line.

They were talking, their words and gestures animated.

Cindy reddened.

I gripped my plastic fork so tight it snapped in two.

It sure as hell didn't look like she was over him.

The guys, who'd been talking randomly, glanced at me.

Dorian eyed my broken fork.

"What's up, Snow?"

When I didn't answer, he turned to see what made me so upset.

"Don't worry about them," he said, clearing his throat. "It's nothing."

I nodded and tried to focus on the mandarin orange cup I'd chosen for lunch.

It wasn't right to be jealous.

I knew that.

Christopher - even thinking his name punched a hole in my gut - and I were secretly doing things that didn't make it right for me to be green-eyed, but I was.

Gabe brushed Cindy's hair from her face, and that was the last straw.

My mind zeroed in on Gabe like a stalker with binoculars.

Adjusting my senses, I listened to his rapidly beating heart.

Smelled the scent of his body wash, the decadent aroma of his blood, his skin.

I heard him talking.

"Want to come with me to Warehouse Video after school? We could grab a coffee and talk," he said to Cindy.

Cindy laughed. The one she used when she flirted. "Okay. My shift at Bertilini's ends at seven. Can we meet after that?"

He smiled.

My heart broke.

"Sure. I'll pick you up."

Cindy nodded. "Great." She selected some food and scanned the room, her eyes finding mine.

I heard the intake of her breath and could only imagine the emotion plastered on my face. Anger. Fury. Possibly avocado - the shade of sick jealousy.

Gabe must've heard her because he glanced up before following her gaze.

"Snow, chill. Really. You don't understand," Dorian said, squeezing my hand.

I yanked my hand away. "No. I understand completely. And it hurts." I picked up my tray. "See you later."

I heard Cindy call my name but couldn't answer.

Fury like I'd never experienced boiled in my veins.

The lunchroom turned hazy.

Every heartbeat pounded through me, hundreds of harmonized drums.

The intoxicating scent of every person's blood in that room packed my veins, but most especially Cindy's.

I somehow knew which was hers, and I wanted to drain her - not in the way I'd thought about drinking from Dorian.

Not even close.

I wanted her blood to be mine.

I wanted her dead.

That knowledge rocked me with guilt, with fear, but mostly with exhilaration.

Professor Pops' words entered my thoughts: "The more blood you drink, the more like a vampire you'll become. It's like anything in life; if you work to keep yourself as human as possible, that part of you will remain, will be the strongest. If you consume human blood, the way a vampire does, that part of you will become the strongest."

I knew if I drank from Cindy, I'd kill her.

The way I was fuming, I wouldn't stop until she was dead. It didn't matter that she was my best friend.

I had to get out of there.

Someplace quiet.

The library.

I hurried inside, searching for a place to hide in the back.

There was a lone free table, and I dropped my backpack on it before falling into the chair. The haze still blurred my vision.

I took several deep breaths, filling my nose with the scent of dusty books.

Another breath.

I rested my arms on the table and dropped my forehead onto them as hot tears spilled from my eyes.

I couldn't do this.

I didn't want to.

Maybe it would be better if the vampire queen took my body now.

All I had to do was drink my true love's blood. And kill him. There was that, too.

"No!" I whispered fiercely.

Taking a deep breath, I pushed away the desires for Cindy's blood, my desire to hurt her.

She'd told me she liked Gabe.

Plus, she'd been my best friend for a long time, and she was a good person.

If my anger should be directed at anyone, it was Gabe.

He'd caved, broken his promise because I'd been bitten.

That wasn't my fault.

How could he be so cruel? I needed him - at least his friendship.

Not the cold shoulder he gave me.

And Christopher.

Seeing Cindy with Gabe would've been a lot easier if he'd been there.

If he hadn't left.

Everyone leaves, my inner voice scolded, and I swallowed a sob.

A high-pitched cough erupted nearby.

Lifting my head, I saw Pava, the periwinkle blue pixilette I'd met in Sharra.

"Pava?" I whispered.

She fluttered to my arm and bowed. "Snow. You are in danger. Watch the shadows and tell no one you have the pendant Christopher gave you. Never take it off. Promise." She fell to her knees.

She looked paler than usual.

Actually, it looked like she was turning the color of dried cement.

"What's wrong?" I cried, concerned, but I didn't touch her.

I didn't want to hurt her.

"Promise," she wheezed, falling forward.

"I promise." Carefully I lifted her into my hand.

No longer blue, she'd become dingy grey, like a dirty wet sock.

A wing fell off.

Paper-thin, I watched the veins turn from blue to grey to white.

She patted my hand.

"Pava," I cried softly, desperation filling my voice. I didn't know what to do. "What can I do? How can I help?"

A smile touched her lips as she began to shimmer. A reddish glow emanated from her, and then she was gone.

"Pava?" I shouted, standing.

The librarian came around the corner. "Everything alright?"

I searched, frantic, a second longer, but she'd literally vanished.

"Y-yes. Sorry." I swiped my backpack, brushed away a tear, then left the library.

I needed to talk to someone, but who? Professor Pops? No, I couldn't speak to him.

If I did, I'd have to tell him about Christopher and the pendant, and I wasn't ready to do that.

The Museum of the Supernatural.

Since Pava mentioned it specifically, there might be something about the necklace in the book on pixilettes.

I'd check it out tonight, right after school.

Skip Track and head over to his house.

I could do some reading before training.

My insides froze at the thought of practicing with Kenmei, the wise old hunter.

MY CANINES GREW

AFTER SCHOOL, I went over to Dorian's locker to wait.

Out of everyone, he was the one I felt most comfortable with, even with thoughts of sinking my teeth in his neck.

He allowed me to be myself.

He accepted me, liked me.

And he wanted me to drink from him.

My knees trembled.

"Snow. Can we talk?"

My body tightened.

The hall blurred.

The angry craving for Cindy's blood once again boiled through my veins.

I had to get out of there.

"Go away, Cindy. I-I can't be around you right now."

I took off down the hall, through the front commons area and out into the crisp fall air. I knew she followed. I'd zoned in on her heartbeat, the aroma of her blood.

My canines pressed against my lips. I searched the parking lot for Dorian's car. The Mustang still sat in the same spot he'd parked in that morning.

Relieved, I rushed over, hoping Dorian would come soon.

When I arrived at the passenger door, I stopped. Trapped.

Cindy stood a few feet away, her face screwed up with sadness.

My heart sank. "What do you want?"

"I miss you," she whispered, her bottom lip trembling. "Ever since I went to the Cape, you've been weird. Different. Did I do something to make you mad?" She stepped closer.

The pounding of her heart, forcing blood through her body, made the back of my throat ache. "No. You didn't do anything. I - " This wasn't her fault.

Gabe chose Cindy.

Plus, I didn't deserve Gabe.

I'd been making out with Christopher.

I breathed through my mouth, closing my eyes, thinking about anything but her blood.

An image of the necklace came to mind, and I thought of Christopher, followed by the pixilette who died.

Being jealous of Cindy was the least of my worries.

Taking another breath, I opened my eyes.

Her face was inches from mine, and I screamed.

How had she done that? "Cindy?" I gulped, pressing my back against the doorframe.

"I've changed too, you know. We should talk." A glint of humorous annoyance flickered in her eyes.

"O-Okay," I sputtered. Now that she mentioned it, her face seemed slightly different, more angular. Her cheeks hollow, her eyes a more dazzling blue.

"Cindy," Dorian barked. "Get away from her."

Cindy seemed to move back faster than humanly possible. She turned on her heel and started to walk off. A moment later, she paused and looked back. "Tomorrow night? Let's get together, 'kay?"

"Sure," I agreed, swallowing the strange panic that'd crept in.

After she'd gone, Dorian pushed a button to unlock the door. I climbed in and waited for him.

"You okay?" he asked.

I nodded. "Yeah. What's up with her?" I indicated Cindy's retreating form.

He seemed about ready to tell me, but then he changed his mind. "I don't know."

"You're lying, Dorian." He was a terrible liar. "I can tell, and I don't like it. Tell me what the hell is going on."

He faced me, his eyes serious. "You're right. I am lying, but I can't tell you. Professor Pops asked me not to. Not yet." He turned over the engine.

My mouth hung open. "Why? Does he really think anything can shock me at this point?"

Dorian pulled out of the parking lot.

When we were headed toward home, he rolled his shoulders.

"There's still a lot that can surprise you. Trust me." He gave me a look that said he was serious. "And be careful."

MUSEUM OF THE SUPERNATURAL

DORIAN DROPPED me off at my front door.

I figured I should probably let my dad know I'd be at Professor Pops', so he didn't worry. It seemed like the responsible thing to do.

Tossing my backpack on the table, I went to the refrigerator and grabbed a bottled water.

"I'm home," I called out after taking a sip.

The cool liquid soothed my parched throat.

No one answered, so I went into the living room, then upstairs, where I knocked on their bedroom door.

They weren't home.

I made my way back downstairs.

On the kitchen counter leaned a folded piece of paper. It just said they'd gone out and would be back later.

"Fine. Two can play this game."

If I had a phone, they could've left me a message or texted me. I'd at least know when they were coming home.

Grabbing a pen, I flipped the paper over.

Next door at Mr. Henry's. I'll be back around nine, I wrote.

Up in my bedroom, I changed into a pair of black sweats, brushed through my hair, and walked over to Professor Pops' house.

Salvatore answered the door.

"You're early." By the look on his face, he'd expected me.

Dorian probably filled him in.

"Yep, I wanted to do some research first down in the Museum of the Supernatural. Okay?"

"Sure." He followed me through the house, down the stairs, and into the room, I still wasn't used to. "How are you doing with all this?" He motioned with his hands around the room.

"Fine. A lot to learn." I swallowed.

"I've had years to learn about all the creatures, and it still blows my mind." He eyed the dragon near the back.

I was stunned by what he'd said even though I shouldn't have been. Until that moment, I'd believed they learned about the Museum at the same time I did.

But that wasn't right.

Professor Pops said the guys had been trained.

"How old were you when you found out about these creatures?" I walked over to a lemon yellow pixilette. This creature was in a case near the dragon.

At the sight of her - dead - I thought about Pava.

My eyes stung - poor thing.

Salvatore followed closely behind.

"I learned about the supernaturals, and trained with swords, arrows, and such from the time I was twelve."

"Really? Wow. What did you think?"

Salvatore laughed. "The truth is most of us came from - " he paused and ran a hand through his shiny black hair. "We came from less than perfect households. We lived in horrible foster homes or facilities that kept us like prisoners."

He touched the werewolf, shifting his gaze from me to it.

"Training with Pops, the things he taught us about life, about respect for others and ourselves, the world," he shrugged. "I don't know about the others, but I'd do just about anything for Pops. So when he brought me down here, it didn't bother me like it did some of the others. It's hard to explain, but it was like I already knew these creatures existed, and Pops just confirmed what I believed." He laughed.

"Silly, right?" He looked embarrassed.

"Not at all." I could certainly understand why this room freaked some of the brothers out. If I hadn't been bitten, I probably would've been a basket case.

As it was, I kept meeting new supernatural beings and dealt with them as it happened, which reminded me of the beast I'd seen in my room last night.

"Have you ever seen a creature about this tall?" I indicated my leg at the knee. "Its entire body is brown, like mud. It sort of looks like a frog, but the eyes are more like those of a cat. Plus, it can talk."

Salvatore's face paled. "You saw one?"

I nodded. "Last night. In my room."

"Did you tell Professor Pops?" He looked utterly freaked out.

"No. I forgot."

"How could you forget? Sheesh, Snow. He needs to know that stuff." He crossed his arms.

"A lot's happened lately." I had no excuse except I really had forgotten about it.

He exhaled. "They are despicable creatures called changelings." He clucked his tongue. "I've encountered one before. Evil and vile, but easy to kill." He walked past the pixies.

"They can morph into anything, hence the name, or they can be invisible. All are loyal to the vampire queen, but only a select few can see the creatures when they are in their true form."

He stopped in front of a small case. It was only about eight inches square. Inside was what looked like a moth, only it had two yellow eyes, like a cat. Salvatore pulled out the book and took it to the pedestal used for reading. "Appendix D."

The old pages flipped to the back of the book.

When it stopped, I gazed at the pictures.

On the left page sat the changeling in its true form, and on the facing page were pictures of a wasp, an elephant, a beautiful woman, and a small puppy.

The one telltale feature was the eyes - in all its forms, it retained the cat's yellow eyes.

"What did it say to you?" Salvatore asked.

"Hmm." I paused, scared. "He seemed to be talking to someone else and stated that I had magic." I shrugged, peering into Salvatore's keen eyes. They were dark chocolate in color.

"We'd better tell Pops for sure. Come on." He put the book back in its drawer and grabbed my hand, pulling me up the stairs.

My stomach tightened in knots.

Kenmei would be here soon if he wasn't already, and I had a feeling our conversation would be about more than my fighting stance.

I touched the necklace beneath my shirt. Its warmth enfolded me.

Where are you, Christopher? I thought, wishing he was here.

OceanofPDF.com

INNATE GOODNESS

WHEN KENMEI ARRIVED, he took one look at me and directed me into Professor Pops' office. "You've changed, Shiryo-san," he said as soon as the door closed behind him.

I gulped down my fear. "Have I?"

"No sense playing coy, revenant." His voice sounded harsh, his eyes hard with anger. "If you intend to survive another month, you've got to trust Adam Henry, the brothers, and me. We are on your side."

He sat in the chair next to mine and took my trembling hands. His eyes softened. "I can help, Shiryo-san. Talk to me."

I nodded, pushing back tears as heat spread from his hands into my skin.

With my new abilities, I listened for his heartbeat. He didn't have one, though I sensed his innate goodness.

"Start at the beginning," he ordered quietly.

I did. I told him everything. The more I talked, the more relieved I became. I hadn't realized how much of a burden I carried, keeping all that happened - and there was a lot - a secret.

As I spoke, Kenmei nodded occasionally but kept quiet.

He didn't ask questions - he didn't seem to need to - and he didn't interject.

He listened.

When I finished, I pulled the pendant from beneath my shirt.

"This is what Christopher left me," I said. "He told me not to take it off, as did Pava, the pixilette I saw in the library today before she died."

He released my hand and took the gem between his fingers.

It flared red, the essence permeating his fingers, so they glowed.

From the light of the pendant, I watched his eyes fill with admiration.

So close, I could smell the spicy scent of my bloodlust tea on him and guessed he still carried it on his person, somewhere within his royal blue robe.

After several moments, he released the jewel and sat back. "I'll bet you feel like you've lived a lifetime these past days," he said quietly.

I nodded, overcome with emotion. "I do."

"Let's see how you feel after you've lived a century or two." A sad smile, almost more of an echo of a smile, formed on his lips.

"After seven thousand years, I'm tired, Shiryo-san." His voice was filled with melancholy, his eyes glassed over like he was far away in another time.

I swallowed, unsure of how to respond.

After a time, he cleared his throat. "Now then, thank you for your honesty."

"You're welcome." My fingers fidgeted in my lap.

"Christopher is right. No harm will come to you while you wear the pendant. It gives the possessor strong magic. Perhaps there is more to your hunter than I first believed. He seems to care for you; otherwise, he wouldn't have parted with such great magic."

"Oh?" I asked, sitting up. For some reason, his words made me feel better. I was glad Christopher cared for me.

"There is only one of these in all the world, Shiryo-san. May I tell you a story?"

"Of course," I replied, knowing he would even if I didn't want to hear it, but I totally did.

"When the world began, vampires ruled."

I nodded.

That piece of information I already knew.

"Ah, so you've seen the pictures then, heard the story?" Kenmei asked.

"Yes. Professor Pops told me they lived before humans. I've seen the pictures. He told me how the vampire queen was the fairest, and about the war."

"Excellent. Did he mention who the first vampire was?"

I racked my brain. "No, I don't think so."

"The first vampire was a female by the name of Silindra. She and Sharra - the now vampire queen - were close friends, but they were also so much more. Sharra and Silindra were sisters. Twins."

I gasped, recognizing the name as that of the realm Christopher took me to.

Kenmei nodded. "Yes, that is why her realm is called Sharra. Now she is known only as the vampire queen, though she allows a select few to call her by her real name."

He waved his hand, dismissing that fact. "Before Sharra's rise, Silindra ruled Earth. She did so with kindness and equality. Her nature was such that everyone loved her, revered her, and even worshipped her above all other creatures."

"Silindra." I'd said her name without meaning to.

When I did, the gem began to glow.

"She was the most powerful being in the world, and that made Sharra jealous. In time, a male vampire named Gabriel, doing the bidding of Sharra, captured Silindra and took her deep within the earth where he tortured her for many days." Darkness crossed Kenmei's face, rippling with pain. "He was cruel beyond measure."

I almost reached out to comfort him but resisted, caressing the gem within my fingers instead.

"On the tenth day of her imprisonment - when Silindra hovered between life and death, Gabriel raised a dagger above his head, preparing to slay her. But before he could, Silindra raised her hand and said - " Kenmei's voice trailed off as though he'd been whisked away in the story and couldn't bear it any longer.

"What did she say?" I asked, my voice hoarse with emotion.

"She said one word," he finally continued.

"Which was?"

"Wait." His voice broke, and I leaned closer, thinking I'd misunderstood.

"Wait?" That word didn't need a dramatic pause.

His dark eyes captured mine and held me. "You see, Shiryo-san, even near death, the love she harbored for all other creatures was foremost on her mind."

At his words, my throat constricted with sadness. Such love, I couldn't understand it.

"Gabriel paused, asking what she wanted. Silindra begged Gabriel to place one of her tears in the golden gem around her neck, and then, after she was dead, requested he give the gem to a pixilette called Ryden.

"At her words, Gabriel's heart softened, and he agreed. He didn't realize that the gem around her neck already contained five magical properties - the courageous soul of a dragon, the eternal sight of an elf, the healing horn of a unicorn, the strength of a troll, and the giving heart of a fairy. Gabriel added her tear, stowed it in one of his pockets, and then killed Silindra immediately. He left Silindra's body in the earth, found the pixilette Ryden, and gave her the necklace, thus fulfilling his end of the bargain.

"Within moments of the gem being in Ryden's possession, she used its magic to take the final component needed to seal the magic within the gem - the blood of a hunter - Gabriel's blood. With all seven magical components contained within, the gem changed from golden to red."

I considered the pendant around my neck. Without a doubt, I knew it was the same one Silindra had worn.

"It's called the Seal of Gabriel because, without his blood, the magic would've been lost."

Kenmei's words brought home the weight of the power I carried. "Why would she create this?"

"Ah, Shiryo-san. An excellent question. She created that necklace for you."

I looked at him like he'd lost his mind. "Impossible."

"With everything that's happened to you over the last several days, how can you say that?" He took my hand and squeezed. "The magic contained within the pendant is powerful, and anyone who understands magic can use it, increasing their power at least ten-fold, but you Shiryo-san, you can restore balance, bring peace back to Earth by destroying the vampire queen." He studied me with awe. I didn't like it.

I snorted. Very unladylike, I know.

Super disrespectful too, but I wasn't buying it.

"I bet you say that to all the girls." I rolled my eyes.

He jumped from his seat, fury flashing in his eyes.

Like a cobra strike, he grabbed my collar and lifted me in the air so that my feet dangled.

"No, Shiryo-san! Never in seven thousand years has the gem worked for others the way it works for you now." As if to prove his point, a red ball of light shot from the pendant and into Kenmei.

He dropped me and went flying backward into the bookcase.

Books tumbled onto his head, and he groaned. "Don't you see?"

Fear, hot and thick, filled my throat. "No, I don't." I ran to the door. "You're crazy. Leave me alone." I threw open the door, startling the seven brothers and Professor Pops who hovered in the hallway.

Startled, I yelped before regaining my wrath.

Methodically I found each set of eyes.

"I don't want to see any of you ever again. Stay the hell away from me, all of you!" I stormed from the house, my body moving like the wind.

At home, I ran up to my room and threw myself on my bed.

Gatsby appeared in the window and jumped up, nudging me with his furry forehead. Rolling over, I picked him up and hugged him.

He hissed and let out a pained yowl.

In the same instant, I smelled burning flesh.

I released him and noticed the scorched fur surrounding a red welt on his side.

"I'm so sorry." Furious tears poured from my eyes and leaked into my ears. "I don't want any of this. I didn't ask for any of this."

In the dark recesses of my mind, I knew I was freaking out.

Honestly, it was about time.

I'd been handling everything so well.

But this was all too much.

Sitting, I reached around and pulled the necklace off, then chucked it at my dresser. I'd been aiming for Gabe's picture - his stunning smile seemed to leer at me - but I missed, and it smacked against a perfume bottle before skidding off behind my dresser.

"Good riddance." I flipped onto my stomach and fell asleep, hoping when I woke, this last week would be a bad dream.

PATCH THINGS UP

WHEN MY ALARM went off the next morning, I noticed my mother's blanket covered me. I knew I hadn't set the alarm, which meant either Dad or Vivianne had.

They'd come back at least.

After dressing, I went downstairs and noticed two significant items sitting on the counter.

One was a cell phone.

The other was a laptop.

On top sat a note.

Freaking notes!

It was from my dad and said the phone was already programmed, and they'd downloaded some necessary programs to the laptop. Then he said they'd gone out to breakfast and he hoped to see me after school.

I snorted before grabbing Gatsby's food and water. I hadn't seen him yet this morning and wondered if he was still mad.

A pang of loneliness washed through me.

The brothers wouldn't be coming over today. I knew they'd abide by my wishes.

Christopher was gone.

My dad had Viv, and I had - Cindy!

If she would forgive me.

Time to patch things up. Unlocking my new phone, I dialed her number.

"Who the hell is this?" she answered.

I laughed, enjoying the sound of her voice. "Guess who got a cell phone? Come on, guess."

"Snow? Is that you?" I could hear her happy relief.

I sighed happily. "Yes, it's me. Dad and Viv got me a laptop, too, so no more track practice. Woohoo!"

"They must feel really guilty about something. What'd they do?"

I grabbed a water from the fridge and opened it. As I drank, an overwhelming need for blood scorched my throat.

No. No. No.

I grabbed a soy yogurt, pulled off the top, and put a spoonful in my mouth.

The yogurt tasted ashy, but I ignored it.

Act human. That's what Pops said.

Another pang of guilt hit me, and I ignored that too.

"Snow, you still there?"

"Yep. So you still want to get together after school?"

"Hells to the yeah. We can hang at my place if you want."

The note my dad and stepmother left said they wanted to see me tonight. "How about we hang out at my house?"

"Okay. Are you genki?"

I giggled. "What is gen-ki?"

She laughed. "Basically, the word means happy."

"Oh, well, sure. It's been a while since my dad's been home. I'm glad he's back." I didn't tell her that I'd seen him all of half an hour the night before. And I definitely wasn't happy, though I was happy to hear her voice. I just needed to roll with the punches of life, and that's what I was going to do.

"Cool. So I'll see you at school in a few."

"Yep."

After we hung up, she texted me. U hav a cell. U so awesum!

I smiled at the way she abbreviated the words. I had no idea how to text on my pretty new phone, but I figured it was probably easy. I'd go through it later.

Plus, since I had to ride my bike, I needed to hurry.

Carefully placing the laptop and phone between my math and chemistry books, I put my backpack on and rode to school on my purple Schwinn.

"WILL YOU SET THE TABLE, SNOW?" Vivianne was at the sink, draining the spiral noodles.

The chicken cacciatore already sat in a serving dish, as did a green salad and some dinner rolls.

"Sure." I took four plates from the cupboard and set them on the counter.

"I'll help, Viv," Cindy added, sneaking a caramelized onion drenched in red sauce.

She pulled placemats from the drawer and set them on the table, and I followed her, setting the plates on top.

"What's up with Viv and cooking? This is new," she whispered.

I shrugged. "Got me."

Cindy pulled two wine glasses and two regular glasses from the cupboard. "Viv, did you want me to open a bottle of wine?"

Vivianne put the noodles in a ceramic serving bowl and took it over to the table. "That's alright. I'll get the wine."

Cindy crinkled her nose. "Okay."

I grabbed the silverware. Cindy folded the napkins.

Just as we finished setting the table, my dad walked in.

"Hello, beautiful ladies. Mind if I join you?" He wore crisp tan pants and a white linen shirt, his thick hair combed just so.

I discreetly checked out Viv.

She had on a red cashmere sweater and gray pants.

Cindy looked good too, in a black mini with black leggings, black boots that came to her knees, and a fuchsia cable-knit sweater.

I had on my standard - jeans and a tee shirt.

Fashionista extraordinaire.

"Of course, dear." Viv gave him a sly smile, and I wondered what was going on with those two.

Cindy and I finished putting everything on the table. Once we were all seated, Viv uncorked a bottle of wine and poured a glass for her and dad.

While we ate, I couldn't stop thinking about school.

The guys tried to talk to me at lunch and after school, but I wasn't giving them the opportunity.

Cindy sat with me at lunch in a different section of the cafeteria.

When she asked why we weren't sitting with the guys, I told her it was so I could concentrate on learning how to text.

Another reason was I didn't want to see Cindy and Gabe together.

At the moment, Cindy was my only friend, and I didn't want to be mad at her too. She'd obviously given the guys my cell number because I recognized their numbers when they called and texted throughout the day.

I ignored them, deleting their messages and texts without reading or listening.

I was acting childish, but I needed time away from them, apart from the vampire drama. I couldn't be what they wanted.

Me, klutzy Snow White. I wasn't super smart, nor was I incredibly pretty, like Cindy.

I was average.

You are so much more than that, a male voice whispered in my mind.

It sounded like Christopher, but I shook the thought away.

He'd left without giving me a reason, and that was fine.

I wanted things to go back to the way they were.

Sure, people laughed at my clumsiness and made up jokes about me, but in the scheme of things, I wanted to be okay with that because at least I knew where I fit in.

"Aren't you going to eat?" Viv asked, interrupting my thoughts.

Her eyes appeared sad, as though I hurt her feelings by not eating.

I glanced at the salad on my plate. Picking up my fork, I stabbed a cucumber and shoved it in my mouth. "Thanks for dinner," I said as soon as I swallowed.

"Yes, thanks," Cindy added. "The cacciatore is delicious."

My dad grabbed Viv's hand and squeezed. "You've outdone yourself, dear." He kissed her cheek, then cleared his throat. "Snow, we have some news."

I was in the process of putting another cucumber in my mouth and stopped. "You do?" Anxiety twisted in my stomach.

Were they leaving again so soon? I thought I had a few weeks with him.

He cleared his throat again. "Your mother and I have to leave for Tahiti tonight, right after dinner. There's an emergency, and I've got to go help out."

I dropped my fork. "But you just got here. I-I haven't even had a chance to spend time with you." I glared at Viv. "And she is not my mother." Grabbing my plate, I pushed back my chair and placed the plate in the sink.

"Snow," my dad said, shocked.

Why didn't he ever ask me to go with him?

I could homeschool, or he could get me a tutor.

"Can I come with you?" I asked, working to control my trembling bottom lip.

Cindy gasped. "Don't leave me." Tears made her eyes shiny.

I hadn't thought about how my going would affect her, but she had Gabe and the guys. She'd be fine.

"What about school?" Viv asked, her voice too syrupy.

My dad stood and came over. He placed a hand on each of my shoulders, and I dove into him, hugging him tightly.

"Dad, I need you. Please take me with you." I knew I sounded like a child, but I couldn't help myself.

He was my dad and all the family I had left.

I didn't want him to leave me again.

He returned my hug briefly before pushing me back.

I saw the worry in his eyes and the way his forehead scrunched together. "Snow, I can't. You have your school here, your life. I won't take you from the only place you've ever known."

His words sounded sincere, but I felt him bristle. He didn't want me around.

I listened to the rapid beating of his heart, smelled the fear overpowering his aftershave.

Didn't he love me anymore?

Part of me wanted to shout that my life could be wherever he was if he would just love me, treat me as his daughter - but I stepped back.

My shoulders slumped, and I thought I might fall over. Small, warm hands wrapped around my shoulders.

"I'll take good care of her." Cindy's words were filled to the brim with protection and something else I was starting to recognize.

Magic, I thought but pushed that aside, working to stop the tears falling onto my cheeks. At this point, I had no shame.

I heard Vivianne heave an annoyed sigh. "I guess dinner is over."

Had I not been so heartbroken, I might've flashed my fangs and shown Viv that dinner had just begun at least for me.

Instead, I pulled away from Cindy and ran upstairs.

That was why they'd bought me the laptop and phone.

They thought they could buy my happiness and my forgiveness.

I hated them both!

ABERNATHY'S SPELLS

CINDY CLOSED the door as Gatsby jumped up on my bed.

"Man, your stepmother can be kind of a bitch."

"I know, right?" I sat on my bed and pulled my pillow into my arms.

A part of me always believed Viv liked Cindy more than me, and I thought Cindy liked Viv.

Her relationship with her mom and dad was good, but they were older, and Cindy was their youngest, so her parents didn't do much by way of relating.

A naughty gleam lit Cindy's face. "I could cast a spell, cover her face in boils. What do you think?" She sat down next to me, pushing a strand of hair away from my wet cheek.

I laughed. "Might be fun," I said noncommittally, not really feeling it.

She picked up her backpack before sitting beside me, crossing her legs. Unzipping the front pocket, she removed a book.

As soon as I saw it, the air in the room changed.

It hummed as though alive.

The book possessed some serious energy. "I'm not kidding. I totally will."

My attention remained on the book. Bound by a leather cord, most of the jacket was covered in a rusty red material. Cindy held it out and nodded for me to take it.

"What is this?" I asked, feeling hesitant.

Creepy or weird didn't adequately describe the tome.

Bizarre was close. I n the center of the cover was an eye.

It looked real, like a lizard's.

A scaly face in a combination of violets and reds surrounded the eye. It blinked then seemed to focus on me.

"Can the eye see me?"

Cindy laughed. "Probably. The book is known as the Eye of Abernathy, the first and most powerful dragon ever to have lived on Earth."

"A dragon?" I rubbed my thumbs over the edges of the cover, staying clear of the eye. Soft, sleek, and smooth like a lizard's skin. "What's inside?"

Cindy gave me one of her famous looks. This one saying, Duh! "Abernathy's spells. This is the oldest, most powerful book on the planet, and it's mine now."

I snorted, though I could feel the book's power. "Really? Why do you have it?" Immediately after the words left my mouth, I regretted them.

"Harsh," she said, hurt.

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean it the way it came out." I scooted closer and hit her knee with mine.

I didn't know how to ask her where the book came from or when she got it.

Something told me the book was related to the pendant.

I was still ignoring that part of my new life and didn't want to tell Cindy any of it, so I waited.

Cindy took the book from me and slowly started turning pages.

A sweet stench rose from them, like dried flowers.

"Remember the other day when I left school?" Her voice was soft, filled with wonder.

"Yes. You scared me. The guys said it was about a guy, but I didn't believe them." Dorian had also alluded to more. I hoped she'd tell me the truth.

"Sorry." She looked at me, sorrow on her face.

I smacked her knee with mine again.

It was no big deal now that I knew she was safe.

"Anyway, my mother's aunt showed up at school and said we needed to talk."

"Oh?" I didn't know much about Cindy's family.

"Yeah, it was weird. She said - " Her voice trailed off. "Don't freak out, okay? Promise?"

"How can I freak out if I don't even know what you're going to tell me?" My pulse quickened anyway.

Cindy laughed nervously and brushed her hair off her neck. "It's just - " She drew in a deep breath. "You know how I'm a descendent of the Towne sisters?"

"Yeah," I said slowly.

"Well, apparently, they really were witches and powerful ones too." She crossed her legs.

"I thought we decided if the sisters were real witches, they would've kicked some serious townspeople butt and escaped or turned the accusers into frogs."

That was the story Cindy and I told each other since second grade when we first found out she was a descendant.

Our teacher, Miss Field, taught us about the Salem Witch Trials and the Salem Hysteria in social studies.

We knew most of the craziness happened in the town now known as Danvers, not in Salem, but the name stuck anyway.

Cindy cleared her throat. "It turns out when the town accused them, the sisters made a pact to fake their own deaths, if necessary, and allow the townspeople to think they died so they could move on and live their lives elsewhere. My aunt says she believes they may still be alive."

"Wait, so did they hurt those people? Make them crazy?"

Cindy huffed. "Of course not. They were too important, their magic too special for such inconsequential nonsense." The words sounded rehearsed. "The sisters used their magic more subtly, for a greater cause."

"Oh, okay." My mind went back to Kenmei's words.

He'd said the pendant never worked for anyone the way it worked for me, and now I was curious what the greater cause was.

"The book is passed down to the next closest female descendant in their sixteenth year. She doesn't have any daughters, so she gave it to me." Cindy's hand stopped flipping pages, and I read the words across the top.

"Locator spell," I said aloud.

"Yes, it's so cool. If you lose anything, even a person, you can use this spell to find it or them."

For some reason, the fact she chose that particular spell made the little hairs on the back of my neck stand on end.

What did she hope to find?

"R-Really?" I closed my eyes and quickly opened them.

She wants the Eye of Abernathy, a voice in my mind whispered. Don't let her find it.

I certainly didn't want the responsibility of the necklace, but every bone in my body told me it would be bad, very bad if Cindy got her hands on it.

Tomorrow I'd give it to Professor Pops. Surely there was another marked who could restore balance and destroy the vampire queen.

"Want to help me give the spell a shot?" Cindy pulled a candle from her backpack.

"Um, yes. Okay," I said, only slightly worried about what might happen.

No part of me doubted her words.

I sensed the book's power.

If she said she could do a spell, I believed her.

I wondered briefly if that was what Dorian meant at school earlier.

Did the guys know something about the sisters?

About Cindy's family?

About the Eye of Abernathy?

"What should we try to locate?" Cindy asked, smiling.

Before I answered, Viv, poked her head in. Her eyes zeroed in on the candle and the spellbook simultaneously.

"We're leaving, Snow. You should come down and say goodbye to your father."

Resentment - at her, and for my dad. Professor Pops and the brothers. Kenmei, and even at Cindy - overwhelmed my body. I felt my canines grow, and, without thought, I was at the door and grabbed Viv, her neck and shoulder exposed.

Viv gasped. "What evil is this? Put me down this instant!"

That's right, I thought.

I'm not some little kid you can push around anymore.

As suddenly as I thought the words, darkness began to creep through my mind.

I shook it off, releasing her.

"Fine," I said, pushing past her.

I glanced back at Cindy. Her eyes were wide, and her mouth hung open.

I tried to smile, but nothing happened, and I went down to say goodbye.

My dad and Viv left quickly. After locking the door behind them, I went back upstairs.

Cindy had returned the book to her bag and was waiting.

"I should go," she said.

"Fine. Leave," I growled.

She looked at me like she felt sorry for me but didn't say more. When I heard the door shut, I flung myself back on my bed, ramming the pillow over my head. I just wanted it all to go away.

A soft voice chanted sounds in a strange language, and peace enveloped me. I snuggled into my covers and closed my eyes.

"Sleep, young one," the voice said. "You're almost ready."

DID CINDY TAKE IT

WHEN I CAME TO, I felt different. Stronger. More relaxed with what I was - a revenant and nothing more.

Sure, my dad left as had Cindy, and I'd pushed away from the people most important to me, namely my seven best friends and their adoptive father, Professor Pops.

But whatever. I could handle the situation. I just wanted to feel like myself again. A normal teenager.

Certainly not some deliverer for the supernatural.

The gem wasn't created for me by one of the original vampires because she knew she would be killed.

That was impossible.

I refused to believe that in a sea of billions, the gem was meant for me.

"No way!"

It was morning, and I was determined to go about my life as though I were just another teenager. I got ready and studied myself in my mirror.

"Normal."

The only thing left to do was return the Seal of Gabriel to Professor Pops.

He could deal with it.

Reaching behind my lavender dresser, I searched for it but couldn't find it. So, I pulled the furniture away from the wall. There were a few dust bunnies and a pencil, but the necklace wasn't there.

"What the hell?" I went over in my mind exactly how I'd thrown it.

For sure, the chain hit a perfume bottle.

I shifted all five of the pretty bottles, their scents mingling in the air as I moved them.

Then, thinking maybe I was mistaken, I rummaged around in my closet, checked under my bed, in my covers, and behind my window curtains.

By the time I finished, I was sweaty and still empty-handed.

"Ugh! Where could it be?"

Had Cindy taken it?

It seemed the most likely solution.

She hadn't come over to be my friend again.

She was a witch, and she knew about the necklace. Kenmei said it would bring power. That had been what she was after.

The realization hurt, and my rage grew by the second.

I found my phone and texted her.

Did u take my necklace?

I went to hit send but changed my mind. If she wanted it, she could have it. I would be ordinary. I wanted nothing more to do with vampires and the supernatural. I was out.

Hurriedly I ran downstairs, fed Gatsby, and got on my bike.

It was getting easier to pedal.

Easier to move, period.

With each turn of the wheels, as I moved closer to the academy, my worry for the necklace dissipated.

With the necklace gone, that meant I wasn't accountable for ending the vampire queen and restoring balance. Right?

See, everything leaves you, I thought, and shrugged.

"Good."

COOL YOU'RE A WITCH

THE NEXT FEW days were pretty routine. I went to the school, did my homework, fed my cat, watched reality TV, and pretended I wasn't craving blood so severely my stomach always hurt.

I also did a pretty good job ignoring the brothers and Cindy's phone calls and texts.

But on Monday morning of the following week, I woke thinking I was going to die.

Blood! Blood! Blood!

The word pounded through my body over and over like a frenzied crowd at a fight club.

I went downstairs, desperate for food, and saw a package sitting on the counter with a damn note.

Remember, twice a day. That was all it said.

By the smell, I knew it contained my bloodlust tea.

Peeling back the wrapping, I quickly made myself a double dose and drank it with relief. The hunger was still there, but now it was bearable.

I knew it'd come from Professor Pops. I thought about thanking him but couldn't bring myself to dial his number.

Just speaking with him would pull me back into that life, and I didn't want it anymore.

But I needed to let Cindy back into my life.

I texted her before school, and it was like there had never been an awkward moment between us.

After school, we drove to Warehouse Video and got a coffee and talked.

"I'm sorry," I said first, staring into the steaming cup.

"I'm sorry too." She reached for my hand, and I squeezed.

"That's cool about you being a witch," I said quietly, lifting my eyes to watch her expression.

"Thanks." She took a sip of her drink. "Want to tell me about you?"

I swallowed back a desire to tell her about everything.

I just couldn't. It was bad enough the guys knew. I didn't want her to know too.

"It's a lot," I said.

"Worse than being a witch?" She lifted one perfectly formed brow.

"Maybe." I told her about liking Gabe and maybe Dorian and how my feelings were weird toward all of the brothers, which was why I needed some space.

She listened and offered great advice.

Chatting with her was wonderful.

It was also fun to hang out while she performed her magic.

Sometimes she would do it on me. One day, a couple of weeks later, I went to school with a red streak in my hair. The next a yellow one.

She became a pro at changing her nail polish and even "painted" mine red during lunch.

Finally, almost a month later, Cindy gave me the push I needed to make up with the guys.

She drove past my house and pulled into Professor Pops' driveway.

After putting the car in park, she shushed all of my lame excuses.

"Look, it's like a bandage. Just rip the sucker off. It might hurt, but only for a few seconds."

I wanted to be upset, but all seven guys and Professor Pops immediately came outside and were waving and smiling like goofballs, like they'd been waiting for me.

I couldn't leave them hanging any longer.

I didn't want to.

"You're right," I agreed, and got out of her car.

GLASS FELL LIKE RAIN

OUR REUNION WENT BETTER than expected.

Hanging out with them again felt like putting on my favorite shoes.

They were comfortable.

Even Gabe seemed less tense than before my meltdown.

After several hours of chatting, dinner, and a movie screening of the latest Marvel movie in their oversized theater room, Gabe suggested some training.

"You want to take a revenant on at midnight? You're brave." I playfully punched him in the arm and rose from the supple leather couch.

He'd sat next to me when the movie started.

At first, it was uncomfortable but, as the film progressed and we laughed at our favorite parts together, I relaxed, and so did he.

"Training is an excellent idea, Snow. Not for too long, though. After an hour, you should head home and get some rest. We'll be here in the morning for some breakfast if you'd like." Professor Pops' eyes twinkled with happiness, and I was sure my expression matched his.

I'd been away from eight of my most favorite people on the planet for far too long. "I'd like that."

Gabe stood, and I followed him down the stairs.

When we entered the Museum of the Supernatural, it was like coming home.

I'd missed the place more than I realized.

After Gabe unlocked the door to the training room, I followed him in.

He grabbed the long sword, the katana, and the shorter one - I couldn't remember what it was called - and handed them to me.

"Ready?" he asked as he crouched and started to circle.

"Bring it, Gabriel." I'd started to laugh, but the noise caught in my throat as I said his full name, and I froze as thoughts and memories filled my mind.

Before I shut him out, Professor Pops had tried to tell me about Gabe.

My talk with Kenmei, his story about Silindra and the vampire who'd killed her.

His name had been Gabriel too.

It couldn't mean anything, right? I shook my head.

That they shared the same name was a complete coincidence. It had to be.

Gabe definitely wasn't a hunter. I was sure of that.

Gabe smacked me on the arm with the flat of his blade.

"Concentrate, Snowflake. These weapons aren't pretend. They're real."

I jumped. "Right." I copied his stance, feeling my body find its position as I moved with a grace I hadn't realized I possessed.

Even Gabe was impressed. He raised an eyebrow. "Have you been practicing?"

I shook my head. "Maybe," I lied, just to throw him off.

We circled a few more times, and then he lunged.

I blocked the blow and spun around.

"Aren't you, Little Miss Kickass!" He smirked.

"You know it," I responded, smirking back.

After that, we were a blur of blades, an orchestra of clanging metal, breathing, and synchronized heartbeats.

We moved in time to the music of our own creation.

Sweat mingled with the warmth of his skin, the delicious bouquet of his blood.

He tripped me, and I fell, landing on my butt.

Before I could react, he took my swords and put them away.

When he finished, he came over and stuck out a hand.

I grabbed hold.

He yanked, but I had a better idea.

I jerked back, hard.

Surprised, he fell down toward me but caught himself before our bodies touched.

"Nice move," he said with a smile, trapping me under him, his arms on either side of my shoulders.

I was mesmerized by his bright green eyes.

They danced with a happiness I hadn't seen in weeks, not since that night in my bedroom.

Our faces were close, and I kept checking out his lips, so soft and full.

What had changed? Why was he friendly again?

I didn't have time for an internal debate because his lips were suddenly on mine.

I gasped in surprise and gladly reciprocated, twining my fingers in his hair.

Gabe moaned, grabbing my hips and rolling us, so I was on top.

He pulled back, releasing my lips.

I let out a sound like a pouting kitten, upset he wasn't kissing me.

He smirked and brushed some hair out of my face.

"I'm sorry I've been a jerk. I promised I wouldn't leave, and that's exactly what happened. Can you forgive me?" His voice was hoarse, full of emotion, full of sincerity.

I responded by claiming his lips with mine, hungry for more.

I needed this Gabe.

Sweet and kind Gabe.

His tongue flicked inside my mouth, and I felt it low in my belly, a fiery desire.

Sensual Gabe, I thought hungrily.

My heart raced, keeping time with his.

"Snow," he murmured, foraging a trail of hot kisses along my jaw, down my neck, and collarbone.

My lips found his neck, and I kissed him there, once, twice.

He smelled like sweat, soap, and more.

The scent of his blood sang to me.

I kissed him again, directly on the quickly beating vein on his neck.

An unquenchable ache slammed into me so hard I was unprepared to fight it.

"Yes," his voice pleaded. Urgent. Needy.

He wanted me to bite him.

I sensed it.

He wasn't being subtle either as he pressed his neck to my lips.

It seemed fitting that Gabe should be the first human I tasted.

My canines grew, and I sank them into his flesh.

He shuddered.

The first taste of his blood was something I'll never forget, like lust and honey combined, a heady combination.

All my life, I had struggled with food and settled on being strictly vegan, but at that moment - the instant I tasted Gabe's blood - I knew I'd never crave anything else ever again.

It was exactness, precision, completeness.

And I couldn't get enough.

I sucked harder, yanking his neck closer.

The more I drank, the more I needed.

"Stop!" Professor Pops' voice sounded far away.

He tried to force me off Gabe, but I was stronger.

I withdrew my fangs momentarily and sat up, sending the palm of my hand smashing into Professor Pops' sternum.

He let out a grunt as he smacked against the wall with a crack.

There were others in the room. From the edges of my blood-filled vision, I saw them and heard their cries of concern.

"I told you something like this would happen." That was Heathcliff.

"We shouldn't have left her alone," Bart said.

I closed my eyes to clear my head.

Who were they talking about? It couldn't be me.

Someone gently pulled me off Gabe, and I opened my eyes and saw Dorian's concerned face.

"Snow. Can you hear me?" he asked.

"What happened? Gabe and I were training and - " I followed Dorian's gaze.

On the floor lay Gabe, his body twisted at an unusual angle. Part of his neck ripped open. He was covered in blood. So much blood.

And so were my hands.

My body began to shake.

Not Gabe. No!

"Is he - ?" I couldn't finish. Please, no.

"Tell me," I shouted., but I knew the truth.

No one moved.

An unbearable agony crawled up my stomach and into my chest and settled in my throat.

I screamed. The sound was unearthly.

Most of the brothers and Professor Pops covered their ears. But I couldn't stop.

"Snow." Dorian sounded more pained than he looked, and he looked utterly broken.

I pulled out of his grasp.

Gabe is dead. Gabe is dead.

I killed Gabe.

I wanted to die.

"Kill me," I cried. "Do it."

The brothers and Professor Pops regarded me like I was an untamed animal - a monster, but they didn't move.

I couldn't stand to be in their presence another second, and I bolted.

As I went through the Museum of the Supernatural, I screamed again, causing the glass cases to shatter, but I didn't stop.

I went faster, floating like an apparition, up the stairs, and out the back door.

My scream grew louder.

I'd killed Gabe.

Become a monster.

The vampire queen could have me now.

My life was over.

Windows broke.

The glass fell like rain.

Still, I couldn't stop screaming.

Death was too good for me. I deserved something far worse.

I didn't know what, but I knew I wouldn't find my answers here.

Without a backward glance, I ran.

Away from all that I loved, all that I'd known.

I didn't deserve them.

FATE AND MAGIC

OceanofPDF.com

KISS ME

AFTER LOSING EVERYTHING, there was only one option.

Jump.

Go all in.

With both fangs.

It was the punishment I deserved after what I'd done.

Before a few months ago, I didn't eat meat.

Now I craved blood.

As a full-fledged vampire, I couldn't get enough, and I'd decided to embrace it.

Accept my new lot in life as a wicked supernatural creature.

I'd become something I hadn't believed possible, but now that I'd changed, the truth was, I liked it.

At least while I partook.

Afterward, when the blood haze faded, guilt would edge its way in.

I hadn't killed another human, not since Gabe, but killing him was horror enough.

It ate at my heart.

I remembered the grotesque way his body lay on the floor. The way Professor Pops and the guys looked at me with loathing, disgust, and fear.

But I deserved it.

I'd become a monster and killed a boy I thought I might love.

A brother.

A son.

He'd kissed me, and I'd repaid him in blood.

Lots of it.

Maybe even all of it.

My vampire need enveloped me, and I let myself give in, even relished the sensation.

At those thoughts, my mind grew darker, and I shrank further away from everything that had to do with my former life.

I kept running.

Where didn't matter as long as I was further from where I'd been, the kind of life I lived before - my ordinary life.

I blocked memories of my father, my wicked stepmother, the amazing boys who were my neighbors, and the man who loved them. I buried thoughts of Cindy, my cat Gatsby, and Christopher. None of them mattered anymore.

Not to the new me.

Even the name of my home town was forgotten.

All I cared about was blood.

How I could get it and how much I wanted it.

No longer an in-between - part human and part revenant.

I was a bloodthirsty fiend with an unquenchable thirst.

I had become a vampire.

With interest, I fixed my gaze on the night sky.

Inhaling deeply, I smelled the air. Tasted it. Searching for the coppery fragrance I wanted.

It was there.

Past the rushing wind, through the woodland filled with fir and eucalyptus trees, and down on the sandy shore.

The distinct smell of the ocean. And blood.

Pulsing.

Pounding strong in the veins of two humans.

Fast.

Tantalizing.

I let out an unearthly scream and sprinted forward.

Toward my fix. My drug of choice.

When I was only a few feet away, I slowed down, each silent stride closing the gap between me and my prey.

The humans were in the throes of passion.

They were on a blanket, kissing and losing themselves in each other.

The sight burned my eyes, and my heart as unbidden memories of Gabe cut through me.

I needed to forget.

Drinking the humans' blood would help, would fill me up in ways nothing else ever could.

I stepped closer, the edges of my dirty black Converse touching their blanket while my heels sank into the soft sand.

The girl opened her eyes and stopped kissing the boy. "Some skanky girl is watching us. What a perv." She glared before rolling her eyes.

The boy swiveled his head. "Get out of here," he hollered. "She smells," he said to the girl under him.

She giggled again, probably grateful the guy on top of her didn't find me attractive.

Since my change, I discovered it didn't matter what I looked like.

With ease, I could change a human's feelings, compel them to come to me, desire me, and even lust after me until I drained them into unconsciousness.

I knelt beside them. "Look at me," I demanded, my voice silky-smooth.

The boy whipped his head around, a sliver of fear shading his brown eyes.

He was handsome and lean, and his blood smelled slightly like Gabe's.

I swallowed.

"Get the hell away from us!"

He tried to shove me, but I didn't budge.

The angry fear in his eyes grew.

"Look into my eyes," I ordered, enjoying the rush, the adrenaline.

Knowing I possessed all the power.

He did as I said.

"You smell delicious," I said.

Fear left his eyes as they dilated.

The change in his demeanor was swift.

He got off the girl, who let out an annoyed huff, and came to kneel beside me.

While he stared at me like a good puppy dog, I took the girl's chin.

"Do you like the color of my eyes?" I'd discovered with girls that they couldn't resist such a simple question despite whether they sensed danger or not.

I think it stemmed from the innate need to compare one's self to another.

"Such a pretty thing." I watched her blush in the moonlight, the crimson of her blood rushing into her plump cheeks.

"Th-thank you," she stammered. Her dilated cinnamon eyes were no longer interested in the boy next to her but totally focused on me.

"What are your names?"

As one they spoke.

"Ashley."

"Kevin."

Hunger pulsed in my veins.

My fangs fought for release, and my mouth watered.

"You won't remember meeting me. Understand?"

They nodded.

"Good. Now, Ashley, lie down and go to sleep."

Immediately she obeyed.

She closed her eyes, and I watched her breathing deepen.

Kevin still kneeled. His large eyes desperate to please. He had a babyface. Sweet.

Probably seduced a lot of girls with that face.

He wasn't wearing a shirt, and I absently noticed his chiseled abs, the way his faded jeans rested low on his hips, and his finely manicured hands.

I swallowed again. The monster in me wanted to pounce and make him scream. But I resisted. "Kiss me, Kevin."

He licked his lips before pressing them against mine.

At his touch, I closed my eyes and pretended I was in Professor Pops' basement, kissing Gabe.

The boy deepened the kiss, grabbing my shoulders, pulling me on top of him, just like Gabe.

My pulse pounded rapidly. My need was strong.

I wanted to take this boy's blood - all of it.

I straddled Kevin, tilting his chin up with one hand.

THE VAMPIRE QUEEN

THE GUY WHIMPERED AS THOUGH he knew what I wanted.

I allowed my fangs to grow.

His eyes got wide with fear.

I liked that - the horror in them. Bending down, I took in his scent before sinking my teeth into his tender flesh.

His blood filled my mouth, and I swallowed the coppery warmth hungrily. Professor Pops' words strutted across my mind: "Promise me you won't drink from a human for more than ten seconds."

Internally I counted to ten. But didn't stop. Eleven. Twelve.

I finally released Kevin.

He lay unconscious, his breathing weak but there.

The bite marks would heal quickly.

The venom I released with my bite was like a liquid cure. Only a bruise would remain. He tasted good, but I wanted more.

Dissatisfaction sat on my tongue.

Quickly I moved to Ashley.

I lifted her into my arms, and she stirred.

"Kevin." Her eyes fluttered open and then widened momentarily.

"It's okay, Ashley."

Her pupils dilated, and I knew she was mine to do with as I pleased.

"Let me see your neck."

She lifted her head, exposing her milky skin.

When my fangs sank into her, she gasped and grabbed my head, pulling me closer.

I drank greedily until her arms went lax.

Eleven.

Twelve.

I had to push the ten-count limit. It was hard enough to stop at twelve.

Releasing Ashley, I laid her on the blanket next to Kevin.

They seemed so peaceful.

Ashley and Kevin wouldn't remember me, but I would remember them.

"You're outstanding," a woman's voice purred. "Most of the marked don't have the strength to pull back before the human dies."

At being caught, I flinched and backed up at the sound of her voice. All of the newfound power and grace I recently obtained vanished.

Did she know what I was?

What I'd done?

She must.

She said I was marked.

That meant she had to know something.

Her face was hidden in the shadow of a large hood.

Gingerly standing, I wiped the sand off my pants and moved in front of the unconscious bodies.

"Wh-what?" That was all I could eke out.

It felt like some of the sand from the beach had been poured down my throat.

"Don't be demure, Snow White." She took a step forward.

The moonlight caught her blood-red lips.

They were curled into a smile.

Before me stood the vampire queen.

"I'm not. I wasn't. I mean, I don't know what you're talking about," I said, crossing my arms.

Her laugh was low and creepy. Flicking the hood off her head and exposing her jet-black hair, she sighed. "Yes, you do."

For some reason, knowing who she was - the vampire queen - made me relax, made me feel more human and less of a monster.

It was as though a heavy burden lifted from my soul.

She wouldn't judge me.

With her, I had nothing to fear, at least not right now.

I was drawn to her.

If anyone could understand what I'd done to Gabe and what I'd just done to the humans, it was her. "You're right. I do."

At my words, she glided to me, quicker than a blink, placing an icy cold hand around my wrist. "Come, I have much to show you."

"Okay," I responded, though I didn't need to.

We were already in her realm. Sharra.

The domain she'd named after herself.

Not only were we in her kingdom, but inside the castle, specifically, in the room where Christopher and I spent the night together.

My hand went to my throat, searching aimlessly for the necklace he left me - the one I tossed away like garbage.

The one I was told was meant to destroy the vampire queen and restore balance.

I shivered, afraid.

The room looked exactly the same: Lush, golden bedding. Even the magical mirror.

Fragrant air filled my lungs.

This was where I belonged.

The vampire queen released me. "Why don't you freshen up?" She indicated a bathroom I hadn't noticed before.

"Are you leaving?" I'd been alone for days, maybe even weeks.

I wasn't sure, but it felt like an eternity.

Her presence seemed to chase away the memories, the guilt.

"As soon as you've cleaned up, I'll be back. I promise." She walked out of the door and was gone.

I went into the bathroom, which was big as my house, and sat on a golden chair in front of a gilded mirror.

The reflection staring back was scary, and I cringed.

My short, black hair was longer, tangled, and matted.

Dirt streaked my face.

My clothes were dingy and caked with blood and other things I didn't want to think about. "How long have I been gone?"

"In Sharra, the Winter Solstice has begun. In the world of humans, it is the fifth day of November." The voice was deep and resonated within my chest.

It seemed to come from the proximity of the mirror.

I was too tired to freak out.

Leaning forward, I searched for a body to go with the voice.

"My name is Zenny. I reside in all of the mirrors within the castle." As he spoke, a funny looking man with lemon yellow hair and skin the color of a copper pot strolled across the middle of the mirror.

He wore forest green and navy-blue checkered pants, a red shirt, a white vest, and white shoes. I would've thought he was a clown, except for the seriousness of his features.

Deep grooves etched creases between his eyebrows.

His honey eyes held mine with a stern demeanor.

"Oh. That means it's been more than two weeks since I left." I bit back a sob as memories of my loved ones broke through the wall I'd built up against my pain, shame, and sorrow.

Swallowing, I forced the wall back together with my anger and lust for blood.

Zenny sniffed, bringing me out of my reverie.

"I would guess at least that long by the smell of you. Peel off those clothes and throw them into the fire." The hearth on my right suddenly roared to life.

YOU'RE A MESS

"WHEN YOU'VE DISPOSED of your filthy clothes, step into the shower, and I'll send Fina and Trina to assist you in scrubbing off all the debris." He sniffed again.

"No, thank you, Zenny." I untied my shoelaces. "I can take care of myself. I don't need Fina and what was her name? Treeny."

"Trina, dear. And I think you should reconsider." He walked across my reflection to my left cheek, licked his thumb, and pretended to wipe off a dirt streak.

"Funny," I said, sarcastic.

He wrinkled his nose. "I'm not trying to be funny. Really, you're a mess."

"Fine, I get it. Now can you leave so I can shower in peace?"

"Humph," he snorted and walked to the edge of the mirror.

Before he was gone, I remembered my manners. "Thank you, Zenny."

He turned to me, his face ablaze with happiness. "Of course, Snow." Then he was gone.

I quickly stripped and, doing as Zenny commanded, tossed my clothes into the fire.

The shower was steaming as I stepped in, allowing the water to wash away layers of grime. There was some lemon-scented soap, and I lathered it up before scrubbing my skin.

My mental wall melted and thoughts of Gabe, Professor Pops, the brothers, Cindy, my dad, stepmother, and Gatsby - hopefully, someone fed my poor cat - filled my mind and stung my heart.

Had Professor Pops held a funeral for Gabe?

Images of Professor Pops and the brothers all dressed in dark suits, white shirts, and ties mocked me.

The brothers walked somberly, three on each side of Gabe's cherry wood casket, toward Professor Pops and the gravesite where they would lower Gabe's cold, dead body into the ground.

Tears, hot with hurt and devastation, trickled down my cheeks.

"What have I done?"

Unable to keep myself standing, I curled into a ball on the shower floor, and that's where I stayed as I wondered if my dad looked for me, if he knew what I'd done.

Probably not.

Did anyone even care?

Not that they should.

I'd committed the ultimate sin.

Murdered a fantastic person.

I didn't deserve anyone's love or support. I deserved to die. That's what it said in the Bible: an eye for an eye.

If anyone was searching for me, it was probably to find me and punish me. I shouldn't have run. I should've stayed and suffered the consequences of my actions.

A part of me still struggled to believe what I'd done.

It was easier to pretend he lived - that somehow, he'd survived my vicious attack and was only wounded.

Was it possible?

How could I find out without returning?

Should I go back?

A wave of determination washed over me.

I would go home and face the consequences. If that meant death, then so be it.

Standing, I quickly washed my hair before getting out of the shower and drying off. Now that I'd decided, I was in a hurry.

Though, I had no way of getting back.

I was in Sharra, not the human realm.

I wrapped myself in a large red bath towel and sat in a golden chair.

A pearlized brush with soft white bristles appeared near my right hand.

Absently I picked it up and began the arduous process of removing the tangles from my hair.

How would I get back? In the past, when I'd come to Sharra, I went back without trying. Someone or something always pulled me between the two realms.

"Zenny," I said quietly and waited.

He shuffled to the side of the mirror. "How may I be of service?"

I tightened the towel closer around my body. "How do I get back to the human realm?"

He became agitated at my question and started walking in circles. "You can't leave. The queen won't allow it. She brought you here for a reason. You have to stay."

I nodded, showing him I understood. Of course, he was loyal to her.

"That's fine, I won't go anywhere until she allows it. But, if the time comes, how do I leave?" I asked, gulping down a slice of fear.

His eyes grew large, and he bowed deeply. "My queen," he whispered and scurried out of the mirror.

I turned.

She was at the door.

Sharra.

Wearing a pair of holey black jeans and a black tee-shirt with the words: Love Bites scrawled in red across her chest. She wore no makeup. Her hair hung on either side of her head in braids.

On her feet were red Converse, my favorite shoes.

She looked young, my age.

In fact, she looked a little like me. We could've easily been sisters.

"Oh," I said, brushing my bangs off my face. "I'm not ready."

"I can see that." She smiled.

It was less cruel than usual, almost innocent.

Unclasping her hands, she raised them and spread them in front of her, as though she were greeting someone or offering something.

Clothes and a red pair of Converse, just like hers, appeared on the counter next to the brush. "Put those on. I'll wait." She closed the door.

"Hurry," Zenny whispered from the edge of the mirror. "The queen does not like to be kept waiting."

"Alright. Disappear first." I didn't want to change in front of a tiny man lurking in the mirror. That was just creepy.

"Right away." He bowed stiffly and vanished.

Once he was gone, I tossed the towel on the counter and put on the clothes: a red bra and matching undies, a plain red shirt, black jeans, red socks, and the red shoes.

As I put on my clothes, I thought about Sharra and why she'd decided to dress like me. Was she hoping to seem less intimidating?

I also found the fact that she could do magic interesting.

The Vampires I read about in fiction and the TV shows I watched portrayed us without magic. That was left for witches, but it seemed Sharra had magic, and she didn't even have to do a spell for the magic to occur.

It was like she thought it and it happened.

I glanced at my reflection when I finished.

Zenny might know the answers, but I knew Sharra was waiting. I hesitantly opened the door.

The vampire queen stood in front of a large window, staring out, seemingly lost in thought.

"I'm ready," I said softly.

POISONED APPLE

THE VAMPIRE QUEEN appraised me with scheming eyes and nodded her approval before heading out of the room. "Excellent. Let's go."

I followed, curious about her plans and not caring that she probably had ulterior motives.

Also, I was glad for the distraction from my heavy guilt over Gabe.

The sooner she showed me whatever she wanted to show me, the sooner I would have to face the consequences of my actions. Sure, I accepted that I should but that didn't mean I would revel in it.

Though I longed to see Pops and the guys, even if they hated me.

I just needed the pain and the guilt to stop.

Sharra and I passed through a sunroom, down a steep set of stairs, and through a large sitting room filled with extravagant chandeliers, furniture, thick draperies, and a red grand piano.

Seated in some of the chairs were supernatural creatures. Vampires, I guessed.

All of them were female, dressed in clothing from every century.

Some wore dresses with tight bodices and large skirts, others were dressed like the vampire queen and me. All of them looked young - perfect skin, perfectly coifed hair, and red, red lips.

Little pixilettes fluttered around them, serving them something red - possibly blood - in crystal goblets. The vampires took the offered glasses and then shooed the pixilettes away like they were irritating gnats.

The little things seemed worn out, their shoulders hunched, their eyes droopy. The pixilettes I met said they were in charge of the changing seasons.

Why were these ones serving the vampires?

If I hadn't lost the necklace, I could fix this, change the way things were done. I cringed internally, knowing that wasn't possible.

I couldn't change anything.

After we walked through the sitting room, we entered the circular room I remembered from my dream or vision. This time it was empty of anyone except Sharra and me.

She went up the steps in front of two high back chairs.

Had there been only one the first time I was here?

I tried to go back through the dream. I couldn't remember.

The vampire queen sat on the chair to the left. "Sit here," she said, indicating the throne on the right.

Once I sat, she waved her hand, and the room vanished. We were in the middle of a grass and flower-filled meadow. Birdy chirpped happily. Sweet fragrance from the flowers on the trees and all around us tickled my nose while a cool breeze danced against my skin.

The queen stood and walked into the meadow toward hundreds of apple trees. Heavy, fully ripened fruit hung from the branches.

I listened to the stiff grass crackle under her shoes.

When she reached the closest tree, she reached up and plucked a red apple.

My heart began beating fast.

In the story of Snow White, the wicked witch gave the girl an apple. The girl took a bite and fell under a spell.

Only true love's first kiss could wake her.

Was that the vampire queen's plan?

Did she intend to offer me the apple?

Poison me and hope my true love would find me and kiss me?

I snorted at the thought.

Love didn't work that way, and life wasn't a fairy tale.

It was real, complicated, messy, and took effort.

Not to mention the fallacy behind true love's kiss. Gabe and I had kissed, and I was still a vampire. Either Professor Pops had been wrong, or Gabe wasn't my true love.

I'd kissed Christopher too.

Something else occurred to me.

Was that why Christopher left?

He'd accomplished his goal, and I'd become a vampire.

The vampire queen rotated, studying me.

I'd messed up so badly there was no way the Seal of Gabriel, the beautiful pendant Christopher gave me, would work any longer. I ruined any chance of restoring balance when I became a monster.

It was too late for me.

Maybe I should eat the apple.

Then I wouldn't be able to harm anyone.

"Snow," the queen barked, interrupting my thoughts.

"Yes," I said, moving from the throne and over to her.

The landscape was beautiful, peaceful.

I ran my hands over the tops of the tall grass and the white daisies that grew in clumps as I made my way to the tree.

The vampire queen was impatient, and I hurried.

When I was near her, I held out my hand.

I would eat the apple.

I would sleep eternally and no longer be a detriment to those I loved.

But she batted at my hand. "Get your own," she said, taking a large bite.

I inhaled, surprised. "I will," I said after I recovered.

Reaching up, I plucked a large apple from one of the branches.

The sweetly-scented blossoms filled my lungs. Rubbing the apple skin on my sleeve out of habit, I scanned it for bruises or wormholes and, seeing it was unspoiled, took a bite. I chewed slowly, expecting there to be no flavor.

All food tasted like ash since Christopher had bitten me.

But the fruit was delicious. The flavors were a mixture of sweetness, and - I dropped it.

Blood.

The fruit tasted just like blood.

What the hell?

I closed my eyes, waiting for the inevitable poisonous toxin to send me into blissful oblivion.

Several seconds passed, and I still felt the same.

When I opened my eyes, I noticed the queen watched me with an amused expression.

"It won't be long now," she said, taking another bite.

I knew it. "You did poison me." Relief and fear filled my veins.

She laughed. "I'm teasing." She took another bite.

Some of the juices dribbled down her chin.

"These apples are some of the best in Sharra. I wanted you to try them. Didn't you like it?" She indicated the apple I dropped.

The truth was the flavor had been beyond exceptional. The combination actually made my mouth water.

"It was fine," I lied.

She shook her head, amused. "This is your home as much as it is mine. Let me show you around."

I hesitated. What harm could it do?

OceanofPDF.com

SHRUGGING, I followed her back to the thrones. When she sat, so did I.

"This is the entrance to the orchards," she said, pointing. "Beyond the apple trees are peaches, plums, and pears. All of them are grown and cultivated to our specific tastes." She nodded, and I knew she referred to the blood.

Somehow it was fused within the fruit.

"Sometimes it's nice to eat solid food," she continued. "A liquid diet can get boring after a few hundred years." She snapped her fingers, and we were in a forest.

Giant trees shaded the fern and mossy floor.

A babbling brook rushed along next to us.

Three deer drank from its edge, unaware of us.

She put a finger to her lips.

I bobbed my head, indicating I understood and watched her move without sound toward them.

I fought down the knot forming in my stomach.

What did she intend to do?

When she snapped the neck of the largest deer, I shuddered.

"Why?" I asked, stunned.

The other two deer bolted.

The queen pulled a knife from a sheath I hadn't noticed before. Laying the deer on its side, she sliced open its belly.

"Stop!" I turned away so I wouldn't have to see its guts.

Tears threatened, but I pushed them back. I had the feeling my weakness would only irritate her. I sensed her move next to me, smelled the blood on her hands.

It was heady, an aroma similar to that of a human.

I turned and saw she held something - a piece of meat, or an organ in her hands. "Try it. Like the fruit, the animals in Sharra are cultivated for our needs."

I shook my head, but the scent had my canines threatening to burst forth, and my mouth watered. "No, thank you. I'm a vegan."

The words sounded hollow.

It was a lie, and she knew it. I hadn't been vegan in weeks.

She chuckled. "Really? That isn't the impression I got from the way you handled those humans."

She stuck the thing in her hand in front of my face. "Try it. You'll like it."

The vampire queen was right, of course.

I certainly didn't act very vegan.

Stepping slightly to the right, I turned my nose away from her hand. "I thought we only drank from humans," I finally said, trying to buy myself some time.

She took a bite from whatever it was she held.

Disgusted, I looked down, studying the red shoes on my feet.

"Humans are trite creatures. Their presence on this planet has been useful. I've recycled them to benefit our race, but they will die out long before we do." She took another bite.

"Recycled?" I kicked at a chunk of moss in the dirt at my feet. "I'm human. You, your body - " I paused.

I'd almost said she was human too.

That wasn't true, but I now got what she meant by recycled. "What about the other vampires? They started out human. They are as human as I am."

She waved a dismissive hand. "You may look human. Even I look human, but after your first drop of human blood, the genetic code within your body changed. You are no more human than the deer, or these trees. You are a vampire now. Accept it. Embrace it."

She threw the remainder of whatever she held in her hand into the stream. "I thought you already had." She wiped the blood from her hands on the moss near her feet.

At her words, my heart sank. "Is this what you wanted?" I couldn't meet her gaze.

Professor Pops told me Christopher's job was to turn me into a vampire, so I figured the vampire queen was happy.

"Of course, it's what I wanted. You have such potential. And Sharra is a wonderful place to live, learn, and become what you are meant to be."

"Which is a vessel for you," I spat out, curious about why she was going to such trouble to talk to me when she could just do whatever she needed to do, and my soul would vanish, leaving my body for her.

She shook her head, making a tsk-tsk sound.

"I don't know what you've been told, but you'll be more than a mere vessel. You'll become the most powerful creature in the many realms. Everything you desire, anything you wish, will be at your fingertips."

"For my body only, but I'll be gone."

"You've been talking to Adam Henry, perhaps even Kenmei. Those two are such drama queens."

"I have." A part of me hoped Professor Pops and Kenmei weren't telling the truth, but I doubted it. What reasons would they have to lie?

"I'm sure they even told you the story of Silindra and me. About the war?" She raised an eyebrow. "And maybe even about a necklace?" She eyed me, searching my face for answers.

She was leading me.

Deny, deny, deny, I thought.

"Maybe." I shrugged.

"Well, of course, they did. Those are their weapons. The way they get the marked to do their bidding. That's why I brought you here. I wanted you to see I am not some power-hungry maniac as they led you to believe. I am not a monster, Snow, but merely a leader. My people chose me. They need me, and I love all of my subjects equally. You may have seen some of them as we passed through the sitting room of the castle. They are given the freedom and more power than they could ever need, everything they could ever want. All I ask in return is their allegiance. That's all I'm asking of you."

I took a step back. "Why would Profess - Adam lie? He has no reason." I'd seen proof what she was saying was true.

She sighed. Her shoulders sagged slightly, as though she carried the weight of the world on them. "They told you about the war, correct?"

"Yes."

"Well, did they happen to mention it was Kenmei I fought against? Did they tell you he led those who battled against me for power? For the throne that was rightfully mine?"

She started breathing heavily, her chest rising and falling rapidly. Her hair, which was dark and luxurious began to twinkle with darkness like she was about to explode. "Did they tell you he turned my own sister against me?"

OceanofPDF.com

HELLO SNOWFLAKE

"THEY TOLD me you had her tortured and murdered," I said, equally angry, though I was sure there was no twinkling darkness coming off my hair.

The vampire queen gasped and pressed a hand to her chest in mock sarcasm. "They what? I could never murder my sister."

She was a big fat liar. I knew it. Sensed it.

Pushing down my fears, I changed the subject. "Are you saying you were in the right? You deserve the power?"

I didn't add that Kenmei and Professor Pops both told me they were her hunters at one time and that I knew they left her.

Immediately a small flutter danced in my belly.

Was that where Christopher went?

Professor Pops and Kenmei never told me what they did to break free of her.

Was it just a matter of walking away, or was more required? I thought about the bear Christopher carved and how excited he was when I gave it to him.

"Without a doubt, I deserve the power. I've ruled for thousands of years. That isn't going to change anytime soon." She walked back over to the thrones and sat.

I did the same.

She twirled her index finger, and we were back at the castle.

Standing, she moved to the center of the circular room.

"Have you seen the so-called Seal of Gabriel?" She eyes glittered with need.

I gulped and tried to calm my racing heart. After I turned, my hearing got better, so I had no doubt she heard my increased heartbeat and already knew the answer. "I - I don't know," I stammered, trying to pretend I wasn't sure.

She spun around. It was apparent she knew I wasn't telling the truth either. "Where is it? Do you have it?"

Taking a deep breath, I shook my head. "No. I don't know where it is anymore."

"You had it in your possession?" Anger burned her features. "Stupid girl. It must be destroyed. That thing could ruin everything." Her voice softened. "If you find it again, bring it to me." She brushed her fingers along my jaw. "That pendant will be the death of all vampires, the whole race, including you. And him." While she spoke, she moved her hand in a whimsical S motion.

A glass case, like those my stepmother used to hold her porcelain dolls, appeared atop a white stand. It was much more extensive and reminded me of a coffin.

Someone was inside.

I took a step toward the coffin, trying to ignore the ball of fear growing in my chest.

"Who is that?" I asked, giving the queen a sideways glance as I walked past her.

"You'll see, my dear Snow." The evil smile was back.

The ball of fear in my stomach grew into full-blown anxiety. Inside the coffin was a guy, his dirty blond hair flawlessly combed.

His eyes were closed, but I knew they were hazel.

"Christopher," I whispered.

Around his neck hung the carved bear, the one he made right before he was changed into a vampire. He wore brown leather pants and a white shirt with a leather vest.

Dark chocolate brown boots were on his feet and stopped just under his knees. His hands rested on his stomach.

"Is he?" I stopped, unable to finish.

"Dead? No. But if you don't bring me that necklace, he will be." She came to stand next to me. "You don't want that, do you?" She touched my shoulder, and it took all my courage not to shrink away.

"I don't know where it is. I swear." I clasped her hand, begging her to believe me.

"If you think really hard, I'll bet you can figure out where to start looking for it." She squeezed my hand back, and I thought the bones in my fingers might break.

"There - " I began but stopped.

"You're not ready, Snow," the vampire queen's words echoed through my mind and I was no longer in Sharra.

A sound escaped my throat, and I clamped the hand the vampire queen crushed only moments ago over my mouth.

I was happy and scared all at once.

Maybe I wasn't ready, but I was home, standing in the middle of my room.

Purple walls filled with baby animal posters.

Purple curtains.

Purple towels in the bathroom.

I was glad to see all of it.

Wistfulness swept through my veins.

At the same time, there was terror. How would I confront Professor Pops and the brothers? Cindy? Gatsby? And my stepmom and dad - were they here?

Not to mention Christopher. The vampire queen said he wasn't dead but how long would he remain that way? My insides quivered with a jolt of selfish happiness to note that Christopher hadn't abandoned me but he'd been taken.

I needed to help him. But first I had to deal with the consequences of killing Gabe. Pops and the brothers deserved closure.

Using my newfound stealth, I crept over to their bedroom and peeked inside.

My dad and stepmom weren't in bed, and my heart fell.

I'd been gone for two weeks.

Maybe no one bothered to tell them what happened.

I'd lost my cell phone at some point during my time away.

What about poor Gatsby?

"Here, kitty, kitty," I called, not turning on the lights.

I didn't need light to see any longer, and I didn't want the brothers or Pops to know I was home just yet.

So, I listened, taking in the familiar smells and sounds of the house.

I didn't hear any soft padding of kitty feet. Quietly, I tromped down the stairs.

In the kitchen, I sat at the counter.

Pulled over the envelope filled with the invitation to my birthday party.

A tear fell onto my cheek.

The idea of the party was awful, but the person who planned it meant the world to me.

How could Professor Pops ever forgive me for what I'd done?

"Gabe," I whispered.

"Hello, Snowflake."

ARE YOU REAL

THE VOICE CAME from behind me. It was a voice I thought I'd never hear again.

I didn't want to move, afraid if I turned around, I would realize I was hearing things or it'd been a figment of my overactive imagination.

But I sensed movement.

My body began to tremble. Could it be? Was it possible? I was too afraid to find out.

His voice whispered in my ear. "Snowflake. You're back. I knew you'd come sooner or later. I've been waiting."

I had to see him.

Turning, my eyes caught hold of his face, and he was there, standing before me.

His gorgeous green eyes watched me intently, and a smile sat on his beautiful face. But even that could be my imagination.

My mind still wouldn't believe it.

I placed my hands on his arms, feeling the warmth radiating off him. His breathing was rapid, a hint of mint coming off his breath, and he smelled good.

Like my Gabe.

Still, I struggled to accept the truth standing in front of me. "Are you real?"

He pulled me into his arms.

Gabe! He wasn't dead.

Somehow.

My arms circled his waist, my head resting on his shoulder. I closed my eyes, allowing myself to be momentarily lost in his embrace.

He was alive. Gabe.

After I don't know how long, I pulled back, desperate to see his face. His features would tell me whether or not he was angry.

"It's good to see you," he said softly, his voice full of emotion.

I couldn't get a read on him.

"How is this possible? I saw the angle of your neck. It was broken." I fought hard to keep the tears threatening to escape at bay.

His gaze fell to my mouth an instant before his lips pressed against mine.

That was the last thing I expected, but I reciprocated, pouring all of the guilt, the sorrow, the excruciating pain I'd held inside over the few two weeks into my kiss.

He scooped me into his arms and carried me upstairs into my bedroom, where he lay me on my bed before climbing on with me.

Our lips never separated, and he deepened the kiss.

I clung to him as his thumbs skimmed the skin under my shirt, sending fiery heat along my waist.

After a long time, he lifted his head.

"Snowflake, I didn't die. It may have appeared that way, but Professor Pops and the brothers overreacted. I was just unconscious for a while."

I wanted to believe him, but something in his voice, a slight hitch when he'd said they overreacted, gave me pause.

The memory of the way his body felt under me, the way I handled him - as though he were prey and not my first crush. The sound of his neck breaking. The moment ripped through my consciousness as though it were happening again for the first time.

I shuddered, shaking my head at the recollection.

"No, you were dead. Why aren't you telling me the truth? Did you?" I couldn't complete my question even though I was desperate to find out the truth. "Are you a vampire?"

He jumped off the bed, a look on his face like I just slapped him.

"No," he said. "No way!"

I tried not to be offended. "You know I am a vampire, right? Drinking from you changed me."

He let out a heavy breath. "Yeah, I know," he said, sitting beside me again.

"Does that make you uncomfortable? Because you didn't seem all that uncomfortable a few seconds ago." I got to my knees, adjusting my shirt and pushing back the apprehension fluttering like nervous pixilettes in my stomach.

He ran a hand through his hair, his gaze focused on the floor.

What was wrong with him? Ever since my hunter bit me, he'd been hot and cold. I couldn't figure him out.

"No, it doesn't make me uncomfortable. It makes - " He paused momentarily before continuing, "I am beyond happy to see you. But - " He let the word hang in the air.

"Spit it out, Gabe. What's your problem?" The guy could totally press my buttons. I was so, so happy. Because he was truly alive. But Gabe ticked me off way to easily, too.

He watched me a moment, taking me in. "It's just. Ugh! Why is this so difficult?" His green eyes pleaded, as though I should understand what was wrong.

I didn't, not even a little bit. "Tell me."

He turned and took one of my hands in his. "Professor Pops told me he told you about those who might want you dead."

"Yes. He explained that other vampires, and other creatures, believe that if all marked are killed, then it will be easier to destroy the queen." The internal pixilettes quivered again.

"That's right. And just as the queen is the vampire leader, there is one who rules over those who stand against her." He started to fidget, playing with a tassel on one of my pillows.

"Makes sense," I said quietly. "Somehow you know the leader?" I was waiting for the other proverbial shoe to drop.

Gabe continued like he hadn't heard my question. "When I was little, Professor Pops adopted me. You know that." He chuckled nervously.

"Of course," I whispered.

"From a young age, I knew I was different, that Professor Pops was different, and that the world wasn't as simple as it seemed. When I turned twelve, Pops showed me the Museum of the Supernatural. Something clicked inside. I felt drawn to hunt those who served the vampire queen." He brushed some hair out of his eyes and cleared his throat.

"Pops wouldn't let me, not that I blame him. He continued to train me, but that was all. I knew there was more and that a big piece of the puzzle was missing. I didn't know why until a few days after I turned sixteen. A visitor came to see me." He stopped and searched my eyes.

"Oh? Who?" I asked, feeling nervous for him. I scooted closer.

OceanofPDF.com

"He opposes the vampire queen." He shook his head. "He's the leader of those who want you and all of the marked dead." He blew out his breath. "More than that, though, he is my father."

"Like, your real father?" I was confused.

We'd all believed his father was dead - that he'd died in a fire more than a decade ago.

He nodded. "Yes. When we spoke, he explained that he needed to fake his own death." Gabe's eyes filled with wonder. "Apparently, he's been alive a long time."

The make-believe pixilettes in my tummy were having a field day. But I could only focus on one thing at a time.

"Why didn't he want you?" I was confused. The man faked his own death and left Gabe to go through life alone.

Thank goodness for Professor Pops.

Gabe pulled away. "It isn't that he didn't want me. He's just busy, and those who are loyal to the queen killed my mom. He believed Professor Pops would be able to care for me until I was old enough to understand. And Professor Pops did. I couldn't have asked for a better father."

That was true, but I still didn't get it. Had his father known what Professor Pops was? "But Professor Pops is a vampire." I spoke slowly, trying to let all he said sink in.

"Technically, yes. He is. But he's more than that, and my father trusts him." He crossed his arms, his features twisting. "He may not like him or what he is, but he trusts him."

I shook my head. "Okay, so you're the son of the man who wants me dead. But how does that explain why you're alive?"

I knew there were many other questions I needed to ask him as well. "I know you died. No one could survive a broken neck or a torn-out throat." Yet there he was, sitting on my bed, looking as amazing as ever.

I shuddered at the memory of him and forced back my desire to run.

"There must be a balance in all things. For every sunset, there is a sunrise. For each sadness, there is happiness. And for every evil, there must be good." He paused to let the words sink in.

They sank in all right, and I started to get mad.

Was he saying I was evil?

Had he been waiting for me so he could make out with me before killing me? That seemed kind of perverse.

"What do you mean?" I released his hand, moving away.

My movements didn't go unnoticed. He frowned but didn't stop me. "When vampires were created, so was another species. Equally powerful, but keen on living in seclusion." Gabe took a deep breath.

"Please don't tell me they were werewolves," I said, mocking.

"No, not werewolves, but chayot." He pronounced it like someone might say coyote but with a ch at the beginning.

"Chayot?" I smirked. "Did you just make that word up?" I thought about slapping his knee and smiling. He was teasing me.

"Snow. This is serious. If you don't believe me, look up the word on the Internet. It's there, though a lot of the information is incorrect."

He really was serious. The pixilettes in my stomach vanished, replaced by a vicious knot. "If you say so." I sat cross-legged and settled my hands in my lap. "But why aren't these chayot in Professor Pops' books? Or on display in the Museum of the Supernatural?"

He scooted nearer. "Any written mention of the chayot is considered blasphemy. The chayot are sacred and to be revered." While he spoke, his voice softened, but that just infuriated me more.

"Let me get this straight. You're telling me that the chayot are the good guys, and we vampires are the bad guys? Is that what you're saying?"

He let out another weighty breath. "Basically, yes."

I jumped off the bed. "Unbelievable," I snapped as I paced, catching my reflection in my full-length mirror. Even she looked frantic.

"What about Kenmei and Professor Pops?" I didn't add Christopher, but his body in the glass coffin crossed my mind.

"They were human before they became vampires." He gingerly moved toward me. "Though they did a lot of evil in their time, they've atoned and dedicated their lives to destroying the vampire queen."

I backed up, somehow feeling like a caged animal, and remembered what the queen had said. My DNA was changed.

I was no longer human.

Didn't he know that?

"What about me?" I asked between rapid breaths.

He shrugged. "See, it's like this - " He stopped and walked over to my dresser and began fiddling with the perfume bottles. He took off each lid, brought the bottle to his nose, and then crinkled his face like the bottles contained skunk spray.

If the situation hadn't been so difficult, I would've laughed.

Instead, I waited for him to go on as apprehension over what he would say filled every crevice.

Finally, he sighed, turned back to me. "That's why I'm here. My father is the first chayot. When the war broke out between the vampires and the other creatures, he stayed out of it. He and the other chayot didn't get involved until later when vampires decided to kill and use humans."

Frustrated tears filled my eyes, but I forcefully wiped them away. "You're a chayot?" I struggled to believe it but that would explain why he didn't die.

"Half. Yes." He shoved his hands into the pockets of his jeans, his shoulders rising to his ears.

Was that why his blood tasted so good? "You aren't making sense. You are half whatever the hell a chayot is and half what? Changeling?" It was the first word that came to mind.

As I said the word, an image of the squat, frog-looking creature came to mind.

I knew they could make themselves look different. Hence the name changeling.

At the word, Gabe wrinkled his nose. "Hell no, Snowflake. Human. I'm half-human."

"Is that why chayots want to kill vampires?" I asked.

OceanofPDF.com

MAYBE I DESERVED IT

MY BREATHING CAME in ragged chunks. "Is it because we are no longer human?" I wanted out of my room. Out of this conversation with Gabe, and the whole thing.

The desire to bolt took over.

For the briefest of moments, I went to the window, desperate to be anywhere but here.

"That's part of it. But there's more. See," he hesitated.

I studied his reflection in the glass, but I didn't turn.

"My father fell in love with a human, and with that love came many children. The vampire queen made an extra effort to capture and change their offspring into vampires. Sons and daughters with chayot blood make even more exceptional vampires than a regular human does. The vampire queen favored them over all others, and she nearly got them all."

I thought about the vampires I'd seen in the castle.

Were they Gabe's relatives?

I didn't ask. Didn't move.

I was a vampire - the enemy.

I wouldn't give him any information.

"The queen brought this war upon herself. It's my father's life work to finish it - kill them all. Destroy her. End the suffering of those chayot she's changed." As he spoke, he straightened, and a regal arrogance shifted his features.

I crossed my arms. How dare he? I hadn't asked for this.

Yet somehow, he was saying I was evil - a thing to be destroyed.

Maybe I deserved it. I thought of all the humans I'd fed from over the last two weeks. I'd enjoyed it. Reveled in it.

My hands in fists, I faced him. "Well then, what are you waiting for? If that's why you've come, do it. Kill the evil vampire you just made out with." My words came out harsh, laced with spite.

I closed my eyes and rolled my shoulders back.

If he wanted me dead, so be it. If I had to die, it should be by the human - even if he was just half-human - whose blood I drank first.

Several minutes passed, and neither of us moved. I heard him, still standing there, breathing erratically.

I blinked open my eyes to see tears crowded Gabe's lashes and streaked his cheeks. The haughtiness was gone, replaced by a desolate sadness.

I tucked my hands in my back pockets. He was so annoyingly complicated. "What? Am I making it too easy? Do you want me to run?" I asked, turning the palms of my hands toward him in supplication.

He shook his head, a strangled moan leaving his throat. He sank to his knees, bowing his head.

"Why did you have to turn?" The words came out anguished.

I went to him then, kneeling in front of him. "You offered yourself to me. I was there, I remember." My cheeks heated at the memory of our kissing. "You wanted me to bite you," I added, softly.

"No," he growled. "I didn't. That isn't how it went - " His voice trailed off. "You-you tricked me. I wasn't strong enough to resist you, and you used your - " He paused.

"I used my what? Womanly wiles?" I snorted in disgust. I knew he was talking about a vampire's gift of compulsion.

A fantastic ability that came along with being a marked bloodsucker.

But I hadn't had that skill before I drank from him.

"I wasn't a vampire until after you let me drink from you. I didn't use any kind of spell, or magic, or whatever you want to call it. I didn't have the ability then." I got off my knees and went back to the window.

The slivered moon glowed through wispy clouds.

Frogs croaked, and the wind whistled lightly through the trees. "If you'd like, I can show you the difference. I have the power to persuade you into doing anything now." I didn't look at him but heard his breath catch. "Is that what you want?"

"Snowflake," he whispered.

I spun around.

Gabe was back on his feet.

"What the hell do you want from me, Gabe? If you want me dead, kill me. I won't stop you. Just do it and get it over with because I'm beyond sick of your hot and cold."

He crossed his arms. "I should kill you. It's what I'm required to do." He looked away. "But, I can't." Each word came out like he was in pain. "We are meant to be enemies, but that isn't how I feel about you."

My anger returned. I walked over and slapped his face. "This is all your fault. You know that, right?"

He flinched, surprised.

I didn't give him a chance to refute my accusation. "If you had just told me what you were instead of acting weird, I wouldn't have bitten you. I would've resisted," I said, fighting the trembling of my lower lip.

Thinking back, I wondered if I could have, but I had to believe it was true.

It looked like he hadn't thought of that.

Stupid guys and their stupid hormones.

"You're right," he said quietly. "But, I was afraid."

"Afraid of what?" I exhaled and turned away.

He swallowed, taking me by the shoulders and making me face him. Then he took my hands in his. "I was afraid you wouldn't talk to me anymore. That you would hate me." He hesitated and closed his eyes. "I hate myself."

I yanked my hands from his, frustrated. He was still doing it, acting all kinds of sweet one second and like a total jerk-face vampire killer the next.

"Why? Why even care?" I went to my bedroom door and pushed it wide open. "Let me make it easy on you. Either kill me or leave. This doesn't have to be difficult. Now that I understand what you are required to do, just get it over with!" Fury made my canines grow, but I didn't care. I let him see the monster in me.

Tears filled his eyes. "I can't," he seethed. "Don't you get that?" His body teemed with desperation and shook with emotion.

I LOVE YOU

"NO, I DON'T," I said, my body moving toward him on its own.

When I was inches from him, I stopped.

"Why can't you kill me, Gabe?" My voice was low, my breathing erratic as I studied him, trying to decide what the hell a chayot was.

I had no clue. He'd said he wasn't a werewolf, so there was that.

He pulled me so that our chests touched, his eyes boring into mine.

My heart pounded, and I felt his pounding too.

Beat for beat.

I was furious, scared, and angry.

Worst of all, I wanted him.

I wanted his lips on mine again.

And I wanted him to keep his promise to never leave me.

His hurt and confusion vanished, replaced with his need for me.

In answer, his mouth covered mine, his lips warm and urgent.

Without hesitation, I responded, hungry for all of him.

He seemed to need me the same way, and before I knew it, we were back on my bed, his body covering mine, his hands in my hair.

I let my hands roam over his body, exploring the muscles on his back, shoulders, and chest.

Our lips parted momentarily when I lifted his shirt over his head.

Our eyes met.

His were clouded with confusion and something else, and I guessed they were a reflection of mine.

I wasn't sure what we were doing or how we would solve our problems.

We'd been friends most of our lives.

We were supposed to be enemies.

That's what he'd said.

But at that moment, I didn't care, and neither did he.

When I tossed his shirt on the floor, he groaned, pressing kisses into my neck, along my jaw before hesitating, his eyes locking with mine.

"I love you, Snow White. I've loved you since the day Professor Pops brought me home, and I saw your inquisitive, beautiful face in my driveway."

I searched for any hint of a lie as my pulse quickened. "You love me?" I asked uncertainly.

He wrapped his arms around me, his elbows on either side, holding me, a willing captive.

"So much it hurts," he said softly, a smirk playing across his lips.

I realized he was thinking about our first kiss, down in the Seven Magics Academy training room when I drank from him and thought I killed him.

"Won't your dad be mad? He knows what I did, right?"

He nodded, the smirk turning into a smile. "I've just decided I don't care. For the past several weeks, I've tried to be the obedient son and do what my father expects. Take on the family business. But where you're concerned, I can't." Gabe's face turned dark, full of determination. "I won't."

My heart melted, but I wanted him to be clear. "Is that really feasible, though? Isn't it your sacred duty or something to destroy me and my kind?" I still didn't know what he was.

He pulled his arms from beneath me and brushed his fingers through my hair.

We were so close our noses almost touched.

The smell of toothpaste tinged his breath, and manly cologne surrounded his body.

The muscles on his arms rippled, and he flexed. I took in his dark lashes, thick like a girl's, but on him, they only increased the perfection of his face.

There was a slight arch in his brows.

His dark hair swirled in disarray, and his lips were parted slightly.

Sexy.

"Together, we'll figure it out." He kissed me tenderly. "I won't lose you. I made you a promise, didn't I? That is my sacred duty now, to make sure you're kept safe."

I smiled. My cheeks hot with desire. "What if I want to - " My eyes found the pulsing vein in his neck.

The idea of drinking from him again caused my fangs to appear.

He inhaled.

Worried, I scared him, I caught hold of his gaze. "I don't have to."

His expression became hungry. "Well, the damage is done. You've already discovered you can't kill me, and - " Gabe looked away.

"You liked it," I said hoarsely, finishing his sentence.

"Yes," he whispered. "I liked it." He cleared his throat. "Well, up until you broke my neck. That really did hurt, at least for a few minutes."

Our eyes met, and we both laughed. "I'm really sorry about that." I touched his neck with my fingers. "Beyond sorry," I added, my fingers finding his pulse. "But, I've had some practice since the first time."

His eyes widened. "You haven't killed anyone."

"No. I've been careful." My fingers trailed down his back, making goosebumps rise on his skin.

"That feels good," he said, kissing my nose. "I know what would feel better." He rolled us so that I was on top, and he lifted his chin, offering me his pulsing vein.

It was my turn to be surprised. "Are you sure?" I asked, checking his face.

My need for his blood filled my soul even as I straddled him. I wanted him bad.

"Very sure. Take it." He closed his eyes.

I moved so that I could have better access.

Opening my mouth, releasing my fangs, I lowered my head.

I took it slow, allowing each tooth to prick his neck gradually, knowing with the pain also came pleasure.

His breath caught in his throat. When my fangs were fully inside, I began sucking, pulling his blood from his body.

He moaned, taking my head in his hands and pressing me deeper into him.

I sucked harder. This time I counted. When I reached eight, I stopped.

He flipped us, placing me under him again, my canines still embedded in his neck. He pressed his body into mine. "Don't stop, Snow."

I sucked again, counting all the way to fifteen. Way past my limit, but I was almost too far gone to stop.

Surely if I drained him dry, he would die. Wouldn't he?

I had to stop. I pulled out, my fangs retracting.

His eyes were hooded, heavy with lust.

Our bodies twined together.

Gabe's lips found mine, and I froze, worried he would be disgusted by the blood on my lips.

OceanofPDF.com

YOU'RE SO BEAUTIFUL

GABE DIDN'T SEEM to mind the blood. His tongue dove into my mouth and circled mine.

My hands wandered along his back, down to the waist of his jeans and along his butt.

His breathing came faster as we moved, desperate to be even closer to each other.

Our lips parted, and we looked at each other.

"I want you," he said.

"I want you too." So badly I ached.

He helped me sit up, lifting my shirt over my head before tossing it onto the floor.

Then he scooted me back under him, skin touching skin.

"Snow," he whispered, his voice gruff, kissing my neck, along my collarbones and shoulders. "You're so beautiful."

In response, I wrapped my legs around his hips.

Did I really want to keep going? My body sure did, but not too many minutes ago, he'd called us enemies.

He'd said it was his duty to kill me.

But he'd also told me he loved me.

Funny how life worked.

You fought.

You made up.

I decided to go with it and went to bite his shoulder.

Someone cleared his throat, and the lights flicked on.

We froze, both of us looking over toward the sound.

Professor Pops stood in the doorway, his hands on his hips.

My face blazed at the sight of him.

Gabe blocked me with his body. "Give us a minute, Pops," Gabe said calmly.

"I'll give you five. Get dressed," Pops answered sternly, giving Gabe a look that said he was in big freaking trouble. The door closed.

"Crap," Gabe whispered.

I swallowed, working on getting myself under control.

Part of me was glad we'd been interrupted.

But my body was really disappointed.

In the hall, I could hear the brothers snickering.

"I guess they made up," Heathcliff said.

"I told you he wouldn't kill her," Bart added.

"You owe me twenty bucks." That was Salvatore.

Gabe and I looked at each other.

He helped me off the bed.

I threw my shirt back on, and he did the same.

"Ready?" he asked when we were decent.

I knew Gabe was alive, and all the guilt I felt was for nothing, but nervousness fluttered at facing Professor Pops. I didn't want to see the disappointment on his face.

"As I'll ever be." I worked to smooth down my hair.

Before I opened the door, I paused and took a deep breath.

"Wow, dinner and a show," I said and swallowed, working to push down the humiliation that everyone knew what we were doing.

Gabe looked confused a second and then started to laugh. "I'm a full-service boyfriend."

Boyfriend? I snickered, still feeling blissful after-effects of drinking Gabe's blood.

Our relationship felt like more than that.

An image of Christopher in the glass case danced across my mind, reminding me that any happiness I experienced was at his expense.

I needed to find the Seal, or all vampires would be destroyed, including my hunter.

But who would've taken it?

My stepmother? Cindy? What about Gabe's father, or someone in his group? Wouldn't they want it if it could destroy vampires?

I gasped at the questions, my mind moving in one direction. Toward Gabe.

Did he have it?

Kenmei and Professor Pops said it would give the person who had it more power, though it worked best for me.

So, if Gabe or his father had it, did they know what to do with it? I didn't even know what to do with it.

"Snow, what's wrong? You look like you're in pain. Did I hurt you?"

I shook my head. "I'm fine. Just a lot going on in here." I tapped my head with a finger. Gabe placed his hand over mine.

Before we left the confines of my room, I had a question. "Do the guys know what you are?"

He chuckled. "Yes. After my brush with a broken neck and my quick recovery, Professor Pops and I told them. Dorian, Heathcliff, and Salvatore wouldn't speak to me for a week. They were so mad at me for not telling you and not telling them." He huffed. "I should've told you all a lot sooner. So much heartache could've been avoided if I had."

With a sigh, he sidled over, grabbing my hands. "Can you forgive me? Can you love me?" His eyes searched mine.

Love? He'd repeated the word.

If I truly loved Gabe, then either the spell or prophecy or whatever - "Lips red as rubies, hair dark as night, drink your true love's blood, become the Vampire, Snow White" - was just a lot of mumbo jumbo, or I didn't really love, love Gabe.

Professor Pops had told me that a kiss from my true love would return me to human. That hadn't worked, so did that mean Gabe wasn't my true love?

I thought about the vampire queen and what she told me, that Professor Pops and Kenmei were lying.

Someone was lying, but who? Who could I trust? I still had a lot to learn.

I blinked. "Yes, of course, I forgive you. I'm sorry for running. I was such a coward. Had I stayed, a lot of heartache could have been avoided as well." I could ask him to explain what a chayot was. I should. But part of me didn't want to know. At least not yet.

He kissed my forehead. "Then, we'll agree it's both our faults and forget all about it."

"Okay," I muttered, but a big part of me believed it was impossible to totally forget. I wanted to tell him that too, but I was mentally exhausted.

A lot had gone on in a short amount of time, and I needed a break.

"C'mon, let's go see what Professor Pops has to say."

We opened the door, and I followed him down the hall until we reached the top of the stairs where I hesitated.

Gabe turned back. "What's wrong, Snow?" Then he glanced beyond me toward my window. "We could run, if you want."

"Does my dad know I left?"

OceanofPDF.com

NEEDED TO ESCAPE

GABE'S EYES found mine again. "No," he said, shaking his head. "I guess your dad tried to call you several times, and, when some random person answered, he freaked out and called Pops. We didn't want to worry him, so Professor Pops told your dad you lost your phone and that you were upset about him leaving again so soon and that you needed some time."

He touched my cheek with a thumb. "If you hadn't returned by tomorrow, we were going to have to tell your dad the truth."

"Good," I said, exhaling that stored up stress. I would call him tomorrow morning. "What about Gatsby? Do you know where my cat is?"

"Yeah, the poor thing came meowing at our backdoor a couple of days after you left. We've kept him with us. He's been well cared for, but he sure misses you." He took my hand.

"I can't wait to see him."

We lumbered down the stairs and headed into the kitchen.

Professor Pops and the brothers were there.

The guys smiled sheepishly, though Professor Pops looked serious.

"Hi," I said, clinging to Gabe's hand and hiding behind him slightly.

Professor Pops took hold of my other hand and pulled me to him, hugging me tightly.

He wasn't mad.

I forced back a sob, embracing him happily, enjoying the scent of books, ink, and cigars that was the Professor. He may be disappointed, but he still cared for me. I was beyond grateful for that knowledge.

"I am glad you're okay. I was worried sick." Pops held me at arm's length. "Where have you been?"

I couldn't tell them about the vampire queen or the trek I traveled in search of blood. It was all best forgotten. Before I could answer, Salvatore spoke.

"Yeah, Snow. We looked for you every day, but it was like you vanished."

"You shouldn't have run. We will always have your back," Dorian said, his eyes sad.

I nodded. "I'm sorry. It's just when I saw Gabe and thought he was - " I refused to even say what I thought had happened. "Something inside me broke, and I needed to escape."

They all nodded, letting out grunts of understanding and sympathy.

Except for Sebastian. "How many regular humans did you kill?" The words sounded light, but I could tell he was nervous about the answer.

"None," I answered. Focusing on Professor Pops. "I remembered what you said. I counted. I didn't take too much." I felt movement from Gabe but didn't dare look at him.

Professor Pops smiled, his shoulders visibly relaxing. "That is excellent news." He released me.

"I guess this means we don't need to cancel her party," Daniel said.

The rest of the brothers groaned.

And I laughed. "My birthday party? Are you sure you want to host that? I don't need anything. I'm just so glad to be back with you all."

It wasn't necessary, but at this point, I'd do anything, go anywhere for them. As long as these amazing guys - men - were near me, I knew anything was possible.

Professor Pops clasped his hands, and smiled. "Of course we do, my dear. You only turn sixteen once."

"Yes, but will she be able to resist all the delicious human blood dancing around the room?" Dorian asked, his voice tinged with curiosity.

As he spoke, he raised his chin slightly.

I doubted anyone else even noticed. I did.

What was it about Dorian offering me his blood?

They all turned to me, some smug, others concerned.

I shrugged and then sighed, drawing out the time before I responded.

They all seemed to be holding their breaths.

Giving Gabe a sideways glance, I nodded. "I will have no problem resisting. That I can promise."

"I know she can too," Dorian said, pulling me into a hug.

Gabe shoved him. "That's enough. Back off my girl."

"Let's have a ball," Salvatore shouted.

The back door flew open, and we all turned to see Cindy, dressed in soft pink pajamas and fluffy pink slippers, rush into the kitchen, and skid to a halt. Even with bedhead and no makeup, she was gorgeous.

"Snow. Merryweather. White!" she fumed, crossing her arms.

I swallowed nervously. "Hey, Cin," I said, moving over to her and patting her on the shoulder. "It's nice to see you."

She flinched, but quickly recovered and threw her arms around me. "I'm tres glad you're back."

"Me too, Cin. Me too." I hugged her tight, thankful I had such great friends.

"Don't you dare run off without me again. Got it?" She pushed me away so she could study my face.

"I won't." I raised an eyebrow.

She'd bragged about her locator spell and about being a big-time witch, so why hadn't she located me?

Unless she hadn't been looking.

"Good." She released me but linked her arm with mine at our elbows. "Please tell me there are cookies and hot cocoa with marshmallows. I need comfort food."

We all laughed.

AFTER THAT NIGHT, things returned to normal pretty quickly.

I went back to Salem Academy the next day, which was a Wednesday, and continued my Seven Magics Academy training in the evenings.

By the following weekend, I was all caught up in my classes.

Professor Pops had been right.

Human stuff was super easy now.

My Salem Academy teachers were shocked but also pleased with my newfound intellectual prowess.

My Seven Magics Academy training was coming along nicely as well.

After school, I hung out with Cindy on the days she wasn't working. It was fun to listen to her talk about my party, dresses, makeup, and the guys.

I let her practice makeup spells on me and do my hair.

It wasn't my favorite pastime, but it was alright.

She was really talented and made me look good.

She still didn't know Gabe and I were together. Worse, she didn't know what happened to me.

That I was a vampire now.

I half hoped Professor Pops would tell her what I was, but he didn't.

OceanofPDF.com

INSTEAD, he said one of his relatives needed help and that I'd agreed to take care of his niece and nephew.

Cindy bought it and only asked a few questions.

Like how much was I paid, whether I had fun taking care of the kids, and most importantly, had I met any cute guys.

Mostly, she would show me her magic, even practicing on me sometimes.

One day I went to school with a pink streak in my hair, the next I had a red one. She also polished my nails using magic, which was cool.

I especially liked it when they were sparkling red. Thankfully, she was over Gabe. And she only asked about Christopher once.

She'd believed he and I ran off together and that I was pregnant. The woman had wild fantasies, but they weren't even close to the real drama in my life.

When I spent time alone with Gabe, we did a lot of kissing, and he let me drink his blood. We decided to hold off on going further physically.

At least until after my sixteenth birthday.

That seemed appropriate.

I still hadn't been able to tell him that I loved him.

That omission appeared to be wearing on him because he said it a lot, but I didn't know whether that was how I felt.

I mean, sure I loved him, but I wasn't positive I was in love with him.

With Pops and the other brothers, I researched in the Museum of the Supernatural and trained with different weapons.

My Seven Magics Academy training was one of the best parts of my day, though there was no mention of chayot in any of the books.

An Internet search had given me some idea of what Gabe was, and I'd asked Professor Pops to fill in the details, so I had a vague understanding of what a chayot was.

But I still wanted to talk to Gabe about it.

There hadn't been any time to think much about Sharra, Christopher, or the necklace. Though I silently hoped Christopher was okay.

I knew the Seal of Gabriel was out there and that someone had it. But I was at a loss as to how to bring it up.

It was Friday night, and Cindy was at work.

Her job was the one thing about her I didn't understand. Her family was wealthy. She didn't need to work, but she liked to.

Go figure.

I was glad, though.

That little bit of reality kept her from being too snobby.

Gabe trained me after school.

Then he cooked himself a steak with a side salad while I watched, hungry for his blood. When he finished, we left his house, walking over to mine.

There we could be alone.

We watched a movie. Well, we mostly kissed, and I drank his blood.

Now that I knew he was supernatural, I could taste it - the searing light within his blood. It radiated from his pores and gave me a slight buzz.

"Hang on." Gabe got up off the floor. "I need some water."

"Fine." I rolled onto my stomach, watching him get a glass from the cupboard before filling it with water at the sink. "So you're half-angel?" I asked, waiting for him to confirm what I thought was the truth. That chayot was a type of angel.

Gabe chugged down the water before refilling it and drinking some more. I heard his heart skip a beat. "You know, then," he said and smirked, coming back over to the living room and sitting beside me.

I rested my head in his lap, smiling up at him. "I guess so," I said, appreciating the confirmation, though it wasn't a flat-out declaration. "Say the word again."

He knew I liked how he said the word like coyote, but with the ch sound at the beginning. I thought it sounded incredibly sexy coming from Gabe's succulent mouth.

According to the Internet, chayot were holy beings that dwelled on Earth.

One site contained diagrams explaining why and listed names of biblical prophets and teachers they believed were chayot.

The pictures portrayed figures without wings, or horns and a tail.

They looked like any average human.

I wanted to believe that was Gabe - at least half of him, but I didn't know for sure what it meant that he was an angel.

Gabe finished the water in his glass, resting it on the carpet beside us. Then he tucked the pillow behind his back.

My cat Gatsby stood from his place near the TV, giving me a one-eyed glare.

I ignored him, and he trotted from the room.

"But you are an angel?" I verified.

"Technically, yes. But chayot are specific types of angels and are rarely spoken about." Gabe brushed his hands through his hair.

He didn't really seem to want to talk about it, but I wanted answers.

"What, no wings?" I grabbed a pillow from off the couch - the front of this one cross-stitched with Ursula hovering over a wide-eyed Ariel

- and set it on his lap before resting my head on it.

I was trying to be funny, but he seemed preoccupied.

An incomprehensible shadow passed over his face but immediately disappeared.

He adjusted my pillow, so my head was nearer to him.

"Chayot were created for a specific purpose. Each possesses a deeply embedded passion for keeping humans safe. It's their only responsibility."

An insistent dread filled my heart, and I had to tell myself he didn't mean me. I pushed down the feelings, my insecurities.

"And you can't die?" The memory of his body twisted at an odd angle, sprang to mind, and my stomach turned.

What I really wanted to know was how his kind - chayot - could be killed.

What I'd learned from the Museum of the Supernatural was that the word immortal was a relative term.

Every creature had a weakness.

You just had to know what it was and how to use it to your advantage. And if chayot wanted me dead, it would serve me well to know how they could die as well.

"As I said before, yes, I can die. All creatures can. But it isn't easy for me." He smirked, cool cockiness oozing from his pores.

"How?" I asked and immediately regretted it.

KISS ME

GABE'S EYES DARKENED, and he studied me.

"Never mind," I added quickly.

He carefully lifted me so that I was straddling him, and I realized what he was doing. When he didn't want to talk about our differences or the fact that we were supposed to be enemies, he would kiss me.

Then we would get lost in the amazing feelings created by making out. My body hummed in anticipation.

I watched his eyes, curious about what I saw in them.

They were filled with hunger, desire, and something else. Guilt?

Did he regret the way he felt about me?

Had his biological father said something to him about the fact that I wasn't dead yet?

If only I could explain to his father that I was still me.

Still Snow White, a girl from Salem, Massachusetts.

All that changed was I needed blood to survive and - Okay, so a lot about me was altered, but it was physical.

My soul was the same.

Gabe continued to watch me.

"What?" I asked, feeling self-conscious.

Gabe had to know I was still the girl he'd flirted with at Warehouse Video, the same girl he wrapped in his arms and promised to never leave.

Sure, I'd been bitten and changed into a revenant and finally a vampire. But I hadn't killed anyone. I still went to school, fed my cat, and did the usual stuff.

Gabe seemed to sense my internal struggles.

"Kiss me," he said, his voice low and husky.

He tugged me closer, and our lips met.

I pressed my body into him, allowing my need for him to overpower everything else. Tasted his angelic essence on his lips.

For several long minutes, we were lost in each other, and I forgot about everything but how good it felt to have Gabe's hands caressing my body, his tongue skimming the inside of my mouth.

When we broke apart, we were both breathing heavily.

"You're really good at that," I said, biting my lower lip.

Gabe chuckled and a quiver of lust rushed through me. I wanted his blood in my mouth. I wanted his scent on my skin.

I smiled, running my hands through his thick dark hair. Gabe was beautiful.

His eyes searched mine, his usual cocky grin plastered on his face.

"My turn," I said, no longer able to hold back. I pulled his hair, tugging his head and exposing the delicious blue-green vein at his neck. My fangs started to grow.

A low rumble escaped from him, and he closed his eyes. "Yes."

I sank my teeth into his neck, relishing the way his skin parted. I tugged his body tightly against mine, sucking slowly, enjoying the intimacy.

"Snow," he whispered, cupping my butt with his hands.

Now that I knew he was half-angel or I guess, half chayot, I relished the distinct difference in his blood.

I understood it, and I also knew I could be a little rougher with him than with regular humans.

After a few minutes, I pulled back before pushing his shirt out of the way and burying my fangs into his shoulder.

He kissed my neck, sucking hard. I knew I would have a hickey.

At least for a minute. I healed way too quickly for it to last.

When I pulled back, he grabbed my head and kissed me, his tongue entwining with mine. Then he stopped, looking at me.

"I love you, Snow," he whispered, his lips brushing against mine.

I had to say the words back. "I love you, too," I returned.

He slowly moved us so that I was under him.

I knew Professor Pops had "the talk" with him after he walked in on Gabe and me the other night, and we'd agreed not to go further, but his body felt so good against mine. I almost decided to change my mind.

I wrapped my legs around his hips, kissing him with such passion, I hoped he could feel how much I cared.

My hands went to the waist of his jeans, running my fingers beneath them.

Gabe stopped, sitting up and pulling me with him. His face and body told me he wasn't ready to be done. Not even close.

"I should go," he said, his voice hoarse, his hair rumpled.

"Okay," I said, standing with him.

He hugged me. "You're amazing," he said, his lips brushing against my hair.

"Funny, I was thinking the same thing about you." I nuzzled his neck.

His breath came out ragged as he kissed my forehead.

"I can't imagine what it feels like for you." He touched his neck, feathering his fingers across the place my teeth had been moments before. The holes were already gone. "But I've never experienced anything better."

His words caused my knees to go weak. "That pretty much sums it up."

For some reason, an image of Christopher popped into my mind.

Ask him about the pendant. Use your powers of persuasion if you have to and ask already, my inner voice commanded.

But I couldn't.

I didn't want Gabe to think I was accusing him of stealing. Nor did I want to ruin the moment. It'd been hot. My body still buzzed.

"What is it?" he asked, his fingers touching my swollen mouth.

I shook my head. "Just happy." I sighed, leaning into him. I never would've believed there could be a Gabe and me.

"Me, too." He went to the door, opening it, letting in the brisk November air. "You're turning sixteen tomorrow." He still held my hand.

"Yep." Did he want to come back in? It was only one day. Just a few hours, and then I'd be officially sixteen.

His eyes dropped to my lips, but he pulled away. "See ya, Snowflake." He went out onto the porch.

Disappointment flared low in my belly, and my thighs quivered. "Bye." I swallowed, desperate to ask him to stay.

"Tomorrow," he said, and I heard the promise in his voice.

"K."

After he was gone, I got ready for bed, a perma-smile trapped on my lips.

Once I had my purple comforter over me, Gatsby jumped up and curled himself at my feet, his purring a soothing ballad. I immediately fell asleep.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

I WAS DEAD. My body rested on a cloud of red inside a clear glass cylinder that was my casket. I'd been laid to rest in a gossamer white dress. Dainty white slippers covered my feet.

My dark hair was curled, and a yellow ribbon wound through several strands like a headband.

In my hands, I clutched a single red rose, the color of my stained lips. Dark lashes stood out against the stark white of my skin. The casket rested on a white stand in a lush field full of thousands of white daisies.

They swayed in the slight wind.

The smartly-dressed brothers and Professor Pops were at the foot of my casket, and the vampire queen stood near my head.

She wore a blood-red dress that scooped low, enhancing her cleavage. Above, the sun shone brightly. Birds twittered in nearby pine trees. The hum of insects provided a despondent melody, and a babbling brook meandered nearby.

It was like looking at a painting of a moment in time.

No one spoke.

No one moved.

What are they waiting for? I wondered.

Overhead a glorious man with velvet-white wings descended. In his hands, he held a large sword. Tears filled my eyes as an overwhelming serenity consumed my soul, and I wondered at my feelings.

Why wasn't I sad or angry at seeing my body laid to rest in a casket. I should've at least felt fear at seeing the menacing chayot hovering over my dead body. Instead, there was only calm.

He drew closer, his features coming into view.

"Gabe." I noted the set of his jaw and the hardness in his green eyes.

He landed next to my body and lifted the lid on the casket. Still, the brothers, Professor Pops, and the queen remained still.

Could they not see him? Was he going to kiss me awake?

The eyes of my corpse flew open, and my fangs grew. A furious growl rumbled in the throat of my dead body.

Gabe brought the blade above my heart and plunged. As the sharp edges parted my skin, it made sounds like metal ripping through concrete.

"I'm so sorry," he cried, pulling back after several moments. Red blood dripped from the edge of his blade and landed on my white dress.

My eyes closed.

My fangs withdrew.

And I was gone.

WHEN I WOKE, I was shocked to see eight handsome men standing at the foot of my bed - Professor Pops and all seven brothers.

Like in my dream.

At the sight, my pulse quickened.

But I took a deep breath.

They weren't in suits.

Nor did they look sad. Instead, they appeared happy.

Professor Pops held a light wooden tray abounding with food.

"One. Two. Three," Heathcliff whispered.

Eight deep voices sang as one. "Happy birthday to you. Happy birthday to you. Happy birthday, dear Snow. Happy birthday to you."

Gabe said Snowflake. I recognized his baritone.

"And many more," Daniel added.

"On channel four," Salvatore sang.

"We live next door," Bart crooned, lifting a hand in the air.

"She likes to snore." Dorian wiggled his eyebrows in amusement.

"It shakes the floor," Sebastian finished, holding the last note.

I couldn't help the embarrassed giggle, and I covered my head with my blanket. "Thank you," I muttered. If I had the choice of any eight people in the entire world to be part of my life, these goofy, awesome, amazing men would be who I chose.

"Show your face, birthday girl," Dorian said, flipping the covers back. He caught some of my hair in his fingers, and I yelped.

"Violent," I howled playfully.

His eyes grew wide in mock terror. "Sorry." He brushed the hair out of my face with one hand. I sat up and stuck out my tongue, which caused all the guys to laugh.

Professor Pops set the platter of food on my nightstand. A large waffle topped with a generous helping of whipped cream, strawberries, and almond slices steamed from the center of the plate.

A glass of orange juice rested near the knife and spoon, and a bowl of fruit sat above the fork.

"Looks delicious," I said, wishing it would taste like the food in Sharra. At the reminder of the apple I sampled while there, my mouth watered.

"You can eat in a minute. Presents first," Heathcliff said. One by one, they filed out of my room and then came back. Each held a beautifully wrapped present.

I willed away the tears forming on my lashes, sitting up, tucking the covers around my legs.

My eyes still watered, and I waved my hand in front of my face, hoping to fan away the tears. "You guys didn't have to get me anything. The party tonight is more than enough."

"Pish posh," Salvatore said, setting a box wrapped in shiny silver paper and tied with a red bow in front of me.

I raised an eyebrow at his choice of words and laughed. "Thanks, old lady."

"Open it," he said, ignoring my name-calling as he sat at the end of my bed. The others gathered around.

I picked up the box and shook it. It was light, but there was definitely something inside. Untying the ribbon, I ripped off the paper, removing the lid. "Socks," I said, holding up a blue pair with black mustaches all over them. "A lot of socks."

"Sixteen pairs of socks," Salvatore said with a radiant smile.

"Lame," Sebastian goaded, slapping Salvatore in the back of the head. Salvatore reciprocated by punching Sebastian in the stomach.

Professor Pops glared. "Knock it off," he snapped, efficiently ending the altercation.

"I really needed socks. Thank you." I leaned over and hugged Salvatore.

"You're welcome," he responded, suddenly shy.

Sebastian pulled him from the bed and sat in his place. His box was wrapped in a shimmering navy-blue paper and tied with a big magenta bow.

He placed it in my lap.

I opened it with gusto, the excitement building at all of the presents. Inside were smaller plastic boxes.

The first contained a watch with a red band, the face shaped like an apple.

"Cute," I said, setting it next to me on the bed to open the next box. Another watch was nestled inside, but this one had a baby blue band.

The face was surrounded by diamonds - hopefully fake. The next little box had a watch with a black band and tiny black diamonds circling the face.

I knew there would be sixteen in total.

OceanofPDF.com

SWEET SIXTEEN

"THESE ARE COOL, RIGHT?" he asked, searching my face.

"Very cool," I responded sincerely, putting the black one on my wrist. Salvatore made a noise, obviously perturbed I hadn't put on a pair of socks, so I hurriedly did.

"Sixteen watches, all in different colors." He helped me open the rest. My bed held a rainbow of watches, and I wondered what I'd do with them all.

"I think there might be a theme to the gifts," I said, glancing at each of the guys.

They all agreed with "yes," and "of course."

My smile was so big it hurt my cheeks.

"Told you it was a great idea," Daniel said.

For the next half hour, I opened presents, the delicious-looking food forgotten. It didn't matter. I wouldn't have enjoyed it anyway, and I think they all knew it.

Each brother gave me sixteen of something.

Dorian gave me shirts.

They were new and made for women, but still had old eighties memorabilia on the front with musicians like Def Leppard and TV show characters like the Smurfs. A yellow shirt had a smiley face drawn on it with a hole in its forehead. I put it on over my tank.

Bart gave me earrings in all different shapes and sizes.

My ears weren't pierced, but there was also a gift card to go get them done. I would ask Cindy to go with me later today, so I could wear a pair for the party later that night.

Daniel gave me phone cases, which I thought was terrific, especially since they all had some form of the Snow White character from the books and movies on them.

Heathcliff gave me journals. "So you can write down your thoughts," he said. They were beautiful. Some were leather, others had pretty designs and flowers on them.

Professor Pops presented me with sixteen pairs of Converse in an array of shades from bright orange to teal and lime green to lemon yellow. I loved them so much.

"Thank you," I squealed before clearing my throat. I couldn't help the enthusiasm that spewed out of me. I wasn't a shoe person unless the shoes were Converse. "These are awesome!"

I jumped up on the bed and hugged him.

"So glad you like them," he grinned, his eyes twinkling.

I cleaned up my bed, putting the watches into the box, the socks back in their box, and moving the Converse into a boxed pile on the floor.

Gabe stepped forward. "Open mine," he said, his voice soft.

I'd been nervously avoiding his gaze.

The dream of him floating from the sky and stabbing me through the heart was still firmly situated at the forefront of my mind.

Last night he said he was half a specific type of angel.

Seeing him in my dream with his wings freaked me out.

"Snow?" Gabe shook the present playfully.

I smiled. "Sorry. I'm a little overwhelmed, but happily so." The box he handed me was small, the paper was a bright green secured by a white and green polka dot bow.

I opened it. Inside was a gift card to Warehouse Video with sixteen free movie rentals on it. "I love it," I said, hoping he understood the more profound meaning. I loved him too.

I stood, hugging him. "Thanks, Gabe. I'm sure I'll put these to good use."

He placed his hands on my waist, sending an electric pulse of heat through my belly. I leaned into him, enjoying his smell, like fresh laundry, sandalwood, and a hint of his mouth-watering blood.

Angel or not, enemies or not, I was drawn to him. Opposites attract, I thought, secretly pressing my lips to his neck. Gabe kissed me lightly, and my body warmed. His soft lips melted away all worry.

"We'd better let Snow get cleaned up. Plus, you boys have a lot of work to do before the party tonight," Professor Pops said, clearing his throat.

They all grumbled, obviously not excited about the work ahead.

"Later, Snow," they said as they unhappily left the room.

I stifled a laugh, feeling happier than I had in a very long time. "I can't wait to see you guys in your tuxes," I sang out.

More grumbling ensued.

Climbing out of bed, I followed them into the hallway, watching them from over the banister as the guys went down the stairs. Professor Pops didn't follow, but bent over, picking up a white, extra-large box leaning on its side, a red bow tied around it. "One more present," he said, bringing it over to me. It was as long as my bed.

"What is it?" I asked, too intrigued to be embarrassed by the extravagance.

"You'll see," he smiled, causing the wrinkles near his eyes to become more prominent.

I removed the bow. Across the box, written in bold black, were the words, Vera Wang. My eyes found his. "I already have a dress, remember? My dad and stepmother bought one for me," I whispered.

He tipped his chin toward the box. "Open it."

Carefully I removed the lid. For some reason, my hands shook, my heart beating rapidly. Folding back the tissue, I sucked in my breath.

Layer after deep crimson layer of a transparent, filmy material covered the entire inside of the box. On top of the cloud of red was a strapless bodice.

I gingerly pressed it between my thumb and first finger. It was soft, like silk.

"Try it on. Let's see if it fits."

"Alright," I agreed, mesmerized by its beauty.

"Vera is a friend of mine. When I explained the dress was for your sixteenth birthday party and that the theme was a masquerade ball, she excitedly created this masterpiece."

"It's the most beautiful thing I've ever seen," I said softly, walking into the bathroom and shutting the door.

Quickly I removed my shoes, plaid pajama pants, smiley face tee shirt, black tank top, and the watch Sebastian gave me.

I stepped into the dress and pulled it over my chest. Pinching the sides together, I awkwardly zipped myself in.

The dress felt like liquid against my skin. Opening the door, I stepped out, nervous anxiety skipping in my belly.

BE THERE IN TWENTY

PROFESSOR POPS HELD out his hands. I took them, and he gently twirled me. "You look exquisite, Snow. Like a fiery dream."

I blushed, enjoying the compliment.

Seven heads peeked into my bedroom. They'd come back up the stairs, but I hadn't heard them.

"Holy wow," Heathcliff said.

The others nodded their approval.

I found Gabe. "Gorgeous."

"Get," Professor Pops scolded, shooing them from the room. They reluctantly left, and I heard them tramp down the stairs like a herd of sweet elephants.

I walked over to the full-length mirror, and my heart raced faster. The girl in the mirror looked older, more mature. Like a woman.

"The mask will arrive later this afternoon. I'll have one of the boys bring it over," Professor Pops said, choking up.

I turned to him. "What's wrong?" I asked.

He shook his head, clearing his throat. "I am honored to know you, Snow White." He bowed, and my heart lurched.

Why did he do that? The words from the vampire queen filtered through my mind.

She said he wanted her power.

I wasn't buying it.

Professor Pops didn't act like someone who craved power.

Just the opposite.

I touched his shoulder. "Thank you for everything. I'm so glad to know you, too." Heat rose in my cheeks.

He straightened and walked to the door. "Always a pleasure." He seemed sad, but before I could ask him why, he smiled.

"I'll see you tonight. Happy birthday." Then he left.

I turned back to the mirror.

Dark half-circles, like crescent bruises, made my blue eyes appear haunted. My short hair was a mess.

The dress was beautiful, but I needed work.

I needed the best girl-friend on the planet. I needed Cindy.

Making an easy decision, I called Cindy on the regular house phone because my dad and stepmother decided I wasn't mature enough to have a cell after all.

Sure, I'd lost the dang thing after only a month. But it hadn't been my fault.

I was in a blood-induced haze caused by my belief that I killed Gabe. I shouldn't be held accountable for my actions during that time. The problem was, I couldn't explain any of that to them.

My dad, and especially my stepmother, wouldn't understand that I'd been so far gone, they only existed in a deep recess of my mind - that I only remembered them on the rare occasion when I wasn't wholly drunk on human blood.

"Happy birthday, Snow," Cindy shouted as soon as she picked up the phone.

"Thanks," I answered, plopping on the couch and flipping on the TV. Gatsby climbed next to me and yowled, rubbing his head against my thigh. I needed to feed him. Rising, I went to get his kibble.

"Are you stoked about your party tonight?" she asked.

"Um, yes. I am. It's just - " I hesitated.

"You want me to do your hair and makeup," she finished for me.

I laughed. "Yes, please." I sighed. "It's an emergency."

"Does Abercrombie go with Fitch?"

"I - "

"Never mind. I'll be there in twenty minutes."

"Thanks, Cin." I clicked off the phone and filled Gatsby's water dish. "Well, kitty, I need a shower." I ran to the stairs and was halfway up when the phone rang.

"Bring over your dress," I said, thinking it was Cindy. I'd forgotten to make plans and didn't want her to go back home to get herself ready.

"What? Snow, is that you?" It was my dad.

"Oh, hi, Dad. Sorry, I thought you were Cindy. She's coming over to help me get ready for my party." As I spoke, I climbed the stairs, went into my bathroom, pulled out a clean towel, and then turned on the water to warm up.

"That's nice." He paused and inhaled. "Happy birthday, Snow Angel. Wish I was there," he said in a pretend perky voice. I knew he really did wish he was with me.

A lump formed in my throat because I sure needed him. "Thanks, Dad. I wish you were here too."

He exhaled. "We should be there for Christmas." He clucked his tongue. "You know what? I will be there for Christmas. Promise."

I had a feeling his words defied my stepmother's wishes. If she had anything to say about it, they'd be in Paris or Italy. Anywhere but with me.

"That's awesome. Can't wait." The lump thickened. I wanted to believe he would come, no matter what, that I was important enough for him - but past experience told me it wasn't true.

I heard my stepmother speaking in the background, telling him to hurry up. "Alright, well, have fun at your party. Take care of yourself. Be safe."

"I will. Thanks." The lump in my throat sank like a rock to my stomach.

"Love you, Snow Angel. Talk to you soon."

"Love you - " The phone clicked off. "Too."

I STOOD in front of my full-length mirror, unable to believe the reflection was mine. Snow White. A klutzy tomboy turned vampire with a fondness for boyish hand-me-downs and Converse. I ran my fingers over the fluffy skirt.

Hundreds of different sized ruffles in a soft, see-through material were capped with red satin ribbon. The tight bodice felt like a seamless hug - not too tight, not too loose. The dress hung at just the right length and looked awesome with my red Converse - yeah, not even Cindy could talk me out of my shoe choice.

They were brand new. One of the pairs Professor Pops gave me, not the pair from the vampire queen. I had a feeling he picked out the color to go with my dress. He knew me better than most.

"You look tres gorgeous, Snow," Cindy said.

I laughed internally, guessing she must've decided French wasn't as dull as she thought. I turned back and forth, checking my reflection at different angles. "Thanks, Cindy. You did an amazing job with my makeup and on my hair."

She grinned. "No duh. You're going to be the most beautiful girl at the ball tonight."

PINK LIP GLOSS

I SNORTED. "WHATEVER." But as I studied my reflection, I thought she might be right.

Cindy shook her head and continued to pet Gatsby, who sat on her lap, purring noisily. She still wore her jeans but had a strapless nude bra on top.

The party was in a half-hour, but twenty minutes ago, we agreed to meet at Professor Pops'.

Cindy's hair was in three loose French braids that came together in the back near the nape of her neck. She curled the ends and pinned them into a bun and put little baby blue flowers in between the curls.

Her makeup was a little darker than usual. "Dramatic," was what she called it.

My eye makeup was similar.

On her lips, she wore a light pink gloss.

On my lips was a dark red that matched my dress.

Cindy spent an hour using different sizes of irons to put curls all over my head, then she teased and backcombed until my dark hair was like a curly cloud.

She left my bangs straight and used some kind of goop to make them stay to one side.

I looked like me, only different. Older. More sophisticated.

"You getting dressed soon, or did you decide to wear that?" I asked, turning to face her.

She nudged Gatsby off her lap and stood. "Nah, I'm wearing my dress. It cost me a small fortune. Will you help zip me?"

"Sure." Cindy was the only uber rich girl I knew who wouldn't accept her parents' money. She liked to buy things for herself. It was one of the many little things I admired about her.

She slid off her jeans and walked over to my open bedroom door, where her dress hung. Beneath was a box, and she removed the most gorgeous but dangerous-looking pair of shoes I'd ever seen.

The heels were thin, like glass, but probably six inches tall. Gunmetal beads adorned the band across the foot and the cuff that went around the ankle.

"You're really going to wear those?" I asked, wondering how she'd dance, let alone walk.

"Of course, silly." She slid them on and buckled the cuff. She was nearly as tall as me. "Wow," I said as she unzipped the black garment bag.

"Wow good, right?" Cindy asked, sliding a strapless sequined dress out. "My legs appear slender, and my ass looks toned?"

"Definitely," I said. Who was I to question the girl who lived, breathed, and ate fashion?

She stepped into the dress, and I zipped it up. It was sleek and clung to her every curve. Each sequin was the size of a penny and the exact shade of her shoes. Underneath the sequins was a baby blue material in the same color as the ruffled bottom of her dress. She looked like a mermaid, the most dazzling mermaid I'd ever seen. "You look amazing, Cin."

She went over to the mirror, pulling and tugging on the dress until it was just so. She turned to check out the back. "You think?" she asked, though she knew I knew it was a fact. She would be the best-looking girl at the ball. But at least she wouldn't have to be embarrassed by me.

"Since you're the birthday girl, we ought to get you there before everyone else, right?" she asked, heading to the door.

"I suppose," I said, suddenly nervous.

I sat on my bed as though a heavy weight pushed me down. My shoulders turned in. I hadn't had blood since yesterday.

Professor Pops gave me more bloodlust tea, and I'd had some that morning before Cindy came over. But since I was no longer a revenant, it probably wasn't going to do any good.

Even Cindy's blood, which wasn't all that fragrant, caused my fangs to quiver with need. If she offered, I'd take it, but I really wanted Gabe's or Christopher's. or even Dorian's.

That I thought of him surprised me, but it was true.

He kept offering, and I was ready to give it a try. I had a feeling it would be amazing.

"What's wrong? You shouldn't sit. You'll ruin the lay of your dress." Cindy held out her hand, and I took it.

"Fine." I stood and reorganized my ruffles. Swallowing, I searched Cindy's face, listened to the gentle rhythm of her heartbeat, and smelled her skin's lilac scent. Nothing about her spoke of fear or worry. I knew she was a witch. She'd used a spell to freshen my nails, so they were blood red, and panted hers blue. Could I tell her my secret? Would she understand? "Cindy," I cleared my throat.

"What is it?" she asked, smiling brightly.

"I - why didn't you use a locator spell to find me?" I asked, surprised that's what came out of my mouth. I hadn't meant to go there with her tonight.

She grabbed my hand and squeezed. "At first I wanted to, but then when Professor Pops told me you were okay, I figured I wouldn't bother. After a week, though, I was really starting to worry, so I tried."

"Oh?"

"For some reason, the spell didn't work." Her impeccably plucked eyebrows scrunched together in concentration. "I have no idea why."

I nodded. "That's okay, Cin." I wasn't ready to tell her and moved to the door.

Cindy followed. "Not really. I was distraught. Several times I sensed your presence, but for some reason, your location was concealed. I even asked my grandmother about it, whether or not I did something wrong." She frowned.

"And?" I encouraged.

She shook her head, her face filled with a strange expression. Her heart rate increased. Nerves, I thought.

"My grandmother said she didn't understand it either. That there was only one reason, it wouldn't work."

I giggled unexpectedly. What would she say? What was the reason? I didn't think I wanted to hear the answer. At the top of the stairs, I rested my hand on the banister and lifted my dress, more grateful than ever that I was no longer so klutzy.

"It's peculiar."

I bit the inside of my cheek. Could I tell her? Just blurt out the truth? Say, "Cindy, I'm a vampire. But don't worry, I won't kill you or suck your blood or anything. I've got it under control." I started down the stairs, and Cindy followed.

MR. UNICORN

"My grandmother said the locator spell works based on whatever you're looking for. A human is one way. If it's an animal, I have to change up the spell a little. For a plant, I do the spell even more differently."

"Cool," I laughed, a wave of panic washing through my stomach.

"Well, I tried the human spell three different times. Just to be safe, I did the spell for an animal and for a plant as well. None of them worked."

I reached the bottom of the stairs and faced her. "Maybe you still did something wrong. You know you struggle with that science-y stuff in biology."

"That wasn't it. I did everything right. My grandmother said - " she stopped.

I opened the front door, but a fragrant wind blew it from my grip, and the door slammed shut. "What?" I asked, knowing Cindy had used magic. I was going to have to tell her.

"My grandmother said the only reason the spell didn't work was that you aren't human, but something born of magic."

I wasn't surprised. The vampire queen said my DNA was changed. "Oh."

Cindy went on. "She gave me a quick lesson on all the different magical creatures in the world, even explained that my favorite stuffed animal - Mr. Unicorn - remember him?" She stopped, waiting for me to answer.

"Uh-huh," I prodded. Nerves danced along my veins. I didn't know why I was so worried about telling her. She possessed magic. She was a witch. Surely, she would accept my being a vampire.

"Well, yeah, so Mr. Unicorn is based on a real creature my grandmother knew a long time ago. At first, I was freaked out but figured hey, if I could have a spellbook with a dragon's eye on the cover, surely I could handle the knowledge that fairies and unicorns are real." Her breathing came more rapidly now. I sensed she was about to figure out what I was for herself.

"Go on," I whispered, clutching my hands together, waiting. "What am I then?"

"Well, you're too big to be a fairy, and you're certainly not a gremlin or an elf, so I don't know." Cindy placed her hands on her hips and waited. "Tell me, Snow. Please. I can handle it."

"No, I'm not a fairy. Closer to a gremlin, I guess." I choked up for no reason at all. With the brothers, they knew. Professor Pops had prepared them. Christopher was the one who bit me, so I hadn't had to tell him. I hadn't had to come out and tell anyone yet, to say the words "I am a vampire." I tried it in my mind, and they got stuck.

Refusing to go from my brain and out of my mouth.

I guess the most significant part of me worried she wouldn't like me anymore once she found out the truth. Gabe said vampires were evil. What had Cindy's grandmother said about my kind?

She moved, so we were practically nose to nose. It was weird having her so tall. One of her fingers touched my cheek, and she said some words in a language I didn't understand.

I gulped. My skin tingled, and I knew she cast a spell. I decided that if she freaked, I would just compel her not to be afraid.

"Tell me, Snow."

I nodded, taking a deep breath. "Cindy, it's um. You see. Well, the truth is, I'm a - "

She sucked in her breath and stepped back. "You're a vampire. The spell worked. I can see you for what you truly are." Her eyes grew round like two giant blue saucers.

"Yep, that's me." I looked away, scanning anywhere and everywhere that wasn't her.

She sat on the couch, and I knew she must be stunned because sitting would wrinkle her dress, and that was not something Cindy would do.

"What about your dress? You'll wrinkle it," I said quietly, copying what she said to me upstairs.

She waved away my worry. "My grandmother mentioned vampires." Cindy paused and seemed to be mulling over the word, working out what she now knew to be the truth.

I grabbed her hand. "Still warm, see? I'm still me." I resisted the urge to cry, to pity myself or feel bad. I couldn't change what had happened, couldn't go back and get unbitten or undrink Christopher's blood, or Gabe's, or any of the other humans'.

Her eyes squinted in bewilderment, and she placed a hand on my chest. "Your heart still beats."

Cindy shook her head, surprise shining in her features. "My grandmother said vampires were creatures without a heart - that their internal makeup was completely different from other living creatures. How is this possible?"

"I'm not sure." And that was the truth, though Pops had a heartbeat and so did Christopher, so I was guessing her grandmother might have received misinformation.

Or, maybe it was something else altogether. Like I could hear the echo of their human hearts before they became vampires?

Perhaps the vampire queen's magic did something to me, the way it did for Christopher. Maybe it was because I was odd, to begin with. Kenmei had said the magic within the Seal of Gabriel was created for me.

I shook those thoughts from my mind.

I didn't fully believe the magic in the necklace or how magic and vampires worked. I still needed to find the damn necklace.

Christopher's life depended on it.

At the thought of him, I decided to be forward and ask.

"You haven't seen a necklace with a silver chain and a red gem in the shape of a teardrop attached to it, have you?"

She shook her head. "Not in person, but I saw something about a necklace, in my spellbook. It was called the Seal of Gabriel. Is that the one you're talking about?"

As she spoke, her voice raised an octave. She obviously knew that it contained magical properties.

Witches could probably use the necklace to increase their power.

"Yes, that's the one." I nodded, and a combined feeling of hope and dread throbbed against my temple.

She went over to the door, grabbed the bag she'd chucked next to it, and pulled out her spellbook. The eye on the cover blinked, watching. I held back a shudder.

Scooting closer, I waited while she flipped through the pages until she arrived at a picture of the necklace.

"It says - "

A horn blared from the driveway.

"Are you expecting someone?" Cindy asked.

WHERE'S YOUR MASK

I SHOOK my head but remembered Professor Pops mentioned someone would bring over my mask when it was ready. "It could be my mask."

She closed her book, and I went to the door, Cindy following beside me. "Do you want some of my blood?"

I laughed, opening the door. "Are you offering?"

"Noooooooo," she said, but laughed as well. "You aren't some bloodthirsty fiend." She said it as a statement, and I figured it was mostly to convince herself.

"I'm just me. Snow White, the girl you've known since forever."

"That's a relief." And it was.

I heard it in her voice and by the beating of her heart. She peeked over my shoulder.

Dorian was outside, near the passenger door of an extensive black limousine.

He bounced up and down, and I guessed he was cold.

The limo seemed like overkill. Professor Pops' mansion wasn't that far away.

"Shall we?" I held out my arm to Cindy.

"You go. I need to put away my book." I watched her walk carefully over to her bag.

Lifting my dress, I went out onto the porch, leaving the door open.

Cindy appeared, grabbing hold of the knob. "Wait, my mask." She said something I guessed had to do with magic, and her mask sailed down the steps, landing gently in her outstretched hand.

She was proud of herself, and I couldn't blame her.

Her magic was getting better, fast.

She closed the door, and I started down the steps.

"Hurry up, you two, I'm freezing my butt off out here," Dorian shouted.

"Keep your teeth in," I griped, making sure my hem didn't touch the ground. Cindy made it down the steps and was beside me. "Your magic is awesome."

"Duh." She laughed. "Thank you for saying it, though. I've been practicing."

The November night was chilly.

I breathed in, enjoying the crisp scent of the pine needles and how the cold air clung to everything in the shape of tiny snowflakes.

It occurred to me that I felt happy, momentarily satisfied. The feeling radiated with a glow I could almost taste.

In that instant, everything hung right with the world.

Gabe loved me.

Cindy knew what I was and hadn't run away.

The brothers and Professor Pops cared for me without judgment.

There was still my dad and stepmother as well as Sharra and Christopher, but I would allow myself this moment of joy.

One night.

Tomorrow I could focus on finding the Seal of Gabriel and dealing with Sharra.

Dorian opened the door, waving me inside. "In you go." He took my hand, assisting me in.

At his touch, I felt a jolt of warmth. It almost felt like magic, and I checked his face to see if he felt it too. He smiled an enormous smile. I returned it, thinking he looked totally hot in his tux.

Once I was inside, I sat and waited for Cindy.

She moved at a slower rate.

The sidewalk was in pressing need of repair, and Cindy in her six-inch heels nearly toppled over a few times before Dorian jogged over and came to her rescue.

"What the hell are you wearing? Stilts?" he asked in mock disdain.

"Very funny," she replied but clung to his arm.

The two of them looked good together, him in his black tuxedo with a burgundy and black striped tie, a white shirt, and a burgundy vest, and her in her blue mermaid dress.

Cindy climbed in, and Dorian closed the door for us.

A man sat in the driver's seat.

Dorian climbed in on the other side of him. "To the ball, Giorgio," Dorian said, pointing toward the mansion.

"You got it." His voice was laced with sarcasm, and I thought he felt the same way I did about the limo being too much.

He checked the rearview mirror and held my gaze. Something about his eyes seemed familiar.

I couldn't think why though.

In the next second, he looked away, shifting the limousine into drive.

Cindy leaned close. "Tomorrow, you and I will have a big, long chat, and you're going to tell me everything about Chace and Gabe. Deal?"

"Can't wait," I said, and meant it. Now that she knew, I wanted to tell her everything.

Dorian turned his head to look over his shoulder. "What are we agreeing to?"

Cindy and I glanced at each other and laughed, but I wasn't going to tell him. Girl talk was just that. Cindy raised her chin as she slid back in the plush leather seat. "None of your business, Dorian."

AS WE PULLED out of the driveway, I noticed a brown rectangle box on the seat next to Cindy.

"What's that?" I asked.

She shrugged.

"That's your mask, Snow. Check it out," Dorian said from the front seat. I scowled, thinking he should've sat in back with us.

"It seems small," Cindy remarked, handing me the box.

I placed it in my lap. It did seem minute compared to Cindy's mask, which had three large feather plumes in baby blue and gray protruding from the right side.

Her mask was baby blue except around the eyes, which had small sequins the same color as the sequins on her dress, lining the openings.

Timidly I removed the lid on the box and shifted the white paper inside. The mask nestled within the tissue was simple: red satin, the exact color of my dress, covered in black lace. I immediately loved it.

"That's it?" Cindy started.

I'd told her Professor Pops was having the mask made specifically for the ball. She obviously thought it lacked any flair. It wasn't pretentious or over the top. It was perfect.

"I like it. The mask won't take away from Snow's beauty," Dorian said.

My cheeks got hot. "Thanks, Dorian. Where's your mask?"

Cindy sniffed, glancing at hers.

He rolled his eyes. "It's at the house. We all decided on the same style and color. Black. Except Bart's. His is gray. He always has to be different."

We pulled into the circular driveway, and Giorgio put the limousine in park. Dorian jumped out, ran around to our door, and held it open. His face shone with anticipation.

"What is it?" I asked.

BIRTHDAY PARTY

"YOU'LL SEE." He leaned in so that I got a good whiff of his neck. I had the feeling he did it on purpose. "Love your shoes," he said, and I shivered. Like Eve with the apple, Dorian was tempting me.

Just a taste, my mind cooed. But I resisted. Now wasn't the time.

As I waited for him to help Cindy out, I stared up at the mansion. Lit with thousands of white, shimmering lights, it seemed to possess its own glow. "It's beautiful," I breathed, feeling like I'd stepped into a fairytale land.

"You ain't seen nothing yet," Dorian said. "C'mon." He stood between Cindy and me and held out his elbows. I took his arm in one hand and my dress in the other.

We climbed the steps. The front door opened without any of us knocking, as though they were waiting for us. We went inside.

The brothers and Professor Pops stood off to the right.

Several of them were fidgeting with their tuxes, but they all wore their masks.

One of the brothers, Sebastian, handed Dorian his.

He slid it on, moving next to Heathcliff.

They all looked dashing. Cindy thought so too. I could tell by the tittering noises coming from her throat.

Their tuxes were all black, except Bart's. His tux was a dark gray, the same as his mask. There were other, subtler differences in the cut and shape of their tuxes, but the significant variance was the colors of their ties and vests.

Bart's vest and bow tie were golden brown.

Salvatore wore black with black, his sleek black hair in a low ponytail.

Sebastian's vest and tie were navy blue.

Daniel's satin vest and tie were white with white.

Heathcliff's were gray.

Professor Pops didn't have on a vest but a black cummerbund with a black bow tie.

My heart fell a bit when I saw Gabe wasn't among them.

Heathcliff pointed at the railing along the grand staircase. Suspended by a shiny silver rope hung a gigantic banner. Happy Sweet 16, Snow!

"That's amazing," I breathed, admiring it.

"Happy birthday!" all the guys shouted.

It felt like my face would break at how big I smiled.

Cindy's eyes were wide. "Merde," she cursed.

I laughed, squeezing her hand.

As one, the brothers gushed at how pretty we looked. I nodded, said, "thank you," and hugged everyone, but I worried about Gabe.

"Where's Gabe?" I asked Salvatore as we embraced.

He stepped back, eyeing Professor Pops.

Professor Pops cleared his throat. "He's with his father."

The remaining brothers issued comments about the lack of truth to the statement, but I just nodded. "Is he coming?"

"His father?" Cindy asked.

"Yes, he'll be here," Professor Pops responded, patting my back. "You look so incredibly beautiful."

"Thank you," I said, trying to ignore the shadow that crossed Pops' features. What wasn't he telling me?

"You've got to see the ballroom," Heathcliff said.

"You're gonna love it," Daniel added.

I let them lead the way, hoping Gabe would come soon.

Cindy moved, so we were next to each other, and we exchanged a look. Hers was confused.

Mine? I agreed to tell her all about it tomorrow.

From the front door, we went left instead of right to the kitchen, from which delicious smells emanated.

Cindy's heels clicked against the floor as we passed the library and the entrance to the indoor pool. The guys pushed, joked, and shoved in front of us, but something definitely weighed on Pops' mind.

When we arrived at the twelve-foot tall double doors, the guys paused and turned, facing Cindy and me. Her heart fluttered fast like a hummingbird's wings, and I knew she was excited. I was too.

"Put your mask on, Snow," Sebastian said, coming over to help.

I placed it over my eyes.

Sebastian tried to help Cindy with hers, but she slapped his hand away.

"I'll do it. I don't want you ruining her hair." She carefully slid the stretchy silk-wrapped band over my hair and placed it against my head.

Moving to look at me, she sighed and clapped her hands. "Pops was right. You look amazing."

I grinned, the edges of the mask touching my cheeks. "I'm glad. You look pretty damn hot yourself."

"You're so sweet. Thanks for being my best friend all of these years. I could've have survived without you." Cindy adjusted the bodice of her gown and straightened up.

"You ready, birthday girl?" Heathcliff asked.

"Most definitely." My heart pulsed in time with Cindy's.

I'd been in the ballroom several times over the years, mostly when I was younger. I knew the outer and side walls were made entirely of windows.

Above, from the center of the ceiling, dangled an enormous chandelier. In large, checkered squares, blocks of the ceiling were carved out, and inside hung fans.

The wall toward the front of the house held mirrors, making the space look twice as large. As kids, the boys and I would sneak into the enormous room to roller-skate, ride our scooters, or skateboard.

Professor Pops would inevitably find us, give us a stern talking to, and then send us on our way.

Daniel pushed open the double doors. He was so theatrical, and I covered a smile with my hand. The guys parted, allowing Cindy and me access to the entrance.

When I stepped through, I felt transported to another time. I noticed the lighting first and looked up. The chandelier emitted a soft red glow.

Dozens of thick white panels of cloth extended from the top of the light and draped outward to the point where the ceiling met the walls, giving the appearance of an enormous tent.

Square tables, each seating eight, were covered in white linen and set with large centerpieces filled with a spray of red flowers in different varieties and shades.

Along the back wall stood probably thirty waiters dressed identically in white old-fashioned tux tails with bright red cummerbunds and bow ties.

Their hands clasped behind their backs. They were lined up with the tallest on the outside and the shortest in the middle.

"Wow," I breathed, taking it all in.

Current Top-Forty music played softly from speakers discreetly attached to the walls. A DJ set up his equipment next to a decorated table with a sign above it that said: Presents HERE. Scented vanilla candles emitted a pleasant fragrance.

"It's beyond beautiful," I said, turning to Professor Pops. "You all really outdid yourselves. Thank you!"

"It was our pleasure." Professor Pops gave me a gentle squeeze.

The doorbell rang.

"I'll get it." Salvatore and Sebastian casually ran to the front door.

Moments later, excited chatting could be heard coming down the hall.

"This is gonna be fun," Cindy said.

I swallowed, for some reason, nervous about the party. I wasn't sure if it was panic that no one would show, the horror that everyone would come, anxiety over Pops' weirdness, the fact that Gabe was with his dad, or the odd gleam in Cindy's eyes.

Tonight would be one to remember. I had no doubts about that.

FIVE LAYERS OF RED

WHEN ALL THE GUESTS ARRIVED, Professor Pops welcomed everyone and asked that we all take our seats.

The waiters sprang to life, and dinner was served: chicken cordon bleu with steamed baby potatoes and asparagus spears topped with a creamy hollandaise sauce. Everyone commented on how amazing it tasted.

Several times, as I popped a tiny bite of potato or asparagus - yeah, I still didn't eat the meat - into my mouth and forced it down, I longed for the food in Sharra: the food explicitly made for vampires, the food that tasted like blood with a hint of whatever fruit or vegetable or meat it was.

Dessert would be my cake, later tonight. It sat on a decorated table beside all of my presents.

The cake stood tall. Five layers of red velvet covered in red fondant. The black frosting was piped over the top in intricate swirling designs.

White flowers, which looked a lot like snowflakes, were placed methodically in groups of three and five.

On the top layer stood a girl in a red dress holding a cake with sixteen glowing LED candles.

She looked a lot like me.

Even her fondant-ruffled dress looked the same as mine. Around the edge, standing like guards protecting the girl, were sixteen real candles.

When dinner ended, the tables and chairs were cleared and disassembled in record time. Some were pushed to the side so people could sit and visit.

The music was turned up and people danced. Everyone looked amazing and seemed to be having a good time.

I hadn't danced, and I really didn't want to. Even with my new abilities, I probably still had two left dancing feet.

Plus, Gabe still hadn't arrived.

What was he doing? Searching for Pops, I found him talking with Kenmei and a man I didn't know in a corner.

Heathcliff came over, sitting beside me. "How's your bloodlust? Feeling in control?"

I smiled. "Yes, I'm fine." The pulsing blood in the room was mesmerizing, each scent unique. All of them combined to form a decadent bouquet. More than once already, I'd held my breath, forcing my sharp fangs back into place.

Cindy danced closely with one of the senior football players from school, a guy named Chad. Before tonight, Chad and I hadn't said two words to each other.

That was the case with most of the people here.

Sure, I'd seen their faces repeatedly over the years, but I didn't really know any of them. I was surprised so many bothered to come. No one would miss this, my inner voice huffed.

Daniel, Sebastian, Dorian, Salvatore, and Bart danced near each other, each with a beautiful girl in his arms. A pang of sadness split my heart.

Gabe, where are you? At the thought, thousands of pinpricks trickled up my spine like an electric current.

My gaze shifted from the dance floor to where Kenmei and Professor Pops talked to the unfamiliar man. As one, they turned toward the door. Pops and Kenmei appeared angry, and the other man sneered arrogantly.

Heathcliff stiffened at my side. "This is not good."

"What? What's wrong?" I asked, holding my breath in anticipation of whatever was going to happen. Gabe walked in, looking incredibly handsome in a black tux, bowtie, and cummerbund. The buttons on his white shirt were black as well. His jaw clenched as he searched the room.

Was he looking for me? I hoped, but a part of me was afraid. He didn't look pleased.

"Snow, I need you to come with me." Heathcliff grabbed my hand and pulled me behind a group of people, toward the other side of the room.

"Why?" I asked. I wanted to find out what was wrong. The tension in the room crackled. Had Gabe brought that with him? It was then I noticed the men and women filtering in behind him. They all wore black but weren't dressed for the party. They were dressed to hunt.

And I knew they'd come for me.

Heathcliff kept going, but I wouldn't leave. If they were after a fight, I'd give them one. I yanked my hand from his. He glanced at me, surprised. "Please come with me. I know a place where you'll be safe."

I shook my head. "I'm staying. I need to find out what's going on."

Heathcliff took hold of my shoulders. "Listen to me. Those men out there are chayot. They are here to do what Gabe couldn't. They intend to kill you. We've got to get you out of here. I have a friend standing by who can take you to Wonderland, Arizona. You'll be safe there."

I heard the undercurrent of fear in Heathcliff's voice.

It meant a lot that he was worried but, just as he'd forgotten I was stronger than him a moment ago, he also didn't realize that I wouldn't be running from these creatures and into the hands of a stranger and a place called Wonderland.

Not in a million years.

"What are you waiting for?" Dorian hissed, coming up behind Heathcliff.

"She won't go, and she's stronger than I am," Heathcliff hissed.

"If you don't - " Dorian began, glaring at me.

"Snow White, show your face. Accept your fate and come with us." A tall, very stunning man stepped in front of Gabe as he spoke.

The music stopped, scratched into silence.

Those who were still dancing paused to see what was going on, whispering and pointing. The chayot fanned out, systematically searching for me.

"Understand now? You need to leave," Dorian said, crouching. He pulled me down with him.

"Is this part of the party?" I heard someone ask.

"Probably," someone else answered.

"Cool."

"I'm going to count to five. If you haven't come forward, one of these human children will die." The man's voice was low but carried like he spoke into a microphone.

The other chayot continued to search, moving silently.

I frantically searched the room for Cindy. Where was she? I'd lost her in the shuffle when the chayot showed.

"One."

Gabe glanced at the man, and I instantly understood he was Gabe's father.

"Two."

"Get her out of here," Dorian said. "I'll try to hold them off or distract them."

"I will not leave," I whispered fiercely. "If I do, they'll kill someone. I refuse to be part of any more suffering." Plus, I had to find Cindy.

Dorian shook his head. "Stubborn," he growled. "They're bluffing. Gabe said the chayot are like divine creatures. Intentionally hurting an innocent would be against their laws."

"Three."

I glanced around at Gabe's father. "He doesn't look like he cares about any laws." Anger trickled along my spine and bloomed in my chest.

Gabe whispered something in his father's ear. A flick of his wrist and two chayot men came up behind Gabe and held him fast.

Gabe fought against them.

I saw the ugly fury in their expressions, and my heart stopped at the sight of him fighting against his own people. They had better not hurt him, or there would be hell to pay.

"Four!"

"I've got to show myself. I don't have a choice." Leaving the brothers, I pushed through the crowd. Before I reached him, Sharra appeared.

"You always were dramatic, Oberon."

I slid to a stop at her appearance. The crowd gasped around me as someone whispered the word magic. Others were looking around, searching for a way to escape.

The vampire queen had a dozen vampires with her.

"Oh crap," Sebastian said, sliding next to me. All the brothers except Gabe circled me as if they could protect me better than I could defend myself.

Suddenly Professor Pops and Kenmei were there. "Boys. Snow. I want you to gather the kids. Keep them calm. Lie. Tell them this is part of the festivities, then lead them through the secret door."

His intense eyes found mine. "Use your powers of persuasion. Convince them. Can you do that?"

I nodded. I'd have to hold the gaze of every person. "What are you going to do?"

"Stall and then end this. Now go. Hurry."

DESTINY

THE GUYS CIRCULATED, rounding up the students into six groups. I stopped at each one, using my newfound vampire gift to convince the students this interruption was a surprise portion of the party.

I just hoped the chayot and the vampire queen allowed the students to leave.

"Sharra. Oberon. This isn't the place for a dispute. It is a room full of human children. Let them leave. They are innocent." Professor Pops' voice rang through the room, loud and strong.

"I've given you an ultimatum, Adam." Oberon waved his hands at the students. From behind him and along the borders of the room, the chayot pulled swords. "Either Snow White steps forward and accepts her destiny, or the accidental death of a human will be on your conscience."

Destiny. The word Kenmei used to describe what I needed to do with the Seal of Gabriel. The same word the vampire queen used when she spoke about what I was to become.

I was sick of hearing it. My life was my own, regardless of what Kenmei, the vampire queen, or Gabe's father thought.

I wasn't a puppet on a string. My story hadn't been written.

Chayot men and women continued to roam along the edges of the ballroom, spreading out. They kept their distance from the vampires. I did a quick mental run-through on how to kill workers and drone vampires.

To slay a female required a stake through, or shredding of, the heart.

Males had to lose their heads.

My body inadvertently shuddered.

I didn't know if I could kill them. And I had no idea how a chayot could be destroyed.

Dorian grabbed my hand. "C'mon," he mouthed.

I nodded, unsure what else to do. We needed to get every non-supernatural creature out of the ballroom. That was the most important.

"Have you seen Cindy?" I asked Dorian, still searching for her. She hadn't been with any of the six groups the brothers rounded up.

He shook his head. "I'm sure she's fine. That girl can take care of herself."

And I can't, I thought, momentarily irritated. Did Kenmei, Professor Pops and the brothers believe I was too weak, or too much of a coward to face the chayot, the vampire queen, and her followers?

"Do you see her?" Oberon called out.

"Not yet."

"No."

"Negative."

Oberon shook his head in exasperation, as though he felt sorry for what was about to happen. "Five," he said softly.

One of the chayot grabbed Daniel by the arm.

Daniel fought back, using moves that looked like they belonged in an action film, but another chayot jumped in, pressing a short sword against Daniel's neck.

Oberon nodded, and the chayot took the sword from Daniel's neck and shoved the steel into his stomach. A gurgling noise escaped his lips as the chayot withdrew the blade, letting his body fall to the floor.

"No. No. No. Stop. Stop it!" I screamed, kneeling next to him, ignoring my sudden and profound hunger for blood.

My fangs grew, cutting the outer edges of my lips. I snarled at the male chayot who'd done Oberon's bidding.

He winced, stepping back, but quickly recovered, turning his bloody sword in my direction.

"Leave now. Harm no one," I commanded, hoping my compulsion worked on him. The chayot obeyed and took off toward the exit.

When he reached the large double doors, several chayot grabbed him and did something to release him from my hold.

I growled as an overwhelming frustration suffocated my insides, amplifying my desire for blood.

"Snow." It was Gabe's voice, soft like a summer wind. I would know it anywhere. Slowly, I turned until I found him. He was near the doors, but still being restrained by two chayot guards.

The look Gabe gave me, one of love and devotion - it was all I needed to center my thoughts.

I focused and recalled what he once said while we trained. "During battle, anger is good, necessary in fact, but it must be controlled." I inhaled deeply.

My fangs retracted, and I rose, my eyes zeroing in the Oberon's.

I could persuade him to do what I wanted.

Why hadn't I thought of that before?

Moving slowly, deliberately, I stepped over the Daniel and spoke directly to Oberon. "You will let every human leave. You will let the Daniel be treated and taken to the hospital, and you will get the hell out of Adam's house." I pointed toward the doors as I spoke.

He stared blankly, and I thought it worked until he laughed - a hearty, vile, irritating laugh.

"Did you hear that? She's trying to command me. Me!" he roared. The rest of his group laughed with him, though they seemed frightened too.

My face grew hot. Why hadn't it worked?

The vampire queen spoke respectfully, her voice gentle. "Do not do this, Oberon. This isn't a battle you'll win."

I'd momentarily forgotten about the vampire queen and her followers. They'd been so quiet. They hadn't harmed a human, and the queen wasn't threatening to kill anyone. I tucked that knowledge into the back of my mind.

Professor Pops came forward. "She's just a girl, Oberon. You saw she was near blood and didn't feed. She's no more an animal than I am. Rethink this madness, my friend."

I fought back the tears. Professor Pops truly was my protector, more of a father even than my own.

Oberon directed his men with his eyes, and suddenly Professor Pops was being held back by several chayot.

I wondered where Kenmei was.

The chayot, Professor Pops, and Kenmei were supposed to be on the same side.

Obviously, Pops chose me over the chayot, and Oberon wasn't happy.

A burst of love for Pops fueled the anger burning in my heart.

Oberon would pay if he harmed him.

Gabe's father moved into my personal space, towering over me. "Have you come to your senses? Are you willing to accept your fate? Or are you too much of a monster to care if others are killed because of your cowardice?" One of the chayot holding Pops put a blade to his neck. A droplet of blood trickled from the newly opened wound.

For some reason seeing Professor Pops' blood brought questions to the forefront of my mind. Like, did he still drink blood? He was technically still a vampire. At one point, he'd been the vampire queen's hunter, the same as Christopher. Did he still possess the powers of persuasion? And what about Kenmei?

"Snow. Merryweather. White. Snap out of it!" Cindy's voice sounded in my ear, as though she stood beside me. But she wasn't there.

Or was she? Did she know how to make herself invisible?

Was that why I hadn't been able to find her once the chayot and vampires showed up? I'd have to ask her about it sometime when Professor Pops wasn't in dire trouble.

I knew if he was beheaded, he would die. I couldn't allow that to happen.

I stepped forward, lifting my chin to meet Oberon's glare. "You will not hurt him or anyone else."

He laughed again, turning his gaze from left to right, encouraging his followers to join in. From the V in his black button-up shirt, I saw the gleam of something red. It glittered in the subdued lights.

FLAMING SWORD

INSTANTLY, I knew what it was.

The Seal of Gabriel on the end of the silver chain swayed gently near his throat.

If Oberon had it, then that meant Gabe had stolen it.

My barely contained fury exploded.

How dare he?

How dare Gabe?

All this time Gabe had lied to me. Used me. He didn't love me any more than a bear loves a fish.

Something in my features must've changed because Oberon stumbled back.

Clasping his hands together, a flaming sword appeared. "Don't come any closer."

Caught off guard, I put a hand in front of my face to shield myself from the heat.

Flames licked the air, bringing with them a unique scent - like burning metal and flowers.

"It's time to end you," the chayot leader sneered.

Professor Pops still fought against the chayot, hollering for Oberon to stop.

The clang of metal against metal - sword against sword - rocked the ballroom. The vampire queen and her followers had joined the action.

Shouting.

Sounds of death.

Cries of pain.

The destruction needed to stop.

Oberon lunged at me, his fiery sword raised above his head, a look of hatred twisting his face. I could swear I saw large white wings extending from his shoulder blades, the way they had from Gabe's in my dream.

With my newfound speed, I stepped inside Oberon's space, so I was under the sword.

With one hand, I ripped the Seal of Gabriel from his neck and spun away, ending up to the left of him.

Oberon brought down the sword, the fire scorching some of the ruffles on my dress.

The singed material released a horrible smell, like burning plastic. I grasped the red teardrop in my hand and whipped around so that we were face to face.

"Where did you get this?" I asked, my heart pounding not in fear, but excitement. I held the Seal of Gabriel in my hand. I could save Christopher and end Sharra's tyrannical rule.

It wouldn't exactly be that easy, but at that moment, I felt like it should be.

Oberon pinched his lips together and gave me a sardonic smile. "I think you already know the answer."

"No, I don't." My lips trembled as the words spilled out. "Tell the truth."

"Let me make it clear, vampire." Spittle spewed from his mouth, striking me in the cheek as he spoke. I wiped at it with the back of my hand.

"The magic in that pendant only exists because of Gabriel."

I knew that. I'd heard the stories. "I know."

We circled each other. The sounds of fighting around us became nothing but background noise. It was as though Oberon and I were in a bubble.

"Gabriel is my son," he continued.

I knew he was trying to mess with my head.

That the Gabriel who'd been a hunter and had killed Silindra and created the Seal of Gabriel was one of Oberon's sons was news to me.

But if he thought he could convince me that my Gabe was the same as Gabriel, he was mistaken. I'd tasted Gabe, and I knew he most definitely wasn't a hunter or any kind of vampire.

"You're lying." I shrugged.

There was much more I should've said, but he lunged at me again with his fiery sword. I moved at the last second. He missed me by millimeters.

The heat burned my skin, and I flinched at the stark pain. It evaporated seconds later.

He tried another tactic. "You will lose. The vampire breed is dying. You're nothing but an afterthought, and I am the first chayot, bringer of justice, supplier of righteousness, and harbinger of divinity."

As he spoke, he pushed back his shoulders, an arrogant leer distorting his features.

"You may be the first, but that doesn't make you better or even good. Otherwise, you wouldn't be set on destroying me." I dodged his sword again. "I think you're an old demon that craves power and nothing more."

He howled and swung the sword.

I spun out of the way, but this time he was prepared and grabbed me by the neck, squeezing my windpipe.

Oberon pulled me close. "You're a gnat, made to be crushed." He squeezed harder, and my feet left the floor.

With one hand, I tried to pry his steel fingers from my neck. From the corner of my eye, I saw his burning sword coming closer.

I still held the Seal of Gabriel in on hand. It began to glow bright red.

When it became so bright I was about to close my eyes, the light show shot into Oberon.

The chayot's grasp on me relaxed as he flew back, knocking over several other chayot and vampires in the heat of battle.

His sword vanished as he sprawled on the floor.

Oberon was mine.

Cold wrath blackened my veins.

I once read that war was the world's way of cleansing itself.

At the time, I thought the statement seemed brutal, without compassion. I was beginning to realize that was the point.

With purpose, I stalked the first chayot.

He tried to stand, but the force of the blow from the pendant had him panting and clutching his chest. He was wounded.

Kneeling next to Oberon, I pressed the Seal into his chest. He gasped, his body shaking. Like old paper, his skin began to flake and fall away. "You will never again place your filthy chayot hands on me or someone I love."

He gritted his teeth, his eyes wide in fear. "You're nothing," he gritted out.

"Don't! Stop, Snow. Please don't," Gabe called.

I paused, lifting the pendant, catching and holding Gabe's sad stare. If I killed Oberon, it would change how Gabe treated me, the way he saw me, and I couldn't do that, even if Gabe was a thieving traitor.

No matter how much I wanted to destroy Oberon, I wouldn't, because Gabe didn't want me to.

I stood, moving away from the chayot leader before I changed my mind.

In the same instant, the fighting stopped.

OF TWO MINDS

VAMPIRE AND CHAYOT parted to let me pass as I made my way to Gabe. All was silent. I focused on Gabe's heartbeat, concentrated on the distinct thump-thump, thump-thump, thump-thump coming from his chest.

"Gabe." I seemed to float toward him, my feet hardly touching the ground.

The chayot that held Gabe released him. He held out his arms, a slight smile lighting his gloomy face.

I moved faster, allowing myself a moment of hope that Gabe and I could be together.

His smile disappeared. "No!" he shouted.

I sensed Oberon behind me, felt the heat of his sword. In a blinding flash, I faced him, his blade slicing my shoulder. Immense pain ripped through my body.

As I fell to the ground, a glorious red light shot from the Seal of Gabriel and into Oberon.

Someone screamed - Cindy, maybe?

I couldn't be sure, and the pain from where the fiery blade had cut into me seared so intensely I couldn't concentrate.

I closed my eyes, hoping my body would heal the wound quickly, but the pain only intensified.

Voices filled my head, like chirping doves.

I tried to understand what they were saying, but I was in agony.

The noise seemed to pulse into every crevice, pounding out everything else.

At one point, it felt like the Seal crawled inside of my hand, taking up residence there, as though we'd become one.

A tiny portion of the throbbing dissipated enough that I caught pieces of conversations.

- "He's dead." -

- "What will we do now?" -

- "You must lead us." -

A loud laugh that could only be the vampire queen.

- "I knew she could do it." -

- "Give me the necklace, Snow. Let go. It's over. You're safe." -

I worked to open my hand, but when I heard several gasps, I knew the Seal would never part from me again.

Its magic seemed to be twisting inside of me, filling me, changing me in ways I couldn't understand.

It stitched me up into something more, something scary and powerful.

After what seemed like days, the pain dissipated.

I opened my eyes and blinked.

The eyes I looked through weren't my own.

They were the eyes of the first vampire - the eyes of Sharra's twin, Silindra.

Somehow, the Seal of Gabriel had taken me back to the beginning.

I was no longer just Snow White but had become Silindra as well.

COMING in and out of consciousness, I recognized a part of me - my body - was still in the human realm and that Professor Pops and the brothers watched over me.

Occasionally, I would catch bits of their conversations.

Like now.

"What did you tell the doctors and her dad about what happened at her birthday party?" Heathcliff asked.

"I told them she fell," Professor Pops answered.

"Did they buy it? I mean, look at her. It's like she's sleeping, except for the red, glittery aura on her skin. That's not something you see every day." That was Gabe.

For the briefest moment, I longed to see him, but it didn't last.

"No, Gabe, it isn't. I think the red aura, as you put it, has something to do with the Seal of Gabriel. It's changing her somehow. Kenmei has gone in search of answers from the dragon, Abernathy."

"Her dad's freaking out. I've never seen the dude so distraught." Gabe again.

"It serves him right. He's been an absentee parent for far too long and Snow is fine." That was Professor Pops.

I did feel fine, but then I also felt disconnected from my body and the human realm. Like a shadow on the wall, I was only there until the sun went down.

"She is not fine. She's red and glowy. If she were alright, she'd be awake, coherent, and tripping up the stairs. She'd still be the girl I fell in love with."

Poor Gabe. I wanted to comfort him, but I couldn't. I hadn't accomplished whatever the Seal wanted from me.

"Oh, son, I'm sorry. I know this has been hard on you. But you must know she'll never be the same. Neither will you, now that Oberon is dead."

"Nothing's changed, except my desire to find the hunter. He never should've bitten her. If he hadn't, none of this would've happened."

"Snow's been different since long before the night Christopher bit her. You know that. She's been different almost as long as you have."

My heart broke for Gabe. With the Seal, I had killed his real father, Oberon.

Searing agony coursed through me until I felt the power of the Seal pull me from the human realm and back, back to the beginning once again.

At the knowledge that I'd killed Gabe's father, I knew we could never be the same.

He and I were over. Some things couldn't be forgiven. Murdering a parent was one of them.

When I opened my eyes again, I determined I would stay here and be Silindra.

They could bury my body for all I cared.

I would never return. I was Silindra, and I intended to stay that way.

With my fate decided, I studied my surroundings through Silindra's eyes and found myself on the path just outside the castle grounds, and I knew I was in the realm of Sharra.

Desperate to commit myself to my new home, I repeated the chant that was bouncing around in my mind.

But it wasn't me that spoke.

It was the voice of Silindra.

I was her, and she was me.

We were one.

My soul rested inside of her, but I wasn't alone in there.

She was with me, and she was in the driver's seat.

For the briefest moment, I wondered if this was what it would be like if the modern-day vampire queen - Sharra took over my body.

Would I still be in there? If so, it wasn't so bad.

Except that Sharra was wicked and evil, and that wasn't how I wanted to live my life. I'd tried it briefly, and it didn't take.

TWO SOULS ONE BODY

"I, Silindra, Queen of the Vampires, do solemnly swear to do whatever it takes to win." That was my new personal mantra. Of course, no one knew it but me.

I'd been the ruler of the vampires for over a thousand years. The position hadn't remained in my power because of luck, or a convoluted idea.

My sister Sharra disagreed. She was wrong, though.

I still ruled because of systematic planning, a shrewd knowledge of the citizens I governed, and my ability to deal with other magical creatures.

Like dragons.

Dragons and vampires meshed well together, for the most part, but while some of the human vampires craved dragon blood, the originals, like Sharra and me, had no stomach for the foul-smelling creatures. The oldest and most impressively magical dragon of them all was called Abernathy.

I needed to speak to him.

He was kind of a prickly character, but once you got around his rough edges, he had the heart of a gentleman.

Moving with vampiric speed, I reached the entrance to his cave. He wasn't the tidiest of supernaturals.

The whole place reeked of decaying flesh, bat guano, and seawater.

Despite the thick darkness, I could make out the bones of the damned scattered on the dusty earth.

Carefully I stepped over and around as many as possible, but they were everywhere, and occasionally my bare feet crushed one to powder.

Noises bounced off the walls, adding to the bizarrely solemn rooms. Rats scurried, squeaking angrily.

There was a repetitive drip-dripping of water falling from stalactites clinging to the ceiling. And a gentle, continuous rumbling reverberated from the sleeping dragon.

As I tucked my magnificent wings closer to my back, a startled bat caught its feet in my sapphire blue hair before flying away.

Though I knew I had nothing to fear, I jumped.

Taking a deep breath, I held it a moment before blowing out, working to steady myself.

The deeper into the cave I went, the warmer the air became. Perspiration trickled along my hairline and lower back, making my fur stick together.

Memories danced along the fringes of my mind, beckoning me to remember another time, one that wasn't my own.

I shoved them more deeply into the recesses of my mind.

No question, I was Silindra, queen of the vampires, and I needed to find a way to stop my twin sister, Sharra before she destroyed everything I held dear.

As I entered another chamber, there came the distinct sound of rumbling, which sounded a lot like purring from a giant cat.

With each step, it became louder until I was within the dragon's chamber.

The room was enormous and without a roof. In the center of the chamber slept a stunning golden dragon.

He seemed to sense my presence because his languid saffron eyes blinked open.

"Hello," he said, his deep voice shaking the room and my soul. He studied me the way a bird of prey would examine its meal.

I cleared my throat, swallowing. Though his head was more than double the size of my entire body, I didn't fear being eaten.

Dragons didn't like the taste of vampires, especially the originals, like me.

I rolled my shoulders back, allowing my wings to beat and expand before settling at my back. "Abernathy," I said, bowing at the waist.

Abernathy was a remarkable looking creature. Our wings were similar, though his were a beautiful metallic shade of gold while mine were black.

The way he held them draped over his back reminded me of a glorious cape.

On either side of his face and under his chin was a mane of wavy hair. The top layers of his scales shone like molten gold.

The scales underneath glistened in ambers and bright yellow.

He yawned, exposing his razor-sharp teeth as he shook his head. "What brings you into my lair," he said, his voice booming against my bones.

I tried to swallow again, hoping to rid my throat of the dehydration that took up residence. "I need your help," I said, sounding like I'd drunk a glass of sand.

"Is that so?" The dragon rose, his scales clicking against each other as he moved. With him on his feet, I felt like an ant - small, insignificant, and easily crushed. He smacked his lips as though considering my nutritional value. I stepped back.

"Yes, it's my sister," I said tentatively, raising my chin. I refused to let the overgrown flying lion intimidate me.

"Tell me," he responded. He sat on his haunches, and the earth beneath him shook. Abernathy blinked, waiting with interest. Or perhaps boredom.

I focused on his long black lashes. "Sharra is growing more and more ambitious for power. I fear if she succeeds in her plans, the world as we know it will be lost. Only those she deems worthy will retain the magic, and six of the seven magics will be destroyed." I paused, unable to meet his gaze, and took a secret breath.

A big part of me hadn't wanted to come. Doing so meant I was betraying Sharra.

I loved my sister.

She and I had been the best of friends for a thousand years until discovering humans and their uses. Until she realized she could change them into a new variety of vampire and force them to do her bidding.

Until she decided she should rule instead of me.

"I may drive her back for a time, but she'll return. She's strong-willed and so determined." I swallowed. "I - We need a way to protect a portion of the seven magics so it can't be muddled to suit Sharra's lust for power."

"I see." Abernathy's tail whipped and curled around his feet. I got the feeling he really didn't care but wanted to mollify me. "You realize, dear Silindra, life is evolution whether you want to believe it or not." He drummed his clawed paws on the ground, sending wisps of dust into the air. "Had a tadpole not longed to roam on land, it never would have become a frog."

I nodded. It was the same argument Sharra used, but that didn't make what she was doing right.

"Why do you want to stop what so naturally is?" Abernathy continued. "Unless you are worried, the creatures of magic will agree with her instead of you."

A PIECE OF HIS SOUL

ABERNATHY GAVE ME A KNOWING GLANCE, and I cringed.

Clearing my throat, I steeled myself and tried to glare.

The idea of forfeiting one's magic made no sense to me.

Why would someone willingly give up such a gift? Choose to mate with lesser creatures? Weakening their power. There was no rhyme or rationale behind the logic.

I flapped my wings in frustration. "The unicorns believed as Sharra does, and they are nearly extinct, each generation's magic diluted until the youngest no longer grow a horn and can't communicate with other creatures of magic. It's a disgrace! They are called horses now, and Sharra has sent them all to the human realm to do the humans' dirty work."

My words came out ragged, but that was the truth.

It was despicable what happened in the name of Sharra's "evolution."

"Perhaps," Abernathy said thoughtfully.

I fisted my hands, the muscles under my brown fur straining from the pressure. Would he refuse me?

A blip confuzzled my mind, and I was no longer in Abernathy's cave. My consciousness had returned to the human realm, and a time I didn't know.

From deep within, I felt the change.

"WHAT'S the matter with her? It looks like she has a disease - that odd shade of her skin. And she hasn't moved in weeks," Sebastian said.

"I wish I knew. Snow Angel, come back, honey. Daddy's here." My dad. Silindra's consciousness was drowned out, and I returned. I tried to reach out - to pull away from Silindra, but she wouldn't let me go.

"Let's fly to Italy for Christmas, it'll do you some good to see another part of the country." That was Vivianne, my stepmother. At her voice, anger burned through me.

"You can do what you want, but I'm her father. I'm not going anywhere, in case she wakes up." I wanted to high-five my dad and hug him, but I still couldn't break free.

"You heard the doctors, there's nothing wrong with her. She's probably just pretending like always."

"Then get the hell out, Viv. Go! Do what you want. I won't leave my daughter alone again."

"How dare you talk to me like that!" Vivianne's voice sounded as shocked as I felt. I hadn't heard my dad talk like that ever. Not to anyone, and especially not to her.

"No, how dare you! For the past ten years, I've chosen you over her. Never again." His voice cracked, and I knew my dad meant it.

Dad, I tried to shout, but Silindra pulled me back.

Back to the time when original vampires ruled the world.

ABERNATHY EXHALED, sending smoke through his nostrils, and I took another step back. "If you wish to save magic, there is much you must do. While I do not agree the horse is less of a magnificent creature than the unicorn, I do believe there is merit to what you request. Saving magic will benefit all creatures."

I felt my shoulders relax, and my wings vibrated in response.

It didn't matter if he agreed with my beliefs or not, only that he told me what I needed to do to protect the world's magic from dying out completely.

"You'll help, then?" I wanted to make sure before I got too excited.

"Yes, Silindra, Queen of the Vampires. I'll give you what you desire, but remember, all choices come with a price."

"Thank you," I breathed, feeling a little giggly and wondering where the emotion came from. Usually, I was exceptional under pressure.

Abernathy tossed his head back. "Hhhmmmmm. Aaarrgggghhhh. Hhhmmmmm. Aaarrgggghhhh."

The noise trembled deep within the dragon's body.

He pranced from one foot to the other, as though dancing.

I moved back until my wings touched the chamber's wall.

He rose up on his hind legs and let out a roar, breathing a column of fire.

Bats died instantly, falling like black rain all around us.

I turned into the wall, shielding my face.

After several long moments, he stopped, and I faced him.

An angry pain burned in his eyes.

He opened his mouth, and I had a momentary flash of fear that he would send his fiery breath my way.

Instead, something small rolled off his tongue and landed on the dusty floor in front of him.

"Take that," he said, returning to his seated position, looking as though he'd done nothing bizarre.

I hesitated. "What is it?" A hairball? Nasty.

"Go on, it won't bite."

Yeah, but it might be oozing saliva and other disgusting dragon slime, I thought, standing over it.

Abernathy chuckled, his eyes twinkling merriment. "Go on," he prodded.

Cautious, I picked it up. Warm to the touch and, thankfully, slobber free. It looked like a topaz gem, shaped like a teardrop.

A grey-black substance swirled within. Holding it between my thumb and first finger, I peered at it more closely.

"What is it?" I asked again, hearing the wonderment in my voice.

"That, dear Silindra, is a piece of my soul."

I gasped and almost dropped it.

"Why?"

To give away a piece of one's soul was huge.

"In order to save magic, you must combine a piece of my soul with the six other magical elements," Abernathy answered.

A vibration began within my body, and I knew he spoke the truth.

"What exactly?" I asked, pressing the gem into the palm of one hand. I wanted to make sure I did exactly as he said.

"The horn of a unicorn. Strength of a troll. The heart of a fairy, the sight of an elf, and the essence of an original vampire. Finally, the blood of a hunter - but not just any hunter. When the time comes, you'll understand what I mean."

It sounded crazy, but I decided to trust him.

He'd given me a piece of his soul.

There was nothing more significant.

Abernathy spoke. "Do not fight what is meant to be. You have a young vampire within you. She will be the one to restore the magical balance when the time comes."

A gasp sounded from the nethermost part of my mind.

I sucked in a breath, frustrated.

I hadn't made the noise, but who had?

Shaking my head, I tried to rid myself of the clutter. After a thousand years of living, I thought I'd experienced everything, but something new was happening within my mind.

Without waiting for my response, the enormous golden dragon turned away from me and lay back down, curling himself into a ball.

Within seconds he was snoring again.

Tightening my grip on the gem, I retreated from the cave.

A part of me worried about keeping Abernathy's soul safe.

In the wrong hands, it would destroy lives. With the magics combined, whoever wore the gem would possess more power than all others, including the dragons.

Excitement shot through my heart.

I would be the most powerful creature in the world.

"No." I heard the voice distinctly, like someone standing next to me had said it, but there was no one else around.

My vision went dark.

"POPS, I noticed Kenmei is back. What did he find out? Does he know why the Seal of Gabriel disappeared? Why she's red?" Dorian asked.

"He discovered little more than we already knew. Abernathy said the magic within the gem is binding with Snow. If that's the case, she'll be unstoppable, a force more powerful than any of us has ever seen."

"Including the vampire queen?"

"Yes." Professor Pops took a deep breath. I mulled over what he said. I would be the most powerful creature? That was scary. I didn't want that kind of power.

"Holy crap. Let's wake her up then." Bart's voice.

"Try a kiss, numnuts. It works in fairy tales," Salvatore said.

"Back off, Salvatore. I'll go first."

"Dorian, I swear to St. Valentine, if your lips go anywhere near hers, I'll kick your ass."

"You're such a baby, Gabe."

I longed to wake and tell Gabe I was sorry. Obviously, even though I killed his father, he still cared. I wanted him and the others to know I was okay. That I knew they were watching out for me and that I missed them. Gritting my teeth, I tried to return home, but Silindra wouldn't let me go.

"Not yet," she said to me. "We're not ready. We must see this through."

SENSUOUS LIPS

I EXITED the dragon's cave and was met by Ryden, my most trusted friend.

The pixilette had transparent wings and hair the color of daisies. Gabriel, one of Sharra's hunters and my secret lover, was also there.

I was surprised they found me.

At the sight of Gabriel, my breath hitched. It still shocked me that I had any kind of physical reaction to him since he was a human-vampire, but I craved him like a flower craved the light.

He wore his black hair long and in a braid. Several strands had fallen out and framed his chiseled face.

His eyes were emerald green and seemed to overflow with serenity and goodness. He wasn't tall, about my height, and muscled.

He wore black pants, fur-covered boots, and a matching black shirt without sleeves. Strapped to his back were crisscrossed swords.

His sensuous lips were puckered with worry.

Sharra had used her magic and her blood to change him from human into a vampire. With no wings and no fur, he should've been ugly, but he wasn't. Although I was more than offended by what she'd done to him, I couldn't help the strong feelings - the desire - I felt for him. My emotions went against everything I stood for, but I couldn't deny them.

Flying off Gabriel's shoulder, Ryden came to me. "Did you find Abernathy? What did he say?" She spoke in a high, barely audible voice as she flitted around my head.

I held out my hand, exposing the amber stone for them to see.

"Oh," she gasped, clutching her hands to her chest. Her wings beat rapidly as she landed on my palm, reverently touching the stone. "It's beautiful," she breathed.

"It's our future," I said, placing it inside the satchel I wore across my chest.

"What did he say? What do we do with it?" She placed her hands on her hips.

I wanted to tell them precisely what Abernathy said, but something stopped me. "First, we need to find the elf known as Devoran."

Gabriel placed a hand on my shoulder, his eyes questioning.

I covered his hand with mine and pulled it to my chest. "The dragon is sending us on a quest." The word "us" filled me with contentment. We were a team, Gabriel, Ryden, and I.

"A quest? What are we searching for, my love?" Gabriel brushed his hands through my wild, unkempt hair.

I caught hold of his waist, pulling him close, ignoring the frustrated noises coming from Ryden.

Gabriel and I embraced, and he kissed me, his warm lips caressing mine.

At his touch, my body snapped to attention, every part of me quivering like putty in his hands.

Ryden and I talked on more than one occasion about my passions for the human-looking vampire.

I knew it was wrong, that I shouldn't be seen cavorting with a watered-down vampire, especially one that served Sharra.

But whenever he was near, my body would melt.

Every strict word I told myself, each promise I made to Ryden was forgotten around him. The promises flitting from my head like a petulant bird.

I craved his proximity.

Even now, knowing we needed to complete the most important task of my long life, I couldn't stop myself from kissing him, touching him, wanting him.

"Gabriel," I whispered.

He responded by deepening his kiss, and I felt it in my knees, down to the tips of my toes.

"Shiny sheep poo, would you two break it up?"

I smiled against Gabriel's lips.

Ryden had quite the way with words.

"Fine," I said softly, but my gaze never left Gabriel's. "Climb on, Ryden. You don't want to get left behind."

She flew to my shoulder. "You're disgusting," she murmured into my ear, but I noted the hint of sympathy in her voice. The little pixilette understood.

"Shall we go your way or mine?" I asked Gabriel, my wings beating behind my back longing to fly, to feel the wind in my hair. There wasn't a better experience.

"My way, if you please," Gabriel said.

I sighed. "Oh, alright." I knew he didn't like to fly.

"Where to?" he asked, wrapping his arms around my middle.

"The Isle of Rhue."

He lifted me into his arms, and I marveled at his strength. I wasn't the lightest of creatures.

As he ran with vampire speed, something clicked in my brain and I was transported to another time.

"SNOW, it's me, Cindy. I don't have a lot of time. Your boyfriend thinks witches had something to do with what happened to you, but it isn't true. He's on a rampage trying to find out the truth."

"Are you ready to complete the spell, my child?"

"Yes, Grandmother."

"Good. Then begin."

"Don't worry, Snow. This isn't going to hurt," she said and then spoke words I didn't understand. "Essaya. Guinevia. Essaya cayana soyoble."

Her grandmother said the words with her. I felt something happening to my body, like the lightest touch of snow or the sprinkling of rain.

"See, my dear, the spell is working. She's fine. We just need to help the idiot chayot keep her safe until she wakes. I have no doubt she will when she's ready." At Cindy's grandmother's confidence, I relaxed.

"Thank you, Grandmother."

THE ISLE OF RHUE, in the Mediterranean Sea, featured an inlet cloaked by enchantments. Only those who possessed magic could find it, and even then, it was difficult.

The elves weren't social creatures, and the elven leader was no exception. In fact, he was ornerier than Abernathy.

A rock had more warmth and softness.

Needless to say, I was not looking forward to this encounter. I'd spoken to him all of ten times in the last thousand years. Each exchange had been at the meetings the leaders of the seven magics held once a century.

We arrived quickly. Gabriel halted at the edge of Keening Forest. It was known for its giant pine trees, and hostile phantoms said to be able to make you crazy or hallucinate or both.

Seeing one wasn't high on my list, but it was highly likely we would.

Gabriel released me, allowing my feet to crunch against the dried grass. "This way," I said, wanting to get this over with before it began.

"I don't know," Ryden said, her high voice quivering. "Are you sure this is necessary? I mean, can't you command Devoran to come to you?"

HOLY MONSTER

"I COULD, but he wouldn't come. He's arrogant like that." I took a deep breath. "We have to do this." I stepped over a pinecone the size of Gabriel's head. "Stay on my shoulder," I told Ryden lightly. If a pinecone fell on her, she'd be squished.

"I will, Silindra. Everything is so big. I could live in one of those pinecones." To prove her point, a hairy spider as big as my fist crawled out of one. "Holy monster, I'm hiding in your hair," she said with a shudder.

I let her do as she pleased.

The spider would make the pixilette into an appetizer if it caught her.

"I'll get rid of him," Gabriel said, shooing the spider away with the tip of his boot. There wasn't much growing under the canopy of trees, just a lot of dirt, pine needles, pinecones, and the occasional fern. It made sense. The sun was all but blocked from view. Shadows danced within the stilted silence. In the distance, I could hear the waves crashing, and something else. Moaning.

"The song of the dead," Ryden whispered, pressing her little body against my neck.

"Let's go," Gabriel said, taking the lead, but he immediately stopped.

A group of six elven guards approached with their swords drawn and blocked us from going forward.

"Put those away, my friends," I said but heard the edge in my voice. "My name is Silindra, Queen of the Vampires. I'm here to see Devoran. Take me to him at once."

One guard came forward. "Apologies, my lady. I didn't recognize you." He bowed deeply before returning to his upright position.

I regarded him deliberately. He and the others tried not to gawk. It was understandable. I was a magnificent creature, but I was also a vanishing breed.

Most of the original vampires were gone or, like my sister, had pilfered a new body. A human body. The idea of leaving the body I had - the one that would live forever - for a paltry and limited human body, disgusted me.

I wouldn't lower myself as the others had.

Besides, humans couldn't fly! I would die before giving up my wings.

"It's alright." I stepped forward.

The elves were slight creatures, their frames tall and thin like the branches on a willow tree, skin and hair the color of silver dust, and eyes as deep blue as the sea.

They were dressed in tunics, two in black, two in green, and two in blue.

I never did understand the need for clothing since they were binding and uncomfortable. The humans wore them, as did many other supernaturals, but I couldn't be bothered. I had my fur.

A squeal resonated through my mind.

I hadn't made that sound.

She's excited, I thought, and then caught myself.

Who was this she? Perhaps the young vampire Abernathy mentioned? Shaking my head, I cleared my throat, focusing on the elves.

"I am Veb," one of the guards in black said. He came forward as he spoke, placing a fisted hand to his chest.

"Good to know you, Veb. Now, if you please, I'm in a hurry." I waved my hand toward the dark forest, motioning for him to lead us in. I didn't want to be impolite, but he seemed leery of us, especially Gabriel. I didn't have the time for an internal debate.

Veb shuffled his feet, a frown on his effeminate face. "Silindra, I can take you and the pixilette to Crystal City, but I have strict instructions that I must never, under any circumstances, allow one of his kind in." He bowed low but kept his steely gaze fixed on Gabriel. "Again, apologies."

My insides burned with anger. "Listen, Veb. I don't care what you were told. This hunter is with me, and I am the queen - "

Gabriel placed a hand on my shoulder and spoke in my ear. "Can I have a minute?"

"Excuse us," I said and stomped away, following Gabriel. When we were a ways off, I took his hand. "Gabriel, if you think I'm going to bow to these elves, you can think again."

Gabriel smiled. "The thought never crossed my mind." He discreetly kissed my cheek. "Your sister has called me to her side. I'm sorry, but I must go. We can't let her know we are together."

A sickness formed in my stomach. I didn't want him to leave. Having him near brought me contentment. But I knew he was right. "Go," I said, and turned away, determined not to let anyone see the tears in my eyes.

"It's better this way. We don't want word to get back to Sharra that the two of you were on the Isle of Rhue together. That would raise too many questions," Ryden added.

I knew she was right, but I didn't like that I would be without him. Nor did I like that the elves questioned my authority. I rolled my shoulders, wanting to take my sadness and anger out on them.

When I returned to the guards, they were all smiles.

"Follow us."

Two guards walked ahead, and two brought up the rear.

The other two disappeared into the trees. As we walked, I wondered about the perpetual groaning, like a sigh of relief and a cry of agony combined.

The noises seemed to be coming from the trees, but I didn't see anything when I looked.

"Are the stories about the phantoms real?" I asked, knowing they were but wanting to make conversation.

"Yes, they are," Veb said.

I waited for him to continue, to give me a more thorough explanation, but he didn't.

If we were at the castle, he would've been flogged for his insubordination. Or drained dry. No, definitely flogged. The idea of drinking elven blood was off-putting. Their blood tasted like moldy tree sap. Ugh.

The voice inside my head groaned as well.

I ground my teeth together in frustration. "Can the phantoms do any harm?" Again, I knew the answer but wanted to distract myself from Gabriel's absence.

SIRENS CIRCLED THE BOAT

"TO THE BODY, no. But the mind - " Veb let his words trail off. "They are excellent at getting inside here." He pointed at his head. "They spin tales you can't help but believe until it's too late."

"What do you mean?" I asked. "Plug your ears," I mumbled to Ryden so the elves wouldn't hear.

"On it."

"Three full moons ago, a couple of humans stumbled into the forest by accident.

They owned a measure of magic, though they didn't know it, but it was enough that the trees within our forest opened to them.

Within moments of entering, their minds were altered. The phantoms twisted their thoughts and made them believe they were on a boat, stranded at sea. For days they rowed until the female died."

"Why didn't you meet them as they entered, the way you did with us?" Had they wanted the humans to suffer? Some of the magical creatures believed humans to be less than animals.

"They had magic, but it wasn't enough to alert us. The magic you and the others possess is much stronger, so when we sensed you, we used our magic to keep the phantoms away."

I huffed internally. That was good news, though I didn't fully trust these elves. "What happened to the man? Did he escape?"

"We found the male about to expire and asked what his business was within the forest. He said he didn't know. Asked me if I was an angel come to take him to Heaven. I told him, no, and he asked me why I walked on water." Veb chuckled. "Poor thing, I asked him if that was what he saw, and he said yes, that it was very deep and that sirens circled the boat, telling him to jump and join them at the bottom of the sea."

Veb glanced back at me. "The man said he couldn't because he couldn't leave his wife."

"That's horrible," I said, glancing nervously at the trees.

"We calmed him before bringing him to our healers, but he died anyway." Veb shrugged. "There are other stories of the phantoms if you'd like to hear them."

"No, thank you. Perhaps silence is better." I searched the forest for any signs of a phantom. The only movement was an occasional falling pinecone.

AFTER WHAT FELT LIKE FOREVER, my restraint vanished. "Can't we go any faster?" I asked, frustrated the elves couldn't fly or move at incredible speeds the way vampires could.

"Almost there," Veb said, stepping off the worn dirt path.

He and his fellow guard wound us through ferns toward what I thought was an ancient tree. Its trunk was more extensive than I was tall.

Veb touched the tree lightly and whispered something.

I watched, curious. The bark on the tree folded in on itself, revealing an entrance.

Ryden and I inhaled simultaneously.

"Cool," Ryden said. I had to agree.

"Right this way." Veb presented the opening, his hand beckoning. I hesitated but could sense no danger. The other black-clad guard entered the tree trunk. A giant orb of light seemed to swallow him, and he disappeared.

I'd heard elves traveled on the light. Since I never spent any time with them, other than occasionally at a council meeting, I couldn't be sure the whisperings were true.

Now I could see it was a fact.

"Please, this passage will take us directly to Crystal City."

Not wanting the elves to know I was nervous, I moved to the opening. "Is there anything I need to do? I'm not an elf," I said, scowling and making myself appear confident.

"Travelling by light will not harm you, Silindra."

I nodded, hoping they didn't hear me gulp.

"Might as well get it over with," Ryden whispered.

I stepped into the tree's trunk, and several things happened at once.

A whoosh sounded in my ears, as though I were traveling at an extremely rapid rate.

There was a pulling.

The scent of daffodils filled my nose.

A tingling sensation started at my head, ran down my back, out along my wings, and through my appendages.

I became the light: pulsing, vibrating, throbbing.

Strangest of all, I heard the young vampire inside my head gasp.

Time and space seemed to stand still and rush by in one blinding flash.

Images of a human girl with dark hair and bright blue eyes raced along with my mind. She was one of the marked who'd become a vampire. I saw flashes of light and a fiery sword cut into her flesh. There was pain and then - .

I screamed, or she did. I didn't know.

The light was gone, and I was outside once again. Standing on top of a grassy hill, looking down on the most glorious sight I'd ever seen. I heaved a cleansing breath.

"Welcome to Crystal City, Silindra."

My insides raged with worry over what was happening to me. I didn't understand the images I'd seen or the girl in my mind, but I couldn't focus on that.

I had a job to do.

Somewhere in the city below was Devoran, the king of the elves.

I needed to ask him for his eternal sight, and I needed to do it immediately.

Sharra wasn't slowing down.

She continued with her nefarious plans.

If I were going to stop her, I needed to do my part, which meant collecting the different items Abernathy spoke about. I thought for just the briefest moment about what it meant to give the gem the essence of an original vampire.

How would that work without the vampire dying? Was it even possible for an original to die? I had a feeling the answer was yes, though I didn't know what our weakness was. In a thousand years, I hadn't found one.

"Let's go," I said, rushing down the hill. Those thoughts wouldn't do me any good.

"Did you feel that? It was like I was torn apart and put back together again at the same time. Are you alright?" Ryden asked, her voice breathy.

OceanofPDF.com

SNOOTY BLUE BLOOD

I GRUNTED IN ANSWER. She'd described what I felt exactly, but I doubted she saw a human girl in her mind.

"The city looks like the end of a rainbow," Ryden added.

I nodded, expanding my wings, making sure they were still in one piece. When I was satisfied, I relaxed a little. "Keep your wits about you, Ryden, my friend," I whispered.

"I will."

Opulent grass gave way to crystal-paved streets and buildings, ranging in color from light red to sunny yellow, sapphire blue to the palest purple.

The structures correlated with the roads. Sunny yellow streets contained businesses, homes, and gardens swathed in yellow. The purple streets correlated with purple buildings, blue with blue, green with green, and so on.

Elves were everywhere, busily bustling about their lives.

After several minutes I realized the elves wore clothing associated with street colors.

Where all of the colors appeared overwhelming at first, their meaning quickly became apparent.

It was a pecking order.

Fascinating, I thought but kept my mouth shut.

Elves gawked at me excitedly.

Some of the young ones followed, tittering behind their hands until we reached the end of their street.

Then they would abruptly stop, as though crossing into another color would produce severe consequences.

The closer we got to the middle of the city, the more exquisite the buildings, the roads, and the clothing. Everything in the center glistened like diamonds - clear and faceted.

The elves' clothing was blinding white.

They adorned themselves in luxurious furs, jewels, and fancy hats. None of the elves on these streets seemed excited to see me. In fact, they looked down their long, skinny noses at me. A growl grew in my throat.

Ryden patted my neck. "Don't mind them. Their haughtiness will be their downfall."

I calmed myself, swallowing my desire to tear into them with my fangs so I could get their snooty blue blood all over their pretty white clothes. At the thought, I laughed.

Veb scowled, wariness pressed into his thin lips, and I closed my mouth.

He held open a door, and I walked through.

The decorations inside the building were scarce like everything had been swallowed by light.

Resisting the urge to raise my hand and block the blinding brightness, I followed Veb up a circular corridor.

Let me out, the voice inside my mind shouted. I bit my lip, trying to force it away. Please.

My mind drifted, and I found my mind taking a back seat so the girl could be in control. We immediately were in her time.

"WHERE ARE YOU OFF TO, Gabe? Why are you leaving now?" Professor Pops asked.

"Several of the marked have been found dead. Holden thinks those responsible are renegade chayot working with other magical creatures, including the hunter, Christopher, and even the witches. Holden wants me to take my father's place as their leader. I'm going to destroy Christopher - make him pay for what he's done to Snow. Besides, there's nothing I can do here." His voice sounded mournful. With all my might, I tried to open my eyes, to reach out to him, but Silindra wouldn't let me go.

"Oh, son. I know it's hard, but we've got to - "

"Don't bother giving me a pep talk. I've got work to do."

"What about Snow? Did you want to say good-bye?"

"I've already said my good-byes. Now I'll avenge her." At his anger, I sobbed. My poor Gabe. He believed I wasn't coming back. I didn't blame him. I wasn't sure I would be back either.

"Why are you treating her like she's dead? Her heart still beats. Her chest still rises and falls."

"Whatever. I need to move on with my life, and you should move on too. Don't wait up."

My heart broke into a million pieces, and I wept, allowing myself to be pulled back into Silindra's time.

MY FAVORITE BLOOD

THE SOUND of roaring water came from somewhere within the building and grew louder the higher we went. When the guards, Ryden, and I reached the top, I understood the noise.

A large waterfall raged, causing the mist to churn and swirl, making the air wet. I t smelled of lilies.

The droplets clung to my fur and slicked off my wings.

Directly in front of us was a rounded landing dangling by six silver cords.

Veb climbed on and beckoned me to follow.

I stifled a sigh, knowing if the bottom fell out from under me, I could use my wings to escape.

Still, I held the slick crystal rail encircling the landing, hoping to steady my nerves.

Slowly, like molten lava, the landing moved, pulling us closer and closer to the waterfall.

When it looked like the raging water would soak us, a circular piece of ceiling, just larger than the landing, appeared, diverting the water around us.

At once, we were swallowed in darkness. I was thankful my eyes easily adjusted to the dark, but I knew Ryden wasn't as lucky. Her tiny fingers clung tighter to my neck.

"So dark. It's like we've been buried," she whispered.

After several moments, I wanted to say something to alleviate Ryden's fears.

Veb must've sensed my uncertainty. "We will arrive innnnnn - " The landing clanged softy, and the water parted like a curtain. "Now."

We stepped into a wonderland. I was too shocked to say anything. The bright blue sky shone so perfectly, I wondered if it was real.

Trees bearing the most beautiful, luscious-looking fruit in different colors abounded. Their fragrance had my mouth watering.

Surprised, I took a step toward the nearest tree, clasping a lime-colored fruit in my fingers. Its texture was soft and smelled like blood, my favorite blood.

That of my hunter - Gabriel.

How was that possible?

Overwhelmed, my eyes tore through the sumptuous garden, searching for an answer. Birds sang from dense branches, their feathers all the shades of the rainbow, their tails nearly touching the ground.

Animals great and small.

The unicorn and the gremlin, the lion and the lamb, the eagle, and the mouse.

They all frolicked together.

"What is this place?" I asked, unable to help myself.

"This is my home."

I swung in the direction of his voice.

Devoran walked toward me, his hands spread out on either side of him in welcome.

He wore a crisp white shirt with embroidered white buttons and matching white pants. White silk slippers adorned his feet.

His long silver hair was pulled back and secured in a bun with long pointy sticks. He appeared relaxed, his features kind.

He smiled - his almond-shaped eyes, the color of a cloudy sky, crinkled in mirth.

His features and the way he moved were unexpected, mainly since he acted so differently at the council meeting.

"Devoran?" My eyes told me that was who strode toward me, but my mind struggled to believe.

"Welcome, Silindra. I've been expecting you."

I remained immobile. Everything about the way Devoran acted went against all I'd known of him over the last millennium. That concerned me.

Why was he different?

Was this a trick?

Had the phantoms caught hold of my mind, and this was all a hallucination?

It couldn't be, I thought, discreetly pinching myself.

The air smelled so intoxicating I almost decided I didn't care.

With a shrug, I plucked a fruit from the tree and sank my teeth into it before I changed my mind. The fleshy fruit tasted exactly like Gabriel's blood.

"What is this?" I asked, too startled to follow decorum.

"Amonie fruit. Do you like it?"

"It tastes like blood," I admitted in awe.

Devoran nodded. "That's the beauty of the fruit within my sanctuary."

Two crystal chairs and a table appeared in front of the elven leader. He slipped into one of the chairs.

A silver decanter materialized along with twin silver goblets, and a miniature - for Ryden, I guessed.

"Won't you have a seat? Take some refreshments." He indicated the pitcher with his pointy chin.

"I'm so thirsty. Do you think there's watermelon juice in that container?" Ryden asked.

I wondered what was in there too. All I could smell was Gabriel's delicious blood.

"Devoran, you know I only drink blood. Is that what you're offering?"

His smile widened. "But of course, dear Silindra. What kind of host would I be otherwise?"

Ryden sighed.

"Can we get some watermelon juice for the pixilette, Ryden?" I asked, sitting hesitantly in the chair opposite him.

"The decanter pours whatever it is you wish to drink, so if dear Ryden wants watermelon juice, that's what she'll receive." His friendly voice was strange.

Ryden squealed with glee and flew from her hiding place at my neck, toward the tiny glass. Devoran picked up the decanter and poured her a drink.

The pixilette took a small sip, and then several more.

Clapping excitedly, she flew into the air, spinning like a magical top. When she stopped, she laughed. "It is watermelon juice."

I stifled a smile.

"Would you like a drink, Silindra?"

Curious, I agreed, setting the piece of fruit on the table. It vanished immediately.

He poured, and I watched a thick red liquid flow into my glass.

When it was filled, I picked it up, startled by the strong scent of blood.

Pressing my lips to the glass, I tasted.

It was blood.

More specifically, Gabriel's blood.

I felt my eyes widen.

"How is this possible?" I wanted to set the glass down, but I couldn't. With only a little decorum, I chugged down the remaining contents.

"It's part of the magic of my home." He gave a slight chuckle, and I nearly fell off my chair. Devoran never smiled, let alone lifted his lips out of a grim line.

"Who are you?" I asked, moving my body so that I fully faced him. The elf beside me couldn't be king of the elves.

I CALL HER ENVY

"SILINDRA, it is me. I know I am usually melancholy. But you are in my home, in my garden, my most favorite place in all the world." Devoran smiled, and I noticed the tiny wrinkles feathering near his eyes. "Can I show you around?" he asked, rising.

I nodded, feeling out of sorts, but stood as well. The sooner we finished with pleasantries, the sooner I could be on my way.

"Good." He looked at Veb. "You are excused," he barked.

"Thank you, sire." Veb bowed and left.

Once the water curtain resettled itself and Veb was gone, Devoran smiled. "I know why you've come."

I wanted to respond, but the girl inside my mind tried to break free at that moment, pushing against my mind, and I found my consciousness floating like a cloud back to her time. It was apparent she missed a boy named Gabe. I found it interesting her love's name was the same as mine.

"HAPPY HALLOWEEN, Snow. I know you hate girlie stuff, so I only put a little bit of clear gloss on your lips, added just a few sparkles to your eyelids, and put a red stripe in your hair. The nurses are going to flip about that." Cindy was speaking to me, and she said Halloween. How was that possible? It was only November a few days ago. My head pounded, and I desperately fought to wake.

Cindy went on. "I'm dressed up like a cheerleader. We had to wear a costume for work. I bought you one just like mine. We'll save it for next year, even though you know I hate wearing the same thing twice. It's okay, though. I think, under the circumstances, the Vogue gods will understand. Just please wake up. I'm lonely without you. Sure, I have other friends, but you're the only one who knows what I am."

Poor Cindy, she must feel so alone. I wondered if she had a boyfriend. I wanted to know all about what she'd been up to.

Cindy went on, "And your dad, he's taken to drinking. Your stepmother left him. Okay, that's a big-time bonus, but not his drinking. Professor Pops isn't sure what to do about him."

Oh no! My dad. I needed to wake for him.

I needed him to know I was alive and that I cared about him.

"Gatsby is so desolate," Cindy went on. "I tried to sneak him into your hospital room, but the nurses found out and made me take him away. He's with Professor Pops because your dad kept forgetting to feed him."

My poor cat!

"Don't even get me started on the guys. Holy Halloween-in-a-handbasket. They are miserable, except Gabe. He's always out being Mr. Big-Shot leader. I think he forgot he's only eighteen. Yeah, he had his birthday. None of us celebrated, though."

I've got to return. It's important. Let. Me. Go! I said the words in my mind, but Silindra's power seemed to grab my soul and yank me back. A tether connected both of us in a way neither of us understood.

I WASN'T surprised Devoran knew what I wanted - he was always astute at our council meetings - but I doubted he understood the full reason.

The elves had been around almost as long as the vampires and the secretive chayot, but we still had a few decades on them.

"I went to see Abernathy," I said, getting right to the point. "If we are to save the seven magics, I must have a specific property from each of the great magical races."

He nodded solemnly. "And what did Abernathy give you?"

Answering Devoran was necessary. I knew that. He would expect nothing less, and his question was worthy.

"A piece of his soul." I brought the amber teardrop from the satchel I carried, showing him the magical gem.

His eyes widened. "Unbelievable." He reached out as though he wanted to touch it, but I immediately returned the stone to my satchel.

A flash of anger - the look I was used to seeing on Devoran passed over his features for the briefest moment before it was gone.

He slipped his hands behind his back and began walking. I moved to stay alongside him.

"Abernathy and I have never agreed on much," he went on. "He is more impulsive with his decisions, while I tend to think things through so I can plan for different variables."

Abernathy just seemed lazy to me, but I nodded my agreement. Better to be diplomatic and let him believe he had the upper hand.

"By my calculations, you are here to ask for the eternal sight of an elf, correct?" He raised one thin eyebrow in my direction.

"That's right," I answered, not even a little surprised he did, in fact, know exactly what I needed.

"We can discuss it, but first I want to introduce you to someone." Pointing at a small black unicorn, he changed the subject. "I call the little unicorn over there, Envy. See the lustrous shine of her coat? The perfect length of her mane? Her violet eyes?"

"Yes, she's lovely." I had a soft spot for unicorns. They were healers by nature.

"Her brothers and sisters hated her for her beauty. More than that, they hated her for her great magic. They were awful to her, refused to play, or show her any kind of affection. Her mother and father possessed very little magic, and they despised her as well. She was considered the runt. One night her family gave her a sleeping potion, and as she slept, they proceeded to break her legs and tear off her horn." He shook his head sadly.

I was in shock.

It never made sense to me that there was such cruelty in the world.

But I wasn't naïve enough to believe it didn't exist. All creatures had malice woven into their DNA as well as goodness.

The difference between those who were malicious and those who were kind were their choices. Whether they clung to the best parts of themselves or wallowed in the rest.

Devoran went on. "They abandoned her at the edge of our forest. I believe they hoped the phantoms would destroy her. But her magic is powerful, and I sensed her and brought her here before any more harm could come to her."

I was surprised he helped.

Elven magic was rooted in sight.

MINGLE WITH YOUR MAGIC

ELVES WERE able to see back through time as well as forward in time.

With all they could see, they cared little for the rest of the world.

I guessed he saw something in Envy he wanted to use for himself. "I'm so glad. She seems to be doing better."

"She is." He nodded. "When she woke from the sleeping potion, she possessed enough magic to heal herself, and now she's happy and thriving."

The unicorn, acknowledging Devoran's words, shook her mane and pranced over to him, pushing her nose against his hand.

He smiled, petting her between the eyes, below the small nub where her horn was growing back. "She is loyal to me to a fault." Devoran playfully shoved Envy away. "That loyalty could be the death of her."

I shivered, understanding what he meant.

It didn't matter if Devoran's desires were good or evil.

Because Envy was loyal to him, she would do whatever he commanded. It was the same with the vampires loyal to Sharra.

Beyond the unicorn's extraordinary beauty, she seemed kind.

As I watched, she nudged a baby hedgehog over to a patch of clover and kept him company while he ate.

It occurred to me that Devoran had shared the story as a stalling tactic while he deliberated whether or not to give me what I needed.

Though I was in a hurry, I would allow him that time.

Not that I had a choice. Not really.

I could take what I wanted, but doing so would have consequences beyond the war with the vampires. All creatures of magic would take sides.

Stealing from the king of the elves would turn many against me.

That wasn't an option worth considering unless he gave me no other choice.

After we strolled the entire sanctuary twice, Devoran stopped, facing me. "I will give you what you desire, but you must agree to something first."

As he spoke, several of the creatures from the garden raced over to him. He looked away from me, giving each of beasts some individual attention before sending them away.

"What is it?" I asked when he was done cooing at them. Whatever the cost, I would do it.

"To give you the sight, it must become a part of you, mingle with your magic, and insert itself within your body and soul."

That didn't sound pleasant or even possible. Warily, I scrutinized him. What was he playing at?

"It isn't the same as what the dragon did. It can't be taken but must be freely given. I won't tear the eyes from an elf. That isn't how our magic works."

"How then?" I was prepared for worse.

"In order for you to receive our sight, you must experience the pain and power that comes with such an incredible gift."

"Of course," I said, bracing myself. I had no idea what he meant, but I knew it didn't matter. Whatever the cost, I would pay it.

"Come, let me direct you to your room. You need some rest before we can begin." He picked up the pace, and I worked hard to follow.

I didn't want to rest. I wanted it over with now, but one look at Devoran, and I knew it wasn't up for discussion. "Excellent," I said, gritting my teeth.

One of the elven guards directed me to my chamber after Devoran promised to return soon. I took in the four crystallized walls.

Five small rectangular windows ran the wall's length to the left of the large bed covered in white linen and lavender - my favorite color.

Nothing covered the windows, and I saw the beautiful gardens beyond.

"I'll be back," Ryden said, flying toward the window.

"Stay out of trouble," I commanded softly, though I knew she would do what she pleased.

As she exited, I watched her disappear into the trees.

I had a feeling she was after more watermelon juice.

With nothing to do but wait, I removed my satchel and lay down on my side, careful to keep my bare feet off the downy covers and my wings from getting smashed.

As an original, I needed very little sleep, less than most other creatures, especially humans.

Or dragons.

They could sleep through the centuries. I rarely became tired, but I found myself so exhausted I closed my eyes.

"HER BIRTHDAY'S COMING UP." Dorian's voice cut through the darkness. "I can't believe it's been almost a year. It's a good thing her dad agreed to bring her home. I think the doctors wanted to run tests, treat her like a lab rat. Thankfully, he wouldn't allow that."

"I believe they would be shocked at what they discovered," Professor Pops said. "They're already curious about why her body isn't breaking down."

"She looks the same as she did a year ago, only her hair is longer," said Gabe, and my heart squeezed.

"Vampires age at an abundantly slower rate than humans, son. I'm more than six hundred years old, yet I don't look older than forty."

"Right." Gabe sounded irritated and weary. I did that to him. Though I knew I was somehow connected to Silindra, I willed myself to break free, so I could explain it all to my dad, Professor Pops, Gabe, and all the rest of my family. It made no sense that a year had nearly passed in the human realm, yet with Silindra, it'd been less than a day.

"Gabe, come on. Don't be like this. Talk to me. Tell me how everything's going. Did I hear the rumors right? You captured Christopher?"

My veins filled with dread. I couldn't let them hurt my hunter. I growled, trying to wake, to separate myself from Silindra, but she wasn't through with me yet. Or, more precisely, the Seal of Gabriel wasn't through with me.

"We had him," Gabe said, interrupting my thoughts. "But he escaped. Next time we catch him, I'll kill him."

I couldn't let that happen! Somehow, I needed to separate myself from Silindra and the Seal.

FULFILL THAT DESIRE

WHEN I OPENED MY EYES, it surprised me that I had, in fact, fallen asleep. My body hummed with invigoration. It also dazed me to realize I somehow saw the world differently. Was it the elves' eternal sight? There hadn't been any pain.

I got to my feet, shaking out my wings, allowing the circulation to reach every tendon and vein. They felt good. I felt good.

A large bumblebee flew in, lazily making its way to the wall on the right of my bed. It bumped into the door several times.

"Oh, you poor thing." I went over and cupped the bee between my hands, took it over to the window, and released it. The garden's aroma filled my nose. It still smelled like Gabriel's blood, and my knees went weak. I was hungry.

Directly south of the bed was an opening. I peeked inside, happy to see it was the relieving room. I went in and took care of my necessities. When I returned to the bedroom, I noticed a mirror hanging on the wall next to the bed. It wasn't there a moment ago. "Where did you come from?" It was large and oval, framed in what looked like finely spun spider silk or icicles. I usually wouldn't bother with it. Mirrors were of no value to me. But for some reason, I was drawn to this one. As soon as I peered into the strange glass, I understood. The reflection wasn't mine, but that of a girl. A human. With ruby red lips and dark hair.

My mouth fell open in astonishment. Tugging in a deep breath, I turned from side to side, watching the girl in the mirror imitate me. I closed my eyes, sure I was seeing things, but when I opened them, she was still there, staring back, her eyes as wide as mine.

"Mirror, mirror made for me, whose reflection do I see?" I asked, watching the girl standing there, her lips unmoving though I spoke aloud.

"I'm Snow White," the girl responded, her voice soft.

I stepped back, using my wings to move more quickly. The reflection spoke to me. Tentatively I went back. She was still there.

Slowly I moved my finger toward the glass, curious to see if it was solid. Her creamy, hairless finger moved in time with mine, as though she didn't want to but didn't have a choice. When our fingers met, she gasped.

"Silindra," she said.

"How are you here with me?" I was shocked. I'd never seen this human before. In fact, I refused to entertain humans. I had nothing against them, but their existence meant little to me. Except for Gabriel, I thought, but I pushed that line of thinking away. Sharra had altered him. His body looked human, but he was no more human than I was.

The girl called Snow White leaned toward me. "I'm not sure, but I believe it was the Se - " She couldn't finish the word. It seemed stuck in her throat.

"But, you know what I am?"

"Yes." She touched her throat as though worried about what had happened a moment ago. "I've heard stories about you." She leaned back. "Your sister, Sharra, had a hunter mark me. I'm a vampire now." Her words sounded sad, and I felt momentarily sorry for her. I knew Gabriel had similar feelings.

Was this reflection sent to me by Sharra? My sister's magic was strong. Had she created this mirror as a way of luring me? A pang of longing shot through my chest. If I had a human body like Gabriel, then he and I could love each other fully - in every way physically. My body hungered to fulfill that desire, but no. I shook the thought away. I was an original, a true vampire, not some watered-down human version, like the girl whose reflection I saw. I would not be swayed by her or my lust for Gabriel, even if I did want him so badly, the craving caused my eyes to water. "No!" I slammed my fist into the mirror, shattering it.

Snow squealed. I heard it inside my head. Pieces of glass fell like sharp rain to the floor. A few shards hit my skin and bounced off but I was unharmed. Urgently, I searched for my satchel, but it was nowhere to be found. Had the elves stolen it?

I headed to the door. Devoran had better provide me the answers I needed, including what he did with my gem, or there would be war, and I would be the one to start it. Before I could exit, the sound of tinkling glass made me turn. As I watched, the shattered mirror reassembled until it was whole. I knew if I looked into the mirror again, I wouldn't see myself, but the girl. Snow White. With a growl, I pulled open the door.

"Devoran!" I shouted, surprised that I stepped out into the garden instead of a hallway within one of the crystal buildings. Strange, but there I was. Grass, soft like feathers, brushed against my bare feet. The unicorn Envy flicked her ears, watching me, her eyes keen with interest. "Have you seen Devoran?" I asked.

She nickered and came over, her head bent low as a sign of subjection and respect. When she stood in front of me, I touched her head, directly above the place where her horn grew.

"Rise, dear one." I spoke softly, remembering the cruelty she endured and appreciative of the respect she showed.

"Devoran left Crystal City earlier today. I'm so sorry, apologetic, remorseful." She bowed again, putting one hoofed leg behind the other.

I noticed the leg she stood on trembled, and my anger subsided. A wave of sympathy for her filled my veins. "Please, Envy. You don't need to bow to me. Rise. I insist."

She did as I commanded.

"When will he be back?" I asked, carefully running my clawed hands through her delicate mane.

ENVY

"I DO NOT KNOW. It seems there is trouble between the trolls and the elves near Ellavera Pass. He's gone to make peace, return their harmony, rebuild an accord." Her tail swished as she spoke.

The trolls and the elves were always at odds over one petty issue or another. "I appreciate your time." I scanned the gardens. "Have you seen the pixilette I arrived with? Ryden."

She shook her head, making her long, beautiful mane flip back and forth.

"Where is she?" I wondered aloud, crossing my arms as some of my irritation returned.

"I could help you look for her if you like. The pixilette drank a lot of watermelon juice. She's probably sleeping it off, feeling woozy, hungover," Envy said.

"You're undoubtedly right," I said, smiling. Knowing Ryden, she overdid it and was snoring away somewhere in the trees. "Your assistance would be greatly appreciated." We moved toward the table where I'd last seen my friend. As I came closer, a silver decanter appeared along with a goblet.

"You must be thirsty," Envy said. "Why don't you have a drink?"

"I am." I poured the liquid that looked like blood into the goblet and drank until it was gone.

"Better?" Envy's dark liquid eyes studied me with curiosity.

I still wanted more, but there wasn't time. "Much."

Together, we moved over to the orchard. A ruby red fruit grew in abundance in this section of the garden. Even though it was a different color than the green fruit I smelled yesterday, it held the same aroma - Gabriel's blood.

"What does the garden smell like to you?" I asked, curious about whether or not she smelled blood.

She sniffed, her nose moving so that I wanted to reach out and touch its softness. Resisting, I clutched my hands at my sides.

"It smells of fresh clover, alfalfa, and Elisar apples." She flicked her tail, angling her head toward the red fruit on a nearby tree.

"That's what this is?" I touched one of them, admiring the luster of its skin.

She whinnied in response.

I picked the one I prized, holding it my hand by each end and down to Envy's level. She took it in her teeth and began to eat.

"Have you seen a gem? It's amber in color and shaped like a teardrop," I said, watching her eat.

"Are you talking about the pretty, the lovely, the gorgeous one hanging from your neck?" Her head bobbed up and down.

I pressed a hand to my neck. It was there. "How?" I wondered aloud but knew Envy wouldn't have the answer. Still, I was relieved. I removed it, eager to see the gem with my own eyes. Sure enough, the dragon's soul swirled within just as before. But there was more. An outline of an elven eye seemed to bob inside as well, its silvery shape staring beyond what I could see. Devoran had given me the elven sight. He said there would be pain, but I hadn't felt any. Unless I considered all I saw when I looked in the mirror and at Snow White. Had that been what he meant? I wrapped the gem in my fist and clasped it against my chest. There was only one way to find out. "As soon as we find Ryden, I need to be moving on. Can you let Devoran know I appreciate his help?" I spoke as I headed back toward my room.

She trotted along with me. "I will, Silindra. You have my word, my declaration, my bond."

"Thank you." I stopped, bending, so we were face to face. "You are an amazing creature. Better than most I've had the pleasure of meeting. Hold on to that." The words seemed to have come from Snow White and not me, but I agreed with her. The unicorn was special.

"I'm honored, grateful, esteemed you think so. But where are you going now?" She nuzzled my face. Her whiskers tickled, and I smiled.

"I must go back into my room." I hurried in that direction.

"I will keep searching, looking, hunting for Ryden, then."

"That would be wonderful."

She trotted back toward the trees, and I went over to the place where I exited my room. From the outside, my room looked like a crystal cottage. It gleamed in the sunlight, shimmering with hundreds of rainbows. I stepped inside and went over to the mirror. Snow White looked back at me. "Are you stuck in the mirror?" I asked, getting to the point. I already knew the answer, but I asked anyway.

She shook her head.

"Did Sharra send you?"

"I don't think so. I think this did." She grasped the gem held by a chain that resembled the one around my neck. The difference was her gem was red, a deep crimson instead of yellow-gold.

I studied my necklace. "Where did you get that?" I indicated her jewelry.

"It was given to me by Abernathy. It's called the Seal - " she stopped as though she couldn't tell me more. Though she tried to mouth the words, no sound came out, and I couldn't discern what she was saying.

"Are you somehow here to stop me from collecting the magic I'm trying to preserve?"

She gulped. "No," she finally whispered. "I think I'm here to help. Somehow."

I shook my head and noticed hers shook like mine. "Are you inside my head?" I already knew the answer. How it happened, I didn't know.

"I am," she said matter-of-factly.

I had so many questions I wasn't sure where to start. But I got the feeling Snow had many more than I did.

Peering closely, I watched her do the same.

She wore a white dress.

It was simple but elegant.

The collar circled against her neck, accentuating the blood-red of the gem. The sleeves of the dress were long, and her hair was turned under at the ends.

A white ribbon was tied in a bow on top of her head.

She looked very young.

"How old are you?" I finally asked.

INSIDE MY HEAD

"I'M SIXTEEN," Snow said. "But I think I'm having a birthday soon." She cleared her throat, and I noticed she fought back the tears.

"You think?" I asked simply, putting my hands to my hips.

She nodded. "I don't belong in this time. Where I'm from, I recently turned sixteen. Since I've been here with you, I keep getting these flashes of conversations from where I'm from, and I'm hearing people I care about. One of them, Gabe, he said I had a birthday coming up, which would mean I've been away nearly a year."

She looked devastated. A tear ran down her cheek and, as though the feelings were my own, I felt an overwhelming agony.

In my mind, I saw a flash of steel, heard the clips of conversation.

Saw her in a beautiful dress.

Watched her get bitten by a hunter.

Saw her kiss a dark-haired boy who bore a striking resemblance to my Gabriel. (At least the girl had good taste in men.)

She walked through a room full of magical creatures.

Talked to a blonde human, she called Cindy.

I saw her mother. The woman was part elf, but this girl - Snow didn't know it.

The girl believed her mother was dead. There was a funeral. Her mother lay in a wooden box.

Pixilettes I didn't know visited her.

This human girl was unusual, filled with magic, more than she realized.

More even than her friend, the one she called Cindy.

The withdrawn chayot, Oberon, fought the girl. A flash of red light

I gasped. The visions vanished as quickly as they came.

I took a deep breath. "Do you know why you're here?"

She answered with a question of her own. "You're trying to collect the seven magics?"

"Yes, that is correct."

"I think I'm supposed to be with you, help you in some way." The girl moved back, wiping her wet cheeks with the backs of her hands.

"What time are you from?" I whispered, wishing I could take back the question. I didn't want to know.

"Many, many years in the future." Her voice sounded as scared as I felt, though I couldn't believe it was possible. Fear wasn't an emotion that plagued me.

A different time - that made no sense. I switched gears. "You heard what Abernathy said in the cave?"

"Yes." Her lips pinched into a tight line. "I've heard all of it."

I thought about kissing Gabriel and felt my cheeks get hot but only for a moment. I hadn't asked for the girl to hitch a ride in my mind. Until she was gone, she would have to deal. "Can I only see you in this mirror?"

"I don't know." Her voice was pained and anxious.

"It's alright, Snow White," I said, trying to bring comfort. "We'll talk again soon. I need to find my precocious friend Ryden so we can be on our way. If that," I pointed at her necklace, "brought you, perhaps once I complete the quest, you'll be able to go back to your time."

Something akin to deep sorrow changed her features, and it looked like she would cry again. "Oh, Silindra. I'm so sorry."

I didn't understand what she meant, and I knew I didn't want to know. It was better for life to happen without foreknowledge of what would be. Elven magic could produce such gifts of seeing into the future, but I never wanted to experience such nonsense for myself. "No need. It isn't your fault you're stuck in my head or that you're from a different time. My guess is it isn't even your fault you're a human-vampire."

She gulped. "That isn't what I meant exactly. See, G - "

I held up my hand to stop her. I really didn't want to know. Before I could utter a word, Ryden flew into my room. "Silindra, I'm here!"

"Where have you been?" I asked, crossing my arms.

She shrugged, her teeny cream cheeks blossoming a deep shade of chartreuse. "Too much watermelon juice," she said. "Sorry."

"Humph. Well, I hope you're refreshed and ready to go." I lifted the mirror off the wall, deciding I would take it with me.

It was much easier to talk to Snow White while I was looking at her. Better than trying to carry on a conversation inside my own mind.

"Hang in there, Snow White," I said, wiggling the mirror back and forth, but it vanished. "Figures." As I spoke, my mind got hazy. This time I knew what was happening. Snow White pulled back to her time.

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY, Snow Angel. I don't know if you can hear me, but I love you. Daddy's here. And when you wake, the two of us are going to catch up on daddy/daughter time. Okay, sweetheart?"

SHE HAD a family waiting for her. I tucked that information away as I worked to bring the mirror back. No amount of my magic would make it appear.

"If you can hear me, Snow White, I'll figure out a way to bring the mirror back, but we've got to move on."

I know. It's okay, she said invoice my head. It made me crazy, and I didn't like it, but at least she knew I knew she was in there.

Outside, I closed the door.

"Ryden, let's go. We need to find a - " I stopped and glanced at Envy. She stood a little way off, her tail swishing behind her, her bright eyes watching.

"You need the healing power of a unicorn horn, don't you? Am I right, correct, assured?" Envy asked slowly.

"Yes, that's right." I took in her stubby nub of a unicorn horn - at the spot where her horn was trying to grow. "I planned to speak with Lorenze, the leader of the unicorns."

Envy shook her mane. "No need. You can have mine as soon as it's fully grown, developed, supplanted."

I smiled. Meeting this sweet creature, seeing the way she loved so unconditionally, filled me with a joy I hadn't experienced in a while. "Thank you, Envy, but I couldn't ask that of you. Besides, I need it right away, and yours isn't fully grown. Thank you for your kind offer. It's a pleasure to know you."

MY FATE

SHE WHINNIED, stomping her foot as I headed back to where I came in - the waterfall.

The closer I got, the louder the roar of the water.

Mist splashed against my face. Once we were free of the elven city and back at the edge of the forest, Ryden and I would fly to the land of the unicorns.

It would be a quick trip.

Ryden fluttered near my ear. "Where are you going to put the horn, anyway?"

That reminded me that my satchel was missing.

It held more than my things.

It was of sentimental value because Gabriel gave it to me.

I didn't respond.

Ryden didn't know the whole plan yet.

She didn't understand what I was doing.

I would tell her, of course. I told her everything.

But I hadn't found an opportunity.

"Silindra, it's my destiny, my fate, my calling, to do this." Envy's voice roared louder than the waterfall as she raced around and in front of us, blocking our way.

I looked at her, searching her kind, generous eyes. "It won't work, dearest Envy." I reached out to touch her emerging horn but resisted at the last moment. "Does it hurt very much?"

She shook her head. "Not at all, but I promise my horn will be ready very shortly, soon, swiftly." Her long black lashes batted sweetly, but there was no denying the fervor in her voice. I appreciated her passion.

"Envy, I've lived a long time. For a couple of centuries, I even dwelled in the land of the unicorns. I know it takes years for a horn to regrow." I didn't want to hurt her feelings. I would've done anything to keep her from more pain, but her horn couldn't grow as quickly as I needed.

She whinnied, pounding the ground with her hoof. "If you'll have faith in me, I promise, when the time comes, it'll be ready, developed, complete."

How could I tell this fantastic creature, no? I wouldn't. It was impossible. It might take longer than I planned, but if Envy believed it was her destiny, I would honor her request. "Thank you so much, Envy. I'll go to the trolls next then. I need to speak with them about their strength. On my way back, I'll stop here and check on you."

"That won't be necessary. I'm coming with you." She let out a neigh-whinny-neigh type laugh. I had to join in. "Okay?"

"Oh, I - "

Envy interrupted. "Don't say no. I'm supposed to go. Devoran even decided, agreed, approved."

If I took her, we'd have to walk. Or, I guess I could carry her if she let me. "Ryden and I are going to fly."

"How I would love to fly, to soar, to flutter!" Envy closed her eyes. Her lashes trembled against her lids, and her whole body shook like she was concentrating too hard. A black cloud began to form around her legs and rose up until it covered her entire body in its velvety tendrils.

I stepped forward, thinking she was in trouble. "Envy, what's the matter?"

"Stay back."

I stopped, watching in shock as the wispy ebony cloud became a glorious, feathery pair of deep violet wings. Inside my head, Snow

White gasped, and I swallowed. It was as Devoran said, the unicorn possessed a great deal of magic. "They're beautiful," I said, unable to stop myself from stroking the downy feathers. "Your magic is even greater than Devoran knows, I think."

She whinny-neighed again happily. "See, Silindra. I'll fly with you."

"Yes, you will." I rubbed her between the ears before heading through the falls.

Once we were out of Crystal City, we made our way out of the forest, keeping watch for any phantoms. We journeyed by foot since there was no place to take off and fly, and I felt myself and Snow being tugged forward to her time.

This time I didn't fight it.

From what I'd felt and seen, many people were mourning for her.

If I knew of a way to release her, I would, but even Abernathy had said I needed to let this be.

She and I were in this together whether we liked it or not, but I could give her a moment.

"WHAT'S THE PLAN? Continue to take care of her here?" Dorian asked, his voice tender.

Moments like this, where I was able to return to my time and remember me and not that I was inside Silindra's mind filled me with refreshing hope.

"We are getting her out of here and taking her home - to our house," Pops said. "I've already explained the situation to child services. With her father gone and the crazy stepmother out of the picture, I'm her legal guardian again. And I won't leave her in this ridiculous house another second." He paused.

I worried about my dad. What had happened to him?

Ugh, whatever the Seal was doing to Silindra and me, I needed it to be over quickly.

"Good. It's tragic, all that's happened to her and her family. First, her mother dies. Now her father vanishes. Poor Snow. She's too good for this." Dorian was sad, I sensed it even though I wasn't entirely there, in the room.

No amount of trying would wake me up until I was done with Silindra. I knew that now, though I didn't want to accept it.

But Silindra needed me.

I sensed that even though she tried so hard to remain tough - to be the queen she was born to be.

And though I knew her fate, part of me hoped that somehow and someday I could see her once again.

Because, really, was death the end?

"Agreed, son." Pops said, and I concentrated on him and Dorian.

"At least she isn't as red and glowy anymore. Do you think she'll wake up soon?" Dorian asked and my heart melted. He truly cared for me.

"I don't know," Pops responded. "Magic is strange. It's exciting, easy to manipulate if you possess the genes, but it can also be cruel and cunning."

NOT SANE

MY SISTER SHARRA and I had been born with wings, and at a young age, became quite adept at flying. I had a training period, a time where I learned what it meant to beat my wings against the air, turn them, or tuck them according to what kind of flying I intended and where I wanted to go. With the little unicorn, there was none of that. Once we were out of the forest, Envy leaped into the sky and soared like she'd been flying forever.

"It took me ten tries before I could fly without crashing into something," Ryden whispered.

"She's magnificent," I agreed, unable to take my eyes from her.

"This is amazing, wonderful, stupendous," Envy said, her deep violet wings beating against the bright sky.

I flew over to her. "It really is the best, right?" Her giddiness and enthusiasm rubbed off on me.

Snow White was enjoying herself as well.

I've never flown before, she squealed happily. Her voice caught.

Is it all right if I talk? I was nervous about speaking before, but now you know I'm here with you, it would be nice to have a conversation once in a while.

Of course, I answered, wondering if somehow I was only talking to myself, but was so far gone in my insanity, I didn't realize it.

Thank you, she whispered.

For whatever reason, having her with me became a comfort.

If I was crazy, then I didn't want to be sane.

We flew to the craggy mountains where the trolls dwelled, since I determined to believe in Envy and her horn. She could give it to me somehow, but once it was gone, I knew it could grow back.

Putting that worry aside, I focused on the trolls.

We could hear them long before we saw them - their battle cries, trees being torn unceremoniously from their bases, rocks carved with bare hands from the mountain.

"Their war with the elves is still raging," Ryden said.

Devoran's mission of peace hadn't worked. I pushed myself faster over the mountain peaks and along the steep ridges to Ellavera Pass. The scene we came upon twisted my gut. Death raged below. Bodies of the willowy elves and the leathered trolls were strewn across the earth, along with hundreds of trees in various stages of mutilation. Large boulders lay broken and powdery, making the bleeding bodies appear covered in ash.

"This has to stop," Ryden said, her tiny lips trembling in dismay.

"We cannot let this mayhem continue, go on, advance," Envy added. Her eyes filled with tears.

This is awful, Snow White added.

It is, I agreed, searching the battleground. Since Devoran came to this fight, I knew Titan, the leader of the trolls, would be there as well. I spotted him at the top of the pass. Angry lines etched his potato-skin face. The troll yelled orders, spraying spittle into the faces of those unlucky enough to be near. Pointy yellow teeth seemed to swallow his face. Steeling myself, I headed over.

While I was still ten feet away, Titan turned his beady black eyes on me, an angry roar sending spittle my direction. Luckily, he didn't have that kind of range, but I took that as his greeting. Ryden and Envy trailed behind.

"Titan, I have business to discuss." I stayed in the air, beating my wings to keep me aloft so I could look him in the eyes. Had I landed, I would've come to his protruding belly button, and that wouldn't do.

"Can't you see I'm busy? These senseless elves are nothing but trouble, insects to be squashed back into the earth where they came from." He focused his attention on the warriors he was talking to before I interrupted. "I don't care if Devoran wants to talk. I'm sick of his mind games. Kill them all!" he shouted, waving his three-fingered hand in dismissal.

As he spoke, I looked back to talk to Ryden, but she was no longer at my side. Neither was Envy. The pixilette was a way off, near the battleground, hovering anxiously over something. I couldn't see Envy. "Where did she go?" I searched the sky, worry twisting my insides. I hoped she was okay. The trolls cared little for other creatures, especially when they were in the throes of battle. "This is of the utmost importance. I cannot wait."

His shrewd eyes studied me. The trolls looked dumber than rocks. Early on, I discovered that deception was one of their greatest weapons. They were actually quite competent, especially in the art of war. I believed it was because they held no remorse.

"It's for your benefit as well as mine. Otherwise, I wouldn't be asking," I continued when he didn't respond.

He growled. "You have three minutes." A troll standing to the side of Titan suddenly sprang into action, heaving a large wooden chair and placing it behind Titan just as the leader sat.

Impressive, Snow White said.

I snorted internally and said into my mind, Yeah, but if that assistant was a second too late, he'd be dead.

I felt Snow shudder.

Once Titan sat, I lowered myself, pressing my feet into the scraggy earth.

"You now have two minutes," he said, taking a goblet of liquid refreshment from the troll assistant.

I watched in disgust as he drank, sloshing the orange liquid out the sides of his mouth, down his naked chest and onto his trouser-clad thighs, and I wondered how much actually ended up in his mouth.

"I've been to see Abernathy," I said after clearing my throat.

He stopped drinking. The troll assistant took the glass. "Go on."

I had to be careful. If Titan knew I possessed a piece of Abernathy's soul, he would use his impressive strength-laden magic to slaughter me before he would allow me to leave. "He sent me on a quest to collect and save each of the seven great magics." I paused, preparing myself to slather on the compliments. "Trolls hold the greatest strength in the world, and you, Titan, are the strongest of them all." He sat up straighter. "I have been sent to collect the strength of a troll so that I may keep it safe." I didn't add, just in case the troll people were destroyed or became nothing but diluted sloths.

He wiped his mouth with the back of a hand and leaned his elbows on his knees. "And how do you propose I give you this strength, Silindra?"

The moment I was dreading. I didn't know, but I had to think of something. Where did a troll's strength come from? Sure, their bodies were large, tough like a rock, and their skin prickly as porcupine fur (not to mention their blood was black as tar and tasted like oil). But the trolls' strength was more than that. It was a deeply embedded part of their personality. After a thousand years of living in the roughest terrain on the planet, they had to be strong, or they would've died off quickly.

"Well?" Titan prodded.

"Where do you think your strength comes from?" I asked, sending the question back at him.

He guffawed, slapping his knee in glee. "I like you, Silindra. I always have." He leaned back in his chair. "The strength of a troll isn't in these." He lifted one arm and flexed his enormous biceps and winked. I tried not to retch. His bicep muscles were bigger than my head. "It's in this," he continued, tapping his hairless head. "Our brains, dear Silindra." He gave me a surly glare, as though begging me to disagree. "We are more than brute strength, though the physicality of our species is beyond measure in that department as well."

"I believe you're right, Titan," I acknowledged, hoping to appease him.

The troll stood. "I've decided to give you more time. Follow me."

I hesitated. Sure, I was interested in what he had to show me, but I also worried about Ryden and Envy. What were they doing?

Titan didn't wait to see if I followed, he just walked away. Never mind the raging battle, the slaughter happening mere feet away. He turned his back on them and me. With a sigh, I plodded along after him.

He stomped down the mountain's side through leafy trees and plants, over thick, dry roots and yellow-orange flowers. When he reached what looked like the edge, he jumped.

A hitch caught in my throat. Lifting to the air, I hurriedly reached the edge and peered over. More than four thousand feet of sheer rock went straight down until it reached a small valley below. On the other side of the grassy valley was another mountain, as high as the one I stood on.

CHRISTOPHER

WHOA, that's a long way down. Where did he go? Snow White asked.

I don't know, I responded.

Flying over, I scanned the valley below, searching. After several minutes I still hadn't found him, and I was almost at the bottom. Glancing up, I saw Titan looking down at me from a slight lip in the rock. He had an arrogant smirk on his face.

I worked hard not to shake my head in frustration as I flew toward him.

"Find anything interesting?" he asked when we were eye level.

"No."

"Tsk-tsk," he said. The noise sounded like he sucked spit between his teeth. It was annoying, but I ground my jaw together, holding back any comments. The troll leader turned, and I noticed for the first time the oblong door behind him. It blended in so entirely I would've missed it had I not been so close. He pushed, and the door scraped inward.

Not another cave, I grumbled. Snow White wasn't excited either, and her mind slipped through mine, pulling us forward to her time.

"I CAN'T STAY LONG. No one knows I'm here. Gabe would probably kill me if he found out. In fact, I know he would. It doesn't matter, though, not if you aren't around. I'm alive because of you. The vampire queen released me after your party. She's thrilled you killed Oberon and believes no one can stop her since the Seal of Gabriel is gone. She would be right, if not for you. You're the key, Snow. We need you to wake up. I want to thank you for saving me." Christopher sounded so sincere, and my heart ached.

"Don't let the Seal control you. It will try to keep you, make you its own. Okay?" He paused again. "Now, don't freak out, but I figured since we've tried everything else, what could it hurt if I kissed you again? Maybe now I'm your true love, and if you're no longer a vampire, then the Seal can't control you. So, yeah. I'm going to kiss you now." His lips pressed against mine. I felt the sweetness and tenderness of his kiss, but knew without a doubt, he wasn't my true love. Still, I appreciated the effort.

So did Silindra. I heard her sigh.

I TOOK my first big adventure while still an adolescent. Sharra and I dove the depths of the Mediterranean Sea. Abernathy told us many stories of a dragon living somewhere at the bottom and that if we found him, we could claim a wish, anything we desired, and the dragon would grant it. For weeks, we searched and were about to give up when we found a cave entrance. It sloped downward, and a dim blue-green light glowed within, begging us to see what secrets it held.

Hand in hand, we went down together, using our wings to push us farther, deeper. After a long time, we arrived at a glistening cavern filled with all manner of shimmering gems. They sparkled faintly from the ceiling, the floor, and the walls. There were red ones, blue ones, green, and orange ones. As soon as we entered, they began to shine brightly, like a rainbow of light. Dazzled, we sheltered our eyes until they became accustomed to the brightness. And then we saw him. In the center of the jeweled space, a sea dragon lay curled into a scaly ball like that of a white rose. Instead of clawed feet, he had fins and a long tail like petals. Two blue eyes, the color of midnight, peered at us.

"I suppose you're here for a wish, little vampires." He shook his stark white mane, making it dance in the water, and his fins and tail hovered - like a flower floating on water.

"Yes, we are," I said, admiring him.

"Very well. What is it?" He swam closer. His scales were the color of pearls, and he shimmered in the light.

I glanced at Sharra, and she nodded.

When we decided to search for the dragon, Sharra and I had long, sometimes hostile discussions about our wish when we finally found him. So, without hesitation, I looked directly at the dragon. "We wish to see our parents." We had never seen or met our parents. My first memories were of my sister and me taking care of each other. We watched the other creatures have children, saw the way they cared for their infants, and knew we must have been born of parents as well.

The dragon blinked, blowing bubbles from his nose, warming the water with his hot breath. "Are you sure that is your wish?"

"It is," we said together.

"So be it." He blinked his eyes. Instantly, the cavern became dark, as though we swam in ink instead of water. I couldn't see my hands in front of my face.

"Silindra?"

"I'm here."

"What happened?"

"I don't know."

A clicking sound started from a great distance and grew louder and louder as it drew closer. Sharra and I clung to each other.

"I'm scared," Sharra said.

I tried to calm her, stroking her hair. "Shhh, it's okay. You're safe." I was terrified as well, but I didn't dare move. I had no idea where to go or how to get back the way we came. When the clicking sound got so close, I thought it would run us through, a bright light flashed, startling us.

Two large sets of eyes, so beautiful and yet so chilling, peered at us. Light radiated and swirled around their bodies like a lightning storm. Their forms were hard to explain. They were like all creatures and none at all. Swirling unknown entities one second and corporeal the next.

When Sharra and I talked about the experience later, neither of us could decide what we had seen.

I was frozen, my lips unable to move.

"Are you our parents?" Sharra asked. She was usually the shy one, but I was grateful for her courage at that moment.

"We are, and ever will be." The voice was like liquid, neither male nor female, and seemed to reach me to my very core.

"Why didn't you stay with us? Why do we drink blood? Why are we so different from all other creatures?" Sharra asked, moving out of my arms. She asked the questions we craved the answers to.

EYELASHES FLUTTERED

"DEAR ONES, you are the sum of all other magical creatures - the beginning. Blood is your sustenance because magic is strongest there. And we saw no purpose in staying. When we created you, we provided you with each other." They turned, swimming away and taking their strange light with them. We were again plunged in darkness. The clicking sound, which Sharra and I guessed came from our parents, got farther and farther away. Blue-green light filled the salty cavern once again, but the sea dragon was gone as well. We were alone.

Sharra cried.

I forced back my tears, knowing they wouldn't make a difference. From that moment on, Sharra and I became more than sisters, more than girls related to one another. And I promised to protect her, always be there for her. I became the parents she never had. That was several lifetimes ago. Since then, I found myself in hundreds of caves, and every single time I thought of Sharra and the tears she shed for our non-parents.

Standing on the precipice of another, while Titan's ugly troll face scanned mine, Sharra's image crossed my mind. The beginning of the end, I thought sadly. The pull of Snow's time called to the both of us, and I went willingly, feeling myself falling for this family I didn't know.

"SNOW'S EYELASHES fLUTTERED. Did you see them?" Dorian asked.

"Whatever is going on inside of her, I think it's almost at an end. Look at her skin. Completely back too normal. It shouldn't be much longer," Professor Pops said.

"You don't think - She isn't dying, is she, Pops?"

"I'm not sure, Dorian. I hope not. For her sake, Gabe's, and for all of us. She has to live."

"You hear that, Snow? We aren't giving you a choice. Come back."

"WELCOME TO MY SECRET FORTRESS, SILINDRA," Titan said. "Only a select few have been inside and survived to tell the tale.

I grunted my response, walking past him to the doorway in the mountain, its entry bursting with light. The surface my feet touched was smooth and hard, like a polished rock - but it wasn't a rock. It was some kind of iron. It swayed slightly, and I grabbed hold of the rails as my eyes roamed the fortress inside the mountain.

This is incredible, said Snow White.

I agreed wholeheartedly. Metal catwalks crisscrossed each other, reminding me of a spider's web. Tall beams rose to the ceiling where millions of lights shone. It was as though Titan harnessed a portion of the sun and somehow held its rays captive within.

In the center of the mountain, reaching vertically to the top and, I guessed, touching the bottom, was a thick grated tube. Inside the tube were two sets of stairs: one used to walk up, and the other for down. A steady flow of occupants used them, exiting through archways onto the walkways like the one I was on. The walkways led to large, cylinder-shaped holes carved into the mountain.

Cautious, I glanced over the side and felt my throat drop into my stomach. A seemingly endless number of walkways weaved from the center stairs and downward.

I took a deep breath, noting the tang of something sour in the air, like curdled milk. The voices of thousands echoed as trolls, fairies, gremlins, and other magical creatures busily rushed around. It was a city.

"What is this place?" I finally asked.

"This is Varden, the place where all the scientific magic happens," he responded, pushing his bulky body past me and walking briskly along the path. The metal shuddered under his weight, and I held my breath. Snow let out a tiny scream.

It'll hold him, I thought, hoping I was right but unable to follow.

When he reached the stairs, he turned. "Do you want the strength of a troll or not?"

"Of course I do." With feigned confidence, I reorganized my wings and moved along the metal walkway. He started down the stairs, and I followed. I was surprised to see so many different creatures working side by side in seeming harmony. They talked quietly amongst themselves. That's when I noticed each level led to at least ten different tunnels.

"Where are they going?" I asked. We were on the third level from the top and moving down.

"Each level holds a different department. When a fairy, elf, dwarf, vampire - any magical creature comes to Varden, their talents are taken into account before they are put to work. Those two," he continued, pointing at an elf and a troll walking side by side, chatting excitedly. "They work in the efficiency department as part of a team creating sustainable energy."

I was shocked. Elves were killing trolls and vice versa above, yet these creatures didn't appear to care.

I shook my head in awed amazement. A vampire could live a millennium and not see everything. But this indeed was new. Above, all species, including and especially the magical ones, kept to themselves. Elves lived and worked with elves, dwarves with dwarves, vampires with vampires, fairies with fairies. It was the way life went. Order was kept by adherence to the rules. Yet in the heart of the enormous mountain, those lines were crossed - blurred into extinction. Didn't these creatures understand they were messing with age-old regulations? Surely at some point, their blatant disregard would destroy them. And why had Titan created this place? I knew I should be worried. Instead, I was happy. All creatures working together. It seemed like an unattainable dream to me, but now I saw it in action.

"I know what you're thinking." Titan stepped off the stairs onto a metal hallway.

"Do you?" I asked, joining him.

He nodded. "You're wondering how I can allow a war to rage above while this goes on below."

"That is curious," I agreed noncommittally.

"This mountain, and what goes on down here, is of the utmost importance. Devoran and his band of elves think to take the mountain, believing it belongs to them. But, if they were to gain control, they would discover our secrets, and Devoran would never let the work we're doing here continue." His face grew angry. "The elven king is ancient and set in his ways. I won't allow him to destroy everything we've worked for in the name of old-fashioned beliefs. This is the future."

LOSS OF FAIRY WINGS

I UNDERSTOOD TITAN'S PASSION. I held the same beliefs for the quest I was on, to save magic, but I doubted what Titan was doing down here would matter in the long run. The term "science" was thrown around at the last council meeting. It meant little to me. "What else do you do down here?" I asked.

"Let me show you." He glanced over and smiled.

I held my tongue, working to keep my face blank of any emotion.

"You believe I'm heartless, uncaring. Is that it? You're wondering how I can put science above the lives of my people."

"Something like that," I acknowledged.

"It's simple. Down here, we take emotion out of the equation. We take a problem and use science along with our magic to solve it. Up there," he pointed one of his thick fingers toward the ceiling. I understood he meant above ground. "The trolls and the elves fight over an imaginary line - an important line, yes, but imaginary, nonetheless. The elves only desire power. We aren't oppressing them, and they have plenty of food and shelter. But none of that matters. They fight because one of the elven leaders believes the trolls should give over this land."

Titan threw up his hands, flashing long, unkempt armpit hair. "They don't realize if they worked together, used the resources from each side to benefit the other, their lives would be far better." He spun in a slow circle, his arms extended wide. "This, down here, is the true power. Down here, we have harmony, accord, a group of intelligent beings working toward the betterment of the entire world." He moved toward one of the corridors. "Come with me. I want to show you something."

I didn't speak, interested in his opinions, and shocked he even had them. I believed him to be an intelligent brute, but he was more than that.

"You probably think none of this has anything to do with you. Vampires are lucky they can't die of diseases." He raised a finger. "But other magical creatures can, and you, Silindra, should be concerned with that." He waved his hands in a circle. "All of this should matter to you. Once you've seen what we do, perhaps you'll encourage more vampires to join our cause."

"What kinds of sicknesses?" I wanted to take the focus off what I wouldn't do and turn it toward what he found so fascinating about this place.

He gave a knowing smile. "The top rung houses the center for disease control. One ailment our scientists are working on causes the loss of fairy wings. Did you know that happens?"

Worry formed in my belly. Ryden wasn't a fairy, but a pixilette. Still, I wondered if she ever got sick, if her wings would fall off. I never knew her to be ill. "I didn't," I answered quietly, still lost in my own thoughts.

"We've discovered it's a degenerative disease found in the DNA of some fairies. But in the last few years, our scientists have found a cure."

That surprised me. And Snow White.

Cool. I never really thought about fairies getting sick or old, she said.

Me either, I said.

A troll ran up to Titan and demanded his time. "One moment, please." He walked away with the troll.

I glanced out over the railing, down, down, down. It made my head spin.

And I was suddenly being pulled into Snow's time. I sighed in anticipation. What were the brothers, Pops, and Cindy up to?

"SNOW. Merde! I'm so over not being able to get your advice. I need to tell you about Gabe. The guy has lost it. Last night I was at Warehouse Video, and he pulled up in his silver CRX wearing a sword across his back, like some kind of Knight of the Round Table. He looked sexy and completely stupid. Sexy, because I know what he is - the leader of the chayot. Stupid, because everyone else thinks he's gone crazy. I mean, really, if I didn't know what he was, I would've laughed my ass off. He didn't even notice the other high schoolers making fun of him. It was like he saw no one else, just the vampire dude who was sniffing around one of the cheerleaders. Gabe grabbed him by his coat collar and yanked him into the car. I have no idea what happened to him, but I'm guessing Gabe killed him.

"Honestly, I don't know what to think about Gabe. I'm pretty sure he doesn't believe witches did anything to you, so that's good. But, ugh, how do I say this? I guess I'll just spit it out. See, he's - I - Kuso! That's Japanese for dammit. Anyhoo, Gabe asked me out. It was weird. He came into work, sat at a table in my section, and when I brought his water and bread, he was all, 'Hey, Cindy. Want to see a movie with me on Friday?'

"I think my mouth might have dropped open. I was like, 'No way. What about Snow?' His features grew angry, and I thought he might yell or lose his temper or something. But he crumbled like his heart was fractured. He said, 'I just need someone to hang out with.' Well, I couldn't say no to that, so I agreed. I hate to admit it, but after the movie, which was all blood and guts and totally gross, he took me home, and we kissed. Like a lot.

"Please don't be mad. I'm so sorry. But that's why I need you to wake up, so everything can make sense again. See, I think I might have feelings for the stupid, arrogant chayot. Ugh! Please, Snow. Wake up."

Cindy's news didn't upset me as much as it should've. Sure, I loved Gabe, but I knew he wasn't my true love, just like I knew Heathcliff or Christopher wasn't. Hearing her talk about kissing Gabe did hurt, though, and I found myself longing to go back to Silindra's time. Even if it was just for a while.

DNA

WHEN TITAN RETURNED, he was all business and took me on a tour of Varden's immense innards, winding us through the most elaborate structure. Like the inside of an anthill or a beehive, everything was precise and pristine. When we finally reached the bottom level, I sensed a change in the air, like the crackle of electricity right before a lightning storm. There was a vibe, a droning energy. It made me nervous.

"What's this level for?" I asked, moving after him into a tunnel. A reddish glow pulsated to some unknown rhythm, and a coppery smell inflamed my nose.

Titan turned back and smiled, the light bouncing off his teeth with a menacing radiance. "Down here, we extract, study, and discover the delicacies of each creature."

I stopped. "You what?" What did he mean by delicacies?

Snow shivered.

"This is our lab. It's fascinating all we've uncovered about each species."

Tentatively I hurried after him. The farther along the corridor I went, the worse the smell. If Snow could've run, she would have. I sensed her immense desire to turn back. She didn't want to see whatever we were headed into.

When we arrived, I worked not to gag. The large room contained magical creatures in varying degrees of decomposition. Some lay on tables, their innards spread out on top of their bodies. Others hung from the ceiling, their eyes open and vacant.

"What have you done?" I asked, stepping toward a fairy pinned against a piece of wood, his guts pinned around him, his chest opened and peeled back like a banana. "This is wrong," I added, my throat dry. I couldn't swallow. All the excitement and happiness I felt at creatures working together was sucked dry. This would not do. This was cruel and evil. Even worse than what Sharra wanted.

"How can you say that?" Titan asked, throwing his hands up in exasperation, scaring the trolls busily doing whatever it was they were doing. "Without this room, we wouldn't understand how each creature works." He paused and picked up what looked like a walnut still in its shell. "This is the brain of a fairy. Right here," he touched his dirty index finger to the back of the brain. "This is where the ability to do magic is stored. Without this tiny piece of the genetic puzzle, a fairy can't do magic." Then he tapped a portion on the left. "This tells the fairy's body it's going to be small and winged." Then he pointed at the part directly in front. "Right here, this tells the fairy it wants to reproduce every six years." He stared at the thing in awe.

I was mesmerized and revolted at the same time. It was fascinating that he knew such information, but, as my eyes searched the tables, witnessing all the carnage, I couldn't join in his awe.

Titan walked over to a large container filled with a liquid that looked like dirty water. Encased within was another brain, much larger than a fairy's. He tapped on the glass. "This is the brain of a troll."

I stepped toward it involuntarily. Was this why he brought me here? Did he intend to give me a portion of this brain?

"We've studied each and every magical creature, save one." He gave the nod, and two trolls grabbed my arms.

Where had they come from? I let out a roar of anger. How dare Titan think he could capture and study me? I was Silindra, Queen of the vampires. I wouldn't be taken captive!

"You'll regret this." Furious anger roared through me. I felt Snow's fury as well, fueling me on. I yanked my arms together, using the trolls' strength against them, and flipped over, so I faced them.

Flapping my wings, I used my magic to make my wings pointy, like swords, jamming them in the eyes as I stepped forward. In unison, they screamed out in pain, lessening their grip on my arms. I slapped my hands together, knocking the disoriented trolls into each other. They crumbled to the ground. I stomped down, crushing their oversized heads into a dark, pulpy puddle.

My wings returned to normal, and I growled. Changing them like that reduced my magic significantly. It would take days for that kind of power to refuel. I rarely used my wings as a form of defense for that very reason, but the trolls caught me off guard, and I'd reacted.

Whipping around, I faced Titan. "You thought I would be taken so easily?" I stepped toward him, and a clear understanding of what I had to do sank into my stomach. He gnashed his teeth and crouched low in a fighting stance. I stepped to the left while he stepped to the right, a kind of dance, after which Titan's life would be over. In order to retrieve a portion of the trolls' strength, I would have to defeat Titan. It wouldn't be easy, but it had to be done.

Do you know where the Troll's strength lies? Snow White asked.

In his brain somewhere. That's what he said, I responded.

From the nearest table, I picked up a large, razor-sharp knife. The trolls performing their various tasks ran from the room, leaving Titan and me alone with the dead and decaying corpses. It seemed fitting the troll leader would die here, among the creatures he so mindlessly, mercilessly ordered to be destroyed.

Tossing the knife from my left hand to my right, I waited for the right moment. "I suppose I'll cut your strength from your very large, incredibly convoluted head."

Snow pulled away from me. She didn't want to be part of the death.

Don't, I commanded, but she pulled us forward, into her time.

"HELLO, my darling marked one. I just stopped by to check on you to see if the rumors were true. You're still alive, yet you are in some form of eternal sleep. This is a variable I did not foresee."

"Sharra!" Silindra and I shouted her name together.

"I wonder if Abernathy knew the Seal would do this. Knowing him, he probably planned the whole thing with my insipid sister years ago. It's sad, really. I didn't have a second choice. Sure, the hunters selected many marked, but I always only wanted you. There were many reasons. Your beauty, intellect, the way you view the world - but most of all, I wanted you for your genetics. You're special, Snow, more than just an ordinary human girl."

OceanofPDF.com

KILL HIM FIRST

I KNEW Silindra heard all that was being said, and I was glad. Perhaps if she were able to change the past, things could be different in the future, and I wouldn't be marked.

I could just be me and wouldn't even know about vampires or magic or anything supernatural.

"It doesn't matter anymore," Sharra continued. "Whatever the Seal did, it's ruined you. The chayot, the witches, Adam Henry. Ugh, they all believe you'll wake, but they don't understand the Seal's power like I do. You won't come back, and that's for the best. I've chosen another. She isn't as great as you could've been, but she is part chayot."

No! I couldn't let her hurt anyone else.

"Besides, she's nearly ready. She's fallen in love, and her craving for her lover's blood burns within her. It's so strong I can feel it. Soon she'll consume him, and then her body will be mine." She cackled.

I tried to force myself awake. I needed to stop her.

"Stay asleep, Snow. Because if you wake, I'll hunt down and destroy everyone you care about, starting with that dimwitted child leader you call Gabe. That's right, dear one. I'll kill him first." She paused, and I heard her fingernails click against the bedside table. "Maybe I should just solve the problem and slay you while you slumber. Press this knife to your neck, sever your head from your body - "

Something was pinching me, making it difficult for me to breathe, but it only lasted moments.

Sharra screamed. "My hand. I can't feel my hand. What have you done?"

Sweat beaded at my brow as I shook off what happened in Snow's time. My sister, Sharra had tried to kill her, which ticked me off.

But I couldn't be concerned with that now.

I had to focus on ending the altercation with Titan.

"I'm going to kill you slowly, you sick, twisted creature."

"Silindra, you're making a grave mistake."

I didn't respond. His error was thinking he could withhold what I wanted or get away with what he was doing down here.

In one swift movement, I spread my wings, stepped forward, and rammed the palm of my hand into Titan's chest, hoping to throw him off balance.

He held his ground, grabbed my wings in his clammy hands, and tried to rip them from my back.

I roared in pain and drove the knife directly into the troll's immense chest, sinking it deep into his heart.

He snarled, releasing my wings, clutching his hand to his chest. Black blood poured from the wound, through his large fingers, and onto the sterile floor.

He fell to his knees. "You realize I let you win," he sneered.

The fight seemed too easy, but I didn't care. "Give me what I want."

His eyes blinked in pain. "At the top of my brain, between the two hemispheres, is a black nodule. It's the source of a troll's strength. You'll have to use those pincers to crack open my skull. When you remove the nodule, protect it. I fear my kind won't be around much longer, especially if your sister has any say." He took a final, giant breath and collapsed dead.

Pushing back the anxiety rolling off Snow, I lifted Titan's chin and sliced off his scalp before grabbing the pincers.

This is awful. Why did you have to kill him? Snow rambled as I cracked open the skull. I felt her sadness, smelled her tears.

"I didn't have a choice," I growled aloud, wiping the inky blood and other liquids from Titan's head and locating the black nodule he spoke of. With my fingers, I tried to pull it out, but it wouldn't come. "He's a stubborn arse, even in death." I found a set of pincers on a nearby table and used those to get under it. Taking a careful grip, I rocked back and forth to pry it loose. The nodule came out with a pop, flying into the air. I caught it in my palm on the way down. Wiping it on my fur, I studied the thing Titan said held a troll's strength, holding it between my thumb and first finger. It was perfectly round and reminded me of a black pearl. "Now what?" I murmured, wondering how I would get the small black nodule into the stone. Letting the knife clang to the floor, I took hold of the amber stone.

Touch it to the stone, Snow White insisted.

"How will that help?" I asked aloud but did it anyway. As soon as it brushed against the stone, the gem flared to life and consumed it. "Easy enough," I said, standing. "Now, I need to find Ryden and Envy."

I hope they're okay, Snow White said, her voice trembling.

I do too.

Running from the room, I entered the corridor and beat my wings, allowing them to fly me back to the top, to the door Titan brought me through. No one paid me any heed, and I was grateful. When I reached the door, I pushed it open and flew out into the sunshine. Inhaling a deep breath, the stench of battle stung my nose first, but I also smelled fresh grass, pine, and salt.

I shook my sore wings, grateful they were already mostly healed and beat them against the air, lifting higher until I passed the edge of the mountain higher than the trees' tips. The battle still raged on below, both sides suffering massive fatalities. Greasy smoke from oil-dipped arrows clouded the sky. "Where could they be?" I wondered aloud.

Finally, I spotted Envy, pinned down by a large troll.

"Get off her!" I roared, tilting my wings, aiming for the troll. On my way, I picked up a spear jutting from the gut of an elf and ferociously tossed it at the troll's head. It slammed into his skull and went straight through. He fell forward onto Envy, covering her so that only the tips of her wings could be seen. The troll let out a groan, grabbing his head, and then he lay still.

SCENT OF LILACS

I LANDED with a grunt and threw the murderous troll off the unicorn. She lay on her side, breathing rapidly, blowing out air with a snort.

"Envy." I wanted to retaliate and kill everyone but I kneeled next to her, tucking my wings away.

One of Envy's legs was bent at an odd angle, and a wing was torn, several feathers ripped away.

Please be all right, Snow White sobbed. Her sadness tore through me, and I growled the pain away.

All that mattered was that I collected the seven magics, I thought, but my insides ached. It was an awful truth about myself.

"Envy, can you hear me?" I asked, gently touching her side.

She winced and opened an eye. "Yes," she said, the word garbled.

I swallowed. Regardless of my personal desires, I didn't want this poor creature to suffer. "You can heal yourself, right? What can I do to make it easier?"

She snorted. "I must do what I must, what I can, what is necessary."

What did she mean? I shook my head. "Let's get you out of here. I'll take you back to Devoran's, where you can rest and heal. You'd like that, wouldn't you?" I tried to smile and was surprised when tears gathered on my eyelashes. What was this human-vampire doing to me?

Envy lifted her head, her eyes suddenly full of fear. Understanding radiated through my veins, and I yanked the spear from the dead troll's head, stood, and turned in time to jam it into another charging troll. With a loud growl, I used my magic to form a force field around myself and the little unicorn.

Envy's head fell back to the earth.

"Come closer, Silindra," she said.

I got on both knees, leaning my face next to hers. "I'm here, Envy." A faint scent of lilacs surrounded her, pushing back the stench of battle.

Envy took a deep breath. A black swirling mist surrounded her, just as it had when she gave herself wings. I hoped this time she was healing herself.

When the mist vanished, her body was still broken - except her horn. It spiraled up to a point, fully-grown and beautiful, swirled with silver and indigo. It was the most exquisite thing I'd ever seen.

"Envy, your horn. It's stunning."

She smiled. "It's my gift, present - " She coughed, and blood dribbled from her mouth.

She's dying. Oh, Silindra, don't let her die. Please. Please. Please. She can't die. No, Snow wailed.

There is nothing I can do for her, I answered, angry her profound grief affected me.

Yes, there is. You have magic. Use it. Do something.

I'm sorry. There is nothing I can do.

"Silindra, to possess the healing power in the horn, you must remove it while I still live. I don't have long. Do it quickly, rapidly, speedily." She coughed, and her lungs rattled.

I searched the terrain for something sharp. There was the spear, but it was only sharp at the tip. I needed a sword or a knife. Plenty of elves and trolls had both, but I'd have to release the shield I held over Envy and me to get to them.

"Hurry, I don't have long."

I knew what I needed to do, but it would mean causing the little unicorn more pain. Close your eyes. Shut yourself away if you can. What I have to do -

You don't have to do anything! The stupid gem doesn't save you! It doesn't help you remain queen. In fact, it lets you die, and if you don't help Envy, you'll deserve it! Snow yelled so loudly it was like she banged metal against rocks inside my mind.

Her words angered me. "You have no idea what you're blabbering about. Keep quiet."

Envy peered at me, her eyes achingly complacent.

"I'm sorry," I uttered.

She nodded and closed her eyes.

I grabbed the horn in one hand, wrapped my fingers around the edge near her forehead, and tore the horn off. Like snapping a twig from a tree, it took little effort. Envy and Snow screamed at the same time. Then the unicorn nickered and was quiet.

You are an animal. You're cruel and evil, and you should know that Sharra wins. Not you. And just so you know, you die at the hands of your lover!

Her anger swirled and pulled, and I knew she was taking us forward to her time.

"HELLO, my friend. It's Valentine's Day. I hate to admit this, but I've thought of no one but you. I want so much to tell you how I feel when your eyes are open. I love the way you look at me, the way your features are always easy to read. You have this naiveté thing going on, but I know you possess passion. I've sensed it when you're near, and I long to taste it, bring it out in you.

"It kills me that you chose Gabe, that you've swapped blood with that sleazy hunter. I have no one to blame but myself. Gabe told you how he felt, and I never said anything. Maybe you don't think of me at all, and I'm just another boy to you. But Gabe, he's an idiot. He told me he was in love with you, but he's off doing who knows what with Cindy. I think he's using her. If that's the case, he's going to be in a lot of trouble. I've seen the way she looks at him, and she most definitely cares for him - way more than he deserves.

"Don't be too mad at her. I think if Gabe pulled his head out of his uppity ass, he'd realize Cindy is perfect for him. And that's because you are perfect for me. Snow. Sweet, amazing Snow. What can I do to help?"

I knew his voice, but I was too shocked to believe it. He felt those things for me for how long? He never said anything. Never given me a hint.

Dorian loved me?

HARD CHOICES

"YOU THINK I wanted to hurt Envy? I didn't. It breaks me up inside to know I caused that little unicorn pain. But I had no choice. This is the cost of war. Death." I forced the angry fear Snow's words caused to the back of my mind. I touched the horn to the gem, and I watched as it disappeared inside and rested in the center, the pointy end facing upward.

I knew Envy was dead, and I had to bury her. She deserved a more honorable memorial than what I could give at that moment, but I had to do something. I dug a deep hole with my clawed hands, then using my magic, I lined it with lilacs. Carefully, I picked her up and placed her inside. "I'm sorry, Envy, but I'll make sure your sacrifice wasn't for nothing." With more magic, I covered her in more lilacs. Tears dripped from my eyes, and I knew it was Snow crying more than me, but I let them fall. The unicorn had been a bright spot in my life for a few moments, and I would never forget her.

All around me, trolls banged against the forcefield, desperate to get in. The sound was annoying, and I ignored it the best I could until I buried Envy. "Let this part of the land never be free of lilacs," I said, as sorrow rolled off me in droves of magic. I loved the little unicorn and mourned her loss. As soon as my magic touched the dirt, a small grove of flowers grew where she was buried. "Nothing save true love can ever disturb Envy's resting place, the greatest of all the unicorns."

I stood, eyeing the trolls who were still trying to get into the force field. Angry now, I shoved them away with magic before releasing the shield. Then I killed my way from one end of the field to the other, keeping my eyes open for Ryden. When I finally saw her, I nearly fell over in relief. She buzzed above the head of a troll and dropped a tiny pebble on his head. The troll, distracted, looked up, and an elf stabbed the troll through the eye. "Ryden!" I yelled, bashing a troll in the head with a club I picked up as I rushed toward the pixilette.

She saw me and her eyes lit up. "Silindra, where have you been? I was so worried. Gabriel is looking for you. He has news."

"Gabriel is here?" I turned in a circle, searching for him. When I found him, he was fighting three trolls at once. My skin warmed like I was set on fire, and my cheeks flushed.

He seemed to sense me because he turned, and his gaze held mine until he smirked. In three moves, he slaughtered the trolls and ran to me.

Ryden landed on my shoulder just as Gabriel wrapped his arms around my waist. He lifted me slightly and ran away from the battle using his vampire speed. When we reached the other side of Ellavera Pass, he stopped. I took a deep breath, working to forget everything that had happened, and wrapped my arms around Gabriel's neck.

"Hello, lover."

He smiled, and it was glorious, immediately lightening my mood. Snow was still upset, but I ignored her.

"Hello, yourself." Leaning in, he kissed me. Soft at first, sweet. But I needed more and pressed my lips to his, pushing open his mouth so I could taste him with my tongue. He reciprocated, his tongue circling mine.

"You two are gross," Ryden said and flew off my shoulder.

I smiled against Gabriel's lips, but only for a moment before kissing along his jaw and down his neck to the pulsing vein. Pulling back my lips, I sank my pointy canines into his soft flesh. Gabriel moaned, pressing my body tightly against his. I drank deeply, my lust for him more potent than ever before. In was several long seconds before I was finally satiated and withdrew my fangs, kissing my way back to his mouth. His lips pressed against mine fiercely. My body ached for his touch, and I pushed him into the grass. I knew we couldn't consummate our love the way humans did, but there were other things we could do, and I hungered for all of it.

He chuckled. "Right here, my love? Aren't you afraid someone will see us?" He removed the swords at his back and lay down.

"Not even a little bit. Are you?" I straddled him, breaking open his vest so I could touch his taut chest. I undid the string on his trousers and was about to remove them when Ryden flew toward me, her hands covering her eyes.

"I can't see what's going on, I swear, but," she cleared her throat. "The King and Queen of the Fairies and their court are coming this way."

I growled, standing, gnashing my teeth against my need. "I hate interruptions!" This was a stroke of luck, though. "Ryden, would you please request an audience with the king and queen on my behalf? Gabriel and I will wait here for their response."

"You got it." She flew off.

I realized Snow hadn't said anything while I kissed Gabriel, hadn't said anything since she yelled at me after what I did to Envy.

Are you not talking to me? I asked, stomping around the grassy meadow, flapping my wings sporadically and trying to reclaim my sanity as Gabriel stood and adjusted his clothing.

I don't see a point, she responded in a sulky voice.

I guess that's true. We're almost done collecting the pieces I need for the gem. I'm sure you heard fairies are nearby. I'll take a heart, and then I'll return home to collect what I need from a vampire and a hunter. Once that's done, perhaps you'll be free.

You don't know anything, she said.

Well, then tell me. What do I need to know? I waited for a response, but none came.

Fine, if she was going to ignore me, then I would ignore her. "Ryden said you had news. Why are you here?" I asked Gabriel.

He stood beside me as we waited for the fairies to arrive. "Not news, just information. Sharra is worried you're working against her. She wanted me to check on you, your whereabouts."

I put my hand in his. "I won't be well until I've had my fill of you in every way."

"Yes, my queen," he said, but he kept his eyes forward in the direction Ryden had flown.

Something felt off about Gabriel. He seemed less willing, less excited. Or maybe it was just all I'd gone through. Not to mention the human girl dwelling in my head. I had no doubt that was making a difference as well. I wanted to ask him about it. Knowing one word from him would alleviate my fears, but the fairies came into view before I had a chance.

Ryden introduced us.

"We heard of your plight," the king said. We would be happy to provide a heart - on one condition."

"What's that?" I asked.

"When you win, we will seek an audience with you and discuss it then. Do we have a deal?"

"I accept those terms," I said.

The queen took the heart from one of the fairies in her court, who gave it up without hesitation. As before, I touched the heart to the gem, and it disappeared into the stone. I thanked them profusely, forcing myself not to shed any tears. Snow was getting stronger, and it was difficult not to feel her emotions. Afterward, the fairies held a small funeral to honor the one who so willingly sacrificed her life.

When the funeral ended, the fairies bowed and moved on. They truly were the most giving of the magical creatures. As I watched them go, Gabriel seemed to stiffen beside me, releasing my hand.

And Snow pulled me from my time and into hers.

"EVER BEEN LET down by those you care about most? I have. Recently.

I believed something I did to be honorable, a good thing. And it is. Was. Is. But Professor Pops and my brothers don't think so," Gabe said.

He sounded tired.

"It's so frustrating. I expected them to be supportive, but they said what I did was no better than what the vampire queen is doing. I don't know what to believe anymore. The other chayot, including Holden and Jaycee, agree I did the right thing by killing the hunter. They're almost too willing to please, though. Their opinion, while appreciated, doesn't mean as much to me as Professor Pops. Dammit!"

No! Christopher. He couldn't be dead. Please no!

"Snow, there's something else Professor Pops and my brothers aren't happy about. I'm dating Cindy. I've fallen for her. I love her. While you've been like this, Cindy was there for me. First as friends. Then we became more. I hope you can understand and that if, no, when you wake, you won't be angry."

Gabe forced a harsh chuckle. "This is nuts."

I wanted to be sad, to feel let down by him, but while I loved Gabe and always would, I knew he wasn't my true love.

"Whatever is going on with you, I thought you should know," Gabe said. "And that brings me to my next point. Heathcliff, and, well, all of the guys, think I should kiss you. I told them we've kissed - a lot. But they believe if you receive a kiss from your true love, you'll wake. Once, I thought maybe I was that guy. Not anymore. Still, I'm willing to try again. It hurts to see you this way because I'll do anything to have you wake up. So, I'm going to kiss you."

I felt his soft lips feather mine.

My body stirred, but I didn't wake since my mind, and Silindra's were still fused.

THE LITTLE IMP

AS THE KING and queen and their court continued toward their destination, Ryden, Gabriel, and I made good time getting home.

We arrived at the castle swiftly and parted ways. Ryden said she needed to get cleaned up. I wanted to do that, as well. It was too long since I bathed. Gabriel went to report to Sharra that I was found, and all was well.

When I entered my room, two male humans greeted me. Neither wore clothing on their top halves, and their trousers hung low on their hips.

My mouth watered.

"Well-kept humans," I muttered, taking my fill of one and then the other.

No doubt, they were a gift from my sister, and I didn't want to hurt her feelings.

I'd be doing more than that soon enough when I proved to her once and for all I was and would always remain ruler of the vampires - when I possessed the power of all magics inside the gem Abernathy had given me.

That would be soon. I still needed the essence of a vampire and the blood of a hunter.

I wondered if I would have to slay my sister to retrieve her essence - not that I could. I also pondered which hunter I would need to drain to give the blood to the gem.

When I finished with the humans, I sent them away and had my servants bathe me. I stepped from the water, and they wrapped me in thick towels, rubbing my furry skin dry.

Once they were done, I went to my favorite golden chair, allowing my servants to brush and groom.

Zenny, the little imp Abernathy created for Sharra and me when we were young, peeked at me from one side of the gilded oval mirror hanging on the wall. His lemon-yellow hair swirled like frosting over his head.

"Hello, Zenny. Have you missed me?"

He gave a deep bow, and I hid a laugh behind a hand. His brightly colored plaid clothing always provoked my amusement. "Of course. Did you do anything fun while you were away?"

I thought about all that occurred since I went to see the dragon. "I wouldn't use the word fun, but it's been interesting."

He leaned over and beckoned me to come closer. "I need to tell you something - privately." He sniffed his nose haughtily at the human vampires working through my sapphire blue hair and snarled fur.

"Get out," I said, waving the girls away. I didn't care that only half my long hair was combed or that my fur still looked matted.

I only groomed myself for my sister anyway.

She was always making comments about my appearance.

I thought she was too vain for her own good. Always wearing fancy clothes and peculiar shoes on her feet. When they were gone, I leaned in.

"What's going on, Zenny?"

I've met Zenny. He looks the same, Snow said in my mind.

I didn't respond to her but waited for Zenny.

The little imp was sweet, but I wondered where his loyalties lay - with my sister or me.

I would know soon enough.

"I adore both you and Sharra," Zenny began, running a hand over his tiny copper-colored face. "But you are the queen, and I feel obligated to tell you I think Sharra is planning to dethrone you." His light brown eyes darted from side to side, as though he was worried someone would hear.

"Go on," I prodded, a thick worry forming in my gut.

"I heard her talking to Gabriel about making sure you were permanently gone before they began the war."

"What? What war? Sharra doesn't dare to go against me." But I thought of all she did in the last millennium, and my worry changed to dread.

And Gabriel? Surely, he was on my side.

If she was planning something, he would only be pretending to do what she asked. Right?

"Sharra intends to take your place as ruler of the vampires. Her magic has become so strong, Silindra. It's troubling."

Anger burned away my dread. "Don't you dare worry about me. My sister doesn't have the resolve. And if she does, she'll soon learn she has no idea who she's messing with." I wrapped my fingers around the gem hanging at my throat. "Are you sure she was speaking to Gabriel? My Gabriel?"

"Yes," he nodded, his poofy hair bobbing in earnest.

Was he genuinely conspiring with Sharra? Had Gabriel betrayed me? I remembered our times together and couldn't believe it.

I would find him and ask.

If what Zenny said was true, Gabriel would die.

Exiting the bathroom, I moved swiftly through my bed-chamber, heading to the window where I searched for Ryden. She wasn't far, speaking with another pixilette. I waited until they were finished and then waved her over.

"Silindra, I was just coming to speak with you." Ryden landed on my shoulder and nestled up to my ear. "Something is going on. I'm not sure what. Two of Sharra's hunters have broken the bond Sharra held over them, and the chayot are rumored to be coming out of hiding to go against her."

The end is coming, Silindra. I'm so sorry. I sensed an acceptance come over Snow. I longed to ask her what she knew. I had a feeling it was important, but I needed to talk to Ryden, and I needed to find Gabriel.

"Ryden, I have something to tell you too." I went back to my room and sat on the edge of my bed. Ryden flew from my shoulder so I could see her.

"I have so much to tell you, but no time to do it," I began, feeling frantic.

"I'm listening," my little pixilette friend hovered in front of me.

I grabbed the gem dangling at my neck. "See this?"

She nodded.

"I've been collecting important components that have to do with the seven magics. Abernathy said I needed them to defeat Sharra. So far, I've retrieved five. A piece of Abernathy's soul, the eternal sight of an elf, the strength of a troll, the healing horn of a unicorn, and the giving heart of a fairy."

Ryden nodded again, her gauzy wings and daffodil hair moving as one. "To what end?" she asked.

I HAVE A SURPRISE

I SHOOK MY HEAD. "It doesn't matter right now. What does? I still need two more magics: the essence of a vampire and the blood of a hunter." I clenched my hands together, trying not to believe what Zenny said about Gabriel.

"I'm not sure how to collect those, but I'm working on it. The thing is - " I closed my eyes and took a deep breath.

It was becoming clear I would need to kill my sister to win. If that was what it took, I would do it.

"If something happens to me - " I began.

"Nothing will, Silindra," Ryden interrupted, wringing her hands.

I appreciated Ryden's belief in me. "I know, but if it does, I need you to promise me something."

"Anything." She flew around with nervous worry. "I need some watermelon juice to calm my nerves. You shouldn't talk like this."

I held out my hand, hoping she would land. Thankfully, she did but started pacing around my palm and up and down my fingers. It tickled. I smiled. "Just promise me you'll take this back to Abernathy. Can you do that?"

She stopped and put her hands on her hips. "You're asking me to willingly enter the cave of that dragon?"

"If necessary, yes, that's what I'm asking."

She took in a long, shuddering breath, her whole body and her wings shaking in fear. "Fine, I'll do it. But nothing, and I mean nothing better happen to you. Understand?"

I laughed. "I understand, my friend."

Snow sighed.

Recognizing she intended to go to her time, I went to the chair by the window and sat down.

"What is it, my queen?" Ryden asked, concern evident in her high voice.

"Nothing, I just need a minute." My mind pulled from my time to Snow's.

"YOU'VE GOT TO GET UP," Heathcliff said. "Spring is here. I don't understand how you're still sleeping after eighteen months. I brought you some of your bloodlust tea even though I know it's a waste. I'd offer you my blood if I thought that would assist you in waking. Anything to help. Even a kiss."

His lips touched mine. He definitely wasn't my true love.

"Nope, I should've known kissing you wouldn't do any good. I love you, Snow, but we both recognize our love is more along the lines of brother and sister than that of lovers. Oh well. I tried."

I sighed, feeling such gratitude for him.

GABRIEL KNOCKED on my door and walked in. He glanced at Ryden as he placed a light kiss on my lips. "I need to talk to you. Alone."

"I was just leaving." Ryden sniffed, rolling her eyes.

After she was gone, I stood, feeling oddly nervous about being in his presence. Had he betrayed me? "What is it? Everything alright with you? You seem out of sorts." I studied his face, searching for a telltale sign that what Snow White and Zenny said was true.

Gabriel grinned, and my insides turned to mush. "Of course. I just wanted some alone time with you. Ryden is always around lately. Plus, I have a surprise." He knelt in front of me, grabbing my hands and lifting his face. I bent down, planting a kiss on his glorious lips. Gabriel wrapped his fingers in my hair, deepening the kiss, entwining his tongue with mine. My body responded with a deep hum. No way could he be plotting against me. He said he loved me. After several long minutes, he pulled back, standing. "That wasn't your surprise.

Come on." His eyes twinkled, and I couldn't resist.

I followed him out of my rooms and though several hallways. Down a dozen set of stairs, past the kitchen, and into the cellar.

Snow White seemed skittish, her thoughts a jumble of nerves until I was ready to scream.

The happy giddiness I felt from Gabriel's kisses and how he looked at me wore off, and nervous anger settled in. When we reached another door, I stopped. "Is this necessary? What kind of surprise is down here?"

"Trust me," he smiled.

Did I trust him? He'd never given me a reason not to. Always the perfect gentleman. Kind, sweet, caring. He would never harm me. But the feeling, the one that told me to slaughter the deceiving bastard, kept getting stronger. The cellar held endless barrels of wine mixed with blood. The sweet aroma and the smell of old wood and dry earth did little to settle my nerves.

Maybe he has a new blood wine to show me? I hoped that was it.

But he didn't stop when the wine barrels ended, continuing down another damp corridor. Magical blue light lit the walls, giving Gabriel's skin an odd hue. When we reached another door leading to another set of stairs going deeper into the earth, I planted my feet. "Seriously, Gabriel. What do you have to show me that would require us to go way down here? You know I'm not a fan of being this deep underground."

"Not too much farther," he said.

There's still time to kill him, I thought, knowing I would if I had to. He was strong, but he was only a human-vampire while I was an original. I followed him, working to make my breathing and my steps sound confident, relaxed. But the odd feeling in my stomach grew.

We walked past the dried meats, kept to feed our non-vampire guests, and arrived at another set of downward spiraling steps.

"I'm not going any farther until you tell me what is going on," I finally said, flexing my wings, preparing for whatever he might try to do.

He rushed toward me, kissing me with such passion and fire, my knees went weak, and my hunger for him intensified to the point of boiling over. Moments later, he released my lips and gave me a seductive look.

"You know we don't have to go so far to hide our affections. My - " My head became foggy and my body lethargic.

"Close your eyes, my queen. It's for the best."

OceanofPDF.com

HAD HE POISONED ME? I did as he said because my lids were too heavy to do otherwise, but not before noticing the wisp of a malevolent gleam cross his features.

It won't be long now, Snow whispered through the dark.

I know, I responded, letting the anger evaporate into an overwhelming sadness. I didn't know how, but Gabriel intended to kill me, and he found a way. At that moment, I understood whose blood would seal the gem. It would be Gabriel's. I didn't know how it would happen, but without a doubt, it would. I didn't believe Gabriel could betray me. It seems my arrogance has gotten the best of me.

I'm sorry, Silindra, Snow said.

"OH, man. I can't believe Professor Pops and the guys talked me into this," Daniel said.

Daniel! He wasn't dead.

A chayot had stabbed him at my birthday party.

His blood had been everywhere.

But he was alive, and I was so happy.

Relief rushed through me, and I wondered if perhaps he was a supernatural as well.

"They're confident one of us is your true love," Daniel went on. "Remember those times we used to sleep out on the tramp? I've been thinking about that a lot lately. Even then, I thought you were beautiful. And I do love you, but I'm not in love with you. In fact, I'm in love with a girl by the name of Jaycee. Okay, she isn't just a girl. She's part chayot, and I only met her through Gabe, but man, she takes my breath away. She's strong, willful, kind of a total pain in the ass, but she's also sweet and giving. She's the most awesome - "

"Stop whining like a baby and kiss her, Daniel. I'm next."

"Salvatore, get out. This is my time with Snow," Daniel returned.

"Fine, but hurry up."

"Okay, so here goes, Snow," Daniel said.

Daniel pressed his lips to mine, but there was no spark. Not even a little bit.

"Yeah, nothing. But I'm not surprised. You know, I'm just going to say this. You don't need some stupid dude to kiss you to wake up. You know that, right? I mean, sure, we all love you, but I hope you love yourself enough to know that you are way better than all of us combined. This isn't a fairytale, this is real life, and you're way cooler than any princess from some kid's movie. So, do yourself a favor and wake the hell up."

MY HEAD WAS FOGGY, as though I'd been in a long, drug-induced slumber.

Snow was still there, inside my head, but she seemed to be hiding. Or, perhaps she was still thinking about her wonderful family, in her time.

What's wrong, I asked her.

Then I remembered Gabriel and tried to sit.

But my hands were tied above my head.

"Gabriel," I hissed. The hunter had kissed me, poisoned me somehow, and I was lying on my stomach on a slab of white granite.

The ropes he bound my hands with were stronger than any material I ever encountered, and I guessed magic was infused within the chords. I tried to lift my wings, knowing the edges could cut through anything, but my wings were also bound tightly, as were my feet. I turned my head, trying to locate Gabriel.

"I'm here," he said, though his words sounded harsher than any I heard from his mouth when he spoke to me.

"How dare you do this to me? Release me this instant, and I might let you live." The words tore from my throat in a violent frenzy.

"As Sharra's personal assassin, I wouldn't be very good at my job if I freed you, now would I?"

Sharra's assassin?

I was such a fool.

Snow White was breathing heavily, hyperventilating.

It's happening. I can't believe it's happening, she said.

Her frantic panic calmed me for some reason.

"You know the word assassin comes from the fact that to be one - an assassin - you have to be double the ass, right?"

Gabriel chuckled. "You always were quite clever." He knelt so I could see his face. "Here's how this is going to go. As per Sharra's instructions, I'm going to kill you." A flicker of pain crossed his brow. "You know, there's still a way out of this. Take on a human body. Become the vampire you were meant to be, and then this will all be over."

I tried to yank myself out of the ties. "Never! I like who I am," I growled. "If Sharra wants to torture and kill me, tell her to come down and do it herself. I want to see her face."

I wanted to know what power, what magic he possessed to kill an original, but it seemed pointless to ask. Soon enough, I would find out.

"The torture is all me, Silindra. Sharra wanted me to end your life quickly, but how would that do any good? Accept a human body. Then we can be together, as we are meant to be." He pointed to the corner of a room.

A human girl huddled there. Her arms wrapped around her knees. She was covered in dirt and I guessed Gabriel had kidnapped her from the human realm.

"I've marked her," Gabriel said. "She is prepared for you, my queen." At that moment, he seemed the slightest bit forlorn. Possibly even hopeful that I would do what he wanted.

But his gloom only infuriated me further, and I snarled, tugging the ropes again.

"No! You marked an innocent girl, and now you want me to steal her body? You disgust me. I can't believe I ever thought I loved you." I rocked back and forth against the ropes.

I wouldn't give up. There had to be a way out.

"Don't bother trying to escape. You're secured with cords dipped in dragon's blood and sealed with the healing power of a unicorn and something else. What the something else is doesn't matter. It's a secret I've been commanded never to reveal. Just know you will never be freed, and you will be able to feel pain unless you agree to take on a human body."

He paused, picking up a cat o' nine tails, the edges covered in jagged metal. "Only I can free you."

He bent down so I could see his face. "Just accept what's meant to be. Evolve like the rest of your kind and take on this human form." He pointed at the girl in the corner again, and she started to cry.

I had no idea how to put myself into a human form, and I didn't care to know. "Never!"

The cat o' nine tails came down against the backs of my legs.

I felt the ends cut into my thighs and waited for them to heal, but they didn't, and I realized his weapon must've been doused in magic as well.

But what kind?

Originals couldn't die, and any injury healed almost immediately.

"Stop it, Gabriel. Please. I don't want my life to end, but if that's what you're here to do, then do it. Don't torture me. It's beneath you."

Gabriel made a face like he'd eaten something sour. "The torture is for all the times my body was beneath your disgustingly hairy one. All those times, your rough, gigantic hands touched me, and in ways, no man should be touched by an animal like you."

His words cut worse than the whip, and I felt something inside me break, shatter into a million pieces.

"You never loved me?" I whispered.

Obviously, the answer was no, but I had to ask.

It didn't help that Snow was crying.

"How could I love you while you wear that disgusting body? You're a freak!" he shouted, whipping my legs again.

UNKNOWN CREATURES

HIS WORDS INFURIATED ME. I was the first - an original. A creature born of all seven magics and a portion of them dwelled within me. The way I looked, the way I acted, every part of me was precisely right. "You're the freak!" I shouted. "You live only because the blood of a vampire flows in your veins. Don't ever think you're better than me. You're nothing but a whipping boy, a slave to the real master. If not me, then my sister."

He hit my wings this time, and I felt whatever was on the ends bite deep. Then his face was next to mine. "You were born first. That is true. But that doesn't make you better. It makes you old. It makes you inadequate. You refuse to see what is right in front of you. Evolution is the answer to eternal life. Instead of choosing to progress, like the rest of the vampires, you stay like this." He yanked on my hair. "In an ugly, good for nothing body. You could've been so much more. Your sister wants that for you. I want that for you. Now it's too late."

I spit in his face. With the back of his hand, he wiped away my saliva before picking up a dagger. It gleamed in the low blue light, and I knew it wasn't an ordinary dagger. Magic surged through it, but it wasn't like any I'd ever seen, and I sensed it would kill me. I thought about our parents. Those unknown creatures we saw deep in the ocean. Had they provided the means to kill me? It seemed the only logical answer.

"This is going to hurt," he said, sounding anything but mournful, and began hacking off my wings.

The cry that burst from my throat was a sound, unlike any I've ever heard. There was pain, of course, but it was more than that. It was the knowledge that my life would end, the last of my kind, and there was nothing I could do about it.

"Take me away from here," I shouted.

Snow complied at once, her mind pervading mine.

"HEY, girl. It's me, Sebastian. Gosh, this is embarrassing. I've had a crush on you for the longest time. When Gabe said he was in love with you and that you two were going out, for the first time ever, I wanted to fight one of my brothers - for real. Like literally kick his too-skinny ass. But then I saw how you looked at him, and I realized my feelings didn't matter. You cared about Gabe, and I couldn't stand in the way of you two.

"Not anymore. That jerk-face-no-good-wannabe-chayot-leader can shove it where the sun don't shine. Besides, now that he's dating Cindy, he can't say a word about how I feel toward you."

He paused, and Silindra and I waited.

"I love you, Snow. You hear me? And I know a few of the guys have tried to kiss you, so I figure, what the hell? I'm going to try it too." His warm mouth enfolded mine.

I sighed but knew he wasn't the one either.

"Snow, did you feel that? All the love I poured into my kiss? I guess not. I'm such an idiot."

Silindra clung desperately to my mind and my time, but we were being pulled back to hers.

"SILINDRA, are you awake? I'm still here, inside. Silindra! It's me, Snow White. Can you hear me?

I could hear her, but, for the life of me, I couldn't figure out what she was talking about. Who was she? "I don't get it," I said. My mouth felt stuffed with cloth, and I knew I was back in the cellar with Gabriel.

"There's nothing to get, Silindra. You still refuse to do the right thing and take on a better body, so I have no choice but to kill you now. Is there anything you wish to say before I end your life?" His face was next to mine, but my eyes were blurry. It looked like there were four of him, then two, then six.

Tell him he needs to promise you something. Tell him he needs to place one of your tears in the gem, and then take it to Ryden. You hear me, Silindra? Tell him! The strange voice was shouting inside my head, but I heard myself whisper the request.

Gabriel's face softened. "Of course, Silindra. I may be a lot of things, but I will honor this request if for no other reason than to prove that I could've loved you had you chosen to leave your revolting body behind and take on a human one." He yanked the gem from my neck and pressed it against my cheek. "Alright, you hairy leech. Cry."

I tried, I did, but the tears wouldn't come. Until suddenly, I heard the girl in my head sobbing.

I'm so sorry, Silindra. I'm so sorry this had to happen to you. I'm sorry Gabriel didn't truly love you. I'm sorry you were betrayed. But know this. Gabriel gets what he deserves. It's his blood that seals the magics in the gem. It's okay to cry. I promise it'll be okay.

Her tears reached my eyes, and I felt them pool. One dropped and landed on the gem.

"There. There, Silindra. I'll put you out of your misery." He grabbed hold of my body and flipped me onto my back.

I flinched as an agony like nothing I ever experienced tore through me. He raised a long blade above my chest and pressed slightly.

A smile formed on his wicked lips. "The last of the ugly originals - gone forever."

From inside, I felt the girl wrap her arms around me, as though she were trying to give me a hug.

I'll make everything right. Somehow, I will. I promise, she cried.

Her words brought a smile to my lips. I believed her. She would make everything all right. "Thank you," I said aloud.

Gabriel flinched, but only for a second before he jammed the glowing dagger into my body.

BACK TO THE FUTURE

"I, Snow White, do solemnly swear to right the wrongs." My eyes opened, and I stared into the surprised eyes of Dorian. The edges were crinkled with gladness, and he had a huge grin on his face.

"I, Dorian, swear to help you right those wrongs in any way I can," he said, his voice overflowing with emotion as tears filled his eyes.

His face hovered above mine, and I wondered if he'd kissed me. At the thought, I blushed and tried to sit up, conking my forehead into his.

"Sorry," I said, my throat scratchy. It was seconds ago that I witnessed everything happening to Silindra, feeling her pain and suffering through her anguish.

So many emotions dashed through my body.

But I was beyond glad to be back in my time and looking into the face of one of my favorite people in the whole world.

I was also sick inside at Silindra's death, the lies and deceptions Sharra had spewed, and I was determined, resolved, to accept my destiny. Silindra's death came with the knowledge that I was responsible for the fate of not just vampires, but all magical creatures.

Kenmei was exactly right when he said the Seal of Gabriel was created for me.

Did he know I actually assisted in its creation? I felt bad now for laughing in his face when he told me.

"Hey, you okay?" Dorian asked, rubbing his forehead, his face etched with concern.

"Better than okay. I'm back." I smiled, patting his cheek with my hand. His warmth reminded me it was a long time since I had any blood. My fangs pressed against the inside of my mouth.

"I'm so glad you're awake. I can't wait to tell everyone."

Dorian turned to leave, but I grabbed his arm with one hand and felt for the gem with the other. It wasn't around my neck. "Wait," I said, and he turned back.

"Yeah? Did you need me to stick around?"

"Did you kiss me just now? Right before I woke?"

He smiled, showing off all his straight teeth and the dimple in one cheek. "Wouldn't you like to know?" He brushed a thumb along my jaw, and I swallowed. My throat was parched. I needed blood.

As though reading my mind, Dorian tilted his neck toward me. "Go ahead."

"It's been a long time since I had any blood, are you sure you want me to drink from you now?" It was hard to talk because my fangs were in the way.

"It looks to me like you could use some. Take mine." His neck touched my lips.

"Holy crow, don't make me fish-slap you," I said, shoving a hand against his chest. I really, really wanted his blood. He smelled so good, like manly body wash and sandalwood, but I didn't want to hurt him.

He laughed. "Fish-slap. That's a good one. I like it better than the original."

I smirked. My fingers curled into a fist in his gray polo shirt. "Why are you always offering me your blood? What's the deal?"

A dark smile curved his lips. His mouth was so close, his Scope and Mountain Dew breath made my eyelashes flutter. "I want your mouth against my neck. I want to feel my skin part when your fangs press into me." His heart raced like a pack of wild horses.

I shook my head. "You're twisted, Dorian." But I wound his shirt further around my fist. I needed blood. My throat burned, and I licked my lips. "I'll be careful if you're sure you don't mind?"

"Not at all."

"Then come closer," I said, my throat screaming.

He complied, pressing his neck against my mouth again.

I licked his vein, and he shuddered. Parting my lips, I extended my fangs and bit down.

His head rested on a pillow next to mine, and his clean, slightly wet hair tickled my cheek. When I began sucking, his breath caught. "Snow, it feels so damn good. Better than I imagined." He wrapped his arms around me in a tight hug.

In response, I sucked harder.

His blood tasted sweet and sexy, like sugared oranges and milk chocolate.

My mind automatically started counting while I drank.

I hit twenty before I finally stopped, and that was difficult.

The vampire part of me wanted to drain him dry.

But this was Dorian, and I refused to give into my vampire desires entirely.

Withdrawing, I pushed him away. "Are you alive?"

His eyes were glazed over, and his skin looked pale. "I'm awesome," he whispered but turned so that he was lying on his back beside me. "I'm just going to rest my eyes a minute before I tell everyone the good news."

"Sure. Go ahead." I had to smile. He was adorable.

"Hey, Snow," he muttered, his voice soft and sensual.

"Yeah?"

"I missed you."

With his words, comprehension flooded my heart. I had been gone for a long time. While my mind was with Silindra, my body stayed here.

My dad, Professor Pops, Cindy, the guys - they all suffered because of what the Seal of Gabriel had done.

But I was back!

It had been hard on me, experiencing Silindra's life, watching events unfold that ended with her death.

But how much harder had it been on my family, the people who loved me? My body lying here, unmoving for so long.

"I missed you too," I responded.

Dorian let out a snuffling-snort as he rolled onto his stomach. One hand rested near his chin.

He was sound asleep.

"So, so much," I added, brushing wayward hair from his clean-shaven jaw.

Satisfied he was okay, I took in my surroundings.

The bed rested against a long wall, situated in the center between two bay windows. Large, comfortable-looking pillows in reds, blacks, grays, and whites were propped against each other along the window seat.

A red chandelier hung from the center of the vaulted ceiling.

The walls were a deep shade of red and pinstriped black.

The curtains were billowy and white, as was the carpet and my bedding. Distressed black furniture and a white couch with thick black stripes complimented the room.

It was lovely.

The nightgown I wore was white. Three pearl-shaped buttons held the gown closed at my neck.

Next to one of the buttons was a drop of Dorian's blood, perfectly round and red like the walls.

I tried not to think about who took care of my body while my mind was away.

Taking in a deep breath, I glanced at Dorian.

My blood haze was already wearing off, and I felt a little guilty for drinking from him. Since the beginning, he seemed more than willing to offer himself, but something or someone always stepped in the way.

Not this time.

And I had to admit his blood hummed through my veins in a way no one else's had - including Gabe's and Christopher's.

"What's your deal, Dorian?" I whispered, moving my hands through his hair.

"Please tell me you didn't kill him."

I inhaled in surprise and turned toward the sound of Salvatore's voice.

He was there as well as seven others. They all gawked at me from the doorway.

"He's sleeping," I said, a pang of happiness shooting through my veins.

"Thank goodness," Professor Pops said, walking toward the bed.

"Yeah, otherwise we would've been doing a whole other kind of celebrating," Sebastian snorted.

That's when I noticed the cake in Pops' hands. Candles glowed in the white frosting.

"Dorian, wake your lazy ass up. Snow's back," Bart said, smiling. The other guys jumped, high-fived, and hooted around the room.

Dorian groaned. "I know, and it's perfect because today's her birthday."

"No duh, doofus. We're going to sing," Daniel said.

"Care to join us?" Professor Pops asked. His gaze fell to the blood on my nightgown. I tried to cover it up, and he sighed.

Dorian started singing, his voice muffled by the pillow his head rested on. The guys joined in.

I couldn't help but laugh. Then it hit me. I had been asleep for two years. I had no doubt a lot changed, but one thing hadn't - my love for these eight amazing men.

When they finished singing, I blew out eighteen candles.

Smoke twirled upward, writhing and winding like slow-moving dancers.

Dorian rubbed at his face and moved to sit on the bed next to me.

Professor Pops placed the cake on my lap, and several of the guys sat on the bed.

As I studied these amazing men, my eyes caught hold of a flash at the door. I glanced up and into the brilliant hazel eyes of my hunter.

"Christopher!"

RED HOT

TIME WAS A flIGHTY fiEND, I thought as I watched Cindy rummage through my closet. Not the one at my little cottage of a house, but the one in Professor Pops' mansion.

"What about this one?" Cindy asked, holding out the dress my dad and stepmother had brought home for me.

I swallowed down the raw hurt over my father leaving. Shook my head. "What else?" I eked out.

Cindy was getting frustrated. She threw her hands up. "I need a break. Your turn." She gave me a haphazard look and I smiled, getting off the chaise.

"Fine," I said, watching Cindy fall onto the same chair I'd been sitting in.

As I pushed through all of the amazing dresses Pops had purchased for me, I considered again the strangeness of time. How seconds flickered in slow motion until an instant later, weeks simply vanished, disappearing without a backward glance.

A month had passed since I woke from my time with Silindra.

Though I was still desperate to end her - Sharra - the vampire queen, I wasn't meant to be her next victim, which took the bullseye off my back.

But she also said if I woke, she would kill all those I loved.

That worried me, but only slightly.

I hurt her somehow when she tried to kill me in my sleep, and she seemed to have gone into hibernation to heal or lick her wounds or whatever.

Still, I told Professor Pops and Kenmei all she said and that she already selected another victim.

The news sent Kenmei, Professor Pops, several brothers, and even Christopher on a wild goose chase to try to find the new marked, but so far, they hadn't had any luck.

Since my dad had left and was nowhere to be found, Adam Henry, the man I called Professor Pops, had become my guardian.

While everyone searched, Professor Pops had kindly demanded I complete the last seven months of my final year of high school.

It stung that my dad didn't want me anymore, but I was grateful to Pops for taking me in, and I reluctantly agreed to his wish.

He had talked to the principal, and after taking several tests, I was permitted to finish my senior year as though I hadn't been in an enchanted sleep for the past two years.

It was weird. So weird, but I promised him, and I was trying to enjoy life at Salem Academy and all that entailed.

When I was with Silindra, Professor Pops decided to make the Seven Magics Academy and official school and had invited a select few supernaturals to participate.

Several were witches, and one was a gargoyle while another was half-dragon. Classes were currently being held in Pops' basement. I overheard him talk to Kenmei about the need to expand, but nothing had come of that yet.

Dorian and Gabe were already graduated from Salem Academy, as was Cindy. I missed her being in school with me. It was a little lonely sitting by myself at lunch, and I didn't speak unless spoken to.

People gave me looks and whispered about me.

Instead of jokes about me falling or being klutzy, I became Mono Girl, which was worse.

Thankfully, my friends were kind of still around.

Cindy taught magic at SMA (Seven Magics Academy) now.

She was good at it too.

The few times I watched her, I was impressed by her ability to get her point across. And she was passionate about what she taught.

She was inspiring. Of course, she still had a seriously crazy love of fashion, while I still mostly wore jeans and tee shirts.

Nothing fancy.

I kept my long hair pulled back in a ponytail, or sometimes I just brushed it and went, leaving it wild.

Classes at the human high school were simple enough.

I could've taken my GED and gotten the whole high school debacle over with, but Professor Pops wanted me to experience all that high school was supposed to be, including activities.

Oddly, Christopher also sided with Professor Pops, telling me to finish out the last few months.

I hadn't seen much of him lately, but I was glad he was okay.

Fall break was coming up. That meant a week of not worrying about school, but I agreed to go to the stupid autumn formal.

Dorian agreed to go with me.

At least that was something to look forward to though I wasn't thrilled about having to wear a fancy dress again.

"How about this?" I held out a black full-length dress. It was simple. Elegant.

Cindy huffed. "You aren't going to a funeral. Hang on." She went back to her phone. Probably texting Gabe.

I put the dress against my body and went over to the full-length mirror. I thought it looked great but that was why Cindy was here. She liked fashion. I liked to think about it as little as possible.

She locked her phone and stood. "Hang that dress up and put on this red one." She walked past me and over to where all of the dresses were hanging, removing a beautiful but short dress.

"You're a spoil sport," I said but didn't mean it. Hanging up the black one, I took the one Cindy recommended and slid it up over my hips. "Don't you think it's too short?" I made a face, tugging on the hem.

"Nope. Try these on," she said, handing me a pair of black heels.

I slid them on and stood. They fit well and made my already long legs look even longer, but they felt like stilts. "I'm not doing it. No way. These things will be the death of me."

Cindy laughed, moving to stand behind me so she could adjust the dress. "You look amazing," she said, fiddling with the spaghetti straps.

I grimaced. I looked like something. Not like me.

While I watched, Cindy used magic to style my hair and do my makeup. I turned back and forth in the mirror, trying to find the awkward girl I was before the Seal took hold of me.

She was gone.

In her place was a woman.

One that had stumbled right out of one of Cindy's fashion magazines.

Full red lips.

Dark eyes with a wisp of silver.

Long dark hair that hung in loose waves around my shoulders and nearly down to my waist.

"Can you use your magic to make this a little longer," I asked, tugging at the hem again.

"Hell no. It's what all the kids are wearing these days. Besides, you look hot. Gorgeous. Every guy is going to want your number, and every girl is going to want to kill you."

"That isn't what I'm going for." I pulled at the sweetheart neckline, wishing it was higher. Thankfully I didn't have much cleavage.

That would've been obscene.

Cindy batted my hand away. "That's exactly what you want. Hell, if I was going to be at the dance, even I would be jealous." She crossed her arms, admiring her work.

"That's a great idea, Cin. Why don't you come? Please?" I put my hands together, begging.

"I can't. I have a date with Gabe." She made a face, and I ignored the way my heart jumped at his name.

I didn't have feelings for him anymore - at least not romantic feelings.

But it was hard seeing Cindy and Gabe together.

In a way, I felt like a failure that my relationship with Gabe hadn't worked, but theirs was.

"Besides, Dorian will be there with you," she said.

"That's true." I was so thankful he was going.

We would dance and have fun, and I wouldn't have to worry about being alone.

"Fine, but I really think I should change."

She shooed me toward the closet exit, and I found I could walk in the heels without an issue.

Vampire genes, I thought.

In my bedroom, I grabbed my clutch, the one Cindy said I had to take because it would hold my school id card, lip gloss, and a fifty Professor Pops gave me for emergencies.

I felt weird carrying the purse. Why not a backpack? That was what I asked Cindy.

She rolled her eyes.

"If I wore my Converse, I could just tuck it all in my shoes. That's much easier."

"Merde," she swore in French following after me, picking up her purse and keys as she walked past my bed.

I laughed. "Fine, but if I lose the dumb thing, you can't be mad." I held up her clutch so she would understand what I meant.

"Yes, I can. Don't lose it. I love that bag." Her blue eyes sparkled with mischief. "In fact - " She paused and tapped her finger against her chin, thinking about something.

I guessed a spell.

"Got it." She said some words I didn't understand and then smiled smugly.

"What did you do? Will I turn into a toad if I lose it?" I shook my head in exasperation.

"No, but that's a good idea." She winked, putting a hand on the doorknob.

Someone knocked.

We both started.

Cindy recovered first and moved me out of the way.

"If it's Dorian, I'm going to tell him to wait at the bottom of the stairs so you can make a grand entrance and he can admire your beauty."

"Or catch me when I fall," I said, only a little exasperated.

She made a face and opened the door.

It was Dorian, and she sent him downstairs, then closed the door and turned to face me.

"It's showtime. You ready?" She gave me another quick once over. "Yes, you are," she said, answering for me and opening the door.

"I can do this," I said.

She nodded as I passed her.

"Have fun," she said in her sing-song voice.

I snorted and kept walking, taking hold of the banister out of habit. It really wasn't hard to walk in the heels, but it felt like it should be.

"You look like a queen. Own it," Cindy hissed.

I released the banister and moved down the stairs with as much confidence as possible.

Dorian stood at the bottom, and I smiled with relief.

He was my friend, and he loved me.

He said so while I was in and out of consciousness.

I didn't think he meant in a romantic sense.

It was more like the kind of love like I felt for Gabe.

His eyes got big as he took me in.

He looked amazing too, wearing a deep gray suit with a red tie that was slightly askew. His dirty blond hair had been cut but was still on the longer side, and his gray eyes shone intently.

When I reached the last three steps, he held out his hand.

"Damn, Snow. You're beautiful." He held a container in his other hand and I guessed it held a bracelet corsage.

"Thank you," I said, feeling suddenly shy.

"I'm only telling the truth." He opened the container and slid the corsage, which was red flowers that matched the red of my dress, on my wrist. "You ready?"

"As I'll ever be." I took his elbow when he held it out.

Before we could get out the door, Professor Pops and the brothers were there, all except Gabe.

They took pics and gushed about how great I looked.

We went down the front steps and to a waiting Mercedes. Dorian held the passenger door open for me before getting in. "This is going to be fun," he said, peeling off down the driveway.

LOVE AND LIGHT

AS WE ENTERED THE DANCE, it was like everything moved in slow motion. I took the whole scene in at once. The crowd of students dancing and talking - most of them I didn't know. The music blasting so loud it seemed to be coming from inside my mind. The scent of several hundred blood-filled bodies pummeled into me, and I held my breath. It wasn't that I craved the blood, only that it was powerful, and a bit overwhelming. Although, when I smelled Dorian's blood, I decided I wouldn't mind a taste. I glanced at him, but he was focused on the decorations.

The gymnasium was enchanting. Thousands of paper snowflakes dangled from the ceiling. A disco ball spun from the center, filling the darkened room with white dots of light. Sparkling white bunting that was supposed to look like snow covered the walls and perimeter of the dance floor. The tables were covered in white tablecloths. In the center of each sat an oversized snow globe and chocolates wrapped in white foil.

As we skirted the edge of the gym, Dorian and I looked at each other and laughed. He took my hand. "It's like they created this dance, especially for you without even knowing it." He kissed the back of my had, his amused eyes focused intently on me. I laughed.

"I swear I didn't compel anyone," I said, swallowing down my nerves.

"If you say so," he said, pulling me closer to him. "Want to dance?" His breath smelled like his minty toothpaste, but his blood caused my pupils to dilate and my fangs to press against the inside of my mouth.

"Sure," I said, and let him pull me onto the dance floor. I wasn't a dancer, but it didn't matter. A distraction was in order.

Besides, Professor Pops would ask me if I danced, and I didn't want to let him down.

Dorian walked us through the crowd until we were directly under the disco ball, avoiding the mosh pit near the DJ booth. Just the thought of trying to dance there gave me hives. I was glad Dorian didn't lead us over that direction.

He glanced there, though, and my eyes followed. "Please tell me you don't want to dance in the pit."

"No," he said, his eyes squinting. "It's just - " He shook his head.

I followed his gaze, giving the group a closer look.

Sharra was there. She twisted and writhed among the dancers.

They seemed to swarm around her, like bees in a hive.

She would bite one of them on the neck, suck briefly, lick the wound closed and move on.

"What the ever-loving hell?"

Sharra heard me and looked up, her fangs buried in Tanner's neck.

Her eyes sparkled with wicked mischief as she withdrew her fangs and licked her lips.

"Stay here," Dorian said.

"No." I grabbed hold of his arm. There was no way I would let him go over there and do - what? It wasn't like he could stop her, and she could and probably would kill him.

I felt the Seal of Gabriel stir inside me, not awake yet, but ready. I pulled at Dorian, making him face me.

"Don't go anywhere near her. She isn't killing them, just drinking from them. It looks like she's here to bait me into coming after her. If I do, then those humans could get hurt. We don't want that. Ignore her."

"You're kidding?" He was shocked. "She's using them like an all-you-can-eat buffet, and you're saying we should let her get away with it?"

I wrapped my hands around his waist. "What's the alternative? Try to kill her and end up murdering innocent humans instead?"

I shuddered at the thought. "Let her drink from them. At least they'll live," I said firmly.

His hands found my hips, and I caught his gaze, knowing if I had to, I would compel him. Tension coiled through his body, humming like a new car.

He was trained to fight against evil, and Sharra was evil, but for his sake and those at the dance, we couldn't start anything.

That was precisely what Sharra wanted.

"You're serious?" he asked again.

"Completely." I tried to smile, but it didn't work.

Dorian gritted his teeth so hard I could hear them grinding. "I can't do that," he said.

I was stronger than him, and I held him firm. "I won't let you leave. If I have to make you stay, I will." I would do anything to keep him safe.

There was no way I would let Sharra harm him.

At that moment, I realized how much I cared about Dorian.

Just the thought of him getting injured brought out the anger in me, and I felt the Seal flare to life.

Dorian flinched, pulling his hands away like I burned him.

"Sorry," I said, dropping my hands to my sides. "Why don't we go? If we leave, I have a feeling she'll leave too. She's only here to make me irrational."

"We can't leave these students alone with her."

"Fine. Then you stay here, and I'll go over there." I crossed my arms and waited for his answer.

"That's not how I'm made, Snow. Where you go, I go. I won't stand by and watch you walk into danger." Dorian's gorgeous eyes held me fast, and I knew he meant it.

My hands turned into fists of frustration. "Stop being an ass. Don't you get it? I can't have you going over there because then I'll be too worried about you getting hurt."

Dorian sucked in a breath and then pulled me into a bear hug. As he did, he wrapped his suit coat around me. "Okay. Okay. I'm sorry."

I was confused and furious but drawn to his body like I was the bee and he was the honey.

His lips grazed my ear and I shivered. "You really need to calm down," he whispered. "You're glowing for crap's sake."

So that was why he wrapped me in his suit coat. "Damn." I took a deep breath and glanced down. He was right. My body was coated in a red shimmer. The power of the Seal.

I took another deep breath.

Relax, I told myself.

Otherwise my time as a typical high schooler would be over.

I closed my eyes, resting my head against Dorian's chest, allowing him to hold me a few moments.

He felt good. Safe. He smelled like expensive cologne, and under that, I could smell his blood.

My mouth watered, but I shook the desire away and took a deep breath, trying to quiet my mind.

It was challenging with Sharra so close to Dorian.

I glanced over my shoulder in the direction of the mosh pit.

"She's gone," I said.

At Sharra's absence, the tension in the room vanished, and the gym was much livelier and lighter.

"Yeah, I saw her disappear as soon as you started to glow." His hold on me softened, and he slid back, placing his hands on my waist. "I think she's testing you, searching for a weakness."

"You're probably right." I swallowed, hating that I was in this predicament.

"Damn right, I am," he said softly, his voice teasing. He kissed my cheek, allowing his lips to linger.

Electricity danced along my skin at the feel of his breath on my face. His neck was so close to my mouth.

I grabbed hold of his jacket and twisted his coat into fists, pulling him closer, his blood calling.

"You want me?" he said, finding my gaze and holding it.

I smiled, exposing my extended fangs; his eyes widened as his heart began to race.

"Right here?" he asked, pulling me against him.

I grazed him with my teeth, enjoying the feel of his skin beneath them. The vein pulsed faster and faster. I sank my teeth into him, and he groaned quietly. When I began to suck, I felt his body tense but in a different way than when Sharra was here.

"That feels so good," he whispered, his fingers working the back of my neck, sending tingles along my veins.

Dorian tasted so good, like love and light and goodness.

I reached the count of ten and had to use all of my willpower to pull away, casually licking the wound closed.

"Get a room," someone yelled.

I smiled shyly as Dorian studied me. "I want to kiss you," he said.

I wanted that too, but I knew it was mostly blood lust and physical hunger. I still had feelings for Christopher.

Complicated, lustful feelings I was still trying to work out.

Since waking, I drank from the hunter more than once, and we kissed several times. His kiss didn't wake me from the enchanted sleep the Seal placed on me, but I thought it was stupid to worry about such things.

I woke from the two-year sleep on my own, so the true love's kiss thing was probably just part of the vampire queen lore.

Christopher was special to me, and I wouldn't kiss someone else while I still considered myself bound to him.

I licked my lips and shook my head. "I can't."

"Christopher," he said, straightening and looking away.

"Sorry, Dorian." How could I explain that I thought I loved Christopher, but I also had tender and sweet feelings for Dorian, too, not to mention whatever I still felt for Gabe?

I didn't want to make the wrong move, which meant I was doing everything wrong. I sighed.

"Don't' worry about it." He put a respectful distance between our bodies, and I immediately missed his nearness.

But it was for the best.

The rest of the night, we did our best to have fun.

Dorian was easy to talk to.

He told me about college and his classes and the parties he went to. It seemed like he was having a great time there, and I suddenly wondered if I was too childish for him.

His life sounded so grown up, and I was still just a high school girl.

At the end of the night, he walked me to my room.

I stood on my tiptoes and kissed his cheek.

"Thank you so much for taking me to the dance. I had such a great time." My belly ached with wanting him, more of his blood, and to know what his lips tasted like, but I didn't give in to the temptation.

I had enough problems without making a mistake like that. "Goodnight."

"Night, Snow."

I watched him walk to his room and disappear behind the door.

With my supernatural hearing, I heard him sigh, then proceed to get undressed before getting into the shower.

Inside my closet, I took off my dress and changed into PJs before washing my face.

When I climbed into bed, Gatsby was there, purring quietly on the end like old times. He returned a few days ago, and we made up.

I scratched his head between his ears. "Night, Gatsby."

He opened his eyes, blinked once before curling into a tighter ball, and going back to sleep.

COME AWAY WITH ME

THE NEXT DAY Christopher came by the house, but instead of heading straight for me, he winked before going to Professor Pops' study.

I followed, but I wasn't able to hear what was said and figured his office was probably spelled against eavesdropping.

At least until Professor Pops raised his voice. "Fine, but if anything happens to her, I will hunt you down and finish what the vampire queen started."

I felt my eyes grow wide, and contentment filled my heart.

I was so loved.

It was a feeling I cherished beyond belief.

"If anything happens to her, I'll expect nothing less," Christopher answered.

Those two and their testosterone-filled bullheadedness.

Sheesh!

Christopher yanked open the door to the study, nearly running me over. When he saw me, his face lit up.

"Hey," he whispered, taking my hand in his. "I want to take you away for the weekend - just the two of us. What do you think?"

Him and I alone? The idea sounded exciting, but it also made me nervous.

We hadn't gone all the way, but once we did, and he possessed me in every way, would he still want me?

I needed to speak with Cindy.

I wasn't sure I was ready for that next step, with him or anyone.

"Snow?" Christopher lifted my chin with a finger, his beautiful eyes searching my face. "If you don't want to go, we don't have to. I just thought - " He trailed off and drew me to his chest, his muscled arms encircling me.

"I love you, Snow. More than I believed possible, more than I've ever loved anyone. If you need time, you can have it." His words came out anguished, and I wondered what happened in his life that made him hurt so much.

I met his gaze. "I love you, too."

Even as I said the words, I knew my love for him wasn't the kind poems were written about, but that was okay.

I was young.

There was no doubt I loved his blood and kissing him.

Maybe the rest would grow with time.

"And I do want to go away with you." I traced the outline of his chest muscles through his black button-up shirt. "But not yet. I promised Cindy we could hang out today. I need a little time to talk to her, and then we can go."

I watched different emotions flicker across his features and heard a low rumble in the back of his throat. "Whenever you're ready." He smiled, but it was more than that. It was a seductive promise.

I worked to contain my lust. "Can't wait."

He pressed his lips to mine.

Gently at first, caressing.

I opened my mouth, and he deepened the kiss.

In an instant, our kiss changed from sweet to sexy.

His hunger for me flickered low in my belly, and I almost changed my mind.

Cindy would get over it.

When his lips left mine, he blazed a trail from my chin to my jaw and down my throat.

"See you soon?"

Professor Pops' voice broke the spell. "Can the two of you move away from my office? The farther, the better, please. I've got work to do."

I nodded, mortified, and cleared my throat, covering my mouth with my hands.

"Sorry, Professor." I grabbed Christopher's hand, and we ran down the hall, through the kitchen, and to the front door.

My thoughts were conflicted.

When his lips were on mine, our bodies touching, I didn't want to stop, but I couldn't allow myself to move to the next level of intimacy either. I wasn't ready.

Christopher watched my face, his eyes dancing with amusement. "I know you're confused, your body telling you one thing and your mind saying something else. And that's why I'm going to leave. Make it easy on you, because I want you certain. I want your body and your mind on the same page." He opened the door. "No regrets," he said, tapping me lightly on the nose. "I'll see you later."

I nodded, tears filling my eyes. No idea why. "'Kay."

As soon as he left, I grabbed a jacket. I needed to talk to Cindy, and I couldn't wait until she came over.

If this going all the way business was going to happen, I needed her input.

I climbed on my purple Schwinn. Sure, I could've vampired myself to Cindy's house, but I liked bike riding.

Pedaling and the wind against my skin allowed my mind to mull over my problems.

On the ride over, a million different worries ran through my head - school, Sharra, Dorian, Silindra, Christopher, Cindy, and Gabe.

I almost turned around, realizing I hadn't told Professor Pops about seeing Sharra, but I figured Dorian would have, and if the professor had thought it was urgent, he would've said something.

Instead, I kept pedaling, turning my focus to Cindy and Gabe.

My feelings for Gabe would always be special, but I didn't want him the way I wanted Christopher.

What about Dorian, I thought and immediately pushed that away.

He was a friend.

Just a wonderful, supportive friend.

When I reached Cindy's house, I skidded to a stop, kicking down the kickstand and parking my bike in her driveway.

At the door, I knocked.

Her mom answered and said Cindy wasn't there.

That she picked up a shift at Bertilini's.

I almost gave up and went home, but once I got on my bike, I decided to head over to the restaurant. I knew I was procrastinating.

That should've been a clue as to my real feelings for the vampire hunter, but it wasn't. After locking up my bike, I went inside the restaurant.

The most delicious smells filled my nose. Italian red sauce, basil, garlic, sweet butter, and freshly baked bread swirled in the air like an aromatic cloud.

I wished I could still enjoy those flavors, savor them.

Cindy saw me and smiled. Placed a couple of water's on a patron's table and waved.

MY BLOOD IS YOURS

"SNOW! HOW WAS THE DANCE?" Cindy asked, slapping the menus down on the hostess table and rushing to me.

Even in a uniform - white ruffled shirt, black pants, black tennis shoes, and a black half apron wrapped around her hips - she still looked like a model.

Her blond hair was pulled back in a high ponytail, and she wore some shimmering shadow on her eyes and pink lip gloss.

"Hey, Cindy," I said, hugging her back.

"Spill. I need details." She released me, studying my face.

"The dance was fun. Dorian was amazing, but - " I glanced around the dimly lit restaurant. "Can we talk?"

"Is this about Dorian or Christopher?" She put her hands on her hips, a slight smirk on her pouty lips.

"Christopher."

"So, this is serious?" She went back around to the hostess stand, and I followed.

"Yep," I said, trying to sound like it was no big deal.

Cindy looked at her watch. "My shift ends in thirty minutes. I'll finish here and then shower and change. But I can meet you at your house in like an hour. There's something I want to talk to you about, too." She wriggled her brows.

I knew from experience an hour meant two, but that had to be okay. I needed to practice patience.

"Fine," I said. "But please hurry. This is urgent-top-secret-I'm-dying-to-tell-you stuff."

"Sounds like - "

"Cindy," her manager barked, moving toward us like his butt was on fire.

She held up a finger and focused on him. "Hey, Jake."

I didn't stick around. She needed to work and I needed to chill.

The early evening air was stick with humidity. We might get snow.

I climbed on my bike and rode home. It was worth noting that I considered Professor Pops' house my home. That made me happy. I parked my bike near the front door and went inside.

Dorian entered the foyer at the same time I did. "Hey, Dorian."

He held a thick roast beef and cheese sandwich in his hands and his mouth was full. In response to my salutation, he winked.

"That looks delicious." Smelled good too.

He nodded. Chewed what was in his mouth. Swallowed. "It's respectable. But hey, after I'm finished devouring this sandwich, I'm going downstairs to do some training. Want to join me?"

I had some time. "I'd love to."

"Cool." He stuck half the sandwich in his mouth and chewed while I followed him back into the kitchen.

I sat on one of the stools and waited, watching him eat before washing it all down with a glass of milk.

"Ready?" He patted his flat stomach.

"About damn time," I said, but smirked.

He lightly punched me in the arm as he passed me and headed down the stairs to the basement. Once he unlocked it, we went through the museum and into the training room where I picked up a pair of swords, and he took a broadsword.

"Take your stance," he commanded.

I did as he said as his sword sailed toward my head.

Moving faster than lightning, I blocked him and parried, shoving him harder than I planned.

Surprise on his face, he sailed backward, smacking into the far wall before crumpling into a heap on the floor.

"Sorry, Dorian." I ran to him and helped him stand. "Sometimes, I forget the vampire in me."

He chuckled. "So do I," he said, taking his sword in both hands and coming after me again.

For the next hour, metal clanged against metal as we practiced. I was getting better, or at least I thought so until Dorian swiped my leg, and I found myself falling.

I wasn't going to go down without taking him with me, so I knocked the dull side of my long sword into his shin.

He grunted in pain and fell.

I didn't see my mistake until he landed on top of me.

Our eyes met.

Dorian winced but tried to cover it up. "That hurt."

"Sorry, not sorry," I said, sticking out my tongue.

He chuckled as he pushed at some of the hair covering my face.

His fingers caused my skin to tingle, and training was all but forgotten.

Instead, I wanted his blood.

With one movement I flipped us, so I was on top, straddling his hips.

He let out a yelp of surprise and grinned. "I can always tell when your vampire instincts kick in." His eyes studied my lips, and I knew he wanted me to drink from him as much as I wanted to.

"Is that right?" My fangs extended, and I opened my mouth, flashing them.

He lasered in on them, and his heart picked up speed, but he didn't try to get away.

Instead, he tilted his head, pulling me down. "Go ahead, Snow. My blood is yours."

Mesmerized by his vein, I sank my fangs deep into his skin, careful not to be too rough.

Blood filled my mouth, and I sighed with pleasure as I sucked. He wrapped his arms around my waist, holding me to him, and I drank until I counted to ten before releasing him.

His eyes caught and held mine.

"One of these days, Snow, you're going to see that I'm more than a blood donor."

I licked my lips, enjoying the blood and my haze until his words sank in.

Guilt settled over my hunger. "I'm so sorry, Dorian. That isn't how I want to treat you. I know you're more than that. You mean so much to me. I don't know what I would do without you."

He leaned toward me, cupping my butt as he pushed me against him. "You mean so much to me, too. When you're ready, I'll be here."

I knew he was serious, but I needed to lighten the mood.

Hadn't I just agreed to go all the way with Christopher?

More or less.

Allowing myself to feel like this for Dorian wasn't a good idea.

Besides, the guys said Dorian was a total flirt.

"What about your Harvard girls? Won't they miss you?"

He made a face, and I stood, pulling him up with me.

"They are sweet and fun, but they're just distractions. My heart already belongs to someone else." He picked up the swords and put them back in their place on the wall, making it impossible to see the expression on his face.

"Who's the lucky girl?" I was joking until he gave me a look filled with intensity. "Oh." He meant me. "Dorian," I went to him, resting a hand on his arm.

"Don't say anything. I know what I feel, and when the time is right, you'll know it too." He smiled. It was sad, but also showed confidence I didn't feel.

But I nodded. "I better get a shower. Cindy will be here soon, and I'm sweaty."

"Make it a steamy one," he said, winking before he left the room.

DREAM CRUSHER

AN HOUR LATER, Cindy finally showed.

Before she arrived, I called Christopher to tell him we needed to push our overnighter until Sunday. He reluctantly agreed, which left Cindy and me plenty of time to talk.

And I desperately needed to speak with her.

When she came into my room, a trail of magic came with her. The scent of enchantment was so strong, and I instinctively glanced at her neck.

For the first time, I wondered what her blood would taste like.

She noticed and covered her neck with her hands. "I love you, Snow, but I draw the line at you sucking my blood."

I sighed dramatically, falling back on my bed. "Dream crusher."

She tentatively sat next to me. "Are - are you going to be able to handle my being this close?"

I rolled onto my side, trying desperately to keep a straight face, but the seriousness of her expression caused me to laugh so hard tears leaked from my eyes. "I'll manage," I finally got out.

Cindy slapped my leg before crossing her arms. "You're rude. A rude, rude vampire," she said, but smiled in relief.

I sat, crossing my legs and wiping the tears from my eyes. "Sorry, Cin."

We looked at each other and started laughing again.

After a while, she cleared her throat. "It's so cool. You're a vampire, but not a blood crazy fiend. You're still you. I think people have a totally wrong impression of your kind."

"I know, right?" If she saw how I behaved with Dorian an hour ago, she might change her mind, but I let her believe what she wanted. It was mostly right.

"It's the same with witches," she continued. "Most people think witches are green and covered in warts and wicked." She shook her head. "Not so. I mean, look at my face. It's flawless." She turned from side to side.

"You're right." I shrugged. "Maybe people come up with outlandish lies because we scare them."

She sighed heavily. "Oh, the trials of the gifted and magical," she said, resting a hand on her forehead dramatically.

Then we busted up laughing again.

Several minutes later, she carefully wiped under her eyes with her fourth fingers only and crossed her legs, so we were sitting on my bed, our knees touching. "Alright, time to get serious. Spill it. What's going on?"

I took a deep breath, collecting my thoughts.

There was no point telling her about Dorian unless she asked.

Mainly I needed to discuss Christopher and the possibility of sex. Nervous about how to begin, I pulled at a loose string on the bedspread. "Christopher suggested we go away together for the weekend. He even got Professor Pops' permission." I blinked several times, still shocked by that.

Her blue eyes shone brightly. "Holy sexcapades, that is serious." She patted my calf, checking out my face. Tilted her head. "Okay, what gives? His asking seems like it might not be great. Why isn't it great?"

I picked up one of my pillows and clutched it go me. "It is, really. I mean I love him - "

"Whoa. Whoa. What?"

"I told you already, didn't I? When I saved him, I knew I loved him."

She grew serious. "You mean it?"

"Yes, Cindy. I mean it." It didn't matter that it wasn't a forever love.

These feelings were still the strongest I ever felt.

I tugged up my socks, remembering my feelings for Dorian.

But that wasn't the same. Was it?

"You aren't quietly pining for Gabe, hoping I'll drop my guard one day, and then you'll pounce, taking back your man - the man I stole from you - are you?" She sniffled.

"Cindy, I swear." I paused. "I love Gabe, b - "

"I knew it," she whispered fiercely.

"Let me finish. Sheesh." I took her hand, but she pulled away, crossing her arms. "Cin? Are you going to listen to what I have to say?"

"Go ahead." She was pouting.

"I've loved him for a long time, and I'll always love him."

She tried to interrupt, but I put a finger on her lips.

"For a minute there, I thought I loved him like a man loves a woman, but then I felt all these feelings for Christopher, and I realized the love I felt for Gabe wasn't really that kind of love at all. I love Gabe like a brother now. That's it."

I removed my finger and leaned back. "I swear." I didn't bother to mention Dorian, hoping what I felt for him was strictly lust. It had to be.

Cindy huffed, wiping at her eyes and biting her bottom lip. "How does love feel? To you, I mean?" she asked quietly, resting her elbows on her knees and her chin on her fists.

I thought about it. "It's like fireworks and sleeping kittens. Cliff jumping and reading a good book on a rainy afternoon. When I'm with him, my pulse quickens, the world shifts, and my life tips into balance. It's amazing," I finished, not exactly sure I did my feelings for Christopher justice. "Isn't that how you feel about Gabe?"

She closed her eyes a moment, and tears leaked from them.

"Are you crying?" I asked softly. "Did I say something wrong? I swear I'm happy you and Gabe are together."

She shook her head. "No. I guess knowing how you feel for Christopher makes me happy. You deserve goodness. Happiness. And if Christopher gives you fireworks and sleeping kittens, then I'm all for it."

"And you and Gabe?" I prodded. If she didn't feel that way for him, then I felt terrible.

"I'm in love with him, Snow. And I know he loves me, too. The problem is, he takes his role as chayot leader very seriously. And it gets in the way of us. Sometimes when we're together, I feel like he's thinking about work, chayot problems, and I wonder if he'd rather be with them - other chayot - than be with me. A stupid witch." She sniffled, opening her eyes.

OceanofPDF.com

"I DON'T THINK SO. Maybe you should talk to him, explain how you feel." I definitely wasn't one to be giving relationship advice, but I didn't like seeing Cindy sad.

She nodded. "I should. I will." She took a deep breath. "Now, regarding your sexy-times problems," she sniffled and dried her eyes, and I knew we were done talking about her.

"The truth is, you don't have any," she said. "A completely gorgeous vampire wants in your pants. He loves you, and you love him. I see no downside."

I reddened at her blunt words. It excited me to think Christopher wanted me in that way, made me feel desirable. But it was such a big step for me.

I mean, sex.

Ugh.

That was huge.

"What?" she asked, and I could tell she worked hard not to laugh.

"It's just that I'm so nervous. What if we do it and everything changes?"

She nodded. "Everything will change for sure, but it'll hopefully be a good change. That's what moving forward in a relationship means."

"You and Gabe - " I let the rest of the question die. I couldn't bring myself to ask.

For the first time ever, Cindy blushed. "The first time was awkward." A broad, genuine smile spread over her face. "But he's my one and only," she said and bit down on her bottom lip.

She seemed lost in another time.

I watched as a contented peace settled over her.

"My mother always said to wait until I found the right guy. Of course, I thought she was old-fashioned, a complete dinosaur when it came to sexuality. So, I did what I wanted." Cindy wound one of her fingers in her hair. "Turns out, my mom is a lot smarter than I gave her credit."

"Really?" A pang of sorrow filled my heart. I envied her being able to talk to her mom about this stuff.

"Yeah, but don't tell her that." Cindy snickered. "My best advice? Make sure you want to, that you're all in - heart, mind, and soul. Because once you give Miss Virginia away, she ain't never coming back." She tapped my knee with a finger.

"Miss Virginia?" I asked, totally confused.

"Virgin-eee-aaaaaa," she said slowly, sarcastically.

I colored, and we both laughed, falling onto our sides.

"Got it. I won't give her away unless I'm one hundred percent sure that's what I want," I said, wiping my eyes.

When we sat up again, Cindy took my hand, turning serious.

"And even if you love him, it's not like there's a law that says you have to have sex with him. Well, unless you're married, then there might be a law." She paused. "Holy hot guy on a vampire girl. Please say you aren't getting married."

"What? No." I slapped her leg. "Hell no. That didn't even cross my mind." Had the idea of marriage crossed Christopher's mind?

She gazed at me perceptively. "I better be the first to know when it happens. There are ways I can make sure." She winked and moved her hand, making blue light and sparkles appear in her palm.

"You would do a spell on me?" I giggled.

She was crazy.

I was eighteen.

No wedding bells for years.

I still needed to finish high school.

Plus, there was another little item. The whole me-being-the-Seal–and-destined-to-restore-magic issue.

Cindy climbed off the bed and went to her backpack. Opening it, she took out her spellbook, The Eye of Abernathy. "See this?" she asked.

"Yeah?" I responded sarcastically. I wasn't blind.

She got back on the bed and crossed her legs. "There's a spell we can cast to make him ask you to marry him."

I tucked a strand of hair behind my ears. "I don't want to make him do anything, Cin."

She sighed, casually flipping through the pages. "Yeah, probably not."

Then she leaned forward, so her lips were next to my ear. "I found a spell to take us to the dragon, Abernathy if you want."

"You did?" That shocked me.

Talk about a total channel change of the subject.

Plus, I didn't know she was looking.

I told her I was waiting until after the school year so Professor Pops could go with me. He wanted me to learn more about the seven magics and the different supernatural creatures.

"Yep," she said, leaning back. "I can take us there right now if you want."

"No way. Are you serious?" Stunned enthusiasm coursed through my veins.

I didn't realize she could do such potent magic.

She placed her book on her legs and her hands on her hips. "Do you want me to prove it, Snow Merryweather White?" A firm line tightened her lips, and her brow was furrowed.

I didn't mean to offend her.

She was a witch, and I watched her do spells before.

I was just startled she bothered to track him down for me. "I believe you. Sorry," I said, getting off the bed.

If she could take me to him now, then I could get it over with.

Be done with it.

There were all sorts of reasons why that was a good idea.

"What would you have to do to make it happen?" I asked.

She snorted and got off the bed. "I just need to set up a few items, say the right words, and poof, we'll be at Abernathy's."

She held the book in her hands like she was in a church choir, getting ready to sing a hymn.

"You know he lives in a cave, right? With bats. He also breathes fire. And he's huge. You understand all of that?" If she took me there now, I would go. The prospect excited me.

Maybe if she and I went with magic, we could get there and back tonight, and then I could still go with Christopher tomorrow.

But using magic to find a dragon didn't seem like something Cindy would want to do - at least not the Cindy I knew two years ago.

Besides, she didn't look dressed for such an adventure.

I crossed my arms, watching understanding change her features to horror at the prospect. She glanced down at her off the shoulder pink sweatshirt with the word merde written across the front.

With one hand, she brushed her hands down her black jeans and black boots.

"A smelly cave? How cliche." Her nose scrunched in disgust.

I hid a smile. She wasn't worried about bats or the fire breathing dragon, but whether or not her clothes got ruined.

A moment later, her eyes, so familiar to me, twinkled. "You wanna go?"

"Hells yeah."

LIONS, TIGERS, AND DRAGONS

CINDY PULLED fourteen thick white candles from her backpack.

They were small and smelled of vanilla, cinnamon, and nutmeg - a combination that reminded me of my mother's oatmeal.

We placed them on the carpet next to my bed in the shape of a seven-pointed star.

I shut off the lights.

The sun was setting, and brilliant orange, pink, and golden rays glinted across my shadowed room.

"Is there a reason for the scented candles?" I asked as she and I sat cross-legged in the center of them. Our knees almost touched. We were super close, but the position was like second nature to her and me.

She shrugged. "No, I just like the smell."

"Me, too." I smiled. Nervous butterflies doing the hula in my stomach. "Now what?"

"Shhhhh," she said. "I'm concentrating."

"Oops." I stifled a giggle.

She placed her middle finger and thumb together, resting her hands on her knees like she was getting ready to meditate.

Then she closed her eyes.

Her face became serene.

And suddenly, the candles flickered to life.

I gulped.

She opened her eyes. "Cool, right?"

"So cool," I responded, feeling like we were back in junior high and having a sleepover.

"You're going to repeat what I say, but the spell is easy. It may take a few times, so don't stop until I say so."

"Okay." I hoped I didn't say anything wrong.

"Now, put your hands like mine."

The backs of her hands rested on her thighs. Her thumbs and pointer fingers touching.

I copied her.

"Close your eyes and remember as many different things about the cave and Abernathy as you can. What the cave smelled like, what it looked like, the color of his scales, the way the air felt. Anything you saw or felt or even tasted. Can you do that?"

"Yep," I said, swallowing down my nerves and closing my eyes.

I was with Silindra when Abernathy had given her a piece of his soul.

That piece rested within me now.

Would the dragon be able to sense it?

I saw his large eyes and heard the sound of his deep voice.

The smell of salt and the feel of bones crunching underfoot filled my mind.

The sound of the bats flying around pummeled my ears like they were in the room.

Heat rose in my throat, and I knew it was Abernathy's soul.

Cindy began to speak. "Abernathy." She paused, and I guessed I was to repeat her.

"Abernathy," I said.

"Tua Tua Dragonia," she uttered.

I repeated.

On the fringes of my mind, I sensed a shift in the room, like someone else had come in, but I couldn't open my eyes.

"Sithiperia. Groanada. Desperia," Cindy continued.

The words were strange, but I got them out.

"Abernathy," she said, and I repeated the word.

There was a whooshing sound, and I knew we were no longer in my room, but Abernathy's cave.

The smell of bat guano and the deep rumbling of the sleeping dragon was all it took to convince me, but I still didn't want to open my eyes.

I'd wait for Cindy to tell me to.

"Are we here?"

"Did we make it?"

The male voices surprised me. They weren't Cindy.

My eyes flew open.

Our surroundings were pitch dark, and even with my vampire vision, I barely perceived their forms.

"Gabe? Dorian?" I was too stunned to form complete sentences.

Cindy was surprised but grabbed Gabe's hand when he held it out to her. He helped her stand.

Dorian remained perfectly still. As though he was too shocked to move.

How had they come with us? They hadn't been inside the star. Nor had they repeated the words.

"Listeria," Cindy said, and a beam of white light appeared above our heads.

I quickly stood on my own.

"Did you do this?" Gabe asked Cindy, his voice filled with a loving wonder.

"Yeah," she answered. "But I can't believe it only took one time through the spell. Especially with the four of us. It must be Snow and the power of the Seal."

They looked at me. "What?" I asked, embarrassed.

"I just did what you said. I thought it was just going to be the two of us." I felt a little bamboozled and slightly betrayed.

She hadn't told me they were coming along.

"I didn't tell you my plan, just in case you said no, but I didn't want to come without them. I thought we could use some backup." Cindy looked guilty, and she should.

"You could've told me. I'm glad they're here too." I glanced at Dorian.

He came to stand beside me. "We should've told you," he said, his eyebrows arched in worry.

"Yeah, you should have," I answered. "But how did you guys get here? Cindy made us sit inside of a candlelit star."

"That was mostly for show," Cindy said, looking apologetic.

Gabe squeezed Cindy's hand. "When Cindy arrived, we waited outside your bedroom door until we heard the chanting. I opened it, and there was a whoosh, and here we are." He smirked. "Is this Abernathy's cave?"

I spun in a slow circle. "It's been a few thousand years since I've been here, but it looks like it."

Dorian smirked, and I guessed they overheard our entire conversation.

Heat rose into my face.

"Lions, tigers, and dragons, oh my," Dorian said softly.

I tried to smile, but it wouldn't make its way to my lips. I glanced toward Cindy and Gabe. They were in each other's arms, kissing.

Sheesh.

"Are you serious?" I put a hand on my hip. Now wasn't the time.

Thankfully they had the decency to knock it off.

"What's making the noise?" Dorian asked.

"If I'm not mistaken, that's Abernathy, and he's snoring." I took a few tentative steps toward the entrance of the tunnel. "Dragons are lazy creatures. You want to meet him?"

"He won't eat us, right?" Cindy asked nervously.

"No. At least I don't think so." I ducked and started walking.

From the echoes and Cindy's white light, I knew they followed.

"It's hot in here," Dorian muttered.

I didn't respond. He would understand why soon enough.

As we got closer to the dragon's chamber, I noticed Abernathy's golden body, his golden scales gleaming like heaps of gold coins.

The dragon hadn't changed at all.

I stood, straightening my spine as a sense of deja vu tingled through my chest, and spread up and down my arms.

Dorian, Cindy, and Gabe flanked me on either side.

Abernathy stopped snoring and opened his saffron eyes.

KNOW YOUR DESTINY

"GREETINGS, little vampire. I'm surprised to see you here. If I'm right, and I usually am, you weren't supposed to come for another six months." His deep voice reverberated off the rock walls, and a few bats flew up and out of the cave.

Though I sensed this was the same chamber, it had changed over the thousands of years since I was here with Silindra.

The most noticeable difference was the large opening above our heads into the darkened sky.

Wispy clouds lazily coasted by.

Moonbeams filtered in and, while they didn't reach all the way down, they still bathed the cavern in a little light.

The dragon shook his yellow mane, like a lion after a long slumber, and the chamber lit up as if it were noon on a bright, sunny day.

"Hello, Abernathy." I was surprised he knew so much about me.

Would he be angry, I became the Seal?

Did he already know? He said he was waiting. I took a step forward. "You know who I am?"

He smacked his chops, his teeth clinking together.

I heard a collective gasp from Cindy, Dorian, and Gabe.

"Of course, Snow White. I know exactly who you are, and though you're early, I know why you've come." His liquid eyes blinked slowly.

"Professor Pops isn't going to be happy with your decision. I believe he wanted you to continue to high school and keep on training at his little Seven Magics Academy."

"You've spoken to Professor Pops?" That surprised me.

I thought the dragon hadn't left his chamber in thousands of years.

"Professor Pops and I tend to annoy each other, but we also have great respect for one another." The eye I could see blinked, and he shook his mane again. "That is no matter. You've come because you want to know if the Seal will destroy Sharra."

"That's right."

He regarded me thoughtfully.

"Destruction. Love. Hate. All words burdened with thick emotion. There's also rehabilitation, change, compassion, kindness. Words to consider, I think." He blew out a breath, and a gust of smoke filled the air.

I blanched. Was he suggesting I not destroy the vampire queen?

He went on before I could ask.

"Who do you have with you, Snow White?"

I moved to the side, preoccupied with my thoughts, but desirous to show the dragon respect. "This is Gabe. He is the leader of the chayot."

"Ah, yes. Oberon's half-human son. Aren't you a sight?" He sounded sarcastic.

Gabe stepped forward, his features stony. "You knew my - Oberon?"

"I did. A distasteful fellow. Only cared for himself and what he could gain. What he wanted. What everyone else could do for him." Abernathy yawned. "Are you like the narcissistic Oberon?"

Gabe took a step back.

He seemed unsure about what to say, and I heard him grind his teeth.

"No," I answered for him. "Gabe is nothing like Oberon. He's a good man."

Abernathy yawned, and I saw the fire in the back of his throat.

Then he smacked his lips. "I believe you're right, though he seems deeply troubled. Like the weight of the world rests on his shoulders.

What troubles you, chayot leader?"

Gabe didn't answer.

Cindy slipped her arm through his.

"No matter." Abernathy blew out another puff of smoke.

I went on. "This is Cindy. She's a - "

"The young witch who's been messing around with my book." A hint of what looked like a smile touched his lips, and he almost seemed pleased with her.

Cindy took a step toward him. "My grandmother gave the book to me," she whispered.

"Well, it's lovely to meet you, my dear. I see great things in your future."

Cindy perked up. "You do?"

"Oh, yes. It's no accident you and the young vampire are friends. It's destiny." A sound like a mammoth kitten purring escaped Abernathy's throat. He turned his attention to Dorian, who remained deathly quiet since we entered the chamber. "And last but certainly not least, we have you." The dragon blinked. "The only normal, non-magical human in the bunch, yet your destiny." He paused and sniffed the air.

Dorian stepped forward. "You know what I'm supposed to do with my life?"

I hadn't realized he didn't have a plan. I hadn't really thought that much about what he wanted to do with his life.

"Yes, young one. Very few have the capacity to love like you." Abernathy studied Dorian intently.

Dorian took another step toward the dragon. He looked tiny in comparison.

"What is it?" he asked.

Abernathy shook his head and let out a deep chuckle. "It's never good to know your destiny before it arrives, but I think you will find out soon enough."

Dorian sighed.

His shoulders sagged, and he stepped back.

Melancholy weighed heavily on him.

"And you." Abernathy focused his large eyes on me. "You've become the Seal of Gabriel. The seven magics dwell within your body, including a piece of my soul. And it seems Silindra might be with you as well."

My heart raced at the thought of Silindra still being with me, but that was the least of my worry. I nodded, surprised he knew so much. "That's right."

"You expect a specific answer, but there are several, and all of them depend on you."

My throat went dry. What was that supposed to mean?

He considered me intently for a long time until I almost believed he had fallen asleep with his eyes open. "Snow White. Vampire. The daughter of an elf and a human. You're fated to bring - "

"Hold on." I carefully moved closer to Abernathy, so I had a perfect view of his giant mouth. "My mother wasn't an elf."

Abernathy shook his mane. "She is. I met her once when she was much younger before she escaped Sharra and moved to the human realm."

"I've seen elves. They look a lot different than humans. I would've remembered if my mom looked like an elf." Images of my mother flicked through my mind.

She was soft-spoken.

Her hair was long and beautiful. I used to say it was the color of starlight.

Her skin was pale, and she had long, elegant fingers.

"My mother was human," I finally said, facing him.

Smoke trailed from his nostrils. "She appeared human, but she wasn't. Like the caterpillar that appears to be nothing more than a stick, your mother seemed human but was an elf. She was an anomaly, different from all other elves. And they hated her for it. Teased her. Called her an abomination. Even her parents didn't like her. They were embarrassed by her."

His words reminded me of the way the unicorns treated Envy.

Abernathy went on, "After many years, your mother came to me, desperate to start somewhere fresh. I helped her escape the magical confines of Sharra and the elves."

"You did?" My heart ached for what she must've gone through. "Is that why she died - because she was away from Sharra for too long?" The image of Pava the pixilette, and the way she turned to ash after a short time outside Sharra, harassed my thoughts.

He stood, his scales clanking together like old metal.

The top of my head barely reached the top of one of his legs.

Cindy, Gabe, and Dorian scattered back into the tunnel, which was the smart move, but I held my ground.

If Abernathy knew what happened to my mother, I wanted the answer. Besides, he still hadn't told me if I could destroy the vampire queen.

"Well?" I asked, the word forced out between my clenched teeth.

"It's time you know the truth, I believe." He smacked his lips together. "Care to take a trip?" He stretched his golden wings wide.

Each wingtip touched a wall, blocking out the opening above.

Then he shook like a wet dog.

Old scales sailed from his body like giant discs.

They smacked into stalactites and stalagmites, knocking them to pieces.

One flew toward my head, and I ducked just in time.

It crashed into the wall behind me, leaving a hole.

Powdered rock filled the cavern-like smoke, and the smell of sulfur tainted the already pungent air.

"What kind of trip?" I asked when he finished.

He laughed, loud and hearty.

Thousands of bats woke, circling like phantoms, their high-pitched screeching like nails raking a chalkboard.

Abernathy lifted his head and roared, sending a rush of fire at the bats. They fell, their bodies charred and smoking, and I moved to the tunnel entrance, out of the way.

When the bats were all dead, he closed his mouth, extinguishing the fire and smacking his lips. "Bats are worse than rats - flying mongrels, really."

He bent his front paw under and leaned his body toward me. "Climb on, vampire. And the rest of you. Hurry up. I'm late for my nap."

I didn't know if it was a vampire thing or a Snow White thing, but I hated flying in airplanes and they had seatbelts, pressurized cabins, and electronic gadgets.

This would be worse.

"Where are you going? We can meet you there. Since Cindy has magic, we can use that." I glanced back at Cindy, who came out of the tunnel and moved to climb on Abernathy's back. Her face shone with excitement, and I sighed. We wouldn't be using her magic. She wanted to fly on the back of the dragon. Dorian and Gabe seemed excited about the prospect as well.

Me? Not so much.

Abernathy shook his head. "There's only one way to get to your mother, and the journey requires I take you there. Come on. Don't be afraid."

I gulped. If she was dead, how did he plan to take us to see her? "Can't you just explain what happened? You don't need to show me." The others were already on Abernathy's back. Gabe next to his head, then Cindy with her arms around him, then a space I guessed was for me, and finally Dorian.

Dorian patted the spot in front of him. "It'll be fun."

Fun wasn't the word I would use. Horrendous. Terrifying. Those words seemed more accurate.

"Climb aboard before I change my mind. It isn't every day one rides on the back of a dragon."

Hesitant, I climbed up his side, using his scales as grips. My insides shook uncontrollably by the time I was seated in front of Dorian. He wrapped his arms around my waist. "I've got you, Snow."

His breath against my ear tickled. "Thanks," I responded. It seemed nuts that I was afraid, but I couldn't control it.

"Hang on tight. I won't come back for those left behind." Abernathy let out a laugh.

My bottom lip trembled. I was going to fall, roll off his scaly back, get flicked in the head by his tail, and end up a permanent fixture in one of the chamber walls. I heard Cindy whimper. It seemed she was having second thoughts. I touched her shoulder, and she turned back, trying to smile.

Gabe growled. "Let's do this."

Abernathy pounced into the air, his wings tucked at his sides, and then he burst through the opening into the clear sky. His wings spread and caught hold of the wind like a giant kite, and we were flying.

My fear vanished. I felt exhilarated.

Abernathy twisted and turned like a corkscrew, and I heard him chuckle. "This never gets old." He shot through the air, curled his body into a ball, then cannonballed toward the ground. I was having too much fun to be scared.

A few minutes in, something occurred to me. "How are we not falling off?" I shouted the question at Abernathy.

He barked happily, letting out a long stream of fire. "Magic, vampire. Always magic."

I tested the theory, releasing my death grip on one of his scales. In the same second, Abernathy flipped out of the ball and expanded his wings.

We all should've shot into the air.

No matter how tightly we held on, the suddenness of the stop should have sent us sailing off his back.

None of us moved.

It was like we were seat belted to the dragon.

"Woohoo!" I shouted and sensed the others relax.

Cindy glanced back and, though her features were tight, she tried a smile. "Are you glad we came?"

"Yeah," I said, unable to help a surge of pleasure gurgling in my chest. Flying reminded me of Silindra and how she swore she would rather die than lose her wings. At that moment, I understood her a little better.

It was more than that, too. Flying helped me forget why we were going. That my mom was still alive. I didn't want to think about what that would mean.

BORDERS OF MIZU

I PEEKED over Abernathy's side and saw the deep darkness of the water below. It seemed to be in every direction, along the sides and above us too. The illusion made me a little dizzy.

Cindy grabbed hold of Gabe tighter.

He touched her arm. "It'll be okay, Cin."

She nodded but didn't respond.

They were sweet together.

"How is it possible we are surrounded by water?" Dorian asked.

"I don't know," I answered. "Abernathy, where are we?"

It was like we were inside an enormous raindrop.

"Do not be alarmed. We are within the borders of Mizu. Your mother is here."

I didn't appreciate him continually acting like my mother was alive. Perhaps it was because he was asleep a hundred years or even a thousand, but it hurt that he acted as though she was still around.

"Abernathy, my mother died a long time ago." Tears stung the edges of my eyes, and I closed them briefly, working to make them stop.

"You were told your mother died," Abernathy responded. "Doing so was for your safety, but now that you are the Seal, none of the secrets matter."

He paused. "Do you want to see her or not?" he asked, though he continued to fly in the same direction even though I didn't answer right away. Then he laughed like he made a joke. "Shall I continue?"

"Yes," I whispered, feeling sick.

My teeth chattered, and I couldn't slow my racing heart.

"Good." He angled his head downward, shooting toward the water like an arrow.

Despite his words telling us magic held us in place, I clutched one of his scales, holding on like my life depended on it.

In school, I saw a video of a Cape Gannet, which is this amazing species of bird. The species could dive from great heights and would shoot down into the water like a torpedo. And they accomplished the feat without injury.

But they were covered with feathers and fat to make the violent entry survivable.

As we rocketed closer to the water below, I debated whether the dragon intended to kill us.

At the same time, I couldn't stop thoughts about my mom.

Did my father know she was still alive?

Had he been keeping it a secret all these years?

We entered the water, and I had another moment of panic. But immediately, a bubble appeared around us, keeping the water away and allowing us some much-needed air.

"This is nuts," Cindy whispered. "I can't see anything." She cleared her throat. "Listeria," she said softly. Light filled the bubble and the surrounding water.

"You will need to put that out shortly, witch." Abernathy coasted slowly downward like a golden submarine. At first, we didn't see anything but water. After several minutes, a random fish darted by, then a large pod of dolphins. A few minutes later, a giant, strange-looking whale swam alongside us. Abernathy's eyes glowed in front of him like twin headlights, and, as we continued down, there was a colorful reef with all manner of plants growing on it and creatures living amongst the twisty coral.

"It's beautiful," I said.

Gabe, Cindy, and Dorian all spoke their agreement.

"But why are we down here? Elves don't live in the water. On its shores, sure, but never in it," Gabe said.

I knew what he said was true. When we went to see the elves, they were near the ocean, but that had been a long time ago. Since then, Sharra had created her land and ordered all magical creatures out of the human realm. Maybe some of the elves had created a secret land within the water.

Cindy touched Gabe's arm. "Let's see where Abernathy is taking us. If he says Snow's mother is down here, somewhere, then it must be true."

Yeah, because dragons may be lazy, but they're honest. I hoped.

Dorian wrapped his arms tighter around my waist. Part of me felt guilty for being in the arms of another guy, but I consoled myself. This was an extenuating circumstance, and Christopher would want me safe.

Further ahead was what looked like the top of an enormous snow globe, only without the snow. Upon closer inspection, I was shocked to see roads and buildings within.

"You seeing what I'm seeing?" Gabe asked, his voice filled with wonder.

"I see it. It looks like a - a city," I said, blinking my eyes several times to make sure I wasn't hallucinating.

"Is this real?" Gabe asked.

"As real as you and me," Abernathy said. "The city is known as Atlantis by some, but is actually called Mizu Atlantica, or the City Under the Sea."

"Okay, where's the mermaid with long hair? What's her name?" Dorian tried to sound nonchalant, but it was apparent by the tone of his voice that he was as surprised as the rest of us.

"Ariel," I answered softly. "My mother's name is Ariel."

MERMAIDS ARE FISH

AS I STUDIED the city coming into view, I thought about love as an emotion. How it was like a pyrotechnics display. The vibrancy and beauty were not truly appreciated until after the fireworks erupted, when the sparks burst in radiant color and seem to gloriously proclaim to the sky, "This is what you're missing. This is what you've lost."

That was how it was with my mother. I had adored her, loved the way she sang while she cooked, how her eyebrows came together when she read something interesting, and the way she snuggled into my neck when she tucked me in at night.

Those memories were priceless, and I wished I cherished her more while I had her in my life. I should've cuddled with her longer. Hugged her tighter. But then, I didn't know she was going to die.

The knowledge that she was still alive after all this time but chose to stay away filled me with a pain I hadn't known before.

I was devastated and angry, and if I was honest with myself, excited to see her.

"Promises are lies spoken from the heart," my mom used to say. "Never make a promise unless you're one hundred percent sure you can keep it." I hadn't understood what she meant, but, as Dorian, Gabe, Cindy, and I got closer to the city my mother called home, I thought she must've known all along she would leave.

Some of my pain changed to resentment. Towards her.

She allowed me to be raised by a mean stepmother and a father who kowtowed to her every whim. A man who wasn't strong enough to be there when I needed him most.

How could she do that? Why? I hoped I would get the chance to ask.

"Is Snow's mom like an elf-mermaid?" Dorian asked Abernathy, bringing me out of my contemplations.

Abernathy laughed. "Mermaids are fish. Elves are land dwellers. Snow's mother is not a fish, but an elf. Please try to keep up."

"It may not be possible," Gabe said over his shoulder and loud enough so Dorian could hear.

"Watch it, brother," Dorian said, reaching over Cindy and me and punching Gabe in the shoulder.

"Hey, none of that," Cindy hissed. "I don't want to fall."

"You won't," I whispered, leaning into her.

"You doing okay? You must be freaking out about your mom," Cindy murmured.

"Yeah, I'll be fine." I swallowed, afraid if I said more, I might cry. I still didn't totally believe she was alive, and I wouldn't until I saw her again with my own eyes.

And maybe she was an elf but since she looked human while she lived with me, wasn't it possible she could become something different while under the sea?

Could she be a mermaid, too?

"Here we go," Abernathy growled.

I glanced ahead. We were nearly to the large bubble surrounding the city. "How are we going to get in?"

Abernathy's response was flippant. "How are we in this realm to begin with? How are you four able to breathe or, more importantly, how are you able to keep from being crushed? The answer is the same for all questions. Magic. I have it, and I know how to use it." He shook his head, and his amber mane danced slowly in the water like a golden man o' war.

When I thought Abernathy would crash into the bubble surrounding Mizu, he yelled, "Opherium!" And he glided through, the rest of us watching in awe.

The bubble around the city was thicker than I would've believed. As we passed through it, my body felt tingly, as though each cell was being tickled.

Once we passed the protective barrier, I relaxed a little, admiring the tall, vibrant buildings in colors similar to the coral I saw earlier - turquoise, hot pink, salmon, neon blue, lime green, yellows from creamy to vibrant, tangerine, and lavender.

Various types of trees grew in rows along the perimeter of the buildings.

The trees reminded me of a combination of kelp and seaweed.

The heat from above warmed my skin, and I glanced up.

Though it was night outside the perimeter, within a yellow sun shone brightly in the sky. Wispy clouds sailed across a blue firmament.

"How?" I began and stopped. I already knew what Abernathy would say. Magic.

EEL SKIN

ROADS AND SIDEWALKS intersected and meandered along and around the fantastical buildings. The streets sparkled in the sunlight, and I guessed they were made from pearls.

All manner of supernatural creatures, including trolls, elves, fairies, and even humans, moved around below.

Several streams ambled lazily in different sections of the city, and surrounding the city's outskirts was a vast ocean.

Did mermaids dwell here? I strained my eyes, hoping to catch a glimpse of one. The idea of mermaids brought up another concern.

Where exactly had Abernathy brought us? What was this place?

The dragon said the city was called Mizu Atlantica, but what was the town for? Why did it exist?

Abernathy flew us above the buildings in search of an unknown destination.

None of the citizens below shrieked or screamed.

Instead, most waved to Abernathy and greeted him like an old friend.

The whole scenario was wild, and I pinched myself to make sure I wasn't dreaming. Up ahead, in the city's center was a large, circular patch of green.

It wasn't grass, but it could've been moss or algae or even dried seaweed. "Do not climb off," Abernathy said, tucking his wings along his back and to the side.

"We are going below."

As he spoke, a screech reverberated through my body, like metal scraping against metal. I peered over the side and realized the circle Abernathy stood on was descending.

Cindy clung to Gabe, and Dorian tightened his grip around my waist. I leaned into him, thankful for his need to protect me even though I was much more likely to defend him if there was an issue.

Still, it was nice being near him, and I realized a friendship like his rarely came along. I turned back to him and smiled.

"Thanks, Dorian."

"No worries." He nudged me with his shoulder.

After several long, nerve-wracking moments, the metal elevator we rode on came to a halt, and a blue-green light flickered on above us.

With the light came a rigorous hum as the large hole above us sealed shut. As soon as the gap closed, there was a click, and a door in front of us slid open.

Standing in the doorway, flanked by two bodyguards, was a woman who looked startlingly like my mother.

She wore slick black pants and a matching top. It reminded me of a scuba suit, but with more flair. On her feet were boots with sparkling black buckles that went midway up her calves.

On her back was what looked like a large gun.

Her long hair was in a braid, hanging down her back.

"She's kickass," Dorian whispered.

A glint of a smile crossed my mother's lips, as though she heard him.

I couldn't say anything. I was too shocked.

Physically, she looked like my mom, with her long hair, the color of spider silk, and a lithe body, but she also appeared more hardened.

There was none of the softness I remembered.

Instead, she looked as Dorian said, like a kick-ass, no-nonsense woman.

"Ariel," Abernathy said, his voice low and soothing. "It's lovely to see you again."

The dragon and my mother spoke in hushed tones.

Ariel glanced my direction several times, her smile lighting my insides with happiness. Dorian wrapped a protective arm around my shoulders.

Cindy tried to strike up a conversation with me, but I didn't respond.

Gabe climbed down from Abernathy's back first, then Cindy, and then Dorian and finally me.

I couldn't focus on anyone but my mom and all of my unanswered questions.

After adjusting my clothes, I debated whether to talk to her or not.

"Go on," Cindy said, giving me a shove, but I couldn't make my feet work.

It was like a dream, and I couldn't believe she was there, talking to Abernathy in front of me.

When they finished, she patted him on the nose before heading over to a panel on the wall where she pushed a button.

Instantly, the access doors above us began to open, making a clanking sound. Abernathy glanced at me before unfurling his wings and ascending.

When he was halfway up, he spoke. "I'll return when I'm needed, vampire. For now, I need a nap," he said.

I noticed my mom flinched at his use of the word vampire.

I waved nervously. "Okay," I said, my voice echoing against the peculiar walls.

A strange odor radiated from everywhere. It took me a minute to place it, but I realized the most potent smells were hazelnut and saltwater.

Inclining her head to each of us, my mother directed we were to follow.

My feet began to move of their own volition.

We crossed the doorway, and the door slid closed behind us.

The blue-green lights lit up the hallway that appeared to be made out of something black. It sparkled like black diamonds.

None of us spoke.

The only sound was the swishing of our clothes and the rhythmic padding of our shoes.

When we reached the end of the hall, a door glided open. We went through and entered a formal living room with a fireplace, couches, chairs, end tables, even a piano.

But the materials were different somehow.

I touched one of the sofas as I passed and was surprised by its softness.

"The furniture is made of eel skin," my mother said. She didn't turn but kept walking forward.

I pulled my hand away. Should I be disgusted?

"Everything you see here is from Mizu, created from the animals, minerals, and plants found in this land. Nothing is from the surface," Ariel said, answering the question I hadn't asked aloud.

Dorian walked next to me and gave me a look that said all of this was crazy.

I shrugged.

After the living room, we came to the kitchen.

An overwhelming heat radiated from an enormous fire in the center.

Men and women of all shapes and heritages moved as though in a dance, preparing food.

My mother stopped, and I nearly ran into her before I halted.

She turned back and grinned like I remembered, and her vibrancy touched the innermost secrets of my soul.

I breathed in and waited for her to speak.

"Are you hungry?" she asked.

OceanofPDF.com

"STARVED," Dorian answered.

Gabe agreed.

"I could eat," Cindy said, her hands in her pockets as she studied the room.

Blood sounded good, I thought but said nothing.

"Please, have a seat." She indicated a wooden table. The centerpiece was filled with radiant purple flowers I didn't recognize.

When we were seated, plates were positioned in front of us.

The food smelled divine.

It looked like fish covered in a creamy yellow sauce, green beans, and freshly baked rolls. My friends looked at me before shoveling it in.

Obviously, it tasted good, but I didn't even try to fake it.

My stomach was already in knots. I wouldn't add human food to the mix.

My mom ate a little too, but mostly she answered questions from random people who came in and sent wary glances at my friends and me.

I stared at my plate, and I caught my mother watching at me.

When they finished, my mother addressed us.

"Better?"

"Yes," Cindy said, giving me a sidelong look. She had that look on her face. The one that said I was wasting an opportunity.

But I didn't know how to begin.

"Good." Ariel rose and eyed two elven men who appeared to be her bodyguards. They stood against a wall, out of the way. "Will you escort these children to their rooms?" she asked. "They should get some rest."

The bodyguards moved forward in one fluid motion - as though their brains were connected.

Gabe, Dorian, Cindy, and I began to follow.

I wasn't tired and had no desire to relax. I wanted to stay with my mom.

There was a lot I wanted to discuss.

But I didn't know how to voice my wishes.

I was still shocked that she was alive and standing feet away.

As we trailed the bodyguards down the hall, my mother grasped me by the elbow. "Can we talk? Just the two of us?" Her voice was light, soft.

Dorian and the others turned back, waiting for my answer.

I shrugged. "Sure," I said, my shaky voice betraying my nervousness.

Cindy shot me a look, but I flicked my chin, indicating I was fine. She nodded, and they continued to follow the guards.

My mom and I went back to the living room.

"We should have privacy here." She walked over to the fireplace.

At the touch of a button, flames sprang to life, and she rubbed her hands together a moment before crossing her arms.

I couldn't stop watching her, unsure this was real. At the same time, I wanted her to hug me, but I was scared.

She was focused on the flames when she began talking. "From the day you were born, you were special. Even as a baby, you were this little black-haired, blue-eyed force to be reckoned with." She paused.

My mother was alive. That thought kept repeating itself in my mind.

I waited, watching her in awe. I wanted to tell her my eyes were no longer blue, but I didn't.

When she spoke again, her voice shook with emotion. "Every day, every second of every minute, I thought about you, wondered how you were growing, if you were happy." She sniffed and suddenly turned. "Are you happy?"

I winced, hesitant to reply. A part of me wanted to comfort her, ease the agony evident in her eyes. But memories flooded through my mind of all the times I had needed her, from knee scrapes to birthday parties to the first time I got my period, and Vivianne just laughed, telling me to suck it up.

Then there was everything else. I was bitten and transformed into something new and wholly fantastical.

First, a revenant - not quite human, not quite a vampire - to what I was now, a vampire, and more.

The Seal.

And I was given the task of restoring balance to all magical creatures.

In the past thirteen years, I had experienced moments of happiness. I'd laughed, enjoyed time with friends. Had a first love and a second one too.

But there were plenty of miserable times as well.

Most of them were typical teenage girl problems.

Human problems.

Like whether or not I'd trip up the stairs.

Would I ever get a first kiss, pass chemistry, or go to college?

I still didn't know how to drive - not really.

And what about when I needed to talk to her about my craving for boys and blood?

And kissing?

Or just needed my mom because I was having a horrible day?

It was one thing when I thought she died.

Something else entirely that she chose to stay away. Living in this place.

I glanced around the room again, admiring the clean lines and the otherworldly look of all of the furnishings.

Was I happy?

My mom had been hiding. When I needed a mother, she ran.

She reached out a tentative hand, but I pulled away.

She sighed. "I'm sorry, Snow." She turned back to the flames. "If I could have stayed, I would have. I swear. I know what I've missed."

Finally, I found my voice. "Do you? Really?" I shook my head, swallowing back my sadness. "How did leaving, pretending to be dead, help me in any way?" The words tumbled out, filled with aching grief. "I needed you in so many ways. You leaving didn't stop Chris - my hunter from biting me. It didn't stop my need for human blood. All your absence did was tear a hole in my heart. You left me by myself, afraid all the time. I didn't have anyone. Dad and Vivianne were barely around, leaving me alone in that house, and not just for a few days. For weeks or more. If it wasn't for Professor Pops - I mean, Mr. Henry and his sons - I would've died from loneliness. So, tell me how it helped. Tell me why leaving was so noble because I don't buy it." I breathed heavily, my chest rising and falling rapidly.

Tears were streaming down my face, and I let them.

My mother was wrong to leave, and I wanted her to know it.

I HAVE A DRAGON

"I UNDERSTAND, Snow. I do. Leaving you has weighed heavily on my heart since the day I left. But look at you." Her eyes sparkled with awe. "You're magnificent. A leader. A creature destined to save us all."

I let out a noise somewhere between a snort and a sob. I wiped at my tears, wishing they would stop. "How can you say that? I'm a wreck." But I had to admit her words made me feel better.

She came over and gently wiped my cheek with the back of her hand. "Maybe you are a bit of a wreck, but aren't we all? Isn't that what life is about? The mess."

My hands trembled. I listened to her words, heard the tenderness of her voice, and all it did was make me angry. How could she console me or tell me anything? She didn't have the right.

"I don't know," I whispered through clenched teeth.

She rolled her shoulders. "Do you want to sit?" she asked, trying to take my hand.

I shook my head, moving my hands behind my back.

"Fine." She crossed her arms. "Abernathy told you the name of this city, correct?"

"Yes," I answered, and cleared my throat, working to force down words and emotions I wasn't ready to share. If I said more, it would all spill out.

"Did he tell you the city's purpose? Why we're here, under a million tons of water, in a different realm?"

"No," I said, knowing something big was coming, something I didn't want to hear but couldn't stop.

My mother nodded. "It's here, so Sharra, the vampire queen, can't find us. It was built to protect those who stand against her. In a way, we're refugees, people, and creatures without a home of our own. We stood against Sharra, and she nearly slaughtered us all." In a lower voice, she went on. "It's also here to protect you."

My hands shook. I didn't know what to say.

"Are you sure you don't want to sit?" She indicated a couch.

I wanted to yell. Tell her she was mistaken. Call her a liar and a coward.

But I got the feeling she carried a whole lot more than the strange-looking gun on her back, so I agreed.

I followed her to the couch, sitting across from her. She looked sad but also determined. It was apparent she believed in her cause.

"When Silindra died, Abernathy knew right away because Ryden brought him the necklace, the Seal of Gabriel. The others found out rather quickly. Devoran. Oberon. But they believed Sharra's words, intrigued by her attitudes for a new world, one where we were all the same. That the lion and the lamb could lie down together and be friends." She shook her head, disgusted.

"The problem is that a lion is a lion - a predator who must hunt to survive. And the lamb is a lamb - the hunted. Can the lamb eat the lion? Of course not. But Sharra spoke of progress, saying that a unicorn could be a unicorn, but he could also be a horse. A fairy could be a fairy, but she could also be a butterfly. And so on. 'Evolutionary advancement' was the term she used most often."

She glanced down at her hands. "It wasn't until many of the magical creatures were nearly extinct and became devoid of magic that they began to realize Sharra's plan wasn't one of peace and friendship, but of power. Total domination. She didn't want any of the other creatures to have any magic because she wanted it all for herself."

"I get it," I said, interrupting.

Silindra had talked to Abernathy and Devoran about such things, that she believed Sharra wanted all the power. She was right.

"Do you?" my mom asked but continued before I could reply. "Devoran understood her plans long before anyone else. He kept his people as far away from her as possible. When her lies and deceit started to seep into his kingdom, he was frantic. With the help of Abernathy, the elves built Mizu's realm, desperate to save magic and the magical races. When Sharra caught wind of what was happening, she created the land of Sharra. Most were trapped there, but those of us who escaped came here."

Abernathy's words came back to me: The answer is the same for all questions. Magic. I have it, and I know how to use it.

My eyes grew big, and I realized the dragon wasn't lazy at all.

Magic was a whole lot more than words and spells, and I wondered how witches were created.

They didn't exist during Sharra and Silindra's time.

At least they hadn't possessed one of the seven magics.

Witches used Abernathy's magic.

Obviously.

Cindy had his spellbook.

But how did that all come to be? How was the first witch created?

"Snow," Arial prodded her hand on my shoulder.

I shrugged it away. "So, what does this place have to do with me? Or you, for that matter?" She said they were refugees, but why choose to come here when she would have been safe in the human world?

She licked her lips, a very human gesture, and I caught myself staring at her, checking to see if she had any hint of elf in her.

Her frame was thin, willowy like the elves, but that's where the similarities ended. Her skin was the wrong color, as was her hair. The way she spoke did remind me of someone from while I spent time with Silindra.

"What's wrong?" she asked, studying me intently.

And I remembered the mannerisms, the particular way she had of speaking. "You're Devoran's daughter," I breathed as the realization hit me. Many of her mannerisms were the same as his.

A look of amazement splayed across her features. "Which means you are his granddaughter, Snow." My mother gazed at me in earnest. "Do you know what Sharra would give to have your lineage as her own?"

Devoran was alive at the same time as Silindra and Sharra, which made me question how old my mother was. But I shook that away.

"I still don't get why that knowledge meant you had to leave me. If what you say is true, why didn't you bring me with you?" Images of what life would've been like living here with my mother filtered through my mind. I could've helped her. At least spent my life with her.

And I wouldn't have been bitten. An eerie tension coursed through my body.

My mother sighed; her shoulders turned in. "The city isn't to protect you from those out in the world, but to keep those who would kill you, in."

"Oh." A light bulb clicked on inside my head.

The day I ran track with Christopher. It was raining, and I was trying to catch up with him. Then I felt a prick in the back of my legs, and they went numb, making it impossible to move them.

Christopher said I was poisoned.

And he told me some wanted me dead.

Did he know about Mizu? I had no doubt he did, which meant Sharra probably knew as well.

My mother must've read the confused expression on my face because she elaborated.

"Specifically, my father swore he would kill you if I didn't leave you and return." She sniffled, and I watched her eyes fill with tears. "He said he would kill you to punish me."

I was so confused, I clasped my hands together, hoping to alleviate some of my irritation. "So, Devoran is still alive?"

"Yes," she nodded.

"And he's here in Mizu with you?"

She nodded again.

"But I thought Abernathy sent you to the human realm to get away from him and your family. Why trap you down here with them?"

"Excellent questions," she said and swallowed.

I ground my teeth together, remembering Devoran's interactions with the unicorn, Envy. He was kind to her, took her in when no one else would. My confusion grew. "He tried to have me killed anyway," I said through clenched teeth. "Or at least there are those in the human realm who want me dead."

She shook her head. "It couldn't have been him. He's been down here with me the whole time." But she didn't sound convinced. Her words sounded hollow, and I sensed she knew as well as I did that she was lying to herself.

Besides, why would Devoran be honest with her? I thought of the stories Abernathy shared about her parents rejecting her. If they mistreated her before, why would they change now?

"I still don't understand why you're here. Why you left me." Really though, what did I know about anything?

Was my mom - Ariel - lying to me? I couldn't put it past her. "There was this unicorn. Her name was Envy. Devoran was so kind to her," I said slowly.

She nodded. "He brings up that story all the time, about how he's so empathetic, but the truth is he's only accepting when it comes to other people's problems. If anything in his own life is imperfect, then he wants nothing to do with it."

"Except you're here. You chose to be with Devoran over me. What made you leave me?"

She didn't answer right away. Her eyes were hooded like she didn't want me to see something in them.

"Mom?" I asked.

"I'm bait," she finally said.

"Bait?" I sat back in the chair, trying to wrap my head around all she was saying. "Help me understand."

She brushed her hands down the front of her pants. "Snow, I'm so sorry, but the truth is my father wants you here so he can use you to help him destroy the vampire queen. He wants to rule all magical creatures. He craves power just as badly as, if not more than, Sharra. And he knew someday you would come for me."

"What the hell?" I stood, gulping down confused fury. What was it about power? Once they're given a little, they craved more - a lot more. I exhaled heavily. "It seems that if you live long enough, you become evil. Right?"

I walked over to the fire.

Did Abernathy want me killed too?

Was that why he brought me here?

"I've had enough. I'm tired."

"Okay," she whispered. "I'll take you to your room."

"Oh, I'm not staying. I'm getting my friends, and we're leaving." I moved to the hallway, but my mother grabbed my arm.

"He won't let you. Now that you're here, my father will stop at nothing to make you do what he wants."

I twisted out of her grasp. "For one thing, I have a dragon. There is very little doubt he can leave whenever he wants."

Once we were safely back home, I would ask Abernathy why he brought me to Mizu when he knew my grandfather wanted me dead.

"And another thing, Devoran has no say in the matter. I'll leave when I'm damn good and ready. I'm not a pawn. I won't be doing his bidding any more than I intend to do Sharra's." I paused and studied the woman who gave me life.

"I'm disappointed in you, Mother. You're as big a coward as Dad."

I wondered what that made me. If I was the product of my parents and my upbringing, did that mean I was a coward too?

My thoughts turned to my stepmother.

The way she was always such a bitch.

It seemed she might've helped me more than I realized.

"I don't think you understand," my mother started, and I noticed her bottom lip quivering. "This city won't allow you to leave unless Devoran commands it."

I snorted. "We'll see about that."

YOU'RE GLOWING

BURNING ferocity coursed through my veins, and I felt the power of the Seal ignite. The palms of my hands radiated red.

Was this truly what Devoran intended when he gave his eternal sight to Silindra? He said he thought everything through.

Did he know I'd come for him one day? It seemed highly unlikely.

Maybe he didn't realize the power would become part of me.

Or perhaps it was because a few thousand years passed, and he forgot the details.

Abernathy knew what I would become. Though the dragon had a lot of explaining to do, I felt confident he brought me here for a reason, and it was most likely because he knew what I was capable of.

That knowledge and the fact that I still trusted him shocked me. Whether that was a good idea or not remained to be seen. If he brought me, surely, he could help me escape.

I glared at my mother. "I don't think you understand, and neither does Devoran. Maybe he hasn't heard what happened to Oberon, the chayot leader when he tried to take the Seal from me." I was sure they didn't know that I burned Sharra when she tried to kill me those many months ago. "No one will tell me what to do. I make my own choices."

"Your skin," my mother began, her breath caught in her throat. "Your eyes. You're glowing."

I blinked, glancing at my hands. "I'm angry, Mother. And sad. And more let down than you can possibly imagine."

She started to cry. It didn't look right coming from the woman in front of me.

Everything about her said she was hard and unfeeling, but the tears leaving her eyes were big.

"I didn't want any of this to happen. I believed my father when he said he would make sure you were never bitten, that you would be kept safe, and away from all of this. I should have listened to the Unknowns." She covered her mouth with a hand, trying to push down the sobs racking her body.

"It looks like you believed in the wrong person," I said, my voice stiff, though my mind grabbed hold of the word she used.

Unknowns.

I thought of those beings floating around Sharra and Silindra when they were little.

She sucked in a large gulp of air and blew it out slowly. "You're right." She went back to the couch, and even though I still wanted to leave, I found myself trailing after her.

Because despite everything, she was my mother, and I wasn't ready to never see her again.

"I don't know if this will make sense to you." She turned to me and smiled sadly. "But I thought Devoran felt bad about the way he treated me when I was younger. At least, that's what I wanted to believe. See, he was embarrassed that I look this way." She pointed at her very human form. "He and my mom weren't the most loving of parents."

I sighed and sat next to her.

How many years had she been harboring this pain?

She could've been eight or nine hundred years old.

When I was five, I hadn't cared.

My father said she died when she was thirty-five, but she didn't look a day over twenty. "Abernathy told me what happened. The way your - they treated you," I said softly.

As I spoke, the power of the Seal faded, and my skin stopped shimmering.

My mother blinked back tears. "I'm sure it was nothing compared to what you've had to go through."

I doubted that was true. Even though she wasn't around, I had others - Professor Pops, the brothers, Cindy.

She went on. "Growing up must've been so hard on you, but there's no denying you're incredible. I don't think I could've helped you become any more amazing than you already are."

"Really?" My insides fluttered as a surge of emotions rose to the surface. For so long, I needed to hear her say those words.

"Oh, yes. You radiate power - everything beautiful and glorious as well as evil and terrifying. But there's still so much humanity in you. Truly spectacular." A worried expression pressed her brows together.

What did she mean? I wondered if her words were real or if she was trying to make me feel better. "Thank you," I said softly.

My mother leaned away as though really taking me in. I immediately missed her nearness.

"I'm really - " I began but stopped.

I wasn't sure how to express all the feelings bottled up inside. Disappointment filtered into longing for my mom.

She sniffed. "May I hug you?"

The question seemed out of place with all of her gear on, but I nodded.

She moved closer, so our knees were touching. Then she wrapped her arms around me. Her cheek pressed against mine.

We stayed like that for several seconds, until I finally hugged her back, tentative at first, but then I pulled her closer.

Tears clouded my vision, and my heart swelled with sympathy, care, and even love.

Yes, I loved her. So, so much.

And I missed her.

Holding her in my arms filled me with joy. For a brief moment, I was happy. In the next, I understood why Abernathy brought me into a city where the ruler wanted to either kill me or use me. He wanted to give me back my mother.

"Mom," I whispered, hugging her tighter. I breathed in her scent, like wildflowers. And the feel of her soft skin against my cheek. The way her fingers tightened against my back.

After several more minutes, she began to pull back. As she did, she whispered in my ear. "I'll do what I can to help you and your friends leave. The Unknowns were right all along."

She smiled, and it was radiant.

A surge of affection cut through my heart, leaving it raw and tender. I wouldn't be used, but I wanted to be with her, too. "You're coming with us, right?"

A look, one I couldn't read, crossed her features, and vanished immediately. "If that's what you want," she said.

Until she asked, I hadn't known my real feelings. "It is."

She nodded. "Then I'll come with you."

SOMEPLACE SAFE

WE STOOD TOGETHER. She grabbed hold of my hand and squeezed.

"I'll take you to your friends," she said.

I expected her to move toward the hall we went down before. Instead, she went to a set of what looked like elevator doors. "Where are you going?"

"This is the way to your friends."

I felt my pulse pick up. "But, I saw them go down that way." I pointed down the hall.

"True, but I had my guards take them out of here and someplace else. Someplace safe."

I wanted to believe her. "Okay."

The doors slid open, and she stepped inside. "It's fine," she said.

I stepped in with her. Immediately, the doors closed. With a jolt, the elevator moved upward and then started moving sideways. After a few seconds, it began to slant downward.

"What is this thing?" I asked, hoping to ease the tension I was feeling.

"Basically, it's a multi-directional elevator." She smiled. "You might as well settle in. We'll be inside a while."

"It reminds me of a rollercoaster, only not as bumpy."

"Yeah, like that one at Coney Island," she said and smiled.

The memory flooded through me, but we didn't have time to reminisce. Something kept niggling at me. "You've mentioned the Unknowns twice now. What are they?" I thought I knew but wanted to verify.

My mother appeared startled. She glanced down, brushing her hands over her slick black clothing. "The Unknowns are what we call Sharra and Silindra's parents."

"Oh?" I was right. They didn't seem real, more like ghosts or apparitions.

"No one knows what exactly they are, so we call them the Unknowns. Kind of a silly name for them, I guess." She shrugged.

"But you saw them? Like, with your own two eyes."

She studied me a moment before responding. "A couple of times. They came to me right before you were born, and again a few days ago." She sucked in a deep breath. "They're a little creepy."

I nodded. I wanted to say more but didn't know how to explain the link Silindra, and I possessed. Before I could decide what to tell her, she spoke.

"What's it like to be a vampire?" she asked, changing the subject.

I blinked, unable to answer. The question was so surprising. Her lips danced as though she was fighting back a laugh, but that didn't make sense. She flinched when she heard Abernathy call me that.

"It's fine," I answered, wondering how much she knew about vampires.

Her face grew serious. "How far along are you in the process?"

I bit down on my lip. "What do you mean?"

"Have you fallen in love? Did you drink your true love's blood? You're eighteen. You must be relatively close."

I blushed. "Um - "

"Talk to me." She crossed her arms, seemingly uncomfortable. "I know you don't know me - not anymore. But I'd love to hear what's going on with you."

"There is someone," I said, and my face burned with heat.

"And you love him?" she asked. "Who is he?"

I glanced at my feet, uselessly studying the tips of my Converse. It wasn't that I felt defensive, but I was nervous. "His name is Christopher Charming. He had hazel eyes, but now they're sort of a silvery violet color, and hair the color of a soft, sandy beach. He's tall and really nice. He - " I thought about what word to use to describe Christopher. Sure, he was completely gorgeous, caring, and utterly kissable, but he was so much more.

"He what?" my mother asked.

"He gets me," I finished. That was it. More than anyone, he and I were alike. He understood my craving for blood, what changing was like. He accepted every part of me.

"I see," she said, her lips tight. "And have you drunk from him?"

My face got hotter. If I became any more embarrassed, I might turn into a fire.

"Well?" she asked, her voice concerned.

"Yes, but it's no big deal," I responded. It was crazy that I hadn't seen her in thirteen years, but she was still able to make me feel like a little girl. "He and I are - " I paused. I didn't want to say made for each other. That was just too cheesy. Cliché. But it felt right.

"Have you kissed him?" There seemed to be some hope in her voice. And I remembered Professor Pops said if I kissed my true love, I would be changed back. Become a human again. I nodded. "Yes, we've kissed." I touched a hand to my burning cheek.

Her eyebrows lifted. "But you're still a vampire."

"Probably because of the Seal or, I don't know." It was all so complicated.

The whole idea of kissing my true love.

Drinking his blood.

I kissed Christopher before I was the Seal, and nothing happened.

If anything, I craved blood, his blood, more.

At first, I didn't love him, only lusted. Now I knew it was love, though not true love.

"I care deeply for Christopher. The whole true love thing is a moot point because I've become the Seal." I spoke with pretend confidence, hoping she couldn't see through my charade.

Did I even want to be human again? Go back to the girl I was before?

"You're probably right," she said, interrupting my thoughts. "You'll never be human again."

And there it was, the truth I was trying to avoid, spoken aloud. I don't know why, but her words made me angry, and I lashed out. "Yeah, but I was never wholly human anyway, so no biggie."

She sighed, leaning her hands against the rail in the elevator. "I'm sorry," she said, her words heavy with regret.

I released the tension in my shoulders. "I'm sorry too, but it doesn't matter anyway. Sharra doesn't want my body anymore. She's set her sights on another marked."

"Really?" She didn't look convinced. "I would think now more than ever she would want your body. With the Seal, she could become the most powerful being in the world."

I thought of that, but she couldn't get in. The last time she touched me, the Seal burned her.

"All that's left is for you to drink your true love's blood. As soon as that happens, you'll become the next vampire queen."

"My body will be a part of the vampire queen, but it won't be me." What would happen to me? My consciousness? I still didn't know. And I wondered if anyone knew.

"Perhaps." She moved toward me. "Do you want to be the vampire queen?" she asked quietly.

What kind of question was that? Of course not. I wanted to be me. Snow White. I had no desire for power or to be anything else. "No." I shook my head.

"But you know you'll never be just a girl ever again. Besides, you were destined to be more from the moment you were born. So why not be the vampire queen?" There was something about her questions, and the way she spoke that didn't add up.

"Do you want Sharra to take over my body?" She made it sound like I should become the next vampire queen. Was she okay with everything but the body of her daughter being gone?

PLANS FOR THE CHAYOT

"THAT'S THE THING," she began, her voice soft against my ear. "With the power of the Seal, I don't think Sharra will be able to push you out. And when you destroy her, someone will need to rule in her place. You must be resolved to rule, Snow. It's your destiny."

"Do you know this for a fact?"

"No."

I snorted, crossing my arms against my body. "I think destiny is just another word people use to force others to do what they want." I studied her, wondering if it was a good idea to trust her.

"You're wrong," she said, turning away. "Destiny happens despite your choices. One day you'll understand."

There was no point arguing, but I was sick of the word - destiny - and the others that went with it.

The elevator stopped. A bright rectangle of light pulsed on the other side of the opening. I remembered how Silindra journeyed by light to get to Crystal City, the elves' original home. Silindra hadn't liked it.

"Are we going somewhere by light?" I asked, pointing.

"Yes, it's how elves travel, and this is the only way to reach your friends." I started to speak, but she quickly continued, "Travelling by light doesn't hurt. I promise."

I snorted. "That's not what Silindra said."

She made a noise like a gasping fish. "How would you even know that?"

I leaned my shoulder against hers. "I spent some time with her."

My mom's eyes widened. "That. Isn't. Possible." She enunciated each word as though that would help me comprehend that what I said was a lie.

"It may seem that way, but it happened." I decided to tell her the truth. "I was with Silindra when the Seal was created. I went with her to see your father in Crystal City. She traveled by light. And it didn't tickle, that's for sure." I eyed her, waiting for her to come clean, but she was still stuck on the fact that I supposedly was with Silindra

"Silindra died seven thousand years ago. Last I checked, you're barely eighteen." My mother gave me a pointed look.

Should I tell her the rest, explain how, after the Seal killed the chayot, Oberon, its power connected me to Silindra and took me back in time?

That I helped Silindra create the Seal, that I witnessed her death?

That would take more time than we had.

"Believe me when I say it's possible, it happened, and the events I witnessed while with the vampire queen's twin sister won't be easily forgotten."

She smiled nervously. "That's a story I'm anxious to hear." She tucked a piece of wayward hair behind my ears. "Let's get your friends and get out of here." She pointed toward the sheet of light. "Ready?"

I forced back a shudder. "Not really."

My mother grasped one of my hands in hers. "Let's do it together."

As one, we stepped into the ring of light. I closed my eyes. Gritted my teeth. The smell of daffodils filled the air. My mother was squeezing my hand like her life depended on it.

The light vanished, and I glanced over.

Her features were scrunched in pain.

I opened my mouth to tease her.

By her expression, it was obvious the method hurt - even though it hadn't really hurt me, just felt weird, like I was pulled apart and put back together again.

But my gaze fell to her other hand, the one not squeezing mine. It was wrapped around the handle of a knife protruding from her chest.

Blue blood obscured her fingers and dripped down her wetsuit-like clothing.

"Mom!" I cried, hanging onto her as her knees buckled, and she fell into me. My heart was racing, but I gritted my teeth, lowering her to the ground.

Frantic, I looked to see if anyone was around, but we were alone.

"Snow." Blood gurgled from her mouth. "You must find the - "

"The what?" I asked, kneeling next to her.

I just got her back.

No way would I be losing her.

The power of the Seal would heal her the way it healed Christopher.

I just needed to do like Kenmei said and focus on using the power with love in my heart.

"You've got to," she tried again but couldn't finish as she coughed, sending a spray of her blood over my face.

I flinched, debating whether to pull the knife from her or leave it in.

"It's okay, Mom. I can fix this." I grabbed the handle of the knife in my hands and yanked it out, ignoring the disgusting sounds it made when it released.

Her blood smelled of honeysuckle.

The knife was thin but sharp.

I tossed it away and noticed my hands were covered in her blue blood. They were shaking. So was my voice.

"I just found you, Mom. I can't lose you again." I put both hands over her wound. The power of the Seal surged through my hands. "It'll take a minute," I said, blinking back the tears distorting my vision.

Her eyes closed, and my heart lurched.

When I healed Christopher, I hadn't realized that's what I was doing.

It was the same experience when I hurt the vampire queen.

I hadn't wielded the power with intent, but the Seal responded anyway. This time I would focus.

"Stop!" A voice shouted.

I looked up. Devoran was standing a few feet away.

Two guards had Gabe and Cindy by the throat, and the elf king held Dorian in the same position. I hesitated.

Behind them, a rectangle of light twinkled and evaporated.

"Remove your hands from my daughter. That freak of nature doesn't deserve to be saved by your power. She's fulfilled her obligation. I allowed her to live so that one day I would be able to meet you, my granddaughter." His face contorted in a malevolent grin.

My blood boiled in rage at his words. How could he speak about his own daughter that way?

"Do as I say, or I'll kill these three where they stand. It won't be hard. Believe me, I know."

He looked exactly as he did when I was with Silindra.

Had I not known it was Devoran, I would've thought he was just another guard.

He wasn't wearing anything special: white trousers and a matching shirt. Both elven guards wore red.

My hands twitched, but I wasn't too worried.

Gabe was a chayot, and Cindy was a witch.

It would take a lot to kill them. I snorted, compelling more of the Seal's power into my mother. Devoran nodded toward the guard on his right, the one holding Gabe. He twisted Gabe's neck. There was a snap.

Gabe's eyes rolled to the back of his head, and he dropped.

I screamed at the same time Cindy did, but my hands remained right where they were. My mother would not die today.

"Gabe!" Cindy let out a howl and electricity pulsed between her fingers, but she couldn't use it. Her hands, her body seemed tied up by an unseen force.

"Do you want the girl to die next?" Devoran asked. He glanced at the guard holding her. "Well?"

"No," I whispered, and pulled my hands from my mother. "I'm sorry, Mom. Hopefully, that was enough," I whispered.

I thought her lashes fluttered. "Mom," I said, shaking her shoulder.

She didn't move or respond. She looked dead.

"Get over here," Devoran yelled.

I stood. The world was hazy, as though it shifted, and everything was sideways. I had a hard time focusing.

With great effort, I stepped closer to Devoran and Dorian. "Let me make sure Gabe is okay. You know he's a chayot." The words sounded far away like they came from someone else.

"Of course," Devoran said, but a bewildering surprise flickered across his face. He hadn't known, and he intended for his guard to kill Gabe. I would remember that.

The guard who twisted Gabe's neck picked Gabe up.

"Take him to the infirmary and keep him under close watch. I've plans for the chayot," Devoran said.

I caught Cindy's eyes.

They were filled with tears.

I tried to nod, to convince her everything was okay, but I just lost my mother and watched Gabe's neck get broken.

Nothing felt okay.

"I'm sorry," Dorian mouthed.

Dorian. Handsome Dorian. He didn't have anything to be sorry for.

I reached out to take his hand. It looked like he wanted to grab hold but couldn't. And I finally realized that was why my friends weren't fighting back.

Something had them restrained.

"Dorian," I said. The edges of my vision faded, and I tasted blood in my mouth. Was it mine? It had to be. The darkness around my view got thicker and thicker, and my body seemed to get heavier and heavier.

I glanced back at my mom. She was still on her back, unresponsive.

SACRIFICE YOURSELF

"SNOW."

"Snow White."

"We are waiting for you."

"It is urgent we speak with you."

I opened my eyes and noticed a tiny blue light shining above my head.

It flitted around like a pixilette but was much smaller.

I was in what looked like a black box. No windows. No doors. Just four sparkling black walls, a ceiling, and a floor.

"Snow, please hurry."

"This is urgent."

I reached out a finger to touch the light. The voices seemed to come from it, but it darted away.

"I can't get out. There's no door," I whispered, standing. As I spoke, a door appeared, and I gasped, hoping for escape.

But my hope was short-lived, for on the other side of the door was more darkness. As my heart fell, the dark became a tunnel.

I took a tentative step, and as I did, more of the tunnel appeared.

"Where am I?" The blue lights flicked down the shaft, making it obvious they wanted me to follow.

After a few moments, I stopped and looked back the way I came, but there was nothing to see.

One of the blue lights returned, flicking in front of my face. "You want me to follow?"

In response, it headed down the tunnel toward the other blue light.

Desperate to escape, I followed until finally, the two lights led me to another room before disappearing.

With my vampire vision, I was still able to see.

A quick peek inside revealed it was exactly the same as the room I came from, except for one thing. In the center of the room was an altar.

It was white and stood out against all of the black.

Something inside me told me to run away, but I couldn't. An intangible pull emanated from the altar, and I had no choice but to move toward it.

When I was near enough to touch it, two strands of smoke rushed through the walls and hovered in front of me.

They moved like water, their features indiscernible before they shifted into something vaguely animalistic. Like clouds, they changed into a girl who looked like me, then a werewolf, a dragon, and a skeleton.

The Unknowns, I thought, trying to look away, but unable to.

"You are Snow White."

"Daughter of Ariel."

"Born of Silindra."

"Our daughter."

I didn't respond, unsure whether they wanted me to.

"You are the Seal."

"The restoration bringer."

"And your time has come."

"Okayyyyy," I said slowly, wondering why they were talking.

They weren't asking questions.

Their words didn't make sense.

Plus, it was hard to focus on their changing faces.

It wasn't like their voices came from mouths. Their lips didn't move. Sometimes they didn't even have lips.

But as I heard the words, they circled around me, ever closer, though they never touched me.

"What do you want?" I asked, my voice quivering.

At that question, their bodies took shape. Their color stayed the same - one was silver and the other gold.

Each possessed a face, arms, legs, and body, but I couldn't tell what kind of creature they were. Everything and nothing.

"Close your eyes."

"Let us show you."

I did as they said because whatever force held me made my eyes close.

This can't be real, I thought. It must be a dream. Like those ones where you try to run, but your body seems to be stuck in quicksand.

Their fingers touched my eyes.

I tried not to wince at the chill that ran through my body.

Immediately images shot through my mind.

And I was on the altar.

My blood flowed from my body, spilling over the sides and dripping to the floor.

Something round and red and pulsating hovered in the air above my chest.

It beat in a slow rhythm.

Sparkling red flowed from it, and I immediately knew it was the power of the Seal.

A swirling vortex of energy and blood, like pieces of tangled yarn.

They lit up the room, dipped and twirled.

It was beautiful.

Magical.

And horrifying.

After a time, the combination of the Seal and my blood produced seven large gems. Within my line of sight, they pulsated like living things.

One gold: The magic of the dragon.

One blue: The magic of the elf.

One green: The magic of the fairy.

One brown: The magic of the troll.

One indigo: The magic of the unicorn.

One silver: The magic of the vampire.

And one red: The magic of what?

To complete the Seal, the blood of the hunter was required - Gabriel's blood.

"What does this mean?" I asked, a little terrified at seeing myself bleed out.

"To restore the balance of the seven magics, you must sacrifice yourself."

"It's the only way to regenerate the cycle."

"Allow the seven magics to return to the beginning."

"The way magic was before Sharra disrupted it."

"But - " I didn't want to die. "What about Sharra? If I'm gone, who will stop her? The Seal has made me more powerful. I can stop her. But not if I'm dead."

"Once the Seal is broken, the seven magics will be reborn. When that happens, Sharra will be destroyed."

"She'll become nothing."

"We know what she's done."

"And her power will be stripped."

"How," I asked, watching the gems throb steadily as they grew. I realized the gems were a similitude of the magics being reborn. Each possessed a heartbeat. Each thumped in time with the others.

"The Seal is connected to Sharra - to all touched by her blood.

Once the Seal is shattered, those who've been tainted by Sharra, including Sharra herself, will cease to live. And a new breed of magical creatures will be born."

"What are you saying?" I didn't want to be in this dream any longer. I wanted to escape.

"Your death will bring forth new life, Snow White."

"You are the purest of the pure."

"The best of the best."

"The fairest in the land."

"That's unacceptable. You can't kill everyone. It's - it's - " I stammered, feeling frantic. "Ludicrous."

"Death begets life."

"The cycle of the living is to die."

"No! What about all we've learned?" I opened my eyes, and the beings shifted and floated away, their forms once again smoke and light.

"It's how it must be."

"It will be."

"You said it yourself."

"If a creature lives long enough, it becomes evil."

"That includes you!" I yelled, desperate to get away or wake up.

A tornado of energy surrounded me, holding my body firmly.

I was lifted in the air and placed on the altar as though everything started over again. The beings hovered over me. I wasn't able to move or speak.

A wicked knife, the blade twisted like a unicorn horn, appeared above my chest.

The wispy individuals started chanting words I didn't understand.

My skin changed from a too-white-white to the colors of the seven magics.

I tried to struggle and to get away, but I couldn't even scream. I thought of Christopher and decided I should've said yes. If I had, I wouldn't be here. Instead, I would be in his arms.

"We aren't wicked."

"We aren't good."

"We are beyond the living and the dying, no longer like those who dwell on Earth."

"We are the creators."

Deep down, I knew the Seal would do what I wanted. I thought of anger, hate, fear, anything to break the bonds that held me, but I couldn't access its power. It was as though my brain and my body were separated.

IF YOU LOVE ME

THIS IS IT, I thought. I'm going to die.

A profound gloom curled its way around my heart.

Never in a million years did I imagine my life would end this way. If I pictured anything, it was that I disappeared into nothingness as the vampire queen took over my body. Dying like this? No one would know.

And I thought of Silindra on an altar, her blood drained from her body.

Sacrificed for Sharra's whims.

I never would've guessed my fate would be so entwined with hers.

I didn't want to die. I didn't want those I loved to die. I wanted to live!

The knife hovering above me abruptly descended and sank deep into my chest.

If I could have, I would have cried out in pain. I felt every rip, every tear, every shredded vein, and vessel as the blade entered my body.

But I was unable to move.

The knife retreated as quickly as it dropped and once again hung above my chest.

Blood slid from the blade and on to my shirt.

The scent of copper stung my nose. I wanted to cry at the injustice of it all.

And, in a way, the knife did that for me.

Drip.

Drip.

Drip.

Red tears of mourning.

A glittering red mist appeared above my wound, hovering, and swirling into my blood.

It was happening.

The Seal was breaking.

Soon everyone I loved would vanish.

No!

That was my last thought as I drifted into oblivion.

I DON'T KNOW if I was unconscious for a second or a day, but when I came to, it was to the sound of someone shouting.

"I don't care. Let her go. I'll take her place."

The Unknowns responded one by one:

"That isn't part of the plan."

"We can't allow it."

I opened my eyes.

"Dorian?" I asked wearily, surprised I could hear his voice and the sound of my own.

I had to be dreaming.

"Snow!" he cried.

His voice broke as his face appeared next to mine, but he turned in the Unknowns direction. "You can't stop me. It isn't her time to die."

I blinked several times, unable to believe. "What are you doing? How did you find me?"

He climbed on the altar, placing his body between the dagger and me. It had already stabbed me a hundred or a thousand times. I didn't understand why it kept going, kept stabbing, but it did.

The Unknowns spoke, and they didn't sound happy:

"We can't control him."

"He is too strong."

"What is this?"

"Madness!"

I didn't know what they meant.

Dorian was human, perhaps the weakest of all creatures.

How could they not control him? How was he too strong for them?

Dorian's eyes found mine.

"How?" I asked again, relieved to see him.

He kissed the tip of my nose. "I followed my heart," he said. The last word came out in a rush, and I knew the sharp blade drove into his back.

I couldn't let this happen. "Dorian, you need to leave. Go. I don't know how you did it, but - "

A hiss escaped through his clenched teeth and I knew he'd been stabbed again.

A sob caught in my throat as the blade sank and withdrew from his flesh again, and tears filled his eyes from the pain. "Go. Please."

He held my gaze. "No. Don't cry. Shhh-hh."

The knife went into his back again. I noticed the dazzling red of the Seal winding around the room. It was still glowing but didn't seem as strong. Its potency lessened as it spun and dipped into Dorian's blood instead of mine.

"You can't be here." Even though I was so happy to see him. So relieved, I wasn't alone. Did that make me weak?

"I'm exactly where I'm supposed to be." His words caught as the blade went in and out again.

"No," I whispered, closing my eyes.

He touched my face, his fingers pressing against my jaw slightly when the blade buried itself in his back before it retreated. "Do you remember what Abernathy said? That I would know what I needed to do when the time was right?"

"Y-Yes." Tears stung my eyes and burned a path into my ears and hair.

"Tonight, I was pacing in a room without a door when one suddenly appeared."

Had these beings - the Unknowns - brought Dorian here as well? "Was there a blue light?"

He gave me a strange look. "Not blue, but a bright gold. I tried the door handle. It opened into a golden hallway, and I followed it. On, and on, and on. Until I found you. I'm so sorry I didn't get here sooner." The knife tore into his flesh again. He closed his eyes and his fist at the same time. "As soon as I saw you lying on the altar, I knew. My purpose, the whole reason I was born, is to save you."

"You can't - "

He stopped me, covering my mouth with his fingers.

"I've always known. From the moment you tripped up the stairs to Professor Pops' front door. I looked into your beautiful eyes and thought, this girl is meant for me."

"We were eight the first time we met," I whispered. "You were into cars and video games. Girls were the last thing on your mind." I smiled, remembering the look on his face that day.

I finally understood all those moments in my past when I was curious about Dorian and what he wanted or was thinking.

He was there, regardless. No matter what.

"Please don't do this for me," I begged, knowing if I lived and he died I would never be the same. Living without him wouldn't be living at all. "Dorian, please."

When the knife entered his back there was a smacking sound and I knew it was the blade hitting his pooling blood.

While I was still in Silindra's mind, Dorian said he loved me. For some reason the words to a freaking scripture came to mind and I wasn't a church going girl. It wasn't all the words either, but as I stared into Dorian's beautiful face, I knew what it meant to be loved.

Love is patient, love is kind. It does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud. Love never fails.

"Dorian," I said his name so soft.

"It's okay, Snow. Let me do this for you." He closed his eyes a moment.

My sadness turned to anger. "If you love me, you will freaking do what I say. You'll go."

I NEED YOU

"ALWAYS DESPERATE TO SAVE OTHERS, but not this time." Dorian's voice was soft, and I knew it was because he was bleeding out. Dying.

"No, please," I begged.

He shook his head, forcing a smile. "Can I kiss you?"

I closed my eyes, wishing this was all just a dream. "Anything," I said. If only he would go. I couldn't watch him die.

The blade went into his back, that damned noise making me want to throw up.

"I love you, Snow White. Always have and always will." He gently pressed his lips to mine and moved them tenderly.

The blade went in again. And he caught his breath.

I cried out, kissing him back with all the gratitude and love in my heart.

For all the years he cared for me without ever asking me to reciprocate.

Images of each time he was there and loved me unconditionally flashed through my mind.

The night I told Professor Pops, the brothers, and Kenmei, I never wanted to see them again. I awakened with my mother's blanket over me.

At the time, I hadn't realized who had done it.

Now I saw Dorian. He brushed tendrils of hair from my face before covering me.

Or the night I got scared, right after I saw the vision of myself drinking the blood from the heart. Gabe came over, but Dorian stopped by as well. To make sure I was safe.

The night I was first bitten. Dorian demanded I stay in his room, and he checked on me several times during the night.

There were so many images I couldn't keep track of. He was in the background, looking out for me, since the day we met.

And one thought filled me up. Every crevice, and cranny.

This is truly what it means to be loved.

At that moment, something peculiar happened.

Brilliant sparks burst from Dorian and into me, starting with my lips and moving through my neck, my arms, torso, legs, and feet. Right down to my toes. It moved like lightning.

Fireworks, I thought.

And I sucked in a breath at the strength of their heat.

Love. Astonishing love. All-consuming, glorious love.

In the background, I heard the Unknowns shriek and groan, as though they were suffering terrible pain.

"This is unexpected."

"The plan has changed."

The blade above Dorian and me vanished.

Dorian no longer moved, the entire weight of his body resting against mine and I guessed he passed out from loss of blood.

The Seal's glittering red still swirled lightly, bathing Dorian's peaceful face in an extraordinary glow.

My limbs were released from their invisible restraints, and I pushed at Dorian, moving his body. The hole in my chest near my heart healed instantly. "Dorian," I said, shaking him. "You did it. They're gone." I patted his cheek with a hand. "Dorian."

He didn't stir.

The room began to quake, and chunks of black rock fell around us.

I tried to move him, to get out from under him.

His body slid to the side, but he didn't wake.

"Oh, please. Dorian. No. Don't be dead. Please don't be dead." I felt for a pulse at his neck.

He didn't have one.

I jumped off the altar.

Dorian's body rolled so that he was on his stomach and I saw all the knife had done to him. His shirt was sticky with blood, a gaping hole in his back.

"No. Dorian. No."

I had a flash of Gabe when I thought I killed him.

Briefly, my feet wanted to run, but I kept myself planted in place.

I was different now.

I wasn't the girl I was with Gabe.

But, I was a vampire - the Seal - and I could save Dorian.

But only if I stayed.

Sucking in a ragged breath, I climbed on the altar, kneeling next to him.

I placed both hands over the wound and poured all the love I had for him, all the love he gave me, into my desire to heal him.

The colors of the seven magics rushed from my hands into him. They lit the room and beat slowly under my hands.

"Come back, Dorian. Come back. I need you," I pleaded.

The colors grew stronger and surged through his body until he was bathed in them. "That's it. You can do it. If your love saved me, then let mine save you." I choked back my fear. "Please."

His body glowed as the colors grew brighter and brighter, until I had to look away as an eruption of light flashed, and my hands fell onto the altar.

Dorian was gone.

I stared at my hands, covered in Dorian's blood, and screamed, and screamed, and screamed. The sound vibrated through the crumbling rock. One rock struck me on the head, and I tumbled off the altar.

I tried to stand but kept slipping in the blood.

There was so much blood.

It streaked the altar and pooled around it.

My shoes, jeans, and arms were covered in it, a mixture of my blood and Dorian's.

As I sobbed, desperate, unsure what to do next, something began to form on the altar.

Frantic, I moved closer.

To my astonishment, a black gem appeared.

It was spinning fast and grew bigger and bigger until suddenly it stopped, hovering above the flat stone surface.

It was the size of an egg. Specks of silver, green, blue, red, brown, gold, and indigo covered it - the colors of the seven magics.

"I see her." Cindy's voice cut through my anguish and the falling rocks.

I snatched up the gem and shoved it in my pocket. I didn't know what the jewel meant, but I wasn't leaving it behind.

A large boulder fell from the ceiling and struck me on the shoulder, sending me to the ground.

"Come on," I heard someone shout, and I turned toward it.

Rocks continued to fall from the ceiling, but Cindy was there. So was Gabe. I wanted to tell them to leave me. I didn't want to face them. Because that meant I'd have to tell them about Dorian. That he died. Because of me.

"She's over here," Cindy said.

I tried to stand, but another rock struck my leg, and I stayed down. Grief overwhelmed me. The Seal was supposed to be all-powerful and should've saved Dorian. But it didn't.

"Snow!" Cindy shouted, tossing rocks out of her path with magic as she made her way over. She knelt down, and I saw Gabe move to the other side of me.

SAVED US ALL

I LOOKED at Cindy and then at Gabe before closing my eyes. "I couldn't save him," I said in a voice that wasn't my own. "I tried. I did. Kenmei said, use love. I swear, I tried."

Gabe knelt on the other side. "Who?"

"Dorian," I whispered. "He protected me, all of us, but he's gone. I don't know where." The words came out choppy and garbled, but I couldn't make myself stop crying.

"It's okay. You're okay," he said, but I heard the anguish in his voice.

Cindy pulled me into a hug. "It isn't your fault, Snow."

But that wasn't true. It was my fault.

I thought of dying.

Would there be rest?

Could I shut out the agony?

The way Dorian looked at me. His kiss. What he did. Saved me. Saved us all. Abernathy's words to Dorian rang in my mind: "Very few have the capacity to love like you."

"Where could he be?" I wailed.

"Let's get her out of here," Gabe said to Cindy, and I felt his hands pull me into his arms.

"My mom?" I asked as they pulled me from the rubble.

"She's alive. They brought her to the infirmary while I was there," Gabe said.

The weight on my spirit lifted a tiny bit. At least my mother hadn't died. "We need to help her. She's in danger." I tried to climb out of Gabe's arms, but he held on tight.

"Right now, we need to leave. This is our one shot."

Cindy grabbed hold of my hand. "Eradicus seemungus." There was a rustle of wind, and the three of us went from the rocky debris to the colorful streets of Mizu Atlantica.

In the distance was the rushing sound of giant wings beating against the night sky.

Gabe set me on the ground, but I leaned against him. My body was healed but emotionally was another story.

I breathed in deeply, trying to pull in some clean air, hoping it would sustain my devastated soul. The air was wet and smelled of brine, but there was also a hint of fragrance - honeysuckle. My mother.

Gabe held me steady. "Abernathy's coming," he said. "We need to go right away before Devoran realizes we're missing."

I wasn't leaving without my mother, but Gabe was right about one thing. He and Cindy needed to escape Mizu Atlantica. With them out of the way, I wouldn't worry. I shuddered. Another death would end me, I felt sure.

Abernathy landed. "Where's the human?" he asked, searching my grief-stricken face.

I placed a shaky hand on one of his golden scales, near his mouth. He was so warm.

"He's gone. Something happened. I'm not sure what."

I knew, but I couldn't make my lips say the words.

The dragon grunted. "It's just for now," he said without a trace of grief.

I wanted to punch him. Light him on fire. Not that it would do any good.

He went on, his voice was urgent. "Climb on. I can hear Devoran and his guards preparing to come against us. They know you've escaped."

Gabe lifted Cindy onto the dragon's back, then he reached for my hand. "I'll help you," he said kindly.

I shook my head, and his jaw flexed in frustration. "I can't leave my mother. You guys go. I'll find another way to get her out."

Abernathy huffed, and smoke swirled from his nostrils, sending the smell of sulfur into the air.

Gabe shook his head, angry. "Dorian is dead. You nearly died. We need to regroup, figure out our next move. We can't do that if we're trapped here, fighting for our lives."

"Snow," Cindy began, crossing her arms. "We don't know anything about this place. Staying behind is crazy."

"I know," I said, absently patting Abernathy's cheek. "That's why you need to go." I swallowed. "I'll be better off alone."

Abernathy shook his mane. "You need your friends, your family. Without them, you'll lose."

I cleared the emotion from my throat. "Dorian is dead because of me. I can't be responsible for any more."

The dragon snorted. "You're alive because of that boy. Don't destroy Dorian's selfless gift by going into battle without preparation."

Tears stung my cheeks. "I can't leave my mom."

The screeching of metal on metal rang through the night. I turned toward the sound. The green circle Abernathy landed on when we first arrived slid open. At least a hundred armed guards slowly exited. Each held bizarre guns similar to the one my mom had worn on her back. All of them were aimed in our direction. Devoran stood in the guards' midst, an arrogant ferocity on his face.

"On my life, I swear we'll come back for your mother, young vampire. But now is not the time." Abernathy growled, sending a stream of fire in the direction of the guards. I got the feeling it was less about fighting and more about frustration over my unwillingness to cooperate.

Gabe reached out for my hand. "Come on," he said.

A shot ripped at the skin on my forearm. The bullet appeared to be made of pure light. I stared at it, mesmerized, as it sizzled and turned to ash, momentarily leaving a burn mark until my skin recovered.

More of them hissed past me. Several hit Abernathy, and he roared.

"Get on my back, you stubborn girl!"

Another bullet struck my thigh. I looked up and noticed Cindy was bleeding from a wound in her shoulder. Gabe's chest was bleeding, and so was his arm and his thigh.

They weren't going to leave without me.

"Fine!" I yelled and jumped on. "Go!"

Abernathy shot into the air. He swung his head at the guards who were running toward us and let out his fiery breath. I thought for sure they would all burn, but at the last second, a rectangular door of light appeared, and the guards vanished into it. Abernathy growled and flew toward the bubble suspended over the city.

I kept my gaze on the street, on Devoran. He stood on the pearlized road, his hands on his hips, his feet wide apart, his chest heaving in anger.

"I'm coming back," I whispered.

FRESH PAIN

"HOME IS where your heart can flourish." My mom used to say those words to me when I was a child.

As Abernathy circled Professor Pops' sprawling mansion, my heart clenched.

After I told Professor Pops and the brothers what happened with Dorian, would they continue to let this be my home?

From the air, I made out the little cottage-type house I lived in with my mom and dad, and then my dad and stepmother.

Happy memories sprang to mind.

Like the times my mom would bake cookies while she hummed the latest popular song. Or when she would let me help her plant flowers in the spring and fall.

The house where I grew up was minuscule compared to Professor Pops' extensive grounds and house.

Through the dark, I was able to distinguish the tennis court and putting green. Behind the mansion, which seemed somehow larger from the sky, lay a sculpted, manicured lawn, and a rectangular pool - lit and giving off a cyan glow.

If I hadn't left my mother in captivity in Mizu and Dorian dead, I would be excited to be home.

But I wasn't.

I was sick inside.

My heart was broken.

I leaned against Cindy. She, Gabe, and Abernathy were melancholy as well. None of us spoke. Too much had happened.

On the flight back, I healed their wounds with the Seal and told them what Dorian had done.

That I tried to save him, but he vanished.

I told them all of it without an ounce of feeling, as though I was relating events that happened to someone else.

When I finished, it was apparent Gabe and Cindy were hurting too. Broken like me.

Abernathy kept mostly quiet. "The Unknowns are strange creatures. They see things much differently than we do," he said.

And that was it.

We flew the rest of the way home in silence.

Honestly, I was grateful. Soon enough, I'd have to tell Professor Pops and the remainder of the brothers about Dorian. That because of me, they would never see him again.

Dorian, I thought, wiping at fresh tears.

Abernathy's wings pounded against the night sky several times before he landed gracefully on the back lawn. It was winter, so the yellow grass crunched and crackled under his weight and enormous size of his paws.

Gabe slid off first and helped Cindy down. He didn't bother with me. Probably too upset about what happened. That I took one of his brothers from him.

"I have to speak with the other chayot," he said, giving Cindy a quick hug. "Let Professor Pops know I'm back and safe. Please?" He glanced at me then, and I nodded.

Without the slightest noise or even a flicker in the wind, he was gone.

That was new. Apparently, Gabe and his chayot skills were getting stronger.

"I should get home. My parents are probably freaking out," Cindy said.

"Okay," I whispered as I slid down.

Cindy patted my arm. "I'll see you tomorrow. We'll figure out a way to get your mom back." Though I sensed her trepidation, her exhaustion, I knew without a doubt she would help.

"Tomorrow," I repeated and tried to smile, but my lips wouldn't cooperate. She jogged toward the house and skirted it. I knew she was headed for her car, parked in front. As I watched her go, I wondered if it was wise to be close to the people I loved. Being near me seemed to cause them pain.

Abernathy let out a gust of smoke through his nostrils. "You mustn't worry so much, vampire. Yes, your friends may suffer, and sometimes it'll be your fault. But you should ask yourself, would they be happier knowing you went into danger alone? Would they feel safer?" He shook his head, making his golden mane swirl around his face.

I didn't know how to respond. He was right, of course. But it didn't make me feel any better. Accept that you're going to cause people pain. That's what it felt like he was saying. How could I consent to that? The answer was simple. I couldn't.

"A hundred questions are swimming around in your head. Ask them so I may return to my home and get some sleep." He lay down, resting his chin against his front paws. Somber eyes studied me.

Had I not wanted to put off talking to Pops and the brothers, I would've found an excuse to leave. "I do have questions," I began. "Like why would you take me to Mizu when you damn well knew Devoran wanted to kill - " I stopped. At the edge of the woods, between my house and Professor Pops', stood Christopher. But that wasn't what gave me pause. For the briefest moment, I thought he was Dorian.

My heart shattered all over again.

Gulping down my pain, I leaned against Abernathy, my question forgotten.

A rumble, like a purr, came from deep within his body. "Stay strong. You still have much ahead of you."

His words made me ill. It was true. I still needed to find a way to save the seven magics, preferably without losing my life as the Unknowns intended. I needed to rescue my mother, tell Pops and the brothers about Dorian, and determine whether I was meant to be the next vampire queen. Each thought weighed more heavily than the one before until I wished I could disappear, vanish into nothingness.

"He's waiting. You should talk to him," Abernathy said. I sensed a hitch in the dragon's words. He knew way more than he shared, and there was something he wasn't saying.

I studied my hunter. The man I decided to go all the way with. He was handsome, excessively so. And before that moment, it hadn't dawned on me how much Christopher and Dorian looked alike. They both had hazel eyes - at least, had before the Seal changed Christopher's to a silvery violet. Both had sandy-colored hair and were tall and tan, with well-defined bodies. They could've been fraternal twins. Brothers, at least.

Maybe it was because their personalities were so different that I hadn't noticed their physical similarities before now. Where Christopher was serious, Dorian was more laid back, playful.

"How long were we gone?" I asked Abernathy.

"A few days. They've all been worried. I sent word to the professor you were visiting your mom after I left you with her. So, he knows a little, but that only increased his concern."

"Great." And I missed more school. Would I ever graduate?

"Agreed. The hunter is the most upset." A question lay behind his words, but he went on, and I forgot to be worried. "He wanted me to fly him to you, but I told him no. He isn't too fond of me at the moment." A soft chuckle escaped the dragon's throat. "Go on. I'll rest my eyes while I'm waiting."

"Alright." I took a step toward Christopher before pausing. "Aren't you worried someone will see you?"

He already closed his eyes but opened one. "Do I look the least bit concerned, little vampire?"

"No, you really don't. And I'm hoping it's because you know what you're doing and not because - " I trailed off. I didn't want to call him crazy. That would be rude.

"I'm not crazy - well, at least no more than can be expected after six thousand plus years of life. I do possess a good deal of magic, remember." He closed his eye. "Trust me. The only reason you can see me is because I want you to."

"Right." I kept forgetting about magic, even though I was part of that world now - a supernatural creature. Shaking my head, I moved briskly toward Christopher. The closer I got, the faster I went, until I was in his arms, my face buried in his neck. It was good to see him and feel his body against mine, giving me a sense of security. My heartbeat quickened with happiness at having him near.

But he wasn't Dorian. At the thought of him, pain radiated through me.

"Don't ever leave without telling me," Christopher said fiercely, his fingers winding through my hair.

"I'm sorry," I responded, forcing away the tears stinging my lashes.

"What's the dragon still doing here? Doesn't he have someplace to be? A nap to get to?" he asked, his words filled with irritation.

"I need to talk to him. He's waiting until I'm done with you," I said softly, trying to smile.

Christopher met my gaze, his eyes filled with longing. "If I have my way, we'll never be apart again."

I hugged him, though it didn't feel the same. Things changed. It didn't matter that Dorian was gone. I felt what real love was supposed to be and knew that wasn't how I felt for my hunter. "I won't be long."

"Promise?"

I watched his face, the way he looked at me and was grateful he cared so much. "I need to speak with Abernathy. Alone." I looked away, hoping he wouldn't be upset but determined to stand my ground. It wasn't that I didn't want him to know about the black gem in my pocket. I wanted to understand what it was first. Created on the altar from Dorian's blood and mine. I needed to know what it meant, and I knew if anyone had the answer, it would be the dragon.

"Fine," he replied after several long seconds. "I'll see you tomorrow."

I pulled him close, kissing his cheek. "Thank you, Christopher."

He cupped my face in his hands, brushing my cheeks with his thumbs. Electric shocks of longing coursed through my body. "You can tell me anything. You know that, right?"

I swallowed, nodded. "I will. Later."

He pressed his lips to mine, a kiss filled with promises. Compared to what I felt with Dorian, there were significant differences. When we separated, he sighed. "Tomorrow, Frosty," he said, brushing the tip of my nose with his finger.

THE END AND THE BEGINNING

WHEN I WAS sure Christopher was gone, I hurried back to Abernathy. He smacked his lips and opened one eye. "Awww, young love." He paused. "We both know it isn't real."

I sighed, crossing my arms over my chest. It wasn't his place to say anything. After Dorian's kiss - the love that had surrounded me, filled me - I knew the dragon was right. But Dorian was dead.

"Love is dense," Abernathy continued.

I snorted; grateful I could jump on his unusually lousy comment. "That's romantic."

A laugh resounded in his throat. "What I mean is, real love, is more than what you see, what you feel, in the moment."

"Really?" I asked with thick sarcasm, but I was interested. It wasn't like I ever had someone to talk to about love.

"Certainly," he said with a wink. "Think about a lush forest, rich with all manner of foliage. A person could spend eons discovering its secrets and still not find them all. It's the same with love. True love, anyway." He gave me a pointed look. "Deep, abiding love is discovering something new and wondrous about the other person, even after spending a lifetime together."

"I like that," I said, my mind wandering back to Dorian and our kiss. "What about true love's kiss?" My face grew hot. I was embarrassed to be talking to a dragon about something that sounded so juvenile.

He laughed again, and it sounded like thunder. "You want to know if you will become human again if you receive it."

I nodded, blinking back tears. Juvenile or not, it was in my thoughts, and I craved an answer.

"Hmmm." He extended his wings, turned, and looked at them. "Is that what you want? To become human - at least partially so - since you were never fully human to begin with."

I didn't. Without a doubt, I knew that. "No, but what would happen if I received it now? Since I'm the Seal and a vampire." I coughed, trying to work through my feelings. Things were so different, and true love's kiss didn't matter anymore. I knew that. When Professor Pops told me about true love's kiss, the Seal wasn't even in the picture.

"Ah." Abernathy smiled and licked his teeth. "That's a good question." He closed his eyes. "I have theories, but not exact answers." He opened his eyes, catching me off guard with his stare. "There has never been another like you, Snow White."

"That's what I figured." I scanned the sky, searching among the brilliant stars for courage.

Abernathy clicked his claws against each other. "Enough of that. What do you really need to discuss with me? I know there is more."

There was. A lot more. "It's - " I paused, readjusting my inner turmoil. I hadn't meant to bring that up, about the kiss. But I was glad I did. There was no going back to ordinary. Abernathy made that clear.

Reaching a hand in my pocket, my fingers found the gem. Its smooth surface was slightly warm. I pulled it out, holding it up for Abernathy to see. The flecks of color glistened in the moonlight. "This," I said timidly.

Abernathy shook his mane, tilting his head to one side. "Unexpected," he said slowly, his voice filled with wonder. "Tell me how you came to have that in your possession."

I explained what happened and how it formed on the altar from my blood and Dorian's.

"Did you show the hunter?" he asked, his voice so low, I wondered whether he said the question aloud.

I shook my head. "No. Only you." It was apparent whatever it was, the gem was something special.

"Good." Twin wisps of smoke plumed from his nostrils, and he breathed out heavily.

I waited for him to say more, but he didn't. "What is it?" I asked, placing a hand on a hip.

A palpable current of energy churned the chilly air.

A snap, like a fierce worry, rolled off the dragon. Whatever the gem was, it didn't fill Abernathy with joy, that was for sure.

"Between your fingers - that gem - it is the beginning and the end. I cannot tell you more. I will say this, though. Keep it with you at all times, understand?" He stood, and I had to tilt my head to see his face.

"I don't. Why can't you be more specific? Tell me what it is." I stuck the gem back in my pocket, afraid that having it out in the open was somehow wrong. Dangerous, even. Abernathy was infuriating. "The beginning and the end tells me nothing."

"If I'm more specific, then it's likely others will find out what you possess. Once the words have been spoken, they can't be taken back."

"Fine." I tucked my hands in my back pockets. If he weren't forthcoming on the gem, maybe he would be more helpful with plans to save my mother. "What about my mom? How are we going to get her out of Mizu?"

He lowered his head. "Quite simply, you aren't."

I started to protest, but he went on.

"You must confront the vampire queen, convince her she's made a mistake, strip her of her power, and return magic to the other creatures. She must allow you to take over. When she is no longer a ruler, you can release those in captivity. Once those two things are done, the balance of the seven magics should be restored."

He paused as though deep in thought, and I waited. "Killing her won't solve anything. You must make her see the harm she's causing and make her step down."

I huffed. "Yeah, right. I'll just show up in her land and have a conversation with the vampire queen. She'll be more than happy to acquiesce. I'm sure she'll be thrilled by the idea of me taking over and releasing all supernatural creatures under her control."

"Sarcasm is unbecoming," Abernathy quipped, smacking his teeth together with a snap.

"Stop kidding around. I need to save my mother, and then I can go after the vampire queen." I held out my hands in front of me, pleading with him to do as I asked. "Tell me what I need to know about Mizu Atlantica." My bottom lip quivered at thoughts of what Devoran might be doing to her. "My mom! I can't leave her there."

Abernathy closed his eyes. "You know all you need to know of Mizu. It was created to protect magical creatures from Sharra. Once you've dethroned her and her magic is no longer viable, Mizu will cease to matter, and those within will be returned to this realm. Simple as that."

I gasped. "You promised me." His words sounded like excuses, like what a lazy dragon might say.

He growled. It was soft but menacing. I crossed a line, but I didn't care.

"I think it's time I tell you a secret," he said.

"What secret?" I threw my hands in the air, exasperated.

This conversation wasn't going anything like I expected. I thought he would tell me about the black gem. I hoped it was a way to stop the vampire queen or, better yet, a way to restore balance to magic.

I thought it was the answer to all my problems. Something that would mean Dorian's death wasn't meaningless. Though I already knew that wasn't true. His sacrifice saved me and all of Earth's creatures.

Instead of enlightening me, Abernathy made the gem out to be something sinister. I swallowed back a string of curse words that floated through my mind.

Abernathy let out a roar.

Startled, I fell backward.

My hands crunched against the hard, dead grass.

A stream of fire went into the sky, and the air became thick with smoke and the stench of sulfur. It stung my nose.

A golden shimmer surrounded the dragon, so he glowed.

The light became so bright I had to look away.

After several seconds the light diminished. I coughed and squinted, trying to see the dragon through all the smoke. But he was gone, and a man came forward.

SECRETS REVEALED

"KENMEI," I whispered, bewildered. "What happened to Abernathy?"

"Take my hand," he insisted.

I shook my head. "Where's the dragon?" Had Kenmei killed him? Was everything the vampire queen said about him right? Was Kenmei evil?

"Shiryo-san, it's me," he said and crouched, so we were level. His eyes flashed, and the endlessness that was in Kenmei's eyes vanished. Instead, his eyes glowed amber.

Abernathy's eyes.

"That's impossible."

"Not impossible. Let me show you." He held out his hand again. Nervously I took it, and he pulled me to my feet.

"Does Pro - Adam Henry know?" I asked, searching his face, trying to see Abernathy in there. Even though the dragon was a hundred times my size, I felt more at ease with him than I ever felt with Kenmei.

"Yes, he knows. After so many years, how could he not? Even the vampire queen knows."

I raised an eyebrow. "Why's that?" And then I understood. The vampire queen had bitten him, changed him. He was the first hunter. She tasted his blood, probably more than once. "Yet she changed you anyway. That must've been quite a feat for Sharra. Having a dragon do her bidding."

He smiled sardonically. "I was never in my dragon form while in her service. When she changed me, I was in this form." He pointed at his very human-looking body, that of a middle-aged Asian man. "It wasn't until much later that she realized what I was, but I refused to take on my dragon form for her. It was a constant battle between us."

"Why would you even allow it?"

He chuckled lightly. "It was a rough time in my life." He gave me a sideways look.

"Did it have to do with love?" I was only half-joking, but his eyebrows raised.

"Very perceptive." He clasped his hands behind his back and turned his attention to the sky.

I wanted to ask him more. Get the details. It was weird to imagine dragon love or even Kenmei in love.

"May I take you somewhere?"

"Sure," I said, in no hurry to face the realities that lay inside Professor Pops' mansion. The truths about myself that I would have to tell him and the brothers.

"Thank you." He squeezed my fingers. "Don't let go."

"Okay." My stomach felt a little queasy.

Kenmei moved one hand in front of him.

Professor Pops' mansion and yard began to blur like watercolors in the rain.

IN AN INSTANT, Kenmei and I were on a dirt road. The sun hung high above, and, off in the distance, I saw a golden dragon circling in the air.

"Is that you?" I asked, still unsure about where we were and what I was seeing. More than that, I was still having a difficult time believing Abernathy and Kenmei were the same. My mind ran through the different times I talked to the dragon, even with Silindra and Kenmei. The strangest recollection was when Kenmei told me to speak with Abernathy. Which meant he was, in fact, sending me to talk to himself. I shook my head.

Maybe the dragon was crazy.

"Yes," Kenmei answered, bringing me out of my thoughts. I watched his features soften. "Listen."

I clamped down on another question and strained to hear what he wanted me to. Finally, I heard it. Singing, like the song of a beautiful bird, but the voice was that of a girl.

As one, Kenmei and I glided closer, like moving in super-fast forward. We went off the dirt road, passed some wild daisies, and entered an orchard filled with apple trees. The scented blossoms made everything fragrant. I spotted a girl only a few feet away.

"Won't she see us?" I asked, ready to hide behind a tree.

"No. This is one of my memories." A hint of a smile danced on Kenmei's lips. He was happy. I felt it flow off him.

I took a step closer, mesmerized by her song. She seemed so innocent, carefree. Her hair was long and golden blonde, the color of Abernathy's mane. She wore a brown skirt and a white shirt. The sleeves were long and poofed at the wrist. Her feet were bare. On one arm, hung a basket. As she filled it with apples, she sang:

Carry me up to the clouds.

Let me soar like the birds.

I want to fly on the wings of love.

Birds of all kinds fluttered around her, but they were silent. Even they seemed enamored by her voice.

If I had feathers. A tail too.

My love will ascend,

carrying you and you and you.

As she sang, she pointed at a different bird.

Her song was like magic, calling to everyone who could hear. "Who is she?" I asked.

"Can't you tell?" he asked, distracted.

I felt like I should know, but I didn't. "She has a beautiful voice."

"That's Aurora," he said, nodding, his eyes never leaving her.

"No," I began, but regarded her more closely. She looked almost exactly like the girl in the fairytale-inspired figurines and pictures my stepmother used to keep in the house. "Wow," I said.

"She's exquisite, isn't she?"

She was stunning. "Yes," I answered, keeping a step behind Kenmei as we moved nearer.

"Aurora is the reason I first took on a human form." He chuckled. "Before I met her, I didn't even know I could transform. It was my love for her that inspired the change."

We both watched as Aurora plucked an apple from a tree and placed it in her basket.

"Wow," I said again.

"I had all this magic, but no one to love. It was her song that drew me. And once I heard her laugh, that was it. I was gone. In love."

"She sings beautifully," I breathed, trying to understand how a dragon could fall in love with a human.

"If those birds possessed my magic, they would've become men as well."

I snickered, checking his features to see whether he was serious.

OceanofPDF.com

"I'M NOT KIDDING. Even now, I can remember the love that beat in their tiny hearts for her."

I saw the look on his face and knew he wasn't. Even I sort of loved her now. Her words swayed in my head and filled my heart. "Does she possess magic?" I asked, shocked I could be twitterpated after a few seconds of hearing her sing.

"Yes, Shiryo-san. Aurora was the first enchantress, though she didn't know it. Her song bewitched all who heard her but not to the extent that I lost control of myself. Her magic awoke my amorous feelings, and I wanted to experience them. With her. So, I took on this form and became Kenmei."

"Did it work?" I asked, surprised. "Did she love you back?"

His brow furrowed, and pain changed his expression.

"I'm sorry," I said.

He cleared his throat. "Don't be. Though she didn't return my love, we became great friends. Even after she married, we often visited together. I taught her how to use her magic. And she assisted in creating the book your friend Cindy keeps. The Eye of Abernathy."

"Ohhhhh."

"That's right," he nodded, and a whimsical smile smoked across his lips. "She loved me, but it wasn't the kind one feels for their eternal mate. Still, I wouldn't trade a second of the time I spent with her."

Loneliness oozed out of him. But I knew he had family, though I only met his grandson, Hiro. "Your grandson loves you, though."

"Oh, yes. And I love him too." He sighed.

"Surely, you've fallen in love more than once since Aurora?" Obviously, since he had at least one daughter.

"Yes, I've loved a few times, but none were so great as when I fell in love with her."

That made me sad. Unrequited love sounded awful. "I'm sorry," I said.

He shook his head. "Don't be. Perhaps it's the heartbreak of first love, or maybe dragons love differently than humans." He chuckled again. "Either way, my heart has and will always belong to Aurora." He paused and wiped at his eyes. Was he crying? "It was the love I felt for her that finally allowed me to break free of the vampire queen's grasp."

That was interesting. "How does that work?" Christopher kind of told me, but I was still a little confused.

"The token must have significant meaning for the hunter. It's different for each of us."

For Christopher, it was the bear he carved. I wondered what helped Professor Pops. Someday I might ask him.

"I shared this memory with you because I wanted you to understand the power the vampire queen holds," Kenmei said.

"What do you mean?" I'd completely forgotten everything but being in this moment.

"Sharra drank from me at my weakest moment, when Aurora shunned my romantic affections for another. I was angry, filled with hatred, consumed by grief. When Sharra found me, I believed I was using her - at first. Of course, once she changed me, I realized my folly."

I was still confused.

Kenmei noticed and went on. "By drinking my blood, she stole some of my magic." He paused. "Each time you allow Christopher to drink from you, you're giving him some of your magic as well. And when you healed him?" A darkness passed over Kenmei's features.

I wouldn't change what I did. Letting Christopher die was out of the question. But now I understood. Before I was the Seal, Christopher only took what little magic I possessed as a vampire. Now? I shuddered. Some of the Seal's power passed from me and into him every time I let him drink from me. Holy crap. "Why didn't you just tell me that from the beginning?" Frustration oozed from my pores.

His eyes softened. "Would it have made a difference?"

Such a simple question. I wanted to give him a haughty yes, but as I searched Kenmei's face, I knew that was a lie. Before Dorian showed me the truth, I had thought I loved Christopher. "No," I whispered. "But - " I began, and Kenmei held up a hand to stop me.

"You may not be in love with him. He may not be your true love, but you do love him. And I believe he loves you, too. He's - " Kenmei turned away and fixed his gaze on Aurora. Her basket was almost full of apples.

"What?" I got the feeling Kenmei wanted to tell me something important. He either couldn't or wouldn't. And where Christopher was concerned, my feelings were confusing.

Because of Dorian. With him. On that altar, I felt what real love was. Not that it mattered. Dorian was gone. Still, the experience, his lips on mine - I didn't think anything else would ever compare.

"Did you speak to her in this memory?" I asked, turning my attention back to Kenmei.

"No. This was before we officially met."

The landscape smeared like a ruined painting once again, and then I was home. Abernathy and Kenmei were gone.

But his voice whispered in my mind. "Seek out Sharra immediately. Finish this, little vampire."

My thoughts heavy, I went to the back door of the mansion. It was unlocked, and I walked in. Glints of moonlight cut through the windows, bathing the kitchen in its glow. The clock on the microwave said four-thirty. Everyone would be asleep.

Quietly I tiptoed up the stairs and entered the bedroom that used to be Dorian's. Gatsby jumped off my bed and wound his body around my feet.

"Hi, boy." I picked him up. "You're freezing." His fur felt like he came from the blistery cold outside. I went to the window. It was open slightly, and I closed it but didn't move away. Through the trees, I could see my house. An ache filled my heart, and I wiped the tear sliding down my cheek. Placing Gatsby back on my bed, I sat and removed my shoes. Weariness weighed heavily on my shoulders.

Even though the room was redecorated, in my mind's eye, I could still see Dorian's football posters on the walls, his clothes strewn over the desk and on the floor, his laptop flicking through Patriots photos.

"Dorian." I spoke his name like a prayer. It hurt to realize I finally grasped the power of love when it was too late to do anything about it.

"Sorry to interrupt." Professor Pops stood in the doorway, his gray hair rumpled like he hadn't combed it in days, his clothes the same he wore the night Cindy and I decided to go see Abernathy.

"It's okay, Pops." I swallowed. "I mean, Mr. Henry." Once I told him what happened, would he hate me and throw me out? "Have you seen Gabe?"

Professor Pops flipped on the light and rubbed a hand over his tired face. "Not yet." His eyes darkened. "I'm glad you're back. Safe." He extended his arms to give me a hug.

"Dorian's dead," I blurted, clinging to him like he was my only lifeline.

Pops froze in my grasp. His arms went lax and hung at his sides. "I don't believe it."

I stepped back, desperate to see what he was feeling. His eyes glazed over, and pain convulsed through him. My heart broke again. For him. For me. "I'm sorry, Mr. Henry." It didn't seem right to call him Professor Pops anymore, not when that was what Dorian called him. Not when I was responsible for his death.

Pops sat on the edge of my bed; his shoulders turned in wearily. "How?" he asked quietly.

I went over to the loveseat as though space would protect me from the agony he was feeling. Then I explained. When I was finished, he met my eyes. His were filled with tears, and his cheeks were wet. "You didn't see him die? He just disappeared?"

"Yes." I didn't want to give him hope. "He didn't have a pulse, though. I checked."

Pops wiped at his eyes and sat up straight. "If we don't have a body, there's a chance he's still alive." He must've seen the disbelief on my face because he raised his eyebrows. "You should know by now, considering the supernatural world we know exists, that it's not over until - " A smile broke on his face. "Until we have our Happily Ever After."

I blinked. My lips parted.

Was he serious?

Happily Ever After was a stupid ending to stupid fairytales.

More appropriate would've been Happily Next Chapter, or Happily Ensuing Life. Or –

"What do you mean?" I asked, wondering if his grief corrupted his thoughts.

He stood and went to the door before facing me.

A little bit of light shone in his eyes. It didn't matter that I tried to dissuade him. The man still held out faith that his son wasn't dead.

"I have some research to do." He rushed over, wrapping me in his arms. "We'll work this out."

Without prelude, the waterworks flooded my face. I hugged him back and held on tight.

"It's okay," he cooed softly, stroking my hair. "It isn't your fault. It's okay." I clung to him. His words were exactly what I needed to hear.

He didn't hate me, and he wouldn't banish me from his house or his life. I was loved, no matter what. It was a sensation I needed and treasured.

Several minutes later, he released me. Professor Pops' smile was kind. "Get cleaned up. Get some rest." He paused. "We'll get him back." He glanced around the room, noticing the candles on the floor in the shape of the star. Wax had melted and left blobs on the carpet. I doubted they would come out. "Perhaps Cindy can assist with this?"

I tried to return his smile. "I'll ask."

He nodded. His confidence was contagious. "Don't worry about the others. I'll tell them what happened. When you're ready, come down, and we'll make a plan."

"Okay," I said.

He closed the door, sank onto the bed, grabbed one of the pillows, and squeezed hard.

A plan, I thought. If the others helped, that would mean more opportunities for those I cared for to get hurt or die. I couldn't allow that to happen. I would face the vampire queen, and I would do it on my own.

LIGHT SOME CANDLES

I TOOK A QUICK SHOWER, brushed my teeth, put my long hair in a ponytail, dressed in jeans and a red tee-shirt, and put on my red Converse. When I finished, I went to the bed and stared at the star on the floor beside it. I was still a teenager, still not a high school graduate, yet none of it mattered. I had a plan.

It was simple. Find a way into Sharra. Speak to the vampire queen, and if she wouldn't listen, destroy her with the Seal. Once that was finished, if I was still alive, I would have Abernathy take me to Mizu, where I would rescue my mother and bring her home. She and I could live in the little house next door. The one I grew up in. It would be perfect, and everything else, including school and life, would fall into place.

Gatsby climbed on my lap. I scratched behind his ears. "I'm going to fix it. Promise." The cat purred in response before jumping off the bed and leaving the room.

Taking a deep breath, I followed him until I reached the kitchen. There, I opened cabinets and drawers, searching for a lighter or matches. Something to light the candles.

"What are you doing?" Gabe's voice echoed from a dark corner, carrying a hint of amusement.

I turned. "Hi, Gabe." Telling him my plan was out of the question. I needed to make something up. "I was going to take a bath and wanted to light some candles. Do you know where to find a lighter or matches?" I shrugged, hoping the movement was nonchalant enough.

He smirked and moved over to a cupboard I hadn't checked yet. He opened it and pulled out a black lighter - a long-necked one used for lighting a grill - from the top shelf. "Here you go," he said lightly.

When I took it, our fingers brushed, and I had a quick flash of drinking from him, the night we almost did more than kiss, and he told me he loved me.

"I'm sorry, Snowflake," he whispered.

I searched his features, trying to discover what he was sorry for. He seemed so much older than me now. Hardened. Matured. His green eyes were still vivid but darker.

"For what?" I asked, running my fingers along my wet ponytail.

"I'm a coward. I should've been a champion for you, fought for you, loved you the way you deserve."

I crossed my arms. He didn't need to apologize for that. "You are a man with a lot on your mind. I get that. You've got the chayot to lead. Cindy." I sighed. "You did what you had to do. We all did."

He brushed a strand of hair from my face. "I didn't love you for the right reasons."

That surprised me. "What do you mean?"

Gabe stepped back. "The two years you were gone allowed me to see that my love for you was mostly driven by my hate for my father."

I was confused.

"Not Professor Pops, but Oberon. My birth father." He spat out the word like it tasted terrible. "My desire to rebel against everything he was and all he stood for." He blew out a breath. "It was immature. I'm an idiot. And I'm sorry I hurt you."

I swallowed. What he said made sense. I loved him, and always would. But it had been a crush, sweet and innocent; it wasn't lasting. Definitely not what I felt for Dorian in those moments when he kissed me. "I get it. And you didn't hurt me. I'm glad you're with Cindy. She really loves you."

A fragment of a smile curled over his lips. "She's a pain in the ass, but I love her, too." His eyes caught and held mine. "I really do."

"You better," I said, smiling back. "Otherwise, she might turn you into a frog."

He chuckled. "Life is weird, isn't it?"

"That's an understatement," I responded, shaking the lighter in front of us as a reminder of why I came down. "Well, I better get my bath."

"Oh, right," he said, slightly embarrassed. "See ya later."

"Yep, see ya."

He moved out of my way, leaning his back against the island. I smiled and walked by. Without thinking, I reached back and hugged him, hard, acknowledging all he was, all he did for me. "Thanks, Gabe."

"For what?" he asked, wrapping his arms around me.

"For everything. Being a great friend, an amazing boyfriend, and, well - " I pulled back so I could see his face. "Thanks for being you."

He blinked in surprise. "You're welcome, Snowflake."

I CLOSED the door to my bedroom before kneeling in the middle of the star. Then I lit the candles. When I had them all burning, I tossed the lighter outside the circle and sat.

It occurred to me that I was breaking my promise to Christopher. He asked me not to leave again without telling him, but it couldn't be helped. I wouldn't put him or anyone else in jeopardy.

Plus, my idea might not even work.

I had no clue how to get into or leave Sharra.

In the past, it just sort of happened.

But I needed to try.

It hadn't escaped my notice that there were seven points to the star, and there were seven magics. That meant something. It had to. Closing my eyes, I concentrated on the realm of Sharra. The gardens around the castle.

The castle itself. The different rooms I was in, including the bedroom where I kissed Christopher. The bathroom where I spoke with Zenny in the mirror. His flamboyant clothes. I focused on the smells of Sharra - magic, and rosemary, and the blood I craved.

I don't know how long I sat like that, visualizing everything I remembered, but after a time, my mind started to wander. I started thinking about the little cottage near the edge of the forest: the trees and foliage, the bush where hundreds of pixilettes rested. I recalled the earthy smells, the babbling brook, the soft ground covered in moss.

And suddenly, I could hear the brook.

Cautiously, I opened my eyes. I was in front of a cottage - the place Christopher brought me when I was poisoned. My heart lurched with joy because I'd done it. I was in Sharra.

Standing, I went over to the hut and climbed the steps. Dirt covered the window, and I used a hand to wipe it away. Then I peered inside. It was small, smaller even than my house, but it looked homey. A little kitchen with a stove, a sink, and a tiny wooden island with copper pots hung above it. The floor was wood. To the right of the kitchen was a living area. A wooden rocking chair stood next to a rock hearth. Beneath it was a furry rug in the shape of a bear. A table rested against the wall under a window. In the center was a vase. Inside were two dead flowers. They could've been daisies, but it was hard to tell. Most of the petals had fallen and lay scattered on the tabletop.

For some reason, the children's song, "Ring Around the Rosie," came to mind. I learned in World Civilization that the supposedly sweet song, taught to small children everywhere, wasn't sweet at all. It was about the bubonic plague and death.

Perhaps it was how the petals touched each other, as though they were holding hands like the children did as they sang the song. Or maybe it was the wilted stems in the vase. I didn't know, but it filled my stomach with dread.

Maybe I should've brought Christopher with me, I thought nervously. But it was too late. I was already in Sharra, and I wasn't leaving until one of three things happened: I was dead, the vampire queen stepped down, or she allowed me to rule in her stead. I snorted, my confidence waning, but I couldn't go back. I wouldn't.

"Snow." The voice was high, like a light gasp wind. It still made me jump, and I spun in its direction and saw a pixilette. But not just any pixilette. It was Ryden. The pixilette had been alive for thousands of years. Back when Silindra was alive.

"Ryden?"

"How do you know my name?" She placed her teeny fists on her tiny waist.

There was no time to explain my linked consciousness with Silindra. "My name is Snow White. It's a long story, but I know you helped Silindra."

"Then, it is true." Her voice filled with wonder, and she came closer, studying me like I was a new plant. "Silindra kept a journal. After she died, I hid it away and read it, hoping for answers. In it, she mentioned a girl called Snow White and that you would be the key to Sharra's undoing." She rested a hand on my cheek. "You can imagine after a few thousand years, I thought Silindra had gone crazy when she wrote about you. But here you are." As she spoke, a flurry of hundreds of pixilettes, including Arianna and Eon, came in behind her. I watched them, admiring their colors as they seemed to shimmer in the sunlight. I thought of Pava, the little pixilette who came into the human realm to talk to me. She was yet another who had died needlessly at my expense.

"You were a good friend to Silindra," I said to Ryden. The pixilette looked surprisingly young, considering. "There was no one she trusted more than you." I blinked back tears as I thought of Silindra's death.

"Thank you." She kissed my nose, but I barely felt it. "If you don't mind my asking, what are you doing in Sharra?" She landed on my cheek, and I went cross-eyed.

"How about my hand?" I asked, holding it out for her.

She flew over and landed on my palm before sitting cross-legged. "I'm too old for continuous flying."

I glanced at the others and wondered how old they were. Instead of asking, I answered her question. "I'm here to stop the vampire queen." I swallowed, hoping they wouldn't stop me. Abernathy seemed to believe Sharra could be reasoned with. If it was possible, I would certainly try. "I'm here to help her see the truth," I said, my voice quivering with determination.

Ryden laughed, but it wasn't because she was happy. "Glad to hear it," she said with a grunt as she stood. "Well, we will assist in whatever capacity we can."

I glanced at the others and further, beyond the trees. Hundreds or perhaps thousands of magical creatures - elves, unicorns, fairies, and trolls - hovered in the shadows. Listening. Waiting.

"I want to do this alone," I said. "You can help by staying out of the way. I don't want anyone getting hurt."

Ryden lifted into the air and turned to face me. "I see. Well, we are here if you need us. And remember, their fates are in your hands". She pointed at the creatures in the forest, and I swallowed back the sudden fear in my throat.

I was a child. Barely eighteen. What made me think I could defeat the vampire queen? I swallowed again. "I know. I'm going to speak with Sharra, see what she has to say. I will do right by them." I waved a hand toward the trees and those within. "I'll do right by you," I added. "One way or another, I will end this."

Ryden bowed. "Sharra is at the castle. She's completely out of sorts, worse than usual. Until last night. I don't know what's changed, but my spies inform me she's ecstatic about something. So be careful."

"Thank you, Ryden." I stepped off the porch and headed down the dirt path toward the castle and my destiny.

The pixilette landed on my shoulder. "Do you want me to come with you?"

I was touched by her offer, and I did want her company. But I wouldn't be putting her or anyone else in harm's way. I was the Seal. Dealing with the vampire queen was my responsibility. I would handle her alone. "You're welcome to come as far as the castle. After that, I'll go by myself."

MADE OF STONE

AT THE CASTLE GATES, I said goodbye to Ryden. With as much confidence as I could muster, I used the Seal to melt the wrought iron portcullis before stepping through. I expected to see guards or be rushed by Sharra's drone vampires. But there wasn't a single living creature around.

With each step, I realized there wasn't a sound except the clop of my Converse on the cobblestone walk. It was eerie, and I steeled myself for whatever came next.

When I reached the large front entrance, I thought of knocking, but pushed that aside and I threw open the doors. Sharra stood in the entryway, waiting for me.

"How lovely of you to come, Snow White. Although, if you had any manners, you would've knocked."

"I guess I don't have any," I said, trying to sound tough. Nervous jitters fluttered inside my stomach. I took my stance, my feet apart and my shoulders squared. My hands were at my sides, poised to strike if necessary.

Sharra didn't move, almost like she was made of stone. It was like one of those old American cowboy standoffs. We were both waiting. For what, I wasn't sure.

The entryway was extravagant, with heavy red material draped along the tops of the windows. An enormous chandelier, lit by lanterns, hung in the center. From the foyer diverged four different hallways. A double staircase circled to the second floor and a landing above.

Finally, I decided to speak first. "You know why I'm here. What I want." It was a statement. I could see by the conceited haughtiness on her face she knew this was the end. After today, our lives would be altered. She believed my body would be hers, and I would die before I let that happen.

The power of the Seal pulsed through my veins, spread through me like wildfire.

"Why don't you step into my drawing room? I can see it's been days since you've had blood. You shouldn't starve yourself so." She tsk-ed me as she moved toward one of the halls.

Until that moment, I hadn't realized how long it was, but she was right. The thought of blood caused my fangs to press against my lips.

Sharra nodded, and a goblet filled with red liquid appeared in one of her hands.

I knew it was blood. The scent wafted to my nose, and my fangs extended further.

"Here," she said, smiling sweetly.

"I don't want it, Sharra." I shook my head and held my breath.

Her lips were painted a bright red. Thick but perfectly placed eye shadow adorned her eyelids. Her long black hair had been curled and was piled atop her head. A single tendril snaked down either side of her face, and a slight rosiness covered her otherwise porcelain complexion. She wore a floor-length red velvet dress. A black leather corset bound her waist and ribcage, pushing her breasts together, giving her all kinds of cleavage.

She smiled as I glared. "Fine, then. More for me." She tipped the glass, gulping down its contents. A drop fell on her chest. She snapped her fingers, and a vampire appeared from one of the hallways. He placed his arms behind his back and slowly licked the blood from her skin.

I turned away. My throat burned with longing. "Are you ready to call it quits?" I asked as soon as she sent the vampire away.

She giggled like I told a hilarious joke.

I felt like an idiot. Why would she abandon her way of life? She had been winning for more than six millennia. Why change what worked so well? Especially when her only obstacle was me.

"Is that what you want? Me to quit?" She took a step toward me.

"Yes," I said, anger and fear blazing through me at once. "Let the creatures be freed from this place. Allow balance to be restored."

"And what happens if I agree? Do you kill me? What's your plan, dear Snow?" She had her arms crossed, and a sultry smile splayed over her face.

I turned my attention to her pointy black shoes. I couldn't meet her eyes. The truth was, I didn't know what would happen to her. Up to this point, I did what I was told. Someone said I was the Seal and that I needed to rebuild the magics. I believed them. Someone said to see Abernathy, I did it. Someone said, go confront Sharra, and I agreed. And now, here I was. What did I want? What was right? "Ugh." Sharra was messing with my head. I stepped toward her. "You got any more blood?" Might as well build my strength.

Another glass appeared in her hand. "Of course." Her smile grew bigger when I took it and chugged every drop. When it was gone, she took the glass, and it vanished. "Before we begin all of this unpleasantness, I have something to show you." She wrapped her chilly fingers around my forearm, and we whooshed into a round room. I was there once before.

Hundreds of female worker vampires sat on what looked like stone bleachers. Opposite the door were two thrones. To the right was a group of girls, and a sheet of ice blue magic surrounded them. The girls seemed tattered, beaten down. Their clothes were dirty, as were their hair and bodies.

Shocked by the sudden movement, I touched my head. "Who are they?" I asked, but I knew as soon as the words left my mouth. They were the remaining marked. She rounded them up like cattle. Girls like me who were marked at a young age and then bitten by their hunter. Some were already full-fledged vampires. They must've drunk from their hunter and true loves. The rest were still revenants.

In particular, one full-fledged vampire stood out. She was regal. Tall, creamy brown skin and curly black hair. Her eyes were the color of liquid night. Her face seemed familiar somehow, and I realized she was the other marked Sharra had chosen.

Her face hardened when her eyes found mine, and she glared at me like I was the enemy.

"These are the marked. Destined to die," Sharra said quietly.

Some of the girls began to cry and wail. Some tried to escape. Others stood like soulless zombies, allowing themselves to be pushed around. They were awake, their eyes open, but they saw nothing. Except for the regal girl. The one I knew was Sharra's second choice. Sorrow pricked my heart, and Abernathy's words filled my mind. "You need your friends, your family. Without them, you'll lose." Not that his words could help me now. I hadn't listened, and I was already here. My friends and my loved ones weren't. And that was my plan. To keep them from any more harm.

Raising my chin, I rotated away from the girls, focusing on Sharra. "That's crap, and you know it. I'm here to prove you and your stupid words wrong."

She went over to the girl with curly black hair and touched her cheek. "Pocahontas, would you sacrifice yourself for me?"

Pocahontas bowed. "Of course, Sharra."

"See?" Sharra cackled, a chilling, mirthless sound. "I suppose I should've known you would never be ready to understand what I'm trying to do, but this one." She pulled her hand away, pressing her lips into a tight line. "They're marked, but I can only choose one. Many haven't even gone past the revenant stage. They are beautiful and sweet, but they haven't completed their transformation." She spun and stalked over to one of the thrones, sitting with a huff. "You think this is what I want? For them to die?"

"I don't think you care one way or the other."

Sharra smirked. "Perhaps you're right." Discomfort carved across her face. "These many years I've suffered, knowing what had to be done." She slammed her fists against the armrests. They shattered. Her emotions shifted so quickly, I struggled to keep up.

"What else can I do?" she continued. "To live and continue to rule, I need a new body. That means marking and choosing as necessary." She raised an eyebrow. "Vampires were the first. I am the oldest and wisest creature on the planet. If anyone understands the tough decisions, it's me." She raised a brow. "And I am one of the seven magics - an original vampire. Without me, there won't be balance. Have you thought about that?"

I hadn't. And she made sense, sadly. Maybe that's why Abernathy wanted me to talk to her instead of killing her. He understood there couldn't truly be balance without her.

It didn't change the fact that she wasn't sharing, but consuming. Stealing. Keeping magic for herself. That was unacceptable. If I learned anything, it was that tyranny never won out in the end. People would always fight against oppression.

"It is your choice," I said. "You've been alive for a long time. When will it be enough?" I leaned toward her, my hands out, imploring. "Release the supernatural creatures. Allow them to roam freely once again. When your time in the body you possess is finished, then be done. Go your way." She would die, but it was about damn time. No one should live as long as she had, especially since she did so at the expense of others. It was absurd.

Sharra leaned back against her chair. "Perhaps you're right. Maybe I should stop. Life is hard, and it just gets harder." She snorted. "I've accomplished all I could possibly want anyway." She closed her eyes.

I took another step toward her. Behind me was a flurry of voices. The worker vampires were restless. Sharra's words disturbed them. Or excited them. I couldn't tell. Sadly, I understood their excitement. She said everything I wanted to hear. "At least step down," I pleaded.

SENSELESS DEATH

"YOU ARE A SENSELESS, foolish girl, Snow White," Sharra said quietly. Her eyes were still closed, but her words tore through me and held on like a vise. When her eyes finally flashed open, they blazed with fury. "How about I start killing the marked now? Liberate them from their miserable lives." As she spoke, three of the girls fell forward, out of the sheet of magic surrounding them.

"Noooo!" I yelled, rushing over to the nearest body. I knew before I reached her that she would be dead, but I had to try anyway. Her face was frozen in terror, eyes wide as though they witnessed horrors even in passing. I felt for a pulse on her neck, but she didn't have one. Nausea rose in my throat.

The remaining girls screamed and tried, once again, to escape. But the magic held them fast. Each tear, every cry of pain, tore at my insides.

More senseless death, I thought.

I moved over to the next girl, hoping against hope she still lived and checked for a pulse. Nothing.

"Listen to them die. Their screams are like music," Sharra shouted.

She looked deranged as several more girls fell forward. One smacked into my shoulder, knocking me off balance and onto the floor. The rough surface scratched my arm, but it healed immediately. I gently lifted the dead girl and laid her on the ground next to the others.

"Stop. Stop it," I ordered.

"Make me," she hissed. Four more girls fell.

I pushed aside my devastation and stood. My whole body shook with frustration and fear. I had no idea what I was doing. I'd been alive for eighteen years, had almost zero life experience, and I decided to go up against a vampire more than seven thousand years old. Sharra was right. I was a senseless girl. But as those thoughts swirled inside my head, another image flashed strong. It was when Sharra brought me to her realm, and I killed some of the workers.

I could retaliate - a death for a death. The power of the Seal burned through my fingers. I whipped around, lifted my hands, and shot two bolts of red light into the workers nearest me. They immediately began to burn, flames engulfing their skin as they screamed in agony. I held my breath against the stench of their burning flesh. "Stop," I shouted, looking at Sharra.

She snickered, and four more girls fell to the ground. "Kill them. They know their place and will gladly die for me."

I lowered my hands. I wouldn't kill uselessly. "But you did care for them the night you brought me here. You screamed when they started burning. You were upset. You were - "

"Faking it," she finished with a shrug. "It was for their benefit," she said, waving a hand in the direction of her vampires. "Yours as much as theirs."

I stared at her in disbelief and heard the alarmed whispers of the worker vampires.

Sharra sighed as they began to work themselves into a frenzy. "I do care, of course," she said to them. "Settle down. You were created for a purpose." Then she looked at me. "Despite what you may think, every creature in Sharra and on Earth is important to me. But I must take cause and effect into consideration." She smiled genially at the workers who weren't quite as aggravated as they were moments before. "My need for a new body far outweighs anything else." She pointed at her workers. "That includes them." She pointed at the girls who were marked. "Or them." Then she pointed at me. "Even you, dear Snow. But the difference between you and the other marked is they understand what I'm trying to do."

I shook my head. "But why? You've had over seven thousand years to live. What more do you need?"

She threw her hands in the air, exasperated. "I don't expect you to grasp my rationale. How can you? Your life is nothing but an infinitesimal blip on the timeline that is my life." She steepled her fingers, resting her elbows on the arms of the chair that somehow reformed. "If you agree to become the vampire queen, allow me to have your body, I will free the rest of the marked. If you don't, I will kill them all."

"What about me?" Pocahontas shouted. "You chose me!"

Sharra ignored her.

I didn't know what to think about the girl. Why would she willingly subject herself to the queen's wishes?

"Well?" Sharra asked.

If I agreed, Sharra could do what she wanted. I wouldn't know whether she kept her word or not. But if I disagreed, they would all die now. If I said yes, Sharra would possess the Seal. No one would ever be able to defeat her. My mind whirred, back and forth. I didn't know what choice to make. "Give me a minute?" I turned away, my hands against my head. I needed help. As soon as I thought that, Christopher appeared.

Like an apparition, he walked toward me wearing his hunter's garb, a sword strapped to his back. "Christopher?" Relief flooded through my body. He broke the queen's hold on him. He could help me make the right choice.

But he wasn't alone. Another person shuffled along in front of him. His hands were bound, and a burlap sack was over his head. "What are you doing?" I asked, relief replaced with worry. "Who is that?"

He gave me a lazy smile, like this wasn't a life or death situation. I reached out to take his hand, but he pulled away, walking his prisoner past me and over to the queen.

"Christopher?" I saw what was happening, but my mind was in denial.

He released the prisoner. A smirk creased his lips as he lifted Sharra off her throne and kissed her deeply. On the mouth.

I blinked several times. My eyes had to be deceiving me. But he continued to kiss her, and she was kissing him back. Passionately.

"What the hell?" I wanted to run away. I wanted to hide. Go back to the night I was bitten and have everything, all of my memories wiped clean. "I don't understand," I finally said, even though I was beginning to. Christopher betrayed me. When he first bit me, Professor Pops told me he wasn't to be trusted. That he desired power above all else. I hadn't believed him. I didn't want to.

After several minutes that felt like hours, they finally broke apart. But Christopher kept his arm around Sharra, his expression one of gloating.

I still couldn't believe it. "Are you really Christopher?" I asked, knowing I wasn't making sense but too shocked to care.

Sharra pushed him toward me. "Show her what you brought her, my love," she said.

Christopher walked over to the bound man he left standing next to the throne and ripped the burlap sack from his head.

My breath caught in my throat, and two black spots blurred my vision.

"Dorian," I whispered. My fingers covered my mouth, and they trembled. It couldn't be.

OceanofPDF.com

MISSED YOU

HE WAS BARELY RECOGNIZABLE. One eye was bruised shut. His bottom lip was split, and dried blood stained his mouth and chin. His shirt was shredded down the front like a five-fingered lion had ripped into him.

But it was Dorian.

He wasn't dead. Beaten? Battered? Yes. But alive. My heart leaped with joy. I said his name again, balling my hands into fists at my sides. "Dorian."

He grunted as though I awakened him where he stood. His good eye peered at me, and a smile spread across his glorious, broken face. "Snow?"

An aching sob tore at my throat. "What are you doing with him?" I demanded through gritted teeth, my gaze flipping from Christopher to Sharra. "Give him to me," I demanded.

"With pleasure," Christopher said, shoving Dorian toward me. I caught him.

"Missed you," Dorian whispered, his voice hoarse; he coughed up some blood.

I fought down the urge to cry. We had to get out of here. He needed a doctor.

He needs you, my inner voice quipped.

And a light bulb flicked on in my head. Casually, I put my hands under his shirt, touching his skin. Happiness and joy at knowing he was alive poured out of my fingers, along with the Seal's power, and into Dorian. At my touch, I felt his ribs heal. His internal bleeding stopped. The bones of both wrists knitted back together.

Dorian took a deep breath, as though there was an invisible weight pressed against his chest, and it suddenly disappeared.

Sharra finally noticed what I was doing. "Retrieve the boy!"

Christopher lifted Dorian and punched him in the face in one movement. Then he grabbed him by the shirt collar and brought him to stand next to them.

"Here is my final offer, dear Snow." Sharra grabbed Dorian under the chin. His nose was bleeding. "Give me your body. In return, I will allow the remaining marked to live as well as this human." She squeezed his face between her fingers. "It seems you have a soft spot for him. I would hate to kill him while you watch."

My knees buckled. So many emotions pummeled my mind. I felt betrayed by Christopher, relieved Dorian was alive and terrified I wouldn't be able to help anyone.

"Don't agree to anything. She's a - " Dorian began, but Sharra backhanded him so hard I heard his nose break.

"And his death won't be quick. It'll be painful." She tossed Dorian to the floor near my feet.

I knelt beside him, touching him. Healing him as best I could while they watched.

"This first thing I'll do is rip out his tongue," Sharra continued.

"Fine," I said. "You win."

Sharra's evil grin became filled with glee.

I looked at Dorian. "It's going to be okay," I whispered, but I didn't believe it. Perhaps I was just cowardly. If Sharra took my body first, I wouldn't have to witness the evil I felt sure she would bestow on Dorian, the other marked in the room, and all those I loved. What else could I do, though? Pretend I didn't care? Watch hundreds die?

"Fight her," Dorian said, his voice quiet but filled with strength. "You're stronger than her. You can win."

Sharra squatted down on the other side of Dorian, so our noses nearly touched. I could reach out and grab her. Make her suffer. Kill her where she knelt.

The wicked feelings twisted through me like a snake. If she died, then no one else would. If she died, all of our problems would be solved. If she died, the world would be a better place.

Before I comprehended what I was doing, my hand went around her neck. Squeezing like a constrictor. With that anger, I sent the power of the Seal pulsing into her. Sizzling red burned into her flesh.

She screamed.

But Dorian yelled out in pain too.

I looked down and saw that Sharra had dragged her nails across his chest. Blood filled the wounds, leaving a red trail.

"Do - " She took a ragged breath. "Do we have a deal?" she growled.

I released her neck, my eyes trained on Dorian's blood. "Yes," I whispered.

"Good." Sharra stood. Her neck, the place I touched was blackened with my handprint.

Christopher moved to stand closer to her. He smiled, and my body swayed in agony as though he struck me. Every word he spoke, every kiss we shared, every touch - had all been lies.

The knowledge rocked me to my core. Like Silindra, I was betrayed by one I loved. But at least I hadn't loved him as entirely as Silindra had loved Gabriel. At least I was privileged to witness and feel real love.

Sharra stepped forward. The smirk on Christopher's face grew. He was proud of himself, confident in his deception, and in his place as Sharra's second.

"Give me your sword," Sharra commanded.

Christopher raised a brow in question but did as she asked. He slid the blade from the sheath strapped to his back. His lips parted as though he wanted to question her, but he remained silent.

Sharra planted a kiss on his lips when she took the blade from him. Then she turned to me.

"Are you in love with your hunter?" she asked, a knowing smile on her lips.

I stood facing her. It was happening. My body would belong to Sharra.

She thought she knew the answer, but she was wrong. "Yes," I lied.

In an instant, Christopher's smirk changed into horror. He understood what came next. That Sharra used him, betrayed him as he betrayed me. He meant nothing to her, except what he could do for her. He told me the kind of vampire she was. He should've listened to his own warning.

"Lips red as rubies. Hair dark as night. Drink your true love's blood. Become the Vampire, Snow White." The worker vampires chanted the words. With each repetition, the air became heavier with tension.

"Why?" Christopher asked Sharra, his eyes pleading. "I did everything you asked." His voice broke in desperation, and for a moment, I felt sorry for him. "Snow is here because of me. I did everything," he repeated.

Sharra rolled her eyes, giving me a knowing smile before turning her attention back to him. "I know, and that is why you must die. She loves you. In order for the ritual to work, she must consume the blood from your heart."

"I've already consumed the blood from my true love's heart," Pocahontas yelled. "Pick me. Allow me to be your next vessel."

The vampire queen paused, as though considering her words. "That's true. And you were my second choice. But this one - " she pointed at me. "Snow White is the Seal, and she is the granddaughter of the elven king. Her body contains a lot more power than yours does."

Pocahontas glared. Sheesh. If a look could kill, I'd already be dead. She should be happy. Didn't she get that once Sharra claimed my body, I wouldn't exist anymore?

Forcing myself not to shudder, I refocused on Sharra.

Christopher used Pocahontas's interruption to his advantage and ran to the door. He was nearly through when Sharra used her power to lift him into the air and deposit him directly in the spot where he was a moment before.

"Don't leave. Cowardice doesn't look good on you." Sharra shifted the sword and held it like a dagger, the blade facing me.

I gave her a curious look. She spun and lifted the sword.

Everything intensified and sharpened while the events unfolded in slow motion.

Sharra's red dress flared out like a tulip as the blade sliced through his neck.

Christopher made a choking sound as he fell to the ground, his head rolling away like a macabre kickball.

Sharra faced me again.

The chanting became muffled. Each word dragged out, making it hard to understand what they said. Except I knew. The words were seared into my very being.

Still, in slow motion, Sharra dropped the sword and kneeled beside my hunter's bleeding body and pried open his chest with her bare hands. I knew magic was involved. Otherwise, what she was doing would be impossible. But I still couldn't move. I watched as she removed his heart and turned, her body and bloodied hands facing me.

With a pop, the world around me returned to normal.

"Drink the blood from his heart. Do it while it's still warm." Sharra held Christopher's heart out for me to take.

BROKEN AND BRUISED

MY STOMACH TURNED. Christopher's heart still beat. It sounded like a bass drum inside my ears. My body twitched in fear, and I wanted to run. Escape before she did that to me. She was so quick. I was nothing against her.

Worst of all, the vampire in me wanted Christopher's blood. My fangs grew, and I opened my jaws, allowing them to extend. The scent caused my mouth to water. Stepping over Dorian, I took her hands in mine.

"That's right," Sharra cooed, encouraging me.

I barely heard her. Every inch of my body craved his blood as she placed the slowing heart in my hands. Sickened at seeing Christopher so broken, I turned away. As I stared at the heart and smelled the blood, my body wanted one thing. To do exactly what Sharra wanted. Consume the blood from his heart. The rational part of my brain kept telling me to stop, that I was falling into the vampire queen's trap. But the rest of me didn't care. As in my vision, the heart was all I could see, all I wanted. Slowly I lifted the heart closer to my mouth. The warmth and scent nearly pushed me into a frenzy.

Before it reached my mouth, there was a noise, and my eyes caught hold of Dorian's face. Tears tinged his lashes. His mouth was twisted with words I couldn't hear. His arms reached out to me. I felt my head tilt, and I paused, waiting, Christopher's heart only inches away.

Images of Dorian rushed through my mind.

His smile.

His mischievous comments.

The way he always watched out for me.

He told me he loved me the last time I saw him.

And he kissed me.

Not the kiss of a friend, but one of pure love.

My heart lurched at the pictures, at the way my soul burned with comprehension.

Dorian wasn't dead. My true love was actually alive, and he wasn't Christopher. Christopher's love had been pretend, false, and superficial. Dorian's was deep, real, and everlasting.

I needed to ask Dorian why he never told me how he felt. Why he waited until we were both about to die to reveal his true feelings. His love was potent, and I would spend the rest of forever showing him I was worthy of his love.

"Dorian," I whispered.

"I love you. Forever, and alw - " His voice cut off as a needle and thread appeared from thin air and sewed his lips shut.

Damn vampire queen. Anguished fury I didn't know I possessed rose inside me and, without completely realizing what I was doing, I reached out a hand toward her. My only aspiration, at that moment, was to crush her. Destroy her. Make her disappear so she wouldn't hurt those I loved, ever again.

As I moved, a red light shot into Sharra's stomach, and she screamed, clutching at herself in pain. Disbelief crossed her face, and bloody tears dripped from her eyes. "What are you doing?" She fell back, tripping over the bodies of her latest victims.

I quickly placed Christopher's heart back in his chest. Professor Pops said that to kill a drone vampire, the head had to be severed, but Christopher wasn't a drone. He was a hunter, and I'd already healed him once with the power of the Seal. Picking up his head, I set it next to his body.

"Anya, come to me, child," I heard Sharra say.

From the corner of my vision, I watched the red-headed marked step over the dead girls and kneel next to Sharra. "I'm here to serve, my queen."

"Nooooo!" I screamed, and a pulse of red shot from my hands and into the girl. She tumbled back without a word.

Sharra's eyes were wide with shock. "You will do what I command, or I promise you this." Her voice shook with fear and rage. "I will spend every waking moment making your life a living hell. I won't rest until every last person, creature, and being you've ever loved or cared about is destroyed."

I stepped toward her. "No," I said, knowing the vampire queen's threats were only that - threats. She would be defeated, and I would be the one to beat her.

"Workers," Sharra moaned. "My dear workers. Save me, darlings!"

I heard the buzzing and glanced up. They were talking, but unmoving. They sensed her weakness and knew her end was near. I faced the queen. "The only way you can harm me is if I allow you to continue to live as you are. And that isn't going to happen." I lifted both hands in front of me.

"Wait. Don't," she pleaded. "If you kill me, you'll be no better than I am."

One of Abernathy's words - rehabilitation - struck a chord and found resonance in me. I hesitated and allowed a triumphant smile to spread across my face. "You're right, Sharra. I'm not going to kill you." I shifted my emotions. Instead of hate, I thought of forgiveness, pity, and mercy. This time the light that pulsed from my hands wasn't red as in the past. It was black. All seven of the magics combined.

Sharra howled in rage and pain as the power of the Seal pulsed through her.

Her body writhed on the floor. Black smoke surrounded her, consumed her until her body and the smoke became one. There was no way to tell where her body ended, and the smoke began until she became the smoke and wafted away.

Not a body.

Not a speck of dust.

Where her body had been, there was only emptiness.

The vampire queen was gone.

At her absence, a collective sigh of relief came from the worker vampires and the remaining marked.

The magical bonds which held the girls dissipated.

They scrambled from their prison, stepping over the dead bodies. Some hugged each other like they were friends, and I wondered how long Sharra held them captive.

Tentatively, a few of the girls came forward.

"Thank you," one of them said.

"You saved us."

"How can we ever repay you?"

They patted me on the shoulder, grabbed my hands, and pulled me into hugs.

I let them, unable to respond. Their words didn't register.

Was it over? I struggled to believe Sharra was gone. Like gone, gone.

I turned toward the worker vampires. Some were hugging, others weren't sure what to do. And others appeared angry.

SLAPPED HIM PLAYFULLY

I'D DEAL with them later. First, I needed to get to Dorian. He was still on the ground, his breathing labored, but his lips were no longer sewn shut. I placed my hands on his chest, near his heart, and began to heal him.

"Hi," he said gently.

Even after all I went through, all I'd done, I felt suddenly shy. "Hi yourself," I responded.

He turned toward me, but I held him steady. "Don't move. Let me finish healing you."

Dorian cleared his throat. "Alright. But go easy on me." He tried to smirk, but it looked more like a grimace. If he weren't so broken, I would've slapped him playfully. Instead, I sent the Seal's power into him, repairing the damage I hadn't managed to fix earlier.

After several long moments, he looked better. His eyes were bright and unblemished, his nose was no longer broken, and the scratches on his chest were gone. I also wondered about the wound on his back, where he was stabbed repeatedly while protecting me on the altar. "What about your back?" I asked, trying to raise him.

"It's fine," he said, his hands sliding up my arms. My body shivered. Tingled. His fingers wound their way through my hair, and he pulled me forward, so my face was above his. "You're awesome."

I smiled and was about to say something sassy in return when I really looked at his eyes. They were no longer hazel, but dark and flecked with all the colors of the seven magics. His eyes reminded me of the gem still in my pocket. As I thought of the gemstone, it warmed. "Your eyes. They've changed," I whispered, ignoring the gem and focusing on him. We were so close I could smell his blood, and I yearned to taste, suck, and drink him in.

"So have yours," he whispered, touching my cheek.

"What? No way. What color?" I asked, surprised.

"They're black and flecked - " He pulled me closer, so we were nose to nose. "Gold, green, red, vio - "

A shriek interrupted him.

I stood and stuck out my hand for Dorian to take. He did, bouncing onto his feet like a new man. And he was in some ways.

"What's wrong with that guy?" One of the girls cried.

I glanced from the group of girls to the spot where they were pointing. Christopher's body and head were trying to reattach themselves. As Professor Pops once said, it was a gruesome sight.

Dorian placed a hand on my arm. "Maybe you could help him?"

My first thought was to say no. If I helped him, he might just try to kill me again. But then I thought about what happened to Sharra. Perhaps I could heal him and use the Seal to give Christopher a change of heart. Maybe. If he disappeared the way Sharra had, then all the better, as long as he never returned. "You're a good man, Dorian." I touched his face, searching his eyes, wishing I could tell him all I learned and felt because of him. Instead, I went to Christopher and knelt beside him.

His body and head were squirming as he stitched himself back together. His eyes were filled with pain. When he noticed me, they turned to fear. "It's okay. I won't hurt you," I said and actually meant it. Though he betrayed me, it was easy to let it go. The reason was simple. Dorian. My love for him was so powerful, there was no room for hate. At least not at the moment.

Christopher blinked as though he didn't believe my words.

I touched his chest and took a deep breath, calling for the power of the Seal. My thoughts swirled with healing, mercy, and kindness. There was regret and a sliver of anger, too, but I pushed them down for now. As I watched, his head and neck reattached, and his body stitched back together until I could once again hear the beating of his heart in his chest.

Christopher sighed and then looked at me. "Why?"

"I don't know," I said. How could I explain that because of the love I felt for Dorian, I wanted others to know such a gift. "But you are free to go, on one condition."

His eyes, which were the same color as Dorian's and I guessed mine as well, widened in worry. "What is it?" he asked.

Dorian was suddenly next to me, and I was beyond grateful. Perhaps I loved him so intensely because he was a friend first.

"I don't ever want to see your face again." I sat back on my heels, waiting for his response.

"Anything else?" He wasn't convinced.

"Do that, and you'll live," I added.

He scooted into a crouching position, his eyes still on mine. "Deal," he said and ran.

After he was gone, I turned my attention to the worker vampires, the females who surrounded and served the queen for eons. "You're free as well. Go. Do good. Don't kill. Don't hurt others. Be kind." I felt like I was speaking to children, but also felt like they needed to hear the words.

"I am Sasha," she said, placing her hand against her heart. "Thank you for what you've done." She looked away, but I sensed she had more to say. "Will you lead us?" She returned her gaze to me, her light brown eyes searching for answers.

"It is your right," another said before I could respond.

"I'm not sure," I said. I didn't want to. I still had high school to finish, and I wanted to start a real Seven Magics Academy, one where all supernaturals could go and feel accepted. Most of all, I wanted the school to be a place where they could be taught how to use their powers in a way that wouldn't harm others.

"Please," another said. "If you don't lead us, who will?"

"There will be chaos."

My hands squeezed into fists. They were right, but surely there was someone more qualified than an eighteen-year-old girl. As I searched their faces, it was clear that while they had been alive for a long time, they hadn't really lived.

"Whatever you decide, I'm not going anywhere," Dorian whispered, gently prying open one of my hands and lacing his fingers with mine.

I wanted to hug him, hold onto him, and never let him go, but there was still much to do. "Thank you," I said. Hand in hand, I went over to the marked. They were free but still looked confused and unsure about what to do next. "Hold still," I said to the first one I came to. With the power of the Seal, I reversed the mark placed on her as well as the rest. When I finished, I asked Sasha to round up a group of vampires and return the marked to their homes.

"Of course, my queen." She bowed.

I flinched at her words but only nodded. Then moved over to Pocahontas. She wasn't dead, and I used the Seal's power to heal her. She stood, touching her arms and body, surprised she was whole again.

"Why wouldn't you let me die?" she asked when I finished.

"That isn't who I am," I said softly, wishing we could be friends.

She gritted her teeth and crossed her arms. "What do you want in return?"

"My only request is that you live happily and use your newfound power for good, not t evil."

She gasped as I spoke. "You don't expect me to stay?"

"No, Pocahontas. You are free."

She dropped her arms to her sides and started to leave. "My hunter told me that if I agreed to let Sharra use my body, I wouldn't disappear, but would lead alongside her, our minds sharing the same body."

My first instinct was to laugh at her naiveté, but hadn't Silindra and I shared her mind?

"It's certainly a possibility." I tried to smile and let her know I harbored no ill feelings toward her, but I was exhausted. "Go, but know you're welcome back to Sharra anytime."

"Thank you," she said. "But I drank the blood from my true love's heart." Tears filled her eyes. "In the human realm, I'm a murderer." Her anger became fear, and she clutched her hands together. "If you allow me to stay here, I will do whatever you ask. Just please don't make me go back."

She was a murderer, period, but she was also a part of something she hadn't fully understood or even asked for. "If you wish to stay, the castle is yours."

A brilliant smile lit up her face, and she ran to me, hugging me tightly. "Thank you."

I hugged her back, feeling she and I might be friends after all. "Will you look after things here for a while?" I asked, searching her eyes. "I will return, but there are things I still need to do in the human realm."

"You mean it?" Pocahontas was surprised.

"Yes, if that's alright with you."

"It'll be my pleasure, Snow. I won't let you down."

"Great."

"And Snow?" she said. "My friends call me Coco."

I understood what she meant, and a burst of warmth for her filled my heart. "Thank you for your help, Coco."

Before Dorian and I left, a great cheer rose within the room.

"Sharra is no longer a prison."

"You freed us."

"Hail, Queen Snow."

Without the walls, cheers could be heard as well. A quick peek out a window revealed thousands of creatures had gathered. The experience was overwhelming, and a new weight settled on my chest. That of responsibility. Because it was true. With the Seal's power, all the creatures - from the unicorn to the gremlin - were freed. They could come and go as they pleased without dying.

I took hold of Dorian, reveling in the love I felt from him and thought of home. Professor Pops and the mansion. The brothers, Cindy and my cat, Gatsby.

CLEAN SOAP

WHEN WE ARRIVED at the mansion, no one was there except Gatsby. He yowled like he hadn't been fed in days until Dorian got him food and water.

I was antsy and worried. "Where could they be?" I asked, pacing. I found my phone and dialed Cindy's number. She didn't respond. I texted but got no answer. "I'm worried."

"Hey," he said and pulled me against his chest. "I'm sure they're fine. Relax." He kissed my nose. "I'm going to take a shower." He pushed me back and wrinkled his nose. "You oughtta clean up too. You're a mess."

I laughed, and it felt good until I noticed my hands were covered in dried blood. "Agreed."

We climbed the stairs together. When we reached my door, he pulled me into another hug. "See you in a few."

I hugged him back, desperate to talk to him, but I definitely wanted a shower first. "'Kay," I said into his chest.

Inside my bedroom, I quickly undressed and showered. Threw on a pair of black and white checkered PJ pants and a black tank, tucking the black gem in the front pants pocket. Then I put my hair up out of the way before heading to the library, which was Dorian's new room.

He wasn't there, and my first thought was to head down to the kitchen. But I noticed the secret door - the one that led to the basement and the room we hung out in as kids. A little giddy, I pulled it open. The circular tube slide was still in place. Climbing in, I pushed off. The ride was longer and more winding than I remembered.

I slid out and onto my butt with an oomph.

I heard Dorian laugh and searched for him. He sat in a large yellow beanbag chair. His sandy hair was wet and combed back, and he had on a pair of gray sweatpants and a Patriots tee shirt. "You're so graceful," he said, his voice filled with happiness. "The great and powerful Seal has the poise of a bumbling ox."

"Hey," I said, walking over to him.

He pulled me onto the beanbag next to him.

"I'm not an ox. Sheesh."

"Fine, a drunk rhino."

I smacked him on the arm. "Don't make me regret saving you," I joked.

His face grew serious. "Did I thank you for saving me yet?"

I huffed in mock disdain, crossing my arms. "No. Not a peep of gratitude."

He tucked an arm under me and snuggled close. I got a whiff of clean soap and the minty freshness on his breath.

I rested my head against his shoulder, trying to ignore the urgency parading through my body. I wanted to talk to him about what he said when we were with the Unknowns - that he loved me - and I wanted to tell him how much I loved him, too.

There was also the issue of the land of Sharra. Dorian said he'd go back with me. Did he mean it? Without a doubt, I knew he did, but we hadn't said the words to each other. At least when we weren't under duress. My feelings were fresh, exciting, and new, like the first ice cream cone on a warm summer day.

I snuggled against him, my worries waning and thought about what needed to happen next. First, I wanted to show everyone Dorian was alive. Then I wanted to go after my mom. Who knew what sort of plans Devoran would come up with once he heard Sharra was gone? I had no doubt he would fight to rule over the magical creatures and, truth be told, I was fine with that as long as he didn't try to enslave them.

Dorian kissed the top of my head lightly. The movement brought me out of my reverie.

I turned so I could see his face, gauge his expression. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"Tell you?" he asked, caressing my forehead with the tip of his fingers.

"How you felt about me," I finished, and my face colored bright red.

He nuzzled me close and kissed my eyebrow. "I did, while you were with Silindra. I did say I loved you."

"That's true, but you never said anything since." I searched his gorgeous eyes that looked just like mine now.

His lips curved in a slight smile. "When we were younger, you were this bright-eyed tomboy. As we grew, my feelings developed. But by then, the other brothers were talking about you in a romantic way." He raised his eyebrows and wriggled them comically.

My face got hotter. "What? I have no idea what you mean." Professor Pops had said as much, but it was still too weird to believe.

I playfully slapped Dorian on the chest. He caught my hand with his and entwined our fingers. His hand was much larger than mine, but with our fingers touching - palm to palm, finger to finger - our hands felt perfect together. A vibrant purple glowed between our fingers. We looked at each other, surprised. If this happened every time we touched, purple would be my favorite color again, I thought, my heart beating rapidly. "I don't think you're a normal boy anymore, Dorian Henry."

He chuckled, kissing my cheek. "Normal is overrated."

I raised my eyes, longing to kiss him. He lowered his head, so our lips were inches apart, and his breath caressed my skin like a kiss. It was warm and sent tingles through my body.

True love. It's comfortable and sexy. Reckless. Lustful. Fireworks and kittens. I remembered telling Cindy how I felt for Christopher, and it was all of those things. But what I felt for him was also so much more.

The best part? Knowing with absolute surety that the other person felt the same way. Dorian and I were new together. Knowing his feelings for me made my heart beat fast. Sure, there was desire. A part of me wanted to climb on top of him and kiss him until we couldn't breathe, but it was more. It was - it felt like - Dorian was the final piece to my heart.

Gabe exposed the physicality of love.

Christopher revealed love could be heartbreaking.

Dorian showed me love, true love, was unconditional, far-reaching, and all-encompassing.

"Dorian," I breathed, touching his face and leaning forward.

Before our lips could meet, there was a loud clumping, like dozens of feet on the stairs.

We looked at each other and jumped up, prepared for whatever was coming for us. We faced the vampire queen together. We could face anything.

"Hey," Heathcliff said when he came around the corner. "I found her! And, holy crap, she's with Dorian!"

Excited hoots and shouts came from the stairs as they all piled into the room. Six sets of eyes. Seven counting Dorian. My family. Salvatore and Sebastian were wrestling with each other. From behind them all, another set of feet walked into the room. They were smaller. As I looked closer, she pushed through them.

"Mom!" I jumped up and ran to her. "How?" I asked, stunned.

"It's a long story." She hugged me.

Cindy appeared next, an excited smile curving her lips. After her came Professor Pops. He looked like he aged a lifetime since I last saw him, and I felt terrible. I promised we would defeat the queen together, and then I disobeyed. His eyes softened, and he nodded in understanding.

"Pops," Dorian said.

Professor Pops' eyes shifted to his son, and the skin around them crinkled as he smiled.

"Dorian." He helped his son stand and hugged him tightly.

Cindy came to stand next to me. She smiled wearily, but she seemed more confident too. "Merde, Snow. You scared us. I'm mad at you just so you know."

"Sorry, Cin." I leaned my head on her shoulder. She batted at my face.

"You have a lot of explaining to do." She crossed her arms.

I lifted my head and nodded toward my mom, who followed our exchange with interest. "So do you."

"Touché, my friend." She took my hand, and we hugged and laughed.

My mom joined in. I watched with happy interest as the brothers surrounded Dorian, peppering him with questions. Laughing. Dorian did his best to answer. His eyes slid to mine, and he winked.

Warmth filled my body. This was what life was all about. Family. Love. There was one thing that could've made the moment better, and that was my dad. I hoped, wherever he was, he was okay. Safe. Getting the help he needed.

My mom squeezed me. "You're one lucky girl," she whispered, her eyes filled with a combination of happiness and incredulity.

I nodded, blinking back tears, but didn't say anything. My emotions were too close to the surface, and I didn't want to cry.

DEFEATING SHARRA

TWO MONTHS PASSED from when the vampire queen vanished in the black smoke. After speaking with Professor Pops, Kenmei, my mom, Cindy, and the brothers, it became clear I would have to become the next vampire queen. I was the Seal, after all. It was created to bring balance to all magics. There wasn't another way.

Since defeating Sharra, I felt Silindra within my consciousness more than once. She seemed happy. I didn't encourage her, though. I wasn't ready.

The only person who knew about Silindra was Dorian. He also knew about the gem, though we had no idea what to do with it. Until we figured something out, I always kept it on me, like Abernathy said.

I agreed to become the next queen under two conditions. The Seven Magics Academy had to be at the castle. With help, I would make it a real school. And I would finish the last few months of high school at Salem Academy. Dorian already agreed to be my date to Spring Fling.

Everyone loved the idea of us going and promised to help, which was why I was at the castle now, getting ready for my official coronation. Though I'd been handling the duties befitting my title as queen of the vampires for a while, tonight would make it all official. Plus, there would be food and dancing.

I would spend time in both places. Sharra and well as Salem. My mom had already taken up residence in our old house, and it was full of light and happiness and love once again.

As I watched Cindy put the finishing touches on my hair with magic, I thought about the vampire queen. Professor Pops, Kenmei, and I discussed at length what might have happened to Sharra when she evaporated in the dark smoke. None of us knew for sure. We all had guesses and felt certain she wasn't gone for good. But we hoped she learned her lesson and would live out her days in her last human body before going quietly into the night. Part of me knew that thinking was wishful and even unwise, but we agreed to celebrate our win.

My mom came in. "You look beautiful," she said, squeezing my shoulder.

"So do you." She was dressed in a soft silver dress, her long hair pulled back in a bun. She told me about how she was rescued, and that Cindy was an incredible witch and a brilliant hero. Getting to know my mother again would take time, but I figured that was what a person did. Made an effort for those important to them. And my mom was a significant part of me.

Cindy and I talked at length about the Seven Magics Academy. I asked her to run it. She turned the offer down but agreed to teach spells and back up Heathcliff in teaching potions. Since his secretive job in a place called Demonland kept him busier and busier all the time.

After further reflection, I knew the person who should run the SMA was Coco. Because of all she went through, she could be strong when necessary as well as empathetic. As someone who was previously marked, she would be excellent in a position of leadership.

Dorian would teach weapons training. Professor Pops had agreed to assist Coco, but he wanted to continue teaching at Harvard and continue searching the world for those who would be a good fit for the Academy.

Several of the magical creatures, including Ryden, were on board to help too.

Gabe would stay at the mansion in Salem. He wasn't thrilled about the way magical creatures had free reign of the Earth once again. It turned out he and Sharra agreed on this one thing. He believed humans would be safer, as would creatures of magic if they were kept separate.

Gabe and I would be working together often. As the leader of the chayot, his new purpose was to make sure humans were treated fairly. Sebastian and Bart opted to stay at the house with Gabe to help as necessary, not because they weren't behind my decision.

"We need to keep the chayot leader from getting uptight or taking himself too seriously," Bart said with a wink.

Most magical creatures didn't want to dwell in the human realm. They asked that I help them create a realm of their own, which I happily did. Still, Gabe worried.

I quickly realized ruling wasn't going to be easy. That was obvious within seconds of the vampire queen's disappearance. She forced her subjects to be loyal, and that kind of allegiance didn't last. But I possessed one thing she hadn't - the love of family and friends. Real love. Real friends.

Plus, I had Dorian. He decided to take classes from Harvard online so he could help me in the land of Sharra as well as teaching at the Seven Magics Academy.

Zenny appeared in the mirror. He wore a sparkly blue suit, his hair color changed to match. "Why don't you let me fetch Fina and Trina?" Zenny asked.

Cindy stuck out her tongue. "My magic is enough, Zenny."

I turned to the side to admire my hair. Soft curls cascaded down my back, and the sides were pulled up and pinned around the small diamond and onyx encrusted tiara. My makeup was subtle, except my lips. They were blood red. "It's appropriate, Snow. You're the vampire queen. Own it," Cindy said with a large smile.

"I will." I smiled. "You better get ready and check on Gabe. Make sure the chayot leader isn't getting into trouble."

"Agreed." She rushed from the room.

"I'm going to go find Mr. Henry," my mom said, leaving me alone.

In the closet, Fina and Trina helped me into my big, poofy, old-fashioned dress. I didn't want to wear it, but the fairies made it, and I needed to honor them. I studied my reflection in front of a large, oval mirror. The dress was beautiful but overwhelming, the material was velvet and deep purple. Black ribbing crisscrossed in the front, and tiny pearl buttons peeked from between the laced bodice.

"Be careful, child," Zenny shouted at Fina. "For crying out loud, that dress isn't made of bricks. It's delicate."

"Sorry," she responded as Trina assisted her.

"Maybe I can help," Dorian said from the door. Fina and Trina disappeared in a flustered wisp of magic.

I sighed with relief. "Yes, please."

TRUE LOVE

HE LOOKED SO INCREDIBLY handsome in black pants, a white shirt, and a jacket made from the same material as my dress. His sandy was cut short, allowing me full access to his gorgeously rugged face. Soon, he would be king. I had a crown made for him, but he refused to wear it. At least not until after he proposed, and we were married. "Or I could help you out of it?" His strange eyes that exactly resembled mine danced with mischief.

At his words, my heart melted, and my fangs pressed against my mouth. "Do you think?" I wanted him. His lips, his blood. He already gave me his heart.

He let out a joyous laugh. "My dad and your mom would never forgive us."

"I guess." I held up the front of the dress so it wouldn't fall off my shoulders.

"Allow me," he said, pretending to be hoity-toity and coming to stand behind me, pulling on the laces.

I stuck out my tongue but quickly drew it back in my mouth. Dorian's playfulness was gone, his eyes trained on my naked back. He caressed me tenderly, one of his fingers running the length of my spine and stopping at my waist. I shivered.

"You're so beautiful, Snow." His hand circled my waist, pulling me against him.

"So are you." My lower belly was on fire. Every inch of my body longed for his touch, his lips on mine. He kissed my shoulder before turning me so that I faced him.

My dress hung on my arms, sinking low in the front. His fingers stroked my cheeks, sending flickers of heat all over. Lowering his head, his lips brushed mine. Soft. Loving.

I responded with force, opening my mouth, hungry for him. A deep growl escaped the back of his throat, and our gazes locked. He picked me up, moving me to the bed, laying me down before climbing on top. Our lips met again with profound strength, and I let out a mew, something I'd never done before. I wanted to wrap my legs around his hips, but my blasted dress was in the way.

Someone cleared his throat behind us.

"I'll come back later. Your hair is already a wreck, Snow. I don't even know why I try," Zenny said.

I smiled against Dorian's lips. "Help me get this damn thing off." I tugged at my dress.

Dorian lifted my skirt out of the way, and I clung to him with my legs.

"Bite me," he whispered a naughty glint in his eyes. "I know it's been a while since you've had any blood."

I gave him a thoughtful look. I hadn't drunk in a while because I only wanted his blood, and he hadn't offered. "Are you sure?" I extended my fangs.

"Damn sure. You are who you are. A queen. My love. And a vampire. It's one of the many things I love about you."

"Good," I said and kissed his neck, no longer able to hold back.

Dorian sighed sexily. "You're amazing," he said, kissing a trail along my shoulder.

My stomach quivered. The scent of his skin, and his blood, was incredible. Dorian tilted his neck, giving me better access to a vein, and I tugged him more tightly against me as my fangs sank deep. He groaned in pleasure as I ran my hands through his hair, along his shoulders, and down his back.

I counted internally.

One.

Two.

Three.

He tastes like Heaven, I thought, sucking harder. Dorian's fingers brushed my cheeks as he pressed his body into mine.

Four.

Five.

Six.

He tastes like magic.

Seven.

Eight.

A cracking noise sounded from the dresser near the bathroom. It was loud, like the sound of a boulder splitting, and I pulled away from Dorian's throat. My blood haze had me feeling euphoric. Dorian's face looked the way mine felt, I was sure, and I wanted to keep going. But I twisted my head so I could see the dresser.

I had placed the black gem there after Cindy left so I could put on my dress. A surprised gasp escaped my throat. The gem had doubled its original size.

Dorian looked up. "What is happening?" He stood, pulling me with him. My red lipstick was smeared on his gorgeous lips.

"I don't know." I touched the gem. "It is warm."

He touched it as well. "Strange. It almost feels like there's something alive in there."

The top half of the gem cracked, leaving a zigzagged line. Dorian and I pulled our fingers back at the same time, and we waited.

Nothing happened.

"It's probably nothing." I took his hand, hungry to spend more time in his arms.

Dorian looked at me. "I love you, Snow. But I'm not gonna lie; you're a wreck," he said, playfully running his thumb across my bottom lip. "And there are thousands of creatures just beyond this wall, waiting for you." He kissed my nose.

I gave myself a once over in the mirror. He was right. My hair had fallen from the pins Cindy placed around the crown. The crown itself was tilted sideways, almost dangling. My lipstick was smeared along both sides of my cheeks. I let out an embarrassed laugh. "Cindy's going to kill me," I said, grabbing a tissue and wiping at the lipstick.

Dorian took the tissue from me and licked it.

"You're gross," I whispered, but I was mesmerized by him.

He rubbed the wet end of the tissue against my cheek softly. His eyes danced with such happiness. "Even a wreck, you're the most beautiful creature in the world."

I watched his face, knowing that he meant every word and loved him for it. "I never thought I could love someone the way I love you," I said tenderly.

Dorian's smile lit up his whole face. He set down the tissue and reached into his pocket, pulling out a black box. Then he got down on one knee.

Nervous excitement danced through my veins. "What are you doing?" I asked, even though I knew he was going to propose. My heart thundered in my chest, reminding me that while I was a creature of the supernatural world and always had been, I was still the same klutzy human girl who wanted it all - a career, a husband, children, and love. From Dorian, I felt so much love. It was the greatest gift I would ever receive.

He opened the box. Inside was a diamond solitaire, elegant and beautiful.

My hands went to my mouth.

"Snow Merriweather White, would you do me the honor of becoming my wife?"

Was I ready for this? It wasn't that long ago that I defeated the vampire queen. I studied his eyes, so full of love, and knew there would never be a love greater than his and mine. "Yes, Dorian. Without a doubt, yes!" I dove into his arms, knocking him to the floor and smothering his face in kisses.

He chuckled happily until I kissed his lips, then all laughter was forgotten. In its place were hunger and desire. I wanted him. All of him.

"I love you so much, Dorian."

His eyes roamed my face and down my body. "I love you, too." He sat up, adjusting me in his lap, and took the ring out of the box before sliding it onto my finger.

I studied it for a moment, surprised by all that happened. Through all the trials and the heartache, we found each other, and I would never let him go. "I hope you're okay with being mine always and forever, Dorian Henry."

"More than okay with it." He took my face in his hands and kissed me.

I threw my arms around his neck, kissing him back with all the pent up love and adoration I had to give.

He dragged the dress down my arms, and I unbuttoned his shirt. We were going to seal our love with more than a kiss, and I was finally ready.

A loud pop sounded from the dresser.

Surprised, we both looked over.

A piece of the gem fell onto the floor. "It broke," I said, standing up. Dorian did too, and we went to it, bending to get a closer look.

"It looks like there's something inside," I said, and heard the wonder in my voice.

"It's a - "

"Vampire," I finished, as the most adorable pair of lavender eyes fluttered open. "I think." The face of an angel, I thought, moving closer, remembering the depictions I saw in the Museum of the Supernatural.

More pieces of the flecked ebony gem broke away, making it easier to see all of her. There was no doubt it was a vampire, and she had wings.

"It's a girl," Dorian stated.

"I noticed," I said. She was tiny, the size of Dorian's fist. Black wings were tucked against the back of her human body with a shuck of silky black hair covered her head.

"Did you know about this?" he asked, scooping her into his hand. The baby vampire shivered, and he cupped his hand around her. I ran into the bathroom, trying to keep my dress up with one hand. With the other, I pulled a hand towel from the counter and rushed back.

"No," I finally answered, shaking my head in shocked amazement.

Dorian took the towel and carefully wrapped it around her. She sighed contentedly.

I reached the tip of my finger out, and she grabbed hold with one hand, sinking her teeth into my flesh. My heart melted.

"A baby," he whispered. He was astonished, and I completely understood.

"A baby vampire," I added. "With wings." Sated, she released my finger and snuggled down in the towel. I shook my head. Was she the next step in the evolution of the vampires? A human-looking original, but with wings. I thought of Silindra and knew she would approve. At that thought, something inside my head snapped, and like the unfurling of flower petals, I felt Silindra's consciousness come to attention.

She's perfect, Silindra said.

She is, I responded, wondering what it all meant.

I think the time will soon come for my mind and my body to become one again.

Your body is gone, Silindra. You'll -

"Snow? How are we going to explain her?" Dorian looked at me, a confused expression on his face.

I shook my head. We'll talk later. "I don't know." I shrugged. "Maybe we don't tell anyone. Maybe we keep this between you, me, and - " I smacked my forehead. "Abernathy can tell us what to do. That sneaky dragon probably knew what the gem was all along."

Dorian stroked her hair with one of his fingers. She appeared to be sleeping.

"What should we name her?" he asked quietly.

A name immediately popped into my head. "Jasmine," I answered.

Dorian chuckled softly. "I like it."

"It's strange. She isn't covered in hair like the original vampires were. Like Silindra was. Her body is like ours. Human in nature."

"She's a new kind of original, then. Not exactly the same as the first, but similar," Dorian said.

"I think so."

His gaze caught mine. "Is this where I say, 'And they lived happily ever after'?" He grinned.

I snickered. "No, this is where we say: They lived triumphantly.'" I leaned in, careful of the baby vampire, seeing a little of Silindra in her wings. Silindra loved her wings. And she died believing she was the last of her kind. The vampire Dorian held in his hands would be Silindra's legacy. Though Jasmine was slightly different, she was also the same.

A vampire with wings, I thought excitedly.

Dorian nuzzled my cheek with his nose, and I smiled. "Were you going to kiss me, or did you change your mind?" I asked playfully.

Dorian inched his lips, so they barely brushed against mine. "You're the most powerful supernatural creature on Earth. What do you think?" His lips pressed against mine, and I felt it down to my toes.

GORGEOUS HUSBAND

HAPPILY EVER AFTER WAS NEVER SOMETHING I believed would be possible - not for me. Yet I was given exactly that. As I lay in my bed, listening to Dorian's deep breathing, I admired our bedroom in the castle.

It was large and decorated in the most beautiful linens in shades of gold, white, and cream. Thick, soft drapes hung from the windows, keeping out the morning light surely blazing against them, and a sparkling chandelier hung in the middle of the ceiling. There was a fireplace to the left where a loveseat, chairs, and a coffee table were situated. To the right was the entrance to our walk-in closet and beside that, our bathroom.

It was beyond comfortable. Royal, in fact. But also homey. Jasmine's bedroom was next to ours. How I loved her. She was the most amazing child. A year ago, she grew out of her crib, and we moved her into a toddler bed.

But as I gazed on the man lying next to me - the man of my dreams - I was awed by my good luck. Dorian. My gorgeous husband and my best friend looked so peaceful. He was sleeping on his back, without a shirt, the white sheet pooled at his waist, giving me an amazing view.

"Snow, what are you doing?" His voice was hoarse with sleep, but his eyes stayed shut.

"Just watching my gorgeous husband. You aren't going to deny me, are you?" I smiled, then leaned in and kissed him on the mouth.

He growled softly as his arms came around me, rolling us, so he was on top. Then his lips were on mine. Soft and urgent. I would never get enough of him. Not in a thousand years.

"I would never deny you, my queen," he said, after a long while.

"You're such a sweet-talker. It's a wonder I've still got my figure." I smirked, enjoying our banter and the scent of him. He always smelled so good.

"Your figure is deliciously perfect." He pulled the sleeve of my nightgown off my shoulder before kissing a trail up to my neck.

"You're not so bad yourself," I said, running my hands along his muscled arms, up to his shoulders, and down his back. At the scar where the Unknowns' blade had driven into him over and over, I paused.

It was a month since we married. At that time, I discovered Dorian still suffered some pain in the area. I used the power of the Seal to heal it, but even then, I could sense that it wouldn't wholly mend. It was frustrating, but Dorian always played it off like it was nothing and made me promise not to tell Professor Pops or his brothers, so they didn't worry.

As my fingers tenderly caressed the scar, he flinched. "Dorian, I think we should talk to Abernathy about - "

"My lover, I'm fine. Let's not and say we did." He winked, and I laughed. "My first and most important priority this morning is to kiss every inch of you."

My hands were locked loosely around his neck. He kissed each collarbone before trailing kisses along my chest and down my stomach. I put my hands above my head, enjoying the touch of his lips against my skin.

Since becoming the new vampire queen, life was busy. Beyond busy, but Dorian made sure we took time for ourselves, too. And without a doubt, I loved our alone time together. Nothing in the world mattered as much as being his wife.

Dorian kissed around my navel, and I shuddered, pressing up against his mouth. In the last month, he showed me things -

"Mommy. Daddy. Are you awake?" Our door swung open.

Dorian quickly rolled off me and onto the edge of the bed, where he swung Jasmine into his arms. "Hello, my little peanut."

I quickly adjusted my gown, watching the two of them. They were so sweet together. Dorian was a great father, and Jasmine loved every moment they spent together. In the last year, she went from baby to toddler, and when Dorian tossed her in the air, Jasmine spread her wings, hovering above him and giggling like she was the happiest creature in the world. Her black wings were large, too big for her body, and feathered, soft as silk. According to Abernathy, our daughter would grow into them, but for now, her wings almost swallowed her.

"Yes, we're up," I said, once I was decent.

Dorian set her on the bed, and she used her wings to come to me, jumping up into my arms. I hugged her tight. "Jasmine," I said, kissing her cheek.

She released me and ran back to Dorian. Once he was sitting against the padded headboard and she was snuggled into his arms, he took one of her hands in his. "How's my girl?"

"Good, but Daddy?" She patted his face with her tiny hands. "I want unicorn blood for breakfast. And then I want to play with Sabrina."

Sabrina was her best friend and a pixilette. The two of them spent most of every day together. Or, at least as much as they could.

Dorian smiled. "You've got your day planned out, then?"

She nodded. My heart squeezed. They had a special bond, one I found surprising and the slightest bit confusing.

Dorian adored Jasmine, and she reciprocated. Adoration radiated from them both. It was something I never had with my dad. Watching the two of them together filled my heart with such joy and sadness. I wondered where my father was, and if he was okay. I hoped so. It still brought tears to my eyes that he missed my wedding. Mom came, but she hadn't lingered. Not for long. She was busy helping Gabe and the other chayot or assisting the elves with their transition. It was never easy to make such significant changes, but my mom was a champion and so committed to helping supernatural creatures of all kinds find a home for themselves.

"Have you decided to drink blood yet?" Jasmine asked Dorian, her face serious. She still didn't understand that he wasn't like her and figured that since she drank blood, so should her dad.

I waited for his answer. Since he saved my life, he changed. Magic flowed through him now. His body was infused with power. Yet the wound on his back still refused to heal completely.

We talked about changing him into a vampire. In some ways, it made sense, but whenever I thought about the decision, it didn't feel right.

Dorian shook his head. "Not yet." He gave me a tiny smile. "I'm still waiting."

I smiled, knowing what he wanted, but worried it wasn't an option. There was still so much about him we didn't know, and I wouldn't throw his life away for my own selfishness.

"You could drink some unicorn blood with me."

Dorian stroked Jasmine's wings. "Not today. I think I'll have some oatmeal with bananas, brown sugar, and cream with a side of bacon."

Jasmine scrunched her face up in disgust. "Gross, Daddy. How can you eat that stuff?"

A chuckle escaped my throat as Jasmine's eyes grew wide. I covered my mouth.

"What's funny, Mommy?" She came over to me, and the edge of one wing ruffled my hair. "You don't like that stuff either. You drink blood too." She said it matter-of-factly, as though what we did was normal and Dorian eating oatmeal wasn't.

"You're just so cute I can't help myself," I said, brushing some of her long, wild hair off her face.

"Thanks, Mommy." She wrapped her little arms around my neck.

"You cute, too."

"Awwww." I hugged her tight. "Let's get you dressed and then we'll eat."

Jasmine jumped off the bed, flying to the door. "Hungry. Come on."

SEVEN MAGICS

AFTER JASMINE, Dorian, and I had breakfast, I headed down to the conference area. There was a big meeting with all of the supernaturals, where we discussed whose realm would be created next. Once that was finished, Coco came by my office. As the headmistress of the Academy, she was in charge of everything, but she asked that I speak with one of my vampires, a young worker vampire who changed just before I defeated Sharra. The council, which included Professor Pops, Heathcliff, Cindy, Coco, and I, agreed to let Valencia attend the Seven Magics Academy.

I thought it was going well, but apparently, the girl enjoyed starting fights.

She was a beautiful young woman with dark hair, light brown skin, and brown eyes. Her navy jacket was unbuttoned, revealing her white shirt underneath. There was blood on the collar, and I sighed.

At the moment, she was seated in the chair opposite my desk, her head down, and her hands in her lap.

"Am I to understand you picked a fight with a witch and an elf during lunch?"

Valencia nodded, looking up. There were tears in her eyes.

"Then, you drank from them."

"Uh-huh," she said, her face a combination of sad and smug.

"You shouldn't be pleased with yourself, Valencia. I'm not like the old queen. That isn't acceptable behavior."

Valencia licked her blood-red lips.

"And I won't tolerate it." I clasped my hands together, resting them in front of me on the large oak desk.

Her face fell. Valencia looked away, gazing at her feet. She wore black boots with her knee-high white socks, and she crossed her legs at the ankle. She didn't have any family. Many of the supernatural creatures we invited to the school didn't. They were either abandoned or disowned by their parents.

With magic, we created dormitories for them, with six students to a room. I hoped they would be able to bond with each other and create their own families. For the most part, it was working, but some struggled more than others.

Valencia swallowed. "My queen, the elf stole my favorite book, and she wouldn't give it back - not even when I asked her nicely." She blinked several times, and I waited for her to go on. "So I grabbed her around the neck and demanded she return it, but she laughed at me and called me a blood-sucking leech."

That was the cruelest and most derogatory comment a vampire could hear. "I see."

She went on. "The witch walked into the lunchroom while I had the elf around the neck and fought to protect the elf, which irritated the hell out of me, so yeah, I punched them both. But they deserved it."

I clenched my teeth together, forcing myself to remain in control. "I understand your frustration, Valencia, but the next time you have a problem like that, you bring it up with the headmistress or any of the teachers. When you take matters into your own hands, I have no choice but to punish you."

"But that isn't fair." She stuck out her bottom lip, pouting and irritated.

"Maybe not, but doing something negative in response to a negative action isn't right." I pursed my lips together, waiting to see what else she would say. "However, if you tell me the names of the other two girls, I will make sure they are punished as well."

"I'm not a snitch," she said, sitting on her hands.

"Very well, then you must stay after school and help Heathcliff in the potions lab for the remainder of the week." I picked up some paper and clicked it against the desk before setting it in the basket to my right. "That will be all."

"Yes, your majesty." She went to the door. I didn't look up until she was gone, worried she would see my irritation at what had happened. Coco and I needed to talk about what we could do to alleviate some of the tension between the different creatures.

IT WAS LATE AFTERNOON. I sat beside the fire, watching the flames dance merrily in the hearth.

"Mommy." Jasmine flew into the room and straight into my arms.

"Hi. How was your day?" I tucked her against me, holding her close. Jasmine wasn't in school yet, but what would the other creatures think when a vampire with wings began to attend? How would those at the academy treat her? Would they bully her like they did Valencia?

"It was so fun. Me and Abrea chased squirrels and helped baby birds learn to fly. Abrea tried to ride a fish. It was funny because the fish tried to eat her, but Daddy saved her."

"Thank goodness," I said.

"Yeah." Jasmine went on and on about her day as I listened, my eyes falling on Dorian, who stood by the entrance, leaning against the doorframe. His sandy hair was rumpled from the wind or possibly the play. Instantly, my fangs pressed against my lips. I wanted to taste him.

"Your daughter is a handful," he said, his voice filled with admiration, but he saw what I wanted, and his eyes became hooded.

"No, Daddy, you a handful." She jumped into the air and flew over and into his outstretched arms.

I walked over to them and wrapped my arms around them both. "Glad you had a fun day."

Dorian leaned around Jasmine's wings and kissed me. "I missed you," he whispered, his voice full of meaning.

Jasmine rested her head against Dorian's shoulder, and she closed her eyes. Within moments, Jasmine was asleep. Dorian's free hand wrapped around my waist, and he pulled me to him. I ran my fingers along the waistband of his pants, telling him with my eyes what I wanted.

He nodded knowingly.

"Let's put her to bed," he said.

My heart began to race. "And then you can take me to bed," I added, licking my lips.

"Agreed." He went up the stairs, and I followed him down the hall, up another set of stairs, down another corridor, and past mine and Dorian's bedroom. I opened Jasmine's door for him.

Her room was decorated in different shades of teal and black - Jasmine's two favorite colors. In the center of the room was a round bed covered in pillows. I pushed some aside, and Dorian laid her on her stomach. With her wings, it was the only way she could sleep. Then I covered her. "Night, Jasmine. Hope your dreams are sweet."

Ciana, the only vampire I would leave Jasmine with, appeared.

"Watch over her," I said softly.

"With pleasure, my queen." She bowed.

Dorian took my hand and pulled me toward the door. "Do you still want to go on our date?"

I watched his eyes happily. I really wanted him, but our dates were so much fun. "Definitely."

"Where to tonight?" Ciana asked.

Dorian put a finger to his lips. "It's a secret."

Ciana giggled, and I smiled at their exchange. Everyone in Sharra was smitten with Dorian. Where I was respected, Dorian was loved. Adored. He brought joy and kindness into the land. "Enjoy yourselves," she said.

"Thanks, Ciana." She closed the door behind us, and I knew she would sit in Jasmine's room all night. Ciana was Jasmine's guard, protector, and nursemaid while Dorian and I were away.

"You going to give me a hint?" I asked, unable to hide my giddiness. We hadn't been married that long, and while I knew him my whole life, marriage was different. Exciting. And Dorian was so damn sexy I could hardly keep my hands to myself.

"You'll see." He leaned in and kissed my neck. I shivered in anticipation.

"Should I change?" I asked when we reached our bedroom.

He glanced down. I wore a sky-blue day dress made of fairy gossamer. It was soft, breathable, and airy like wearing a cloud.

His eyes skimmed across my body, caressing me slowly, and I shivered.

"You look perfect," he said, pulling me into the warmth of his strong arms. "Come on."

BODY AGAINST MINE

WE MADE our way out of the castle. Once we were outside the gates, we walked through the apple orchard. I plucked an apple off a tree and brought it to my nose. It still surprised me that its fragrance was blood. I knew it would taste like blood as well. I bit into it, enjoying the flavor.

Dorian also picked an apple. He took a few bites.

"What does yours taste like?" I asked, curious.

He lifted an eyebrow. "Like an apple, of course." He winked.

"It does?"

"Yes, my love, it tastes like a sweet and juicy apple."

"If you say so." But I knew that was the magic of Sharra. All foods tasted like what you desired most.

He leaned in and kissed me.

As we strolled through the grove, I admired the blossoms floating along with the breeze. Dorian caught one, clutched it between his thumb and first finger, spun it, and then turned and stuck it behind my ear.

"Beautiful." He stroked my cheek.

I loved that he could make me forget I was the vampire queen. With him, I was a woman in love with a totally gorgeous man, and that was more than enough. "So are you, you know." I touched his chest, felt the beating of his heart. Blood flowed through his veins and made my mouth water. Maybe that was why I didn't want to change him. I loved the way his blood tasted of humanity and magic. There wasn't any other blood anywhere in the world that tasted more divine.

Dorian smirked. "You want me, don't you?" He pressed his body against mine.

"Yes, husband, I do." To prove my point, I ran my hands up his arms to his neck.

He rubbed his cheek against mine. "Can you wait until after our date, or should we go home, my queen?"

"Keep that up, and we'll skip our date and move straight to the afterparty."

Dorian chuckled. "Let's go, sexy. Our date is going to be a blast."

I snickered. "It better be."

We continued through the orchard until we arrived at a cobblestone path where we walked until we reached the Filigree River's sandy shore. At the water's edge, an elegant pearl barge bobbed next to a pier. Paper lanterns in pastel colors hung along the sides of the roof. They were lit and swayed gently in the breeze. The sun had almost set, its dying rays making the water flicker like flames.

"What's this?" I glanced from Dorian to the barge and back at his incredibly handsome face. Water wasn't my favorite thing. Growing up a klutz, I tended to stay away from areas where problems could occur - like water.

But I was the vampire queen now. No longer klutzy, no longer a bumbling snowflake.

"Officially, we've been married one month today. I wanted to do something special." I watched his excitement turn serious. "It feels like forever and yesterday since we were married."

I cupped his strong hand in both of mine. "I know exactly what you mean."

"But, you're still glad we married, right?" There was worry etched in his features.

Before the actual wedding day, we discussed at length whether to marry or not. We were still young - twenty and twenty-one, respectively. But we knew we'd found our soulmate in each other, so there wasn't a point in waiting.

"Absolutely. What about you? Are you happy to be married to me?" His life had altered drastically because of me. He went from a Harvard student to the king of a magical land.

"Without a doubt." He leaned down and kissed me tenderly.

When he lifted his head, I smiled. "You are the perfect man for me."

The corner of his mouth rose into his trademark smirk that melted my heart and soul. "Remember that when I'm ninety and wrinkled and walking with a cane," he said.

I laughed. "Oh, I will." But I doubted he would ever need a cane or become wrinkled. He wasn't a vampire, but he had become part of the seven magics. If he aged, it would be at a much, much slower rate than humans. Though I might have to change him, so he didn't suffer.

"Good." He kissed the tip of my nose and pulled me toward the pier.

When I stepped onto the barge, a feeling of foreboding overwhelmed me. "Wait." I stopped and searched the water's edge on both sides of the wide river. My keen eyesight picked out a herd of deer, an otter building a home near one of the houses, and several dozen different birds chatting amongst themselves from tree branches. There was also a group of pixilettes fluttering near a meadow of pink wildflowers. An ogre was cutting down a tree. About a mile away, a vampire stalked a bear near the base of the mountain. Nothing abnormal - at least not for Sharra. Still, I sensed something.

"Dorian? Who knows we're here?"

An elf appeared wearing a deep blue tunic and brown pants. His long blue hair was pulled back in a low ponytail. His eyes were black, as were his eyebrows. They stuck out from his pale blue skin. He came from below the deck of the barge. In one hand he carried a tray. Two glasses of something deep and red sat on top.

"King Dorian. Queen Snow." He bowed. "Happy anniversary." He offered the glasses to Dorian and me. "Please. Drink up."

Dorian picked up the glasses. "This is Rheme," he said, indicating the elf.

I nodded. "Nice to meet you."

"And you, my queen. Dorian has told me much about the two of you from when you were younger."

I raised an eyebrow. "Really?" I glanced between the two men. "What did he say?"

Dorian's eyes danced with mischief. "Go ahead, tell her."

Rheme seemed embarrassed. "He knew the two of you were meant for each other long before you did." He bowed again. "My queen."

I laughed, taking a glass from Dorian's hand. "Did he now?"

Rheme cleared his throat.

"Of course, I did." Dorian pressed the glass to his lips. My glass held blood. His looked like mine. Was he going to drink blood as well?

"What's in yours?"

He winked at me. "It looks like blood, but it's actually strawberry-rhubarb nectar, a special bland Rheme here makes. It's delicious."

"Oh?" He stuck his glass under my nose. I sniffed. "Mmmm, that smells good." It didn't really. Only blood smelled good anymore, but I knew it was supposed to smell appetizing, so I pretended.

Dorian shook his head and laughed. "You're a terrible liar."

I laughed too. "Yeah, I know."

NIGHT PIXIES

THERE WERE two other crewmembers on the twinkling flat-bottomed vessel. They went to work, pushing us away from the dock until a circular paddle smacked the water at the rear, pushing us forward.

It was nearly dark. Insects came out and played us their songs. Night pixies, their iridescent wings changing colors in the moonlight, fluttered along the water's edge. When they saw us, they flitted forward. I could hear their giggling and whispering. But before they reached us, they stopped and turned back. They no longer giggled. In fact, I sensed apprehension. Something spooked them.

I tried to remind myself I was the scariest thing in Sharra. None could hurt or defeat me. Plus, I had Dorian.

He seemed to sense my trepidation and pulled me against his chest, wrapping his arms around my waist. "Isn't it beautiful?"

I swallowed, forcing down the strange feeling in my gut. "Yes, it's exqui - "

The boat smacked against something hard. My body tried to lurch forward, but Dorian held me fast.

"Rheme, what was that?" He sounded calm, but I felt his pulse increase.

"I'm not sure, sir." Rheme walked toward the front of the boat. "Let me check," he said, leaning over the railing.

Something smacked against the boat again. The elf nearly went in the water.

Dorian released my waist and started forward, but I grabbed his arm. My senses were on overload. Something was wrong.

A figure, dark as the darkest night, appeared in front of Rheme and pulled the elf over the edge of the barge. Sub-consciously I expected to hear a splash, but there wasn't one.

Dorian sprang forward, peering over the edge.

"Get behind me," I said, worried for him, as creatures who looked like shadows swarmed him. They were small, the size of children. "Dorian!" My body moved over to my husband before I even realized it. "Get off him!" My fangs descended with my fury. I couldn't see Dorian, there were so many creatures around him. I pulled at them, yanking and throwing them behind me, but I still couldn't see Dorian. The creatures were too dense.

After several seconds I realized what I was doing wasn't working, so I picked up the nearest dark figure and bit into it. The creatures looked like shadows, but they were solid, and solid meant they would have blood. I would be able to tell the type of creature by the flavor of its blood.

Except -

As soon as my fangs sank into the flesh, it disintegrated in my hands and evaporated. I screamed in frustration and grabbed another. And another. And another. Each one crumbled the same as the others.

Fear welled up; I didn't know what to do. I couldn't lose Dorian, and I wouldn't. So I kept fighting, even though it felt useless. One after another, I buried my fangs into them until a green light flashed from the center of the dogpile. At the place where I thought Dorian might be. It grew brighter, the color intensifying and getting bigger.

The shadow creatures no longer attacked, but froze, and began to float like black balloons.

I pushed them out of the way until I finally saw Dorian. The light was coming from him. "Magic," I whispered. "Are you? Dorian?" I called, reaching out to him in wonder.

He stood up straight, his eyes searching mine in wonder. His eyes glowed red. The magic of the Hunter. "Snow." His voice was soft, like a summer's breeze.

"What's happening? What are those things?" The remaining dark creatures continued to float around him. I took a step closer.

"I don't know, but stay where you are. I'm not sure what's going on, and I don't want to hurt you." He raised a hand. His eyes changed to gold - the magic of the dragon.

"Your eyes."

He smiled. "I know, love. I can feel it. See a difference."

"Are you okay?" I reached out but didn't touch him and crossed my arms to keep from doing something stupid.

His eyes changed to a bright elven blue. "Yes. These are the underlings of the Unknowns. Remember them?"

My mind went back to the altar. The knife stabbing me. Dorian coming in to protect me, taking my place as the sacrifice. The Unknowns stopped their plan to destroy all magical creatures because of him. "They're whispering to me - the underlings. They have secrets; they're trying to protect me - protect us. From what, I'm not sure, but I think it's the Unknowns."

I shook my head. "Why? I thought that was over. They accepted the sacrifice. Your sacrifice."

His eyes changed to green, then brown, then indigo in quick succession.

"Apparently, they still want more." He tilted his head to the side as though listening. "They're bringing her back."

"Who?"

"Sharra."

The sound of cackling rang in the distance.

"No." My hands went to my mouth, and I covered it to keep in the scream forming on my lips.

Dorian's eyes turned silver. "The underlings don't know when, but they came to warn us. The Unknowns will do whatever it takes to give magic its rebirth."

His eyes changed back to ebony, flecked with the colors of the seven magics.

"What?" A sick horror filled my body.

"They say if Jasmine dies, then so will all magic. We have to protect her at all costs." The shadows dissipated, and I went to Dorian.

"We will," I said, leaning against his chest. "We will keep her safe."

THREE YEARS LATER

THE RECTANGLE TABLE was filled with supernaturals from the seven magics, including Cindy. She was still my best friend and a damn fine witch. Professor Pops was there as well as Gabe and Dorian.

My eyes fell on my husband's face, and butterflies fluttered low in my belly. We'd been married a little more than three years, yet I couldn't get enough of him. If anything, my love and desire for the man had grown.

His eyes found mine, and he smiled.

I heard his heartbeat faster, and I bit my bottom lip.

Damn, I wanted to taste him.

"Did you hear me?" Gabe asked, his voice lifted with irritation.

Heat trickled up my neck. "Say again," I said, lifting my chin, daring him to be anything except respectful.

Sure, he and I had been in love once. It seemed forever ago. The chayot was still handsome but nothing compared to Dorian.

"I asked what you wanted us to do about the human girl. Now that her magic has manifested, she needs to be handled before she hurts someone else."

I didn't appreciate the way he spoke about the girl.

"Gabe!" Cindy shouted. She obviously didn't like what he said either.

"Hey, what? I get why she did what she did." He sighed. "But I'm a chayot. It is ingrained in my DNA to protect humans from supernaturals."

That was true, but the way he'd spoken still irked me. That was why we would've never worked. His nature was to protect humans while mine was to protect supernaturals—at all costs.

But Cindy and Gabe? They fit much better.

Slowly, I opened the magical dossier we'd put together on Sera. Unfortunately, the teen had a hard life, and things got worse when her magic violently revealed itself.

"Well?" one of the other board members asked.

I closed the folder. "Cindy and Professor Pops can locate Sera and bring her back to the Academy." The grandfather clock I kept in my living quarters chimed twelve times, telling me it was noon.

Jasmine and I had a mother-daughter date. She wanted to practice her flying with the pixilettes in the garden while I watched. It was one of my favorite times of the day. Jasmine was growing up so fast. Soon enough, she would be the same age as Sera. I had to take every opportunity to be with her while she still wanted me around.

I closed the folder and stood. "That'll be all. I have another appointment."

"I'll go with them," Gabe said, standing as well, his shoulders squared.

Cindy did her best to not roll her eyes while Professor Pops kept his face blank as an empty page.

"Very well," I said and left the room.

From beyond the door, I heard Cindy. "It isn't necessary for you to go with us, Gabe." She sounded only a little haughty.

I smiled.

The two of them were made for each other.

"Wait up," Dorian called.

I turned my skin dancing with anticipation at the sight of him. "Husband."

"Wife." He smiled mischievously. "I thought I'd join you in the garden and then afterward while Jasmine takes her nap - " He paused and wiggled his eyebrows playfully. "I thought I'd give you a massage."

I had a million things that needed to get done, but there was no way I could say no to that.

"Great idea." I tucked my arm through his and leaned my head against his bicep.

"I hoped you'd agree," he replied, kissing the top of my head.

Cindy and Gabe were arguing behind us, but I didn't pay them any mind. All I could think about was Dorian's hands on me and all we would do to each other while Jasmine took her nap.

"Snow," Cindy called.

She wanted me to intervene, but I didn't want to.

In response, I lifted my hand to let her know I heard her but kept walking away.

She huffed as she moved down another hallway in a different direction.

The sound of Gabe's booted feet trailed after her.

"You think they'll figure out they can't live without each other?" Dorian asked softly.

"Eventually," I said.

"It took you and me some time, too," Dorian added, wrapping an arm around me.

"Very true." I snuggled into his side, grateful I never had to be without him again.

DEADLY WITCH

A GRIM SMILE

"CINDY CROSWELL, will you - " Gabe, the angelic chayot leader and my boyfriend studied me, his glorious features a painting of perfection.

"What?" I asked, glancing at Pops nervously before focusing on Gabe.

My heart picked up speed. Was he going to ask me to marry him right here? Right now? In an alley full of smelly trash and debris.

His hands circled my arms, and he pulled me to the side. "Will you move out of the way? You're blocking my view of the street." He gave me a grim smile.

"Oh." My heart sank. How had my thoughts gone to marriage? I clucked my tongue and clenched my fists together. "Sure."

The town of Salem, Massachusetts, was quiet, which was unusual for a Saturday morning. Typically people were shopping in the market or children played in the park.

It could be that it was before seven in the morning, and none of the shops were open.

Plus, Pops, Gabe, and I were in the alleyway behind several stores.

The backs of the tall, brick buildings lined one side. Green trash bins rested against them. On the other side was a ten-foot chain-link fence separating the businesses from the enormous city building.

There were no windows, thankfully.

We could do our magic without worrying about humans catching us.

"Where is she, Cin?" Gabe asked. He was more on edge than usual as he searched the area.

"I don't know. I have magic, but I'm not a GPS. We're still going to have to look." I crossed my arms, frustrated with my long-time love.

The air was damp and warm, causing my blue tank to stick to my back, not to mention the pool developing between my cleavage.

Thankfully I remembered to put my hair in a ponytail. But my green camo pants, while great for carrying weapons and whatnot, had me wishing I wore shorts.

Gabe wore jeans and a green tee shirt.

The blades he started carrying when he became the leader of the chayot crossed behind his back. Those angelic weapons were invisible to humans, so only the supernaturals had to worry.

"Well, you'd think your magic would be more accurate. You used a locater spell, right?"

I glared at him. "Look, Gabe - "

"Why don't you both go left, and I'll go right," Professor Pops interrupted, giving us a look that said we were annoying.

I agreed, but it wasn't me.

It was mostly Gabe.

My man needed to chill, which was difficult given the temperature.

Typically, Professor Pops wore sweaters and dress slacks, but today he had on pants similar to mine and a black tank.

The vampire was more than six hundred years old, but he was still damn fine - for an old guy. Short salt and pepper hair accented his square jaw and smile lines.

"You got it," Gabe said, heading off in that direction.

I followed, trying not to be bugged Gabe was here at all.

Pops and I could handle the girl fine, but my angelic boyfriend felt duty-bound to make sure we didn't use magic or compulsion to hurt any unsuspecting humans we came in contact with. As a chayot, that was his job, but it was still irritating.

I clenched my fists together, inhaling a deep breath to calm my nerves.

The witch we were after needed our help, whether she realized it or not. Like me, she was born with magic. And like me, she didn't find out until after her sixteenth birthday.

It was a tough situation.

The girl was in the foster care system.

One of her foster brothers forced himself on her.

In her fear and self-protective rage, she hurt him using magic.

Not that the little asshole didn't deserve it.

He did.

The problem was, he kept blabbing to anyone who would listen that Sera was a witch.

We needed to find her before the police caught her and incarcerated her, or worse, just killed her.

New laws were passed a year ago.

It wasn't right.

Governments tried to detain any supernaturals they caught.

Thankfully, Pops, his sons, Gabe, Snow, and I freed most of them, but a few were still in detainee camps.

Those supernaturals who weren't prisoners were used in treacherous ways.

Snow defeated Sharra a little over three years ago, and the human realm was just getting back to normal.

Sort of.

While I loved my best friend and appreciated her need to free all supernaturals, she made things rather difficult for humans.

They were entirely blind-sided by the sudden appearance of magical creatures wandering their streets, performing magic in the open, and sucking blood.

Gabe spoke with the leaders of the human realm as well as Snow and the leaders of the other supernaturals, and they all came to an accord.

The supernaturals agreed to leave the human realm, and Snow helped them create their own.

Once most supernaturals were gone, the human leaders passed laws banning magic and supernaturals from their realm altogether.

Still, in many cases, there was no way to tell who the supernaturals were.

That left the human realm in a combustible position, but things were better.

Okay, not really.

The biggest worry was the kids, especially those born in the human realm with magic and didn't know it.

In some cases, the parents kicked them out as soon as their magic manifested.

Others turned their own children over to their government.

The Seven Magics Academy wasn't having that.

Which was why we'd gone to the hospital where the guy was staying.

He had a broken arm and some fractured ribs.

I used magic to sneak us into the room, and Professor Pops compelled the jerk to forget the magic he saw Sera use.

Pops also compelled the guy to be kind.

Gabe didn't like that Pops used compulsion on a human, but I thought it was amazing.

Have I mentioned I really like Pops? He's incredible in more ways than one.

"Over here," Pops called.

Gabe and I ran back.

Sera was huddled against a trash bin, her back against the wall. She was dirty, and her red hair was matted.

"Don't be afraid," I said, standing in front of Pops and Gabe. Men weren't what she needed to see at the moment.

"Leave me alone!" Sera put out her hand, and Gabe went sailing back into the chain-link fence.

Without a word, Pops helped him stand.

I was impressed the girl could do magic without the help of a spell or incantation. Her magic probably came from trolls and was mostly brute strength.

I still didn't know where my magic came from.

"Hey," I said, trying again, my hands out in supplication. "It's okay. We aren't going to hurt you. We're here to help."

She pushed herself against the wall and stood, her hand coming out again, and I knew things were about to get ugly.

Sure enough, this time, she sent her magic into Pops.

The vampire took a step back but repelled her with his own magic - that of a hunter. His eyes glowed red, and he growled, flashing his fangs.

Sera's eyes grew wide, and she cried out in pain.

"Incomples slumberia." I spoke the words gently, and Sera's eyes closed as her body slumped to the ground. "Let's get her back to the Academy before anyone else gets hurt."

"Agreed." Pops picked Sera up like she weighed nothing.

"I'll see you later," Gabe said, kissing my cheek. His features were tight, and I bit back the need to ask him what was wrong. Now wasn't the time.

"Tonight, after my shift at Bertilini's?" I asked, meeting his gaze.

"I'll be there." He smiled, but his body remained stiff. Maybe he was still upset over what Pops had done to the jerk who hurt Sera.

I tilted my head and scrunched my eyebrows together, hoping the effort would help me read him. It didn't. "Good." I watched him walk to the end of the alley and turn the corner.

Once Gabe was out of sight, I whispered the spell that opened a portal back into Sharra. Specifically, the basement of the Seven Magics Academy.

MAGICAL SHIELD

IF THE WORLD was created with a bang, then magic began in a whisper. The utterance of one word: Bloomous, that single declaration, articulated softly, started it all.

Bloomous.

I thought about that as I considered the lesson I was preparing for next week's classes.

The ideas brought back memories, some recent, others happened years ago.

While many weren't good, I was grateful for them anyway because they made me step up and become the witch I was today.

And in my opinion, I was pretty damn awesome.

The lights flickered, and I searched the room.

It was large with reformatory cells along the far wall.

Desks covered in various magical items were placed in the middle of the room.

The door resided on the other side. Wide and arched at the top, it was made of wood with a black wrought iron handle.

Shelves lined either side of the entrance and were filled with dusty old books interspersed with old boxes and ancient-looking artifacts.

On the two short walls stood an enchanted sentry. Gilded armor that looked like it belonged in Arthurian times.

Basically, the room was a catch-all for things we weren't sure what to do with but were too valuable to throw away.

Again the lights sputtered.

"Luminous nervosa," I said, hoping that would fix the flickering.

It was hard to believe I was a teacher at the Seven Magics Academy.

In high school, I always thought teachers were so old.

I was barely older than the oldest students.

In a lot of ways, I considered myself a kid. Just like the ones I taught.

There were three things I believed were important in this world.

Fashion, friendship, and magic. Not necessarily in that order.

Sure, it was always important to look your best, and magic was the coolest thing on the planet, but if I had to choose between a gorgeous new top from Bloomingdale's or my best friend Snow, I would choose Snow.

Without even batting a false eyelash.

Yes, she was a little awkward and couldn't put an outfit together to save her life. But, she had a heart bigger than the Grand Canyon and cared for me and all supernaturals like we were her family.

As Vampire Queen of Sharra, Snow carried a lot of responsibility.

I did what I could to help, including teaching the spells and charms classes at the Seven Magics Academy.

It was strange how much I enjoyed teaching exasperating teenagers how to put together a charm or master a spell.

Actually, it was more than like.

I loved teaching.

Helping them figure out their magic shifted my worldview.

Where before I was unsure of my place, now I knew right where I fit.

Seeing students' eyes light up, and over time, watching their confidence develop, it was a joy to be a part of - even if they were little pricks sometimes.

Gabe kept telling me to pace myself.

All my passion could get used up like a dried sponge sooner rather than later.

He spoke from experience. Leading the chayot and helping the humans took its toll on my boyfriend.

Keeping the peace between vampires and other magical creatures as well as non-magical humans was a full-time job-and-a-half.

I didn't envy him one bit.

But as I sat at a desk in the basement, waiting for Sera to wake up, I thought a lot of it had to do with the job itself.

I was shaping and molding young minds while Gabe was wrangling rogue vampires and cleaning up magical messes.

I sighed, happy I could spend time in Sharra at the academy though I also enjoyed hunting for new students whenever necessary and working weekends at Bertilini's. The Italian restaurant was in the human realm and they would be lost without me.

It was also good to spend time with Gabe.

We'd been together a while, longer than Dorian and Snow, but Gabe hadn't hinted at a proposal.

Not that I cared.

At least, not that much.

I loved him, and he loved me. It was enough for now.

I checked my watch. Sera was still asleep, and I needed to be here when she woke. I ended up calling Bertilini's and getting someone to cover my shift.

I also canceled on Gabe. He was acting weird anyway.

At the moment, Sera was lying on a single bed in a cell, the bars and walls shielded by magic so she couldn't bust out when she did wake.

The bars and cells were a regrettable necessity. I didn't want her to be afraid. She wasn't a prisoner, per se. She was going to be a new student at the academy - if I could convince her.

Sera moaned, rubbing her head.

With the wave of my hand, I paused the pen I was using to do my lesson and stood, taking a deep breath.

Over the years since Snow officially took over the Seven Magics Academy, I found myself in this position many times.

She sat up, rubbing her head. "Where am I?" Her voice was soft but dangerous.

I would bet my right hand she was descended from trolls. Don't ask about the logistics of that. I didn't want to know. Nor did I want to think about it. Weirdly, it was more common than one might believe. Some humans were willing to try anything, including a smelly troll.

"You're in the basement of the Seven Magics Academy, a school for supernatural kids like you," I said, resting my hands on my hips.

She noticed the bars, and her eyes widened. "Why am I locked up?"

"It's okay. They are there to protect you." I stepped closer, getting a whiff of her. The girl needed a shower.

She stood, her hands flailing magic from her body.

Her golden brown magic smacked into the magical shield that surrounded her compartment. The safeguard was useful for a couple of reasons.

The first, it kept me safe. And the second. It gave me an idea of what kind of magic the person possessed.

Sera was descended from trolls, although the golden hue was a surprise.

As her magic melded harmlessly into the enchantment around the cell, she let out a scream of frustration. "Let me out of here!"

"I will. As soon as you have a seat and listen to what I have to say." I kept my voice calm in the hope she would compose herself.

It didn't work.

"I will kill you if you don't let me go." She went to the bars and tried to grab hold, but the magic there shocked her, and she flinched.

"Ouch! Damn, that hurt!" She shook out her hands in frustration, stepping back.

I wanted to stoop to her level and tell her she was acting like a whiny bitch.

Instead, I took a deep breath before heading back to the desk and sat in my chair.

"I swear, I'll rip your eyes from their sockets and douse them in oil before setting them on fire!"

She paused a moment and then growled.

"I'll tear your limbs from your body and beat you with them until you're dead," she continued, stomping around, throwing things with her magic and her hands. Making a mess out of the room.

ALTERED WITH MAGIC

I IGNORED Sera and went back to my lessons.

Monday would be the first day of the new year at the academy.

Even with Sera yelling like a crazy person, I couldn't stifle my excitement.

I always looked forward to the opening ceremony.

Abernathy presented me with an orb, which allowed me to see which house the new students belonged in.

Sometimes I wondered whether I should use the orb on myself to discover which house I belonged to, but I was too chicken.

In A Study on Charms, I would teach the class how to select an object suitable for a magical charm.

It was a serious process choosing and preparing a charm before it was altered with magic. Charms worked best when paired with the person's magic, and that's why we had the opening ceremony.

A student with fairy ancestry would have better luck creating emotional charms, like love, while a witch with troll magic would excel at offensive or defensive charms.

Witches with elven magic could produce amazing luck charms.

Of course, my students could try to make charms from magics that weren't from their heritage.

Some might even turn out well.

Supernaturals could draw from other magics once they learned how, but they were always most powerful using their own.

Still, it wouldn't be a beginner class if at least half the students didn't create a charm hoping it would bring them love. The charm rarely worked.

The other class I taught on Mondays was An Introduction to Spells.

I would teach them a simple binding spell.

The newbie witches would hopefully leave class knowing how to tie their shoes without using their hands.

On Tuesday, I would instruct the intermediate -

"Hey," Sera shouted.

I steeled myself and glanced up. "Are you ready to listen, or do you still intend to continue your tantrum?"

She slumped onto the edge of the bed, her arms crossed, and she was breathing heavily. "What?" she sneered.

I pulled my chair over so I could sit in front of her. "My name is Cindy Croswell, but you may call me Miss Croswell." I paused, waiting to see if she would respond.

She nodded.

Good enough.

"I'm a teacher at the Seven Magics Academy, which is where we are." I looked around the room. "Well, right now we are below it, but close enough."

"Why am I here?" she asked quietly.

"You possess magic." I debated whether to tell her about her heritage but thought better of it.

That could wait until the opening ceremony.

"Didn't you wonder how you were able to injure that boy when he tried to hurt you, or fling my friend across the alley?"

She glanced down at her hands. "I have magic?" she asked in wonder.

"Yes. By the looks of it, very powerful magic."

"But that would make me one of those supernaturals I've seen on the news. They're against the law. I'm against the law." She began to breathe heavily, and her face crumpled like she would cry.

"You are a supernatural, and while you might be against the law in the human realm, you are no longer there." I smiled. "You are in Sharra, and you are safe. Here at the Seven Magics Academy, we will teach you how to use your magic."

"I'm not on Earth? Are you an alien? Are you going to probe me?" She stood and came closer, studying me as though looking for something otherworldly.

I closed my eyes so I wouldn't roll them. Just about every magical hybrid who came here asked the same type of question. "You are still on Earth," I said, opening my eyes. "Just in a different realm. And no, I am not going to probe you. That's gross." I gave her a wry smile, hoping to dispel some of the tension.

Sera smiled too. "Good."

She went back and sat on the bed. Her face fell. "I didn't mean to hurt Bucky so bad. I just wanted him to get off me." Her voice was soft, and she was once again looking at her hands.

"Hey," I said tenderly. "I get it. No judgment here. That guy was an asshole for doing what he did. You protected yourself. A little too strongly, but still, it's what I would've done."

I clasped my hands together and rested my elbows on my thighs. "You did good, and now you're here, I can show you how to control your magic so you can do better."

"Okay." There was still fight in her, but she was ready to talk and listen. I could work with that.

I went over and picked up my paper and pen. I needed to get as much information about her as possible.

"Let's start at the beginning," I said.

IN THE MIDDLE of questioning Sera, the heavy door creaked open.

I glanced over my shoulder, wondering who it could be at this hour.

Snow and Coco, whose real name was Pocahontas, entered.

Both women were vampires, and both of them were exquisitely beautiful.

Snow wore a black dress covered in blood-red lace.

It was tight in the bodice, causing the long skirt to flare out. Since becoming the vampire queen, she went from a total tomboy to always dressed to the nines.

A small crown covered in diamonds and rubies adorned her head.

Coco wore a dress similar to Snow's in style, but it was midnight blue, the color of her eyes. Her black hair was short against her head, accentuating her strong jawline and red lips.

"Snow. Coco." I closed my notebook and sent it back over to my desk with magic while I made my way over.

"Has our new friend spoken yet?" Coco asked, looking over my shoulder at Sera.

"She has, and I believe, after a few more questions and tests, she'll be ready to join the rest of the students for Monday's classes."

As I spoke, I hugged Snow.

Queen or not, she was still my best friend.

Coco and I weren't necessarily friends, but only because we hardly knew each other.

"Good." Coco crossed her arms, lifting her chin.

"Want to introduce us?" Snow asked.

I walked over to the cell, Snow, and Coco following.

Sera looked frightened, and I could understand why.

Vampires were intimidating by nature.

Something about them oozed terror.

"It's okay," I said, holding out my hands. "This is Snow White, Queen of the Vampires and ruler of all supernaturals." I stepped aside, pointing at Snow.

Snow smiled and went toward the cell. "It's lovely to meet you, Sera."

Sera swallowed and tried to smile, but I sensed her fear.

"And this is Coco Redding. She's the headmistress of SMA." I pointed to Coco.

She flashed a bright smile, showing off all of her sharp, white teeth. "Welcome to the Seven Magics Academy, Sera. Please call me Ms. Redding."

"Hello," Sera said quietly. "It's nice to meet you both." She kept looking at me and then back at them.

If I didn't know them, I would find them intimidating as well.

"We're glad you're here. Tomorrow, Ms. Redding will introduce you to your roommates and get you set up with uniforms and books for your classes." Snow's smile got bigger. "The school is a wonderful place to hone your craft and make life-long friends."

Snow glanced at Coco and me before continuing, "We're more like a family than a typical student body, and we hope you'll feel comfortable enough to seek one of us out if you have a question or need anything."

"I'll be by tomorrow afternoon to collect you," Coco said, her lips forming a tight line. It was apparent she wasn't as ready for Sera to be released as Snow and me.

"Okay," Sera said, wringing her hands. "Thank you," she added belatedly when Snow and Coco moved back over to the exit.

Before Snow left, she glanced at me and whispered, "Are we still on for dinner tomorrow evening? There's something I need to discuss with you."

"Wouldn't miss it," I said, hugging her again.

Our Sunday dinners were the best. It was the only time we got the chance to talk extensively.

When they were gone, I went back over to Sera. "Let me go over the details for tomorrow and Monday, and then we can get you cleaned up and presentable before I do a few more tests."

LUMIA

BY THE TIME Coco came by to get Sera on Sunday, the girl was more than ready to get out of the basement, and I couldn't blame her.

More than once, I had to leave her down there alone.

Each time I returned, she looked frazzled, though she was no longer dirty.

She donned some of my clothes, including a faded pair of jeans and a blue sweatshirt with Merde across the front as well as some shoes and socks.

I'd used magic to clean her up.

Beneath the multiple layers of grime, she had long, red naturally curly hair, azure blue eyes, and light, freckled skin.

"Let me know if you need anything," I said as she followed after Coco.

Sera nodded, still slightly nervous. "I will. Thanks."

When she was gone, I stayed and tidied up the cell, then finished my lessons for the week. By the time I was done, I had to rush to meet Snow for dinner.

Snow wrinkled her nose when she opened the door. "I didn't think you were going to make it." She hugged me, and I hugged her back.

"Wouldn't miss dinner with the queen." A quick glance around the finely decorated dining hall revealed Dorian was there, as well as a little girl. She had black wings on her back and was so cherubic, it hurt a little to look at her. "Hello, Dorian," I said, going over.

"Welcome," he said, taking my hand.

"Who's this?" I asked, curious about the girl. She must be another supernatural, but what kind?

Over the years, I'd met gargoyles, fairies, and a dragon hybrid, but none of them had wings in human form the way this girl did.

"I'm Jasmine," she said, standing on the chair, so we were the same height. "What's your name?" Her eyes were the loveliest shade of lavender, and as she looked at me, I thought she might be able to see all the way into my soul.

"Cindy," I replied, taking her small, outstretched hand.

At her touch, a jolt of magic zinged through me like nothing before.

The girl seemed to possess more power than any other person, including Snow, who had been the Seal.

"It's lovely to meet you," Jasmine said.

"And you," I replied, awed. She appeared to be no more than three or four, but she spoke and acted much older.

"Have a seat." Snow indicated the chair across from Jasmine, and to the right of her chair at the head of the table.

I sat as did Snow. For the next several minutes, a flurry of worker vampires brought in our food. Once everything was placed on the table and the glasses filled, the workers left, and we were able to eat and talk in peace.

I was hungrier than I thought and dove in. The roasted chicken with fingerling potatoes, onions, and carrots covered in gravy were delicious.

Jasmine gave me a quizzical look. She hadn't touched her food.

"Mommy, is this your best friend?"

That sent my chewing to a halt, and I swallowed. "Mommy?" I looked from the girl to Snow. "Did you adopt her?"

"Well, not exactly. It's an interesting stor - " The door to the dining hall flung open.

"I'm sorry to interrupt," Coco said. "But, I could use Cindy's assistance." Her brows furrowed. "You seem to have a connection with Sera, and there's a problem."

"Oh?"

"It's after curfew, and she and some other students are out in the forest behind the stables." Her lips pinched together. "Perhaps I wasn't clear on the rules, but I think it would be best if you spoke with them instead of me."

"Sure." I set down my fork.

"Do you want me to come with you?" Snow asked.

I shook my head. "Stay with your family. I'll handle it." I rose, glancing at Jasmine and Dorian, who smiled kindly. The man put up with me because of my friendship with Snow, but we weren't ever really close.

"You positive?" Snow asked, even though it was apparent she wanted to stay.

"If I can't handle it, I'll let you know."

"Thanks, Cin." Snow smiled gratefully.

I placed my napkin on the table beside my plate and went over to Coco. "Lead the way."

I followed Coco down the hall, passing a plethora of rooms, and then down a winding set of stairs inside one of the towers.

At the bottom, we went through the kitchens and out the back door.

Darkness overtook me, and I paused.

Unlike Coco, I couldn't see in the dark without help.

"Lumia," I whispered, and a ball of light appeared, lighting the way.

Coco was already farther down the path than I expected, and I quickened my pace until I was beside her.

"Where are they?" I asked, doing my best to contain my unease.

"Back this way. I saw magic lighting the night on my way back from my ride." She sped up, and I jogged beside her to keep up with her long legs.

I touched Coco's arm. "Don't worry. I know where I'm going now. Go ahead and get the things done you need to. Tomorrow is your busiest day of the year."

She stopped. "Excellent. Thank you, Miss Croswell. Cindy." A wisp of a smile formed on her lips.

"Course."

"Will you let me know what was going on when you finish up?" Coco asked.

"Yes, I'll meet you in your office when I'm finished."

"I would appreciate that." She turned and went back the way we came.

I made my way to the barn before skirting around it and coming to the back. I searched for a moment to find them.

They were beyond the barn and inside the forest.

Candles were lit in a seven-pointed star, and seven students sat inside, around a fire.

"Merde." I extinguished my light and headed toward them.

They were chanting something.

Even without hearing what they said, I knew this magic was more substantial and more complex than any taught at the school.

The very air crackled with power.

As I came closer, I saw Sera was in charge of the group.

That surprised me.

It had only been a few hours since she was introduced to her roommates.

Apparently, she knew more about her magic than she first let on.

My worry turned to panic.

What was she doing?

As soon as I entered the forest, Sera looked up.

Flames from the fire danced in her eyes, and her cruel expression changed to surprise. "She's here," Sera said. "Just like I promised."

The others, all of them looking terrified, turned.

When they saw me, they looked like they wanted to run but couldn't.

"It's going to be okay," I said delicately.

Then to Sera, "What are you doing?"

A look of panic crossed Sera's face before her eyes rolled back inside her head, and they were replaced with twin pools of red, like blood.

"Sera isn't here right now," she said, and my light was extinguished. "I am Mizrabel, a sorceress from the land of Polonias. With her longing for friends and for power, this child was easy to coerce into wakening me. Now everyone in the land will pay, especially you. If you dare, come for me, and we will see who is meant to rule the land." The voice, which sounded nothing like Sera's, cackled and was gone.

The fire went out, and we were immediately bathed in darkness.

"Lumia," I said again.

Around me, the students were crying or whispering nervously.

Sera moaned, her knees buckling as she began to fall forward.

"Deleria soproth," I said fiercely to stop Sera from tumbling into the hot embers of the snuffed out fire.

"We're so sorry," Kaylan said from my right.

"We didn't know this would happen, Miss Croswell. We thought this was just going to be a fun seance," Kimberly added.

I gave them a stern look. "It's after curfew. Get back to your rooms. We will talk about this later." I worked to keep my voice steady, though concern built a well in my stomach, making me sick.

The kids scattered, hurrying back in the direction of the dormitories.

Sera tried to move, but I continued to hold her with my magic.

"I didn't know this would happen," she said. "I swear."

I gritted my teeth. "Let's go. We'll discuss it in Ms. Redding's office." I released her before taking her by the arm.

We walked back to the castle, which Snow turned into the Seven Magics Academy, and straight to Coco's office.

When we entered, a look of relief crossed Ms. Redding's face, but it lasted only moments.

"What is it?" she asked.

"Sit," I ordered Sera.

When the girl was situated, I sat as well, but stayed on the edge of my chair, in case she or this Mizrabel tried anything again.

"It seems Sera here was coerced by a sorceress called Mizrabel to perform a seance and waken her." I turned to Sera.

"Start from the beginning and tell us what happened," I said.

The girl nodded, her teeth chattering. "Ms. Redding introduced me to my roommates, Kaylan, Kimberly, and the others. Kaylan and Kimberly are really nice. We got to talking about spells and being a witch. They were bragging about what they could do, and I felt stupid."

Her hands clenched together in fists. "The last week or so, I've heard Mizrabel's voice in my head, telling me to do things, and so I told Kaylan and Kimberly about it. They said we should do a seance and that I would have to lead since she was in my head. They got some of their friends together, and we went into the forest."

She swallowed. "You saw the rest."

I shook my head. "Why didn't you tell me about the voice when you first arrived yesterday?"

Tears filled her eyes. It was apparent she was really sorry. "I was embarrassed and thought it was nothing."

"It's obviously something," Coco said stiffly.

Sera nodded. "I know that now, and I apologize."

I took a tissue from Coco's desk and handed it to the sniffling girl. "Is there anything else you've neglected to share with us?"

"No." She blew her nose. "I promise you know everything I do."

"Very well, but there must be a consequence for your actions tonight," Coco said.

Sera hung her head. "I understand."

"You will write a two-page paper on the reasons why what you did was a bad idea."

"Okay." Relief filled Sera's eyes.

"Have it finished and bring it to me by tomorrow night. Understood?" Coco looked down her nose at the girl. She was really good at looking the part of the headmistress.

"Yes, ma'am."

"Good, now get back to your room. Do not stop for any reason whatsoever, or I'll add to your consequences." Coco gave the girl a tight smile. "Goodnight, Sera Coggs."

Sera left, and I looked at Coco. "Do you think she's telling the truth?" I asked.

Coco raised her eyebrows. "Let us hope," she replied.

SAVED ME DESSERT

CURFEW WAS eight o'clock during the school year.

Students didn't have to be in bed, but they did have to be on their floor.

With vampires and other predatory supernaturals roaming the land of Sharra and the castle, it was a precaution most students adhered to.

As I made my way back up to Snow's floor, I thought about what Mizrabel said.

She dared me to go after her.

Why? Who was I to her?

The words shook me, though. No doubt about it. I needed to discuss what happened with Snow.

The worker vampire known as Dina opened the door leading to Snow's floor. "Thank you," I said, my thoughts still on Sera and Mizrabel, and I shook my head.

Something about Sera wasn't quite right, but I didn't know why I felt that way. I would keep an eye on her.

Snow closed one of the doors, standing in the hall.

"Hey," I called, waving.

She put a finger to her lips. "Hey," she said in a whisper.

That's when I remembered Jasmine.

Snow and I had a lot to talk about.

"I was just on my way to find you. What happened? Anything I need to be concerned about?" She took my hand.

"Yes. Can we go somewhere to talk?" I studied Snow's strange eyes.

They were changed from blue to grayish lavender since she'd become the Seal.

We talked at length about whether she was still the Seal or not.

The amulet did what it was meant to do, so it stood to reason the Seal's power was gone. There was no way to know for sure without talking to the Unknowns, but we had no way to find them.

Snow led me into their living room. "Have a seat. Are you hungry?"

Dessert sounded wonderful, but I didn't need it. "No, I'm fine."

Snow poured herself some blood into a golden goblet and came to sit beside me. "What happened?"

I told her about Polonias and Mizrabel and all that transpired with Sera. "I believe the girl didn't mean to wake the sorceress or the peoples of the land, but that doesn't change the fact the deed is done, and I'm not sure what to do about it."

Snow watched me, sipping from her glass, her features twisted in an unreadable expression.

"How about I help you research Polonias and Mizrabel? We can check the books now if you want," she said, lifting a hopeful brow.

I shook my head. "I do want your help, but not tonight. I'm tired, and we have a big day tomorrow."

"Alright." Snow squeezed my hand. "Yes, the house ritual is always interesting, isn't it?" She gave me a wry smile.

"That it is." I glanced over to the dining table. "You saved me dessert, didn't you?"

"Of course I did." Snow rose and went over, lifting the cover and grabbing me a napkin, fork, and the little china plate with a delectable cake atop it. "Here you go." She handed it to me.

"You know me too well," I said, taking it from her.

"I should hope so. We've been friends a very long time."

"Since I saved you from the apple," I said, and smiled, before shoving a piece of cake in my mouth.

Snow returned to her spot and picked up her glass. "It was the beginning of a beautiful friendship.

"Amen," I said, swallowing. "Now, tell me all about Jasmine." I cut another forkful but didn't eat it yet. "Where did she come from? What is she? Who is she? Tell me everything."

AFTER A LONG DAY, I went to my room, changed into my periwinkle PJs, and climbed under the covers.

My room at the academy was on the floor below Snow's.

As I lay in bed, I pondered all Snow told me. I couldn't believe she had a daughter, and the girl was an original vampire. We also discussed the Unknowns and what they had to do with us, but we really knew very little about them.

My bedside table lamp still glimmered, casting shadows.

I took a deep breath, trying to calm my mind.

Opening ceremonies were in the morning, and I needed to be up early.

"Diminius." The light went out.

I tucked my sheet and comforter under my chin, the way I liked and was about to close my eyes when a tiny red light flicked on above my head.

"What the hell?" Startled, I sat up and scooted toward my headboard. The light grew bigger and bigger. As it grew, it moved toward the foot of my bed.

An irritated female voice spoke. "Cinderella, it's time. Magic has awakened us from our slumber, and Polonias is in danger. The land needs you. All of our realm's inhabitants need you."

She sneezed. And the rosy light became the outline of a woman who appeared to be around my age with brown hair and very eclectic taste in clothing.

Without thinking, I pulled the comforter up past my nose.

"Revealith," I whispered, hoping the magic would show me what she really was.

My first thought was Mizrabel, but she didn't sound like the sorceress.

"Tut-tut," she quipped, then sneezed again.

"Knock it off with the magic. I'm allergic."

That made me laugh. "You're allergic to magic?" She reeked of it. How could she be allergic to something she so obviously possessed.

"Well, yes. No need to be rude, Cinderella." With her wand, she tapped on the light blue lampshade next to my bed, and it illuminated.

I choked back more laughter, no longer the least bit frightened. "Sorry. By the way, my name is Cindy, not Cinderella." I only sounded a little put out by her using my full name.

"It isn't?" A book appeared in her hands, and she flipped through the pages, sending sparkles of magic into the air. "Yes. It's right here. Cinderella. Plain as day."

I blinked back my irritation. "I don't care what your book says, my name is Cindy."

"Fine." The light around her dimmed, and the book vanished as her feet dropped lightly to my carpet.

I let the comforter fall slightly.

She was obviously some kind of witch, like me, and there didn't seem to be anything malevolent about her.

She smoothed out her outlandish bright green dress.

The sleeveless bodice sparkled with different colored gems, and the tulle skirt pooled out around her like an overabundant tutu.

Her legs were covered in black and lime green striped stockings and surprisingly conservative black heels.

The woman was around my height, and atop her curly brown hair sat a green and black hat, not pointed, but fluffy, like an old-fashioned artist's beret.

At the front rested a lovely gold and lime-colored butterfly. It looked real, and I wanted to reach out and touch it.

Her eyelashes were lined in green jewels that matched her eyes.

"What are you doing in my room?" I asked as I watched her reorganize herself.

She sniffed but said nothing, then stuck her hands out to the side like she intended to walk on a tight rope before jumping into the air.

I worked to keep a straight face.

When she came back down, her feet landed on the carpet with a thud.

"Twixit," she said, jumping up into the air twice more.

Each time, her feet returned to the ground with an increasingly loud thud.

She glanced at me from under her long, bejeweled lashes and jumped a third time.

"Oh, for the love of butterflies!" She stomped around in a circle and pulled at her thickly fluffed skirt. The funky black and green hat on her head danced around precariously.

I thought it would fall off, but it didn't.

"Is there something I can help you with?" I asked, trying to contain my giggles. Maybe I was dreaming.

FAIRY GODMOTHER

SHE HUFFED AND SAID SOMETHING, but I couldn't understand with her back to me.

I watched her shoulders rise and fall.

Then she turned.

"I'm Quilla Templeton. Your fairy godmother. Maybe you remember me?" She stuck out a hand wrapped in a fingerless glove.

I got on my knees and moved toward the edge of the bed. "Um, Quilla, is it?"

She nodded, blowing her bangs off her forehead. "Yes."

I took her hand. "I'm much too old to need a fairy godmother, and you seem too young to be one."

She rolled her eyes. "It's a title, Cinderella." Her cheeks reddened. "And I'm older than I look. We fairies age at a much slower rate than humans." She stepped back.

"If you're a fairy, where are your wings?" I didn't mean to sound presumptuous, but fairies were supposed to have them.

That much I knew.

Her cheeks got even redder. "Well, aren't you just a tactless bundle of appallingly bad manners?" She crossed her arms.

I didn't see a need to respond to that.

"A mean and awful fairy by the name of Tinkerbell used magic to steal my wings." Tears filled Quilla's eyes. "I haven't been able to get them back."

"Is that why you can't fly?" I asked, sitting on the edge of my bed. I figured that was the reason she was jumping around a few moments ago.

Quilla let out a squeal, stomped around in another circle, and then stopped when she faced me. "I can fly just fine. Maybe not with my beautiful wings, but I have the capability nonetheless."

I leaned back, realizing we weren't getting anywhere by arguing like this. "Why are you here?" I asked, trying for the blunt approach.

She glanced at the ceiling. "A roof," she said quickly.

Confusion rolled over me, and I decided to try again. "Yeah?"

"Right. Yes." Still preoccupied, she snapped her fingers and sneezed. "Our land has been asleep for a thousand years, but someone used a spell to wake us, and that's why I'm here." Her face became serious. "It's your magic that will save the land of Polonias and all of its people."

The words sounded rehearsed. I wasn't buying it. "Right. And you've got some great mountaintop property to sell me in Florida, too. Am I right?" I winked, crossing my arms, working to stay calm. Quilla wasn't wicked that I could tell, but she was annoying as hell and must have exceedingly strong magic to get past the protective barriers placed around the castle.

Her hands dropped to her sides. "Florida? No. I don't even know what that means." She shook her head. "Stop talking and listen."

I shrugged. "Bossing me isn't helping any."

She glared. "May I speak? Or are you going to interrupt me again?"

"Continue," I said, sarcastic, crossing my legs and resting my elbows on them.

She put her hands on her hips. "Polonias is a land created by magic. It's connected to this realm but resides on a different plane. It's elsewhere if you catch my meaning." She looked at me, hopefully.

"I have no idea what you're saying." After Snow freed all supernaturals, it was her magic, along with the magics of others, that created the other realms, but Polonias wasn't one of them.

For some reason this witch or whoever was lying to me - about a lot of things.

"Ugh, this is ridiculous. The Croswells should be ashamed of themselves. They were supposed to tell you the truth when you received The Eye of Abernathy." Quilla gave me a pointed look. "You've never heard of Polonias?"

Occasionally, since receiving the spellbook, I saw things. They came mostly at night and didn't make sense, so I ignored them. "Maybe a dream or two of another place, though I didn't know its name," I said.

"That's Polonias, I'm sure of it. King Loyalor sent me to find you and bring you back." She walked over to my bookshelves, retrieved a book, and turned it over. She blew on it, and dust sailed into the air. I braced myself, but this time she didn't sneeze.

"Why me? I've never heard of Polonias, been to Polonias, or known a single thing about Polonias. Why would I be the person to save it? Sounds like a bunch of bull."

She gasped. "It. Is. Not. Bull," she enunciated. "It may sound odd, but it's true. You and you alone possess the keys necessary to save our land."

I snorted, feigning disgust. But Mizrabel had mentioned the land to me as well.

She said it belonged to her.

People with power were idiots except for Snow.

"Don't snort at me. It's very unladylike." She shoved the book back in its place and stomped over. Leaned down, so our faces were aligned. "Are you going to help us or not, Cinderella?"

I leaned in until her nose touched mine. "No."

She sucked in a breath. Pulled back and rubbed her nose with her hand. "Well, that's just unacceptable!" she sputtered and threw her hands in the air.

Glitter shot from her fingertips, filling the room, and she sneezed.

"People will die, Cinderella! Lots of people. And fairies, water sprites, and gnomes. They'll die too." She was out of control, flitting everywhere at once. "Do you want that on your conscience?"

I didn't want anyone's death on my conscience, but I didn't believe she was serious for one second.

And the way the butterfly danced atop her head made me take her even less seriously.

She stopped suddenly and looked at me. "You're a disappointment!" Then, with a quick lightning crackle and a sneeze, she vanished.

My light flickered off, and I was alone.

Timidly, in case she came back, I made my way back under my covers, tucked them to my chin, and thought and thought and thought about what the hell had just happened.

Mostly I believed Quilla Templeton was a nuisance fairy sent to me as a prank by one of the advanced students.

Still, a tiny speck in my brain wondered if she was telling the truth.

Time passed, and the speck got bigger until I decided to talk to Professor Pops about it.

Maybe he would know something about Polonias.

Eventually, I fell into a fitful sleep and dreamed.

I stood in the middle of a misty meadow.

It was dark except for a pink moon hanging against the gray-violet sky.

Gigantic black trees surrounded me.

But it was silent. Still.

The tall grasses didn't swish and tickle my bare legs.

Not a single leaf rustled.

There wasn't a breeze or even the tiniest sound of insects.

Only my breathing.

But I sensed someone was out there, just beyond the tree line.

Watching me.

Waiting for something.

Or maybe he was stalking me, and I was his prey.

I didn't know.

A figure stepped forward.

Dark.

Solitary.

My breath hitched as my pulse picked up speed.

I knew I should run, but my feet were planted to their spot.

Like the tall grasses, I was stuck still, unable to uproot myself.

Five feet away, the figure stopped.

I strained to catch a glimpse.

Arms reached out, grasping as though to touch me, but couldn't.

A male voice whispered, "Come, Cinderella. I need you."

INTRODUCTIONS

AFTER BREAKFAST, opening ceremonies for the academy took place in the grand ballroom.

Since the academy only officially existed for a few years, there were fifty-five students in varying classes.

All of them came from the human realm, and they all possessed at least one of the seven magics.

Two students could change into werewolves, and one was a werecat.

There were three vampires and a plethora of witches. There were also several varieties of other magical creatures, including a half-troll, and a few half-elves.

A rag-tag group, to be sure, but still, it was a start.

Coco, Professor Pops, and Snow went out of their way to find great teachers. There was a teacher from each of the seven magics as well as others, like me, for a total of fifteen instructors.

Some were only part-time, including Professor Pops, Snow, and Heathcliff, while the rest of us taught permanently.

The other adults were already on stage, and I hurried to make my way up.

The grand ballroom was decorated to go with this year's school theme. Signs glowing in varying shades of blue - the elf house color - read BELIEVE IN YOURSELF.

Little pixilettes buzzed around in the air, writing the word believe in sparkles, so from up on the stand, it looked like the room rained blue glitter. The kids oohed and aahed, enjoying the theatrics.

The curtains were a midnight shade while the chandeliers gave off a bluish hue. The chairs were wrapped in navy blue, and the walls sparkled with sky-blue paint.

It was a little over the top - okay a lot.

Jaxon, the school's president and head of the activities committee, really outdid himself. His magic came from the elves, and they were known for their extravagant natures.

The ballroom was a testament to that.

As I took my seat on the end, I smiled at the electric excitement in the air.

"You ready for this?" Eldrick asked. He taught elven magic, which included the ability to see into the future and the past.

In the human realm, a select few people had used a portion of the seven magics for years. Those who called themselves psychics or fortune-tellers (at least the real ones) possessed elven magic.

"Definitely. You?" I returned, getting comfortable in my seat.

"Why not?" He clasped his hands together, and I smiled.

Eldrick was tall and on the willowy side, but he was handsome with silver hair and bright green eyes that gave him a timeless look.

It was hard to know whether he was twenty or twenty-five hundred.

Next to him sat Jordan. He taught the supernatural creatures classes.

The man was short and thick with a beard that nearly touched the floor.

Beside him was Heathcliff.

When he could, he taught potions, but I had a feeling he would have to be replaced soon. His secretive job in Demonland kept him overly busy.

Next came Kenmei.

He was an interesting fellow of Asian descent who taught about dragons and their magic.

Then sat Professor Pops, who taught about a vampire hunter's magic.

When Snow defeated Sharra, she released all magical creatures, and so, since there were still vampire hunters in the world, including Christopher, we felt it necessary to educate the children about what they could do.

Sitting next to Pops was Dorian.

He taught weapons training and was, by far, everyone's favorite teacher.

The girls loved him because he was dreamy.

The guys liked that he showed them how to kick ass.

Snow was beside him.

When she had time, she gave lectures on vampires, sharing about the difference between human-made vampires and originals.

After last night, I understood why.

At some point, Jasmine would attend this school, and she was an original, though she didn't look like Sharra or Silindra.

She wasn't covered in fur like they were at one time.

On the other side of Snow was Coco.

As the headmistress, she made sure everything ran smoothly, and school life was kept in order. She did a great job, and I didn't envy her one bit.

The school kept her busy twenty-four-seven.

Beside Coco sat Tori.

As a full-blooded troll, she could be a little scary. Standing more than seven feet tall, she towered over everyone and had to duck when entering a room.

She was also extremely kind and kept herself looking as lovely as could be expected for a troll. I would go so far as to say she was pretty, especially on the inside.

Fenn was seated beside her. She was a fairy. Her straw-colored hair and pink skin made her stand out almost as much as Tori.

The two of them couldn't look more different, but they were best friends.

Sierra taught about unicorns. Supposedly her ancestors were gifted their healing magic. She had the journals to prove it, so no one doubted her.

She looked a little like a wild mustang. Her brown hair was long and thick and went everywhere, not to mention her oversized teeth. Her smile took up her whole face.

Beside her was Bastille. He taught ancient languages. With gray hair and dark skin, he reminded me of what an old wise man might look like. He was friendly and easy-going.

Lance and Amelia were floaters and taught whenever Snow, Professor Pops, or Heathcliff couldn't. They were both vampires and mostly kept to themselves.

I personally thought they were having a passionate affair, but I wasn't around them enough to know for certain.

Along the edges of the room sat dozens of worker vampires. They barely moved, looking like beautiful female statues.

Though Snow had released them after defeating Sharra and the vampires were free to go and do as they pleased, most chose to stay.

So many centuries of serving Sharra robbed them of much of their free will.

They didn't do much unless Snow or Coco asked them to.

After several minutes, Coco stood and held up her hands, asking the students to quiet down. Once the room settled, Coco introduced all of the teachers.

"Now, as many of you know," she continued. "At the beginning of each school year, we have the opening ceremony to welcome everyone."

Everyone clapped and cheered.

One of the male students, a boy name Casper, shouted, "Go Rams!" Apparently, they were his favorite football team.

Casper was a vampire.

Unusually, he was born of a human woman, but his father was a vampire, so he was sired, not turned.

He drank blood but could eat food as well.

He also possessed all other traits of vampires as well as the ability to walk through walls.

Some people laughed at his words. Others booed.

"Quiet down, please," Coco said, clapping her hands together, making a loud crack.

A vibrating hush settled over the room.

"We have some new students this year. As is the custom, we are going to bring each student forward. Cindy will use magic and the obsidian stone to draw some blood. As it rises into the air, it will turn different colors. Whatever color it becomes will tell us from which magic your power comes, and that will determine where your focus of study will be."

The crowd applauded.

OceanofPDF.com

EXTREMELY RARE

BUT THE FOUR new students looked worried, including Sera. As humans, they were taught early when you bled, it was usually associated with pain.

I hopped down from the stage and came to stand in the center of the room. "Delilah, please step forward." She was small in stature, probably under five feet.

Snow and I had found her a few weeks ago, hiding under a bridge in Rock Springs, Wyoming.

Her knees quaked as she came forward.

She was a vampire, which automatically meant she belonged in the vampire house, but when it came to studies, it was good to verify. Since the originals were created with all seven magics, their own included, they usually had one magic that was more prominent than the others. "It's going to be fine. I promise."

She nodded, but I could tell she didn't believe me.

Not that I blamed her.

Trust was earned, and we didn't know each other very well.

"Hold out your hand, palm facing up."

She swallowed, so loud I heard it, but she did as I said.

I reached into the pocket of my cobalt maxi dress and took out the obsidian orb.

It was a curious object pulsating with magical properties.

For all I knew, Abernathy had created it. When I'd pressed him for answers, he wouldn't give them.

Typical dragon. He didn't like sharing.

"See this?"

"Uh-huh," Delilah said, and her voice trembled.

"All that will happen is the orb will leave my hand and move to hover above yours. Please don't move, and the magic within can get a handle on yours."

She looked at me and blinked. "I will hold still, Miss Croswell," she finally said.

I spoke the words to the spell quietly to the orb before releasing it.

The orb floated from me and stopped when it drifted over to Delilah.

She flinched at its nearness but didn't move.

After several seconds, a small trail of blood came out of Delilah's palm, passing through the orb, where it lingered a few moments as though tasting her blood.

When it finished, the black orb changed to silver.

"Delilah's strongest power comes from the vampires," I said, smiling happily.

As I spoke, it changed to green. "And your secondary power comes from fairies." Fairy magic had to do with emotions, and those who were influenced by fairy magic were exceptionally kind and good.

Those with similar magics hooted and clapped.

"Did it hurt?" I asked quietly, studying her liquid brown eyes.

"Not at all," she replied, her features no longer scared, but relieved. "Thank you."

"Very good. You may go sit down with the other vampires." I took the orb and waited until she sat. "Robbie, please come up," I said.

Robbie was less nervous since the process obviously didn't hurt Delilah.

Once the orb tasted his blood, it was discovered his power came from elves - another great magic.

Sook-Yin followed the boy.

She was a small Asian-American girl with bright caramel eyes and straight black hair that rested at her chin.

The orb revealed her power came from the elves as well.

It didn't surprise me.

For all their talk of keeping their bloodlines pure, there sure were a lot of humans with elven magic.

Finally, it was Sera's turn. "Don't you already know where my magic comes from?" she asked, more nervous than the others.

"I believe so, but we will see." I whispered the spell and watched the orb do its thing.

Her blood changed the orb to brown, which meant her most potent magic came from trolls, just as I suspected.

"Sera's magic comes from the trolls," I said knowingly but stopped because the orb turned to gold. Her secondary magic came from dragons. "And apparently, there is dragon magic in your blood as well."

The orb returned to black. I glanced back at Snow. Dragon magic was very rare.

The students cheered, excited she had dragon magic.

As they did, the orb changed color again. This time to Indigo.

One of the teacher's gasped.

Unicorn magic. A first. No other student had unicorn blood.

Snow was shocked as were the other teachers, I could tell, but they worked to keep their faces serene.

I looked at Sera. "Very good. You may be seated."

"What did the final color represent?" she asked, her eyes filled with intensity.

"Unicorn," I said, biting the inside of my cheek to keep from saying more.

"Oooh. Thanks." Sera gave me a puzzled expression before heading back to her chair.

I returned to my seat, still in amazement.

She was the first supernatural I knew who possessed three magics.

Coco stood. "The original seven may be gone, but their magic lives on in us! At the Seven Magics Academy, we will teach you what it means to eat, sleep, and breathe your magic. Whether you have the heart of a fairy or the soul of a dragon. The speed of a vampire or the strength of a troll. The sight of an elf or the ability to transform as the locanis, you belong here, and we are honored to have you with us."

The room exploded with cheering and clapping.

I understood why.

The academy was a place where most of these kids would finally feel accepted.

Ms. Redding said a few more words to the student body, telling them about the rules and how the year would go.

While she talked, I mulled over what just happened with Sera.

Could Abernathy's orb be on the fritz?

It was highly unlikely.

Coco finished, excusing the students from the ballroom, telling them to meet in their homeroom classes in an hour.

From there, the kids would be given a schedule suited to their particular magic, and that would be their tract for the time they remained at the school.

When the kids were all out, Snow excused the worker vampires as well, leaving just the fifteen of us.

"Did I see that right?" Snow asked, her gaze meeting mine. "She has dragon and unicorn magic as well as troll?"

Kenmei spoke. "It isn't as unusual as one might think." He clasped his hands together lightly. "It just means she's able to conduct all three magics more thoroughly than most. Many humans haven't or aren't willing to open their chakras. As you know, there are seven on the body, and each correlates to a degree with the seven magics. Sera is probably more self-aware than most, which allows her more access to the magics within.

"But unicorn magic?" I asked, flabbergasted.

Kenmei and Snow shared a look before Snow spoke. "At the moment, that isn't important." She turned to Sierra. "It looks like you have a student who might be gifted in the ability of healing. That's exciting," she said.

Sierra wasn't as thrilled as I thought she should be. "Excellent, my queen. I look forward to instructing her."

NORMAL IS OVERRATED

FOR THE NEXT FORTY-FIVE MINUTES, we prepared the new students' schedules and adjusted some of the upper-level kids' classes.

It would be a great year, I decided, making my way over to my homeroom class.

As I went, memories of my dream of the man and my visit with Quilla kept me distracted. My so-called fairy godmother seemed almost too crazy to be real.

At the door to my class, I put all of that aside.

Taking a deep breath, I plastered a smile on my face, went in, walked past the desks, and to the front of the class.

Students talked excitedly, and I soaked in their enthusiasm.

We were on the second floor. In our first year using the castle as the academy, I spruced each room according to my mood.

In this room, I turned the walls into magical movie screens.

On them, moments in supernatural history played out.

The one now was Titan's Battle - a war between the elves and the trolls over a mountain used to study, experiment on, and explore supernatural creatures.

On the back wall played the scene where a black unicorn known as Envy had died in a cause of freedom.

The original, Silindra, kneeled beside her.

I knew the story because Snow told me.

I wanted the students to feel like they were a part of history, allowing them to see first-hand that magic wasn't all it was cracked up to be.

It was also dangerous and deadly.

"Ovangery," I whispered, and the moments froze, becoming like murals instead of movies.

A few students whined but faced me. "Good morning," I said, giving them my brightest smile.

Some moved to their seats.

"Welcome to a new year at the Seven Magics Academy," I said by way of introduction. "If you haven't already, please find a place to sit."

I went over to the large wooden desk at the front of the class and picked up a piece of chalk with the flick of my wrist.

It floated next to the board, waiting for me to tell it what to do.

The trailing students quickly obeyed.

Their focus trained on me, except for Sera.

She and one of the other students, Heather, were in a heated conversation.

I cleared my throat, and Sera stopped talking, an almost cruel smile on her lips.

Heather's hands trembled.

Whatever went on between them, I would figure it out after class.

Heather was a bright student who looked out for the underdog, which made me wonder what happened to upset her so much.

"Throughout the year, you will learn how to use your magic. The other teachers and I will do more than just teach. We will guide you, so by the time you leave the academy, you will know how to better handle the supernatural parts of yourself. You'll be able to do magic and be a thriving member of wherever you decide to live. By raise of hands, who knows how to use their magic?"

Several students sent their hands into the air, including Sera.

Interesting.

She only found out magic existed by accident.

"Sera, you know how to use your magic?" I arched one brow. Her last try had ended with the awakening of a sorceress and an unknown land.

"You know I do." She crossed her arms, leaning back in her chair.

I shook my head. "I know you have magic, but I haven't seen you use it."

Sera looked confused. "But that's how you found me, right? I did magic on the jerk who tried to hurt me and on your friend." She was pleased with herself. "Plus, the other night - "

"You chucked your magic without knowledge, like throwing a rock. You didn't use it. There was zero control." I paused, allowing her to let that information sink in. "The academy will teach you to understand the power in your possession, and you will learn to harness it instead of letting the magic use you."

Her hands balled into fists, but she nodded.

"Good."

The rest of homeroom went off without incident, and in the end, I sent the students off to their first class.

Heather was still in her seat when the others left.

When it was just the two of us, she came over to my desk, her eyes down.

I busied myself with paperwork, allowing her time to collect her thoughts.

"Miss Croswell?" she finally asked.

"What is it, Heather?" I glanced up into her worried eyes.

She glanced over at the door.

With a thought, I closed it. "We can talk in private. Does this have to do with whatever you and Sera were talking about earlier?"

She nodded.

I used my magic to bring a chair over. "Tell me about it."

"It's just - " She sat, dropping her bag on the floor.

Pushing aside my paperwork, I focused on her and waited.

"I'm - it's just - uh, this is hard." She glanced down at her hands.

"It's okay, Heather. You know you can trust me." Uneasiness crept in. What could she possibly need to tell me that had her so flustered?

"I'm transgender," she finally blurted, her features contorted with pain.

"Oh?" That was the last thing I expected her to say. Nothing to do with magic or the supernatural but a difficult challenge just the same.

Now that she started, she couldn't seem to stop. "Yeah, so I was born Robert, but when I was around ten or eleven, I started having these feelings that I was a girl. I even had dreams - night and day - of myself as female. I think it was my magic working within me back then because they were so real." She paused and looked at me.

"Go on," I said, determined to be supportive. This girl was braver than most to be willing to talk about this.

"Being in the foster care system, I was forced to wear boy clothes and keep my hair short, but when I turned fifteen, I ran away, and then you and Professor Pops found me." She smiled. "It was my chance to be who I wanted to be, which is a girl, so I told you I was a girl and that my name is Heather. Since the academy doesn't have records and do things like the human realm, it was easy."

A cloud descended over her features. "Except Sera somehow knows, and she's threatened to tell our other roommates."

Tears filled her eyes. "I know I wasn't honest, and that was wrong, but I love it here. For the first time in my life, I feel right and like I belong."

She glanced at the chalkboard, tears causing her eyes to glisten. "I understand there needs to be consequences and I'll accept whatever punishment you give me, just please don't send me away."

My pulse raced as I considered her words.

First and foremost, I couldn't imagine what her life must be like.

Feeling she was one way while those around her called her something else.

But I also needed to consider the other students.

While I knew Heather wouldn't do anything awful to her roommates (nothing happened in the last two years), her body was still that of a boy, and if anyone else found out we were allowing coed dorm rooms, things might get a bit sketchy fast.

It was also obvious what Heather was sharing with me was hard and that her feelings were tender.

Treading carefully, I tucked my hands in my lap.

"Heather, thank you for telling me. You did the right thing and I commend you for your courage." I considered my next words. "I appreciate that you feel like a girl, and I would never take that away from you. At the same time, you have boy parts, correct?"

She swallowed and nodded.

"For that reason, I will need to speak with Ms. Redding and the queen to decide the best way to handle this situation. You are an honor student, and your past actions speak highly of the kind of person you are, so whatever comes of this, know I think you're amazing and want what's best for you and all of the students."

A single tear streaked down her cheek. "I don't know why I'm so wrong." She buried her face in her hands, sobbing uncontrollably.

My heart broke.

I got out of my seat and went to her, wrapping an arm around her shoulders. After a while, I spoke. "Look at me."

She wiped at her eyes, mascara smearing down her face.

"You are not wrong," I said fiercely. "You're different, but definitely not wrong. Got it?" I went back to my seat, writing a note for her next teacher.

NOT ORDINARY

HEATHER WAS GOING to be late.

"Okay," she whispered, meeting my eyes.

"Let me talk to the instructors, and when I have an answer, I'll let you know quickly." An ache filled me at the pain and anguish she must be going through.

"Can't you use magic to change my body into a girl?" She sounded desperate, placing her hand over mine.

"There is a magic that can make you look different. They are called glamours. But the spell is only temporary. They can't help you long term." In my own studies, I came across a story or two of supernaturals changing their form. I would look into the possibility, but I didn't want to get her hopes up. "Get to class, and when I have information, I'll let you know," I said, handing her the note.

She picked up her backpack and wiped her face as she stood. It was a mess. "Thank you, Miss Croswell."

"Sure," I said, standing too. "And one more thing?"

Heather looked at me, hopeful.

"Your makeup. Want me to fix it?"

She sighed. "Yes, please." She swallowed. "Maybe you could fix me too. If I didn't feel like a girl, then everything would be fine. I would be normal." Unshed tears pressed against her lids.

"Normal is overrated," I said, my voice hoarse with emotion. "I'll do all I can to work this out, and swiftly. Try not to worry." I spoke the words to the spell I used on Snow all the time. Within moments, Heather's makeup was fresh. "There. Now off you go."

"Yes, Miss Croswell."

AFTER CLASSES, I sought out Snow, telling her about Heather.

She agreed it was a tough situation and promised to speak with Professor Pops, Coco, and Kenmei. She had an idea.

I understood some of what Heather was going through. I was feeling a little like I didn't belong as well.

The words my fairy godmother said about my Croswell heritage had me worried I wasn't who I always thought I was, either.

I needed to hear from my mom that everything was fine.

Using magic, I popped into the human realm and into the house I shared with my parents.

My dad was out of town, and my mom wasn't home.

I waited for her until midnight before leaving a note in the kitchen and falling asleep in my old room.

I dreamed again of the man.

When I woke, I was still hazy from the dream, but I showered, dressed, and applied makeup.

Presentable, my mother would say.

I walked downstairs to the smell of coffee, cinnamon, and bacon - my three favorite foods.

I wore a casual mauve dress covered in flowers and my favorite ankle boots. Appropriate school attire. I needed to hurry so I wouldn't be late for classes.

Mom was seated at the breakfast bar, looking perfect, as usual.

Her dyed blonde hair was done up in a twist. Makeup was fresh. She wore a buttery satin, short-sleeved blouse, tan skirt, and nude heels.

"Hi, Mom." I leaned in and kissed her on the cheek.

She put a piece of grapefruit in her mouth, smiled, and then gave me a once over with her hazel eyes.

"What time did you finally get in last night?" I asked, sitting beside her.

"I'm not sure," she said evasively.

I thought I detected a hint of guilt. "Your note said you needed to talk. What's up?"

"I wanted to ask you about our history."

"Oh?" She scooped up another piece of grapefruit before making a point of rolling her eyes.

She went over to the oven and took out a pan filled with enough bacon for seven.

With tongs, she took two pieces from the pan and put them on a plate, then set a muffin next to them and brought it over to me.

She slid the plate in front of me.

"Everything with our family tree is ordinary?" I asked, knowing that wasn't the right word, but unsure how to bring up what I needed to discuss.

"Why would you want to be ordinary? You aren't. Witch or not, you're a Croswell. We don't do ordinary." Her face lit up with a false smile as she nodded, asking me with her eyes to agree.

Quilla's words pummeled inside my head.

I was a Croswell, wasn't I?

My aunt possessed magic.

She gave me The Eye of Abernathy.

We had to be related, right?

The thoughts tumbled around in my mind.

Sure, all families had secrets.

But if I was adopted, well, that was a pretty big secret.

"Cindy," my mom snapped, irritated my focus wasn't entirely on her.

I met her gaze, shoving my questions away before taking a bite of bacon. "Thanks for breakfast, Mom." She hadn't prepared it.

I didn't think my mom knew how to cook toast, let alone bacon, muffins, and coffee. She left everything domestic to Nancy, our housekeeper.

My mom shook her head and laughed. "Of course." She took a sip of her coffee.

I chewed and swallowed. "I better go. I don't want to be late for class."

She made a face. "Always so busy."

"But that's good, right?" I stood, ignoring the muffin, but taking the other piece of bacon and wrapping it in a napkin.

"I suppose. I just miss you." Mom looked sad. It was hard to see her that way.

"Miss you too, Mom," I said, coming over to her for a hug.

Mom nodded but didn't lean in. "Alright. See you later," she said, missing the cue and going to the kitchen door.

"Hey, Mom?" I walked over and hugged her. Secrets or not, she still meant the world to me.

My mom patted me lightly on the back. "What's wrong?"

"Nothing," I said, squeezing her. "I - I just love you."

She sniffed. "Love you, Cindy." My mom pulled away and patted my arm before leaving the kitchen.

I took a deep breath. If she was keeping secrets from me, they wouldn't last long. I had a spell for that.

ANOTHER DAY of classes was over, and I still didn't have answers for Heather. Nor had I decided what to do about Quilla, Mizrabel, my weird dreams, and Sera.

Worries were piling up like stacked marbles.

One false move and everything would come tumbling down.

Snow left word that until we figured out the situation, Heather would have her own room. I didn't want the girl to feel ostracized, though, and hoped we could speedily come to a resolution. Snow also reminded me to talk to Pops about my Polonias problem, which was why I was here.

I sent a message to Sera using magic, asking her to meet me in my office in an hour. I hoped that would be enough time to talk to Pops about the situation.

Professor Pops led me into the small room he used as an office at the academy. He closed the door, his face serious.

I sat in one of his lush leather chairs.

"How can I help you, Cindy?" He sat as well, resting his forearms on the edge of his large desk.

At once, I was nervous. "Well," I began. Why would Pops know about Polonias?

OceanofPDF.com

WHAT AM I

SURE, he'd been alive a long time and seemed to know everything about the supernatural, but perhaps I should've talked to Abernathy, the dragon, instead.

Professor Pops took his reading glasses from his sweater pocket and put them on the end of his nose.

He began going over some papers on his desk.

The longer I sat, the worse I felt.

And I wasn't sure I had a reason.

I never once saw Pops be anything but kind and beyond helpful.

Sure he was a human turned Hunter, turned kind of human again -

No, that was wrong. He was and always would be a vampire.

Nothing could change that fact.

Plus, I didn't think he wanted to change. I shifted in my seat.

Pops looked at me over the top of his glasses. "Cindy? You said you needed to talk to me. Was that true, or are you hiding from someone?"

I snorted and cleared my throat. "Have you heard of a land called Polonias?" I blurted.

He pulled off his glasses and set them on the desk, then clasped his hands together. "Perhaps. Where is this Polonias?" His bright eyes studied me, and I got the distinct impression he was testing me somehow.

I tucked my legs beneath me. "It's a land. My - " Should I say fairy godmother? He might laugh, and I wasn't in the mood to be laughed at. I decided on a different way to put her. "A woman by the name of Quilla Templeton told me about it. She said I needed to save it."

Professor Pops leaned back, resting his hands against his stomach.

"I see. And who is Quilla Templeton to you?"

Ah crap, he was going to make me say it. Out loud. "She says - " I paused, pushing some loose hair behind my ears. "She says she's my fairy godmother." I felt the color rise in my cheeks.

It was as embarrassing to say it out loud as I thought it'd be.

Pops sat up. "Okay, now we're getting somewhere."

"We are?" I asked, blinking several times.

"Yes, because now you're being honest." He picked up his glasses and put them back in his pocket. "Don't want to lose these," he said, once they were in place. "So, when did Quilla first appear to you?"

"You know wha - who she is?" I was stunned.

Did, like, all supernaturals belong to a club?

Were there secret handshakes?

Special codes?

Did Snow know about Polonias?

And why was it I always seemed to be the last person to know everything?

Pops nodded slowly. "I met Quilla before a long time ago. Yes."

"I swear." I stood and began to pace, trying to control my temper. I don't know where it came from, but like lava, it rolled out of me.

"It's okay, Cindy. I wanted to gauge how you know about Polonias, whether you dreamed it or if Quilla actually spoke to you. Now that I know, we can get down to business." His expression was amused, and it made me angrier.

"Seriously. Why didn't you tell me about this place before?" I sat back down in a huff.

"Well, my dear, because it wasn't my place to tell you. I'm surprised Quilla didn't give you more details herself."

I coughed. "Well, she's sort of upset with me. Said I'm a disappointment." I slumped back into my chair.

"Oh, I see." He studied me for several long moments until I wanted to squirm like a disobedient child under his gaze.

"What?" I finally asked.

He leaned forward. "Polonias has some similarities to Sharra, but it's different as well. It's similar in that it's connected to Earth. As you probably know, Sharra was created by the magic of a Vampire. It exists within Earth, only on a different plane." He stacked one hand on top of the other to illustrate. "Like the layers of your skin. You can only see the top layer, but we know two more layers exist. It's the same with Sharra."

"And Polonias. How is it different?"

He picked up a pencil and tapped it on his desk. "Polonias was created by magic, same as the others, but it wasn't created with Earth's magic."

Sick foreboding filled my stomach. "What are you saying?" I asked the question but was terrified of the answer. I didn't even want to comprehend what he meant.

"It gets a little complicated, but Polonias is a land you can get to from Earth, but it isn't part of Earth."

I felt my mouth fall open. Professor Pops hurried on.

"Polonias is kind of like its own world."

I tried to speak but sounded like a gasping fish. "Like aliens?" I finally asked.

"Aliens." Pops snorted. Actually snorted. I closed my mouth, frustrated.

"Those who exist on Polonias are human just as we are. Or," he shrugged. "In my case, once was. The magical creatures that dwell in Polonias are the same as the magical creatures you've seen here and in Sharra. They are part of the seven magics. But here's the cool part."

"Cool?" That wasn't the word I'd use. Freaky. Weird. Effing terrifying. Those words were a better fit.

"The seven magics are part of Earth, but they also exist everywhere. And Polonias used the magics from - "

"Stop. Holy hell. Just stop. Please." I rubbed the sides of my head. This was too much. I didn't want to hear anymore.

But I had one more question. "Quilla said something that leads me to believe my mom and dad aren't really my mom and dad. Am - " I trailed off.

It seemed too impossible.

Saying the words felt like I would make them come true.

Pops shook his head. "That's not a question I can answer. You should ask Quilla. Or better yet, your mom and dad. They have the answers you seek."

I nodded. He was right. Of course, if there were an easy answer, he would've told me.

That meant my parents did have secrets.

I sighed internally.

There was no damn way I wanted to ask my mom now.

I thought about what kind of spell I could use to get to the truth.

"Alright," I said, feeling more confused than before I came into his office.

"How are things between you and Gabe?" he asked, changing the subject.

"Fine, I guess." Nothing like Dorian and Snow. They were so in love it was sickening, but mine and Gabe's relationship was good enough.

Professor Pops came around and patted my shoulder. "One thing I'm certain of is that everything will work out. It always does."

"Thanks." Sure, things worked out, but that didn't mean they worked out the way I wanted them to. Or the way that I thought was best.

I left Professor Pops' office in a daze.

In the hallway, Heathcliff waved and said hello.

I think I raised a hand in answer, but I wasn't sure.

My life suddenly didn't feel like my own.

For a moment, I thought I understood what Snow felt when she became the Seal.

But no.

I wasn't like that.

I didn't need to worry.

Sharra. The academy. This was where I belonged.

LEOLAS

I WENT into my office and closed the door.

During class, I asked my students to write a paragraph on what they hoped to learn this year, and now I needed to get through them to gauge not only their ability to write but also whether or not I needed to change my next lesson.

The words were a blur.

I kept reading the same sentence over and over again and still didn't know what it said. I couldn't help it.

Random thoughts popped up.

My magic.

It came from The Eye of Abernathy, which came from Earth.

And Abernathy was a dragon of the Earth.

If my sinking suspicions about where I was born were correct -

"No," I shook those thoughts away.

It just didn't make sense.

After staring into space for I didn't know how long, there was a knock on the door.

"Come in," I said, glancing at the clock.

It was time for my appointment with Sera. Actually, the girl was a little late but better late than never.

The door opened, but instead of Sera, there stood a man.

His eyes were blue like summer sky right before the sun sets.

"Hello," he said and smiled. The man had dimples. Damn dimples. "Mind if I come in?" He inclined his head at the chair on the opposite side of my desk.

"Oh, sure." I let out an embarrassed laugh as my skin reddened.

His handsomeness was palpable, like the heat from the sun.

"Have a seat."

"Thanks." He sat, his eyes never leaving mine.

"Can I get you something to drink? Wine. Chocolate milk?" Why the hell did I ask the beautiful man if he wanted chocolate milk? Lame. Not to mention, I didn't have any.

He chuckled at that, and I felt more heat rise to my cheeks.

"I'm good, thank you," he said.

"Excellent. Great." My insides spun dizzily.

He studied me as though exploring the facets of my face.

Then his eyes wandered down my shoulders and arms to my hands.

It felt as though he sculpted me with his eyes, as though I were coming alive under his intense scrutiny.

"You don't recognize me?" he asked, a slight grin on his face.

The man was yummy. I would've remembered seeing him before, but there was something about him. "Should I?"

I rested my hands on my thighs, clawing my nails into them, trying to get a handle on myself. I was with Gabe.

My amazing chayot warrior.

Righter of wrongs.

Champion for the humans.

Too bad he'd been in a bad mood for the last year. I dug my nails deeper into my skin.

"Perhaps not." His eyes sparkled, and my breath hitched. "How about I tell you my name?"

"Right. Yes. What's your name, and how can I help you?" I felt like an idiot, like a silly pink poodle with her tongue dangling from her mouth.

He chuckled. "My name is Leolas, but my friends call me Leo."

I stretched out my arm across my desk. "Nice to meet you, Leolas. I'm Cindy."

He stood, taking my hand in his and kissing the knuckles.

I very nearly swooned (yep, I can now say with complete honesty, I understand what the word means) as a jolt of electricity shot through me.

My heart picked up speed, racing like a herd of wild horses.

There had to be a spell to deal with my overactive organ.

Lightheaded, I fell back into my seat.

"You all right?" Leolas asked, sitting back down.

"Sure. Of course. Now, why don't you tell me why you're here." I tried to regain control.

"Cinderella," he said, and the word floated to me like a crisp breeze.

"Don't call me that," I said, scrutinizing him carefully.

Come to me.

Those words filtered into my brain. Had they come from him?

The room felt stifling.

I needed some air.

Standing, I strode past him to the door.

"I should go." I left the room and rushed down the steps and out the front doors of the castle.

The sun was setting, the font of the castle in shadow, and I bent over, heaving air into my lungs.

"Cinderella," Leo called. He was right behind me.

"Leave me alone." I didn't understand what was happening. If necessary, I would use force to keep him from me.

Come to me. The words entered my mind again, but I fought against them. "No," I shouted and took off down the steps.

Then I was running, heading around the castle toward the barn and the forest beyond.

I wanted to hide.

Anything to get away from him.

Not just because he scared me, but because I didn't want to be a part of whatever was happening.

"Cinderella," he called again, and I saw he was right there, as though we were attached.

"Holy merde," I said, crossing my arms. "Leave me alone, creepy stalker."

A stunning spell ran through my mind, and I said the words almost as soon as I thought them.

Leo sensed my magic and sidestepped it as though he could see it.

"Your magic is impressive." As he spoke, he moved closer. "Though it's still new. I can tell that much," he added, his eyes glittering mischievously.

"I - I - " Magic wasn't something I threw around.

Just about everyone, but Snow was uncomfortable with it, including my parents.

My aunt didn't mind, but I didn't see her much.

"Thanks," I finally got out, holding a hand against my head.

Leo was so close the tips of our shoes touched.

Behind me, I heard the rustle of woodland creatures, out of sight, but nearby.

My heart raced erratically.

I was torn between running, lighting his hair on fire with a spell, and seeing just what the hell he would do next. I could see his magic, almost like a light shining around him.

"Who are you?" I finally asked.

Then thought it was a stupid question. He already said he was Leo.

He lifted his hand, and a circle of buttery colored magic flickered at his fingers. My breath sucked in.

"You shouldn't - " I began.

"Shhhhh," he breathed, and the orb grew until I could see within.

There was a castle, flags flying from each point.

Beautiful landscape surrounded it, and it was encircled by water.

As the sphere grew, I stepped back so I wouldn't touch it.

Leo brought it between us.

Six moons shone in various colors, gently lighting the land, including cottages, cities, farmland, mountains, valleys, and a large body of water.

When it finally stopped growing, the orb was the size of a beach ball.

Around the edges were gray mists, some darker than others.

"What's that?" I asked, pointing at the darkness.

"The Sickness," Leo said, his voice quiet, almost reverent.

"What kind of sickness?" Without him telling me, I knew the realm was Polonias.

"She's dying." He looked at me, his beautiful eyes sad. "Polonias needs your help, Cinderella."

"No." I stepped back, bumping against a tree. "Did Quilla send you?"

He shook his head. "I shouldn't be here, but I've come on behalf of the land of Polonias to ask you, respectfully, for your help."

Even though I knew the land was Polonias, hearing him say it aloud racked my body with shockwaves.

"I can't." Uncontrollable terror caused my knees to quake.

I carefully stepped around the tree, trying to get farther away from him.

"Please leave me alone."

Leo's face fell, and the magical sphere vanished. "I'll never stop trying." His words were intense, and I knew without a doubt, I'd see him again.

At the conviction that radiated from him, I almost wavered. Almost. But I shook my head.

"Go away," I said, pushing past him, heading back to the castle.

Leo touched my arm, and I glanced back at him. His posture was proud, his chin lifted.

"I will. For now." He vanished as though he were an apparition, and I clutched at my throat.

He wasn't gone for good. The thought rocked me with terrified excitement.

"Merde," I swore.

I needed Gabe.

Using magic, I created a portal right into my bedroom in the human realm and quickly texted Gabe.

It was a Tuesday night.

My mom had her charity meetings, and my dad was still away on business, so I had the house to myself.

Gabe wouldn't come into Sharra, but I had no problem entering the human realm.

There were talks by the governments of the world about creating a way to alert certain agencies when magic was used.

Gabe and the chayot were part of the team since it was the chayots' job to keep humans safe.

It was the whole reason they existed.

I knew Gabe felt the need to help them on a cellular level, which was why I knew part of him resisted giving himself entirely to me. I was a witch.

Therefore, I was the enemy, to an extent.

LOSE MY NUMBER

GABE TEXTED BACK that he would be over soon, saying we needed to talk, but I wasn't in the mood for talking.

He showed up at my window ten minutes after I was in my pajamas.

I wore silk shorts and a matching spaghetti strap tank.

With giddy anticipation, I let him in.

"Hey," he said softly.

He smelled of the fresh night air, moonbeams, pure magic, and something I couldn't quite gauge.

What could be the matter?

"Hi." I closed the window and turned, studying him as he wandered the room, picking up the photo of us right after high school graduation, before setting it back down.

Gabe was hot. His dark hair short and his emerald green eyes seemed even brighter than usual.

He always had a tan, and his body was sculpted and sleek.

I craved him. And I wanted him to make me forget all my worries for a little while, especially Leolas.

Going to him, I pressed my lips to his.

He responded hungrily, wrapping his arms around me.

I sighed, knowing I would never love another the way I loved him. I met his tongue as he deepened our kiss, pulling me tight against him.

It was too long since the last time we were together, and I moved my hands under his shirt, stroking the skin beneath the band of his jeans.

He lifted me into his arms, and I was surprised, though I wasn't complaining, and wrapped my legs around his hips.

He was kissing me like when we first got together.

As though I was shelter and he was the storm.

In his arms, I didn't think about Sera and her lack of compassion, Quilla and her apparent allergy to magic, a land called Polonias, a man with effing dimples, or Heather and her broken heart.

I just wanted to feel, lose myself in Gabe, and he was right there with me.

He walked us over to the bed and climbed on.

I scooted back, unbuckling his belt.

He released my lips and pushed my hands away. "Wait," he said, running a hand through his hair.

"I don't want to. I need you." I tugged him on top of me.

He groaned, kissing me again, his hands going under me, pressing my body against his, but I sensed a hesitation in him.

"What's wrong?" I asked, cupping his face in my hands.

By the look of him, I knew we weren't going to lose ourselves in each other.

His gaze locked in on mine. Something weighed on his mind.

"I can't stay long," he said after clearing his throat. He looked away.

"You just got here," I said, using my legs to hold him to me.

"I know, but I have a meeting." He still wouldn't meet my eyes.

"You always have meetings," I replied, pouting.

Gabe pulled away and stood, tucking in his tee-shirt. "I wish I didn't. I wish this whole damn thing with the supernaturals would go away. I wish - " He stopped, crossing his arms.

"But it isn't, and I can't stop. It's my job." He began pacing, and I quickly put on a robe. "Just tonight, right before I got here, I was called to a crime scene where five teens were drained dry. All of them dead." He shook his head. "And you expect me to drop everything because you're having a bad day?" He shook his head, and I understood. He found me disgusting.

A fracture cracked at the edges of my heart. "I guess not," I said, wishing he would stop talking. I knew where this conversation was heading, and I didn't like it.

But if he was going to end things between us, I wanted a clean break.

"Damn right." He huffed and fell into a chair, rubbing a hand over his face. "I can't do this anymore," he said and stood right back up, walking over to the window.

I went to him, putting my arms around his waist and leaning my face against his back. "You know I'm not to blame," I said tenderly. "I'm trying to help."

He didn't turn, but I heard him grind his teeth together. "Sure. You and that stupid school." He snorted.

"It isn't stupid, and we are helping." I released him, wishing my hands would stop shaking. "When we discover someone with magic, we take them out of the human realm." I clenched my hands into fists. "At least we don't kill them like you do."

He faced me then. "The chayot must save humans, and sometimes that means bringing justice to supernaturals," he growled. "And you know we only kill those who've murdered humans using their powers. That's it."

"And the others? Where are they?"

"Incarcerated, as they should be." He glared, but I could tell he wanted to say more.

Why wouldn't he talk to me?

I knew the chayot worked in conjunction with certain powerful humans to create a supernatural prison, but Gabe wouldn't tell me where it was located.

If I wanted to, I could use magic to find them, but I didn't want to. Not really.

"Goodbye, Cindy," he said, opening the window.

A blast of cold air caused my skin to prickle.

Without meaning to, tears filled my eyes.

I loved him. So much it hurt. And he was casting me aside like an old shoe.

"Wait." I went to him, knowing his goodbye wasn't temporary, but permanent, and desperation had me clinging to his shirt.

Tears trickled down my cheeks.

I couldn't stop them but angrily wiped them away.

When we first started dating, I promised I wouldn't use magic on him, and I intended to keep my promise.

But at that moment, I changed my mind.

I had to hear him say the words. "Abreva reveala," I whispered.

His body jerked at the words, and a pained look crossed his face. "Don't, Cindy. Whatever spell you think you've placed on me, no good will come of it."

I wasn't having it. I needed to know.

"Tell the truth," I said. "If you're going to dump me, I want you to tell me why."

His shoulders slumped, and he went over to a chair, sitting.

The window was still open, sending wisps of frigid air into the room. "Deneth," I said, and the window slammed shut.

Gabe glared, but I saw the pain in his eyes. "Fine. Since you aren't giving me a choice."

I momentarily thought of removing the spell, but didn't. I was weak and needed him to speak the words.

"Please, Gabe." I knelt in front of him. "I'm your girlfriend, and I love you. Whatever is wrong, we can work it out together." I placed my hands on his knees.

He gritted his teeth as though he didn't want to say the words, but they came out. "I don't love you anymore. Happy now?" He closed his eyes, and he slumped down in the chair.

I fell back like he slapped me. "You're lying," I whispered, unable able to believe him. "Just a moment ago, you were showing me how much you love me."

He took hold of my chin and brought his face so close I smelled his aftershave. "I can't lie. Your spell won't let me. Right?"

For the first time, I saw a hint of his birth father - Oberon - in him.

I pulled from his grasp and stood, covering my mouth with the back of my hand.

Fresh tears rolled down my face. "Right," I whispered.

Gabe went over to the window, opening it again, and throwing one leg over the sill.

"You promised you would never do that." He ground his teeth together. "Supernaturals are all the same. They take what they want without regard for anyone but themselves."

"You're a self-righteous prick, you know that?" I stomped over and slapped his face. "You talk about supernaturals like we're all evil, but you forget one crucial thing."

His hand went to his cheek, where I left an impression of my hand. "What's that, witch?"

"You're supernatural too, you son-of-a-bitch." I moved to slap him again, but he was ready and grabbed my wrist, holding it tight.

"You broke your promise," he said quietly. "You lied, and I don't ever want to see you again." Gabe's face was contorted in a combination of rage and devastation.

"Lose my number. Got it?" He threw his other leg over the edge and jumped.

"Your loss!" I shouted, slamming my window shut.

MIRROR MIRROR

HEAVING A DEEP BREATH, the fracture in my heart splintered, and I threw myself on my bed.

Sobs racked my body as pain filled every crevice.

I don't know how long I lay in bed and allowed myself to cry.

It was after eleven when I made a decision. I needed to talk to my best friend.

Taking a deep breath, I went to my bathroom and took in my reflection.

My eyes were red and swollen. Haunted. Shocked. Horrified.

At the memory of what happened, more tears fell.

"Mirror, mirror, made of glass, show me Snow, do as I ask."

All of Sharra's mirrors were enchanted, making it easy for me to find Snow or anyone, if necessary, though I wouldn't break a student's trust.

It had to be life or death.

But with Snow, we had a bond.

As the spell began to work, my reflection wavered back and forth until it vanished.

In its place was a darkened room. I could hear kissing noises.

Were Snow and Dorian - ?

I forced myself not to be embarrassed.

What just happened between Gabe and me demanded I speak with Snow immediately.

The polite thing would be to say the words that would stop the magic, but I was desperate.

"Snow." I cleared my throat. "Sorry for the interruption, but I really need to talk to you," I said, sniffling.

Dorian cursed.

Snow whispered something to him.

My ears started to burn. "I said I was sorry," I mumbled.

"It's okay." Snow got out of bed. I looked away, allowing her to get decent.

Then she flipped on a light, and I glanced back in time to see her scoot a chair in front of the mirror. "What's up?" She sounded tired but happy.

"Still in love, I see," I said, trying not to sound distraught.

Obviously, Dorian and Snow were going strong, but my love life was in shambles.

"Forever," Dorian said, wrapping a blanket around his naked hips before heading into the bathroom.

"Tell me what's wrong," Snow said. She looked beautiful, her hair hanging loose around her shoulders.

"It's Gabe," I wailed, grabbing a tissue and blowing my nose. "He came over tonight and - " I dabbed at my eyes. "I cast a truth spell on him, and he told me he doesn't love me anymore."

I didn't recognize my own voice.

It sounded hollow and filled with pain. "It just can't be. I heard the words with my own ears, and I still can't believe them." I pressed my hand against the mirror.

"He's been acting weird for a while now, but I thought we could get through it." I swallowed down a sob. "Tell me what to do."

Snow exhaled heavily, flicked her bangs from her eyes. "I don't think spells work on the chayot. At least, not unless it's a really, really powerful one. He was probably lying."

I sniffled. "What? How do you know?"

"I was doing some reading and found an obscure comment about how most spells didn't work on their kind. I could be wrong." She shrugged, obviously trying not to get my hopes up.

"But, I can't imagine Gabe just fell out of love with you." She glanced over toward the bathroom and lowered her voice. "Dorian said Gabe has been way on edge lately. He can't even stand to be around him."

"Does Dorian know why?" I told her about the vamps killing the teens.

She shook her head. "No, but actually, I might."

"What is it?" Regardless, Gabe still said the hurtful words, but if I understood what was going on in his life, then maybe it would ease the pain.

Highly doubtful, but I had to try something.

I couldn't just live with this hurt forever.

"Look, I know I made the right call when I freed all supernaturals, but Gabe is right that I didn't consider how it would affect humans." She closed her eyes.

"I know what I did is making things difficult for them, and the chayot, and I'm trying to come up with a plan to deal with it." Her vivid eyes bore into me.

"I'm sorry my choices have affected your relationship, Cin."

"It isn't your fault," I said sympathetically.

"You know, chayot are like angels." Snow folded her feet under herself. Readjusted her robe. It was apparent what she had to say was huge.

I ground my teeth. Nodded.

Could she just spit it out already?

"There's a hierarchy in the angelic realm. And it seems the highest of all the angels changed the rules. Now, angels, including chayot, are no longer allowed to date, marry, or have relations with anyone who isn't one of their kind." She rubbed a hand over her eyes. "I'm sorry he didn't tell you himself. I don't think he told anyone, except me, and last I heard, he was going to defy the rules and continue to be with you, but - "

"Merde! Why didn't you tell me?" That explained why Gabe broke up with me, but not why he didn't just tell me.

"Gabe asked me not to. Said he wanted to do it himself. But I figure since he was a total asshole to you tonight, he can suck it.0"

"I'm so glad you told me. Not that it helps my broken heart, but at least I know why he broke it." I was suddenly exhausted.

"Yeah, it's stupid, and I don't know how long it'll last. But it's my fault, and I'm sorry."

I picked up my brush, and absently ran it through my hair. "You did what you thought was right. Don't be sorry. That fool Gabe is who should be sorry. He just gave up the best thing to ever happen to him." I pressed my lips together, wishing my heart could be as tough as my words.

"Thanks for saying so, but I may have to go back on my promise and force the magical creatures out of the human realm altogether." She took a deep breath and grimaced. "Being in charge is hard."

"Whatever decision you make, you know I'll support it, but you know as well as I do that magic is interspersed with humans. It's watered down in most cases, sure, but it's still out there and has been for a long, long time. Nearly every human has magic in their blood."

"It's true." She sighed again.

"So, there's this man from Polonias who talked to me today, too," I said, wanting to get it all out.

"Oh?" She seemed to relax though she sounded curious.

"His name is Leolas."

Her features darkened. "I've heard of him. He's the crown prince of the land. He'll rule Polonias one day." Snow pushed her hair off her face, resting in over one shoulder.

"He's a prince?" I was shocked, but it really wasn't surprising.

The way he carried himself, his confidence.

It all screamed he was a leader.

"Quilla made it seem like my parents aren't really my parents. That I'm from there. And Pops said Polonias isn't part of Earth - at least not really." I blinked back more tears.

"I might be an alien," I said.

Snow stood, grabbing both sides of the mirror. "I'm a vampire, the vampire queen. I have fangs for crying out loud. We're friends with a dragon, and Dorian has become," she looked away for a moment before continuing, "something. We aren't sure what yet. A little original vampire girl is running about my home, growing faster than should be physically possible, and I've released magical creatures upon the humans like some twisted maniac. The fact that Polonias isn't part of Earth is probably a good thing and should be the least of your worries." She stepped back.

"You aren't an alien," she said, her lips twitching like she tried not to smile. "Not really."

Laughter bubbled from my chest, and we both started to giggle.

"It's not funny," I said but laughed harder, so the tears in my eyes streamed down my cheeks.

"I know," she said, laughing with me. "It shouldn't be, but just when we think it can't get weirder, it does."

"What's going on?" Dorian asked, appearing behind Snow.

"I'm an alien," I said, my voice thick with laughter.

Dorian chuckled. "I had a feeling."

Snow punched him in the stomach playfully.

I took a deep breath. "Thanks, Snow. I feel better."

"Good."

Dorian took Snow's hand. "Does that mean my vampire queen can come back to bed?" His words were sultry, filled with innuendo.

"Oh," Snow said, giving me a sideways look.

Dorian traced his thumb along Snow's jaw, and a pang of sadness filled my heart.

It was evident to anyone that Snow and Dorian would do anything for each other and fight through Heaven and Hell to be together.

Not so with Gabe. Tonight proved that.

"Of course. Night, guys." I smiled. "I don't know what I'd do without you, Snow."

"Good thing you'll never have to find out." She didn't look at me when she spoke.

Dorian waved before pulling Snow away from the mirror.

I quickly spoke the words to the spell that would remove me from their room: "Mirror, mirror, made of glass, bring back my face, do as I ask." My haphazard reflection returned. I stuck out my tongue before turning off the light and getting back into bed.

That night I dreamed of fire. Of burning wood and smoke so thick I couldn't see much of anything.

I tried several different spells to dispel the smoke and put out the flames, but my magic didn't work.

Brilliantly glowing reds and oranges flashed around me, burning trees to ash, until all that remained was a gray world, with soot filling my lungs so I couldn't breathe.

Come to me, Cinderella. His voice cut through the dreariness and despair, filling my veins and sinews with something akin to a purpose.

LEO IS SKETCHY

IN THE MORNING, I put on a light yellow dress and did my hair up in a bun.

Downstairs I grabbed a piece of toast and peanut butter after turning on the coffee for my mom.

She came into the kitchen, surprised.

"Two days in a row?" She smiled, taking a mug from the cupboard.

"Have you heard of Polonias?" I asked, skipping past the silly pleasantries and getting right to the point.

I could do a spell on her, but after what happened with Gabe the night before, I wasn't in the mood to force someone to tell me the truth.

Her eyes grew large. "Where did you hear that word?"

I decided to be honest. "From Quilla, my fairy godmother."

I went to the refrigerator for some juice.

My mom dropped the coffee mug.

"Thenorus," I whispered. The mug halted its descent just inches from the tile floor.

She took it out of the air and set it on the counter. "I wish you wouldn't do that," she said, seemingly embarrassed by my magic.

I wasn't going to get into it with her, about the fact that I was a witch whether she liked it or not.

"Sorry," I said, though I wasn't.

"You've seen Quilla?" She crossed her arms, looking at me like I was an alien and might sprout two antennae.

"Yes, I saw her. She came to my room the other night." I blinked, trying to keep my words light, but I was experiencing another level of heartbreak.

My mom knew who Quilla was, yet she kept it from me.

"I need to go. I - I must speak with your father." She dashed from the kitchen so fast I didn't have a chance to say goodbye.

I glanced at the clock on the microwave. There was still an hour before my first class. Shoving the last bite of toast in my mouth, I decided to talk to Abernathy, hoping the dragon would have the answers I needed.

In my room, I placed bright blue candles on the floor in the shape of a seven-pointed star. Then I sat in the center, crossed my legs, closed my eyes, and spoke the words that would take me to his cave.

It didn't take long before the smell of sulfur and rotting flesh struck my nose. It was dark.

"Lumia," I whispered, and a small light appeared.

As I walked toward the sound of Abernathy's snoring, my skin started to crawl.

It felt like I was being watched.

I quickly glanced around, searching for the culprit, but no one was there. I stopped.

The dragon wasn't there. In the center of the cave stood Leo.

"Hi, Cinderella. I hope you don't mind, but Abernathy went out for a snack. He agreed it would be better if I answered your questions instead."

I backed away, allowing the light in my hand to extinguish. I didn't want to see Leo. Not now.

"Go away," I shouted, turning and stomping on old bones as I walked back the way I came.

"I can't do that, Cinderella." His voice was right in my ear, and I screamed.

A light like the one I held appeared in his hand. "We're the same, you and I - at least where it matters. And it's about time you understood what that means."

He grabbed for my hand, but I pulled away and ran and ran and ran until I was at the entrance of Abernathy's cave.

I wasn't in the greatest shape, and I bent over, grabbing my knees, gulping in deep breaths, and grateful the air smelled better so close to the opening.

I heard him in front of me and glanced up.

"Just stay away from me," I retorted, trying to think of a spell that would make him go away. Nothing came to mind.

"It doesn't matter what sort of spell you throw my way. I'll just counter it with one of my own. It's easy since I've been doing magic longer than you've been alive." He grinned, flashing his white teeth and dimples.

"Stop smiling, dammit." I tripped over some bones.

Leo caught me before I went down.

His face grew serious. "There is something I need to show you. Someone I want you to meet. Would that be okay?"

I straightened. "Do I have idiot stamped across my forehead? Why would I go anywhere with you?"

Leo examined my forehead earnestly. "There's a dirt smudge and part of a cobweb, but I don't see a word." He brushed at it. "Yeah, there isn't a word on your forehead."

Against my will, a gurgle of laughter erupted from my throat. Leo gave me a confused look. "Why are you laughing?"

I shook my head. "Merde, you really aren't from around here, are you?"

His eyebrows scrunched together. "No, Cinderella. You've seen my land."

A very unladylike noise came from my nose. I covered it and my mouth.

Leo smiled, his eyes twinkling. "Are you alright?"

"Yes," I said through my hand. "Sure, I'm fine." After last night, I should be depressed beyond belief, but Leo had a way about him.

He reached out and grasped the hand covering my mouth. A shiver of exhilaration ran through my body at his touch. "Will you come with me? Please."

Leo seemed harmless, but the idea of going to another land with no knowledge of how to get back didn't fill me with warm fuzzies.

It wouldn't be the smart thing to do. Not even a little bit.

"You're scared?" He released my hand and stuck his own in his pants pocket.

"No." I lifted my chin. If he tried anything, I could kick his ass.

From his pocket, he pulled out a thin chain. It was long and looked like it was made of silver. On the end was an hourglass.

"Here," he said, holding it out for me.

I shrunk away, my hands behind my back. "I don't want it."

He took a deep breath.

Obviously, I was frustrating him.

"This is a travel charm." He placed the small hourglass on the end of the chain between his thumb and first finger and held it up for me to see.

The dust inside sparkled like diamonds.

"If you hold this in your hand and think of where you want to be, the charm will take you there."

I stepped forward. "So if I wanted to go home, for example, I would just need to think of it, and I'll be there?"

Leo grinned, showing off his dimples. "Almost. You must have the charm in your possession. Also, it can be a little tricky. If you think of two places at once, you might end up in some random location instead."

My eyebrows raised in worry. That wouldn't be good, but I was a witch. I could open portals. No doubt, I could handle a travel charm.

"Be specific." He held the necklace in the palm of his hand. "Try it."

I took the charm, careful not to brush his skin.

"Let's try somewhere easy. How about the middle of Abernathy's cave? I'm going to come with you, so I need to be touching you, okay?"

"Sure." I licked my lips in preparation.

His warm fingers surrounded my forearm.

My heart sped up, and I shivered.

To cover it up, I cleared my throat. "So, I just think about Abernathy's cave?"

"Close your eyes." Leo moved closer to me, so close I could feel his breath on my cheek. "Now think about the rock walls covered with moss, the dirt floor. The white bones scattered throughout and the bright sky above." He paused. "Got it?"

I didn't have to answer. The stench that abruptly filled my nose made it obvious we had arrived. I opened my eyes.

Leo's eyes were on me. "You're brilliant." He leaned in, and I thought he might kiss me. Instead, he took the necklace from my palm and placed the chain around my neck.

"Will you come with me to Polonias, Cinderella?"

OceanofPDF.com

THEY ARE HUGGERS

I STUDIED HIS BLUE EYES, searching for a sign of deceit, but there wasn't any. "I will as long as we can make it quick. I have classes to teach soon."

"You needn't worry. Time in Polonias passes at a different rate than time here. We can be gone a year according to time in Polonias, and you will only miss a day here. Okay?"

I bit my bottom lip, thinking I didn't understand how time could scroll at different speeds. Time was time.

But I decided to go with it.

If anything about the land or Leo became sketchy, I could use the travel charm to return.

"Let's get this over with, then."

Leo grabbed me around the waist. "Hold still," he whispered, his voice intense. He pressed my body against him, and I held my breath.

I didn't know what to do with my arms, so I wrapped them around his neck. It was strange, the way my body so quickly responded to him.

Momentarily, I felt like I was cheating on Gabe, even though the ass told me that he never wanted to see me again.

I pushed away my guilt. I wasn't cheating.

He and I were over, but even the thought broke my heart.

Leo took the hourglass between his thumb and first finger. "Ready?" he asked.

I looked away. "Sure."

He pulled me closer.

We seemed to fit like his body was made for mine. At the thought,

I put my hands on his chest, trying to put a little space between us. Leo winked.

We began to move. As we went, the dust inside the hourglass slowly rose and swirled from the bottom to the top.

If that wasn't strange enough, we entered a misty fog.

The air changed, and I knew we were no longer in Abernathy's cave, but somewhere else.

It churned through the air like it wished to claim us.

Whispers could be heard all around, tiny voices speaking in a language my mind tried to understand but couldn't.

Almost like the wind was speaking.

Dozens of feathery touches brushed against my arms, my neck, and even pulled at my hair.

I glanced up at Leo, curious what was happening.

His features were focused. He concentrated on something beyond what I could see.

I turned, so my back was against his chest, nervous, but I didn't speak, feeling that doing so might cause a disturbance.

Leo's hand held me tightly, and his clean-shaven jaw pressed against the side of my head.

"Almost there." He spoke through clenched teeth.

As we moved, the air changed several times.

From the clingy stench of Abernathy's cave to wet mists to a dry heat so hot it was hard to breathe.

The landscape changed, as well.

Darkness turned to grayish-black mists to fiery lava. When we finally stopped, it changed again.

I held my breath and searched the land.

Electric pink and purple flowers grew from vibrant green branches.

Poppy orange and lemon yellow blossoms danced in fields, and overhead was a bright violet-blue sky.

From Leo's arms, I could see two moons with pink bubblegum rings. Birds sang in the branches, and insects buzzed in the lush foliage.

"What is this place?" I asked, stepping away from Leo.

"This is Polonias," he said, coming to stand beside me. I heard the smile in his voice. It was obviously a land he loved.

"It's beautiful." A delicious breeze licked the back of my neck and my arms. It was the perfect temperature. "How many moons does Polonias have?" I pointed to the two I could see.

"There are six moons in total." Leo's arm brushed against mine, sending prickles of pleasure along my skin.

"What about those mists we passed through?" I bent and picked one of the orange flowers. Then brought it to my nose.

The petals were shaped like pansies and smelled like tangerines.

"These flowers are called tigerspaw." He plucked the flower from my hand and spun it between his fingers.

The color was that of a tiger's fur. "Why, tigerspaw?"

Leo turned the flower over and gently touched it against my wrist. "Its petals leave a paw print. See?" He moved the flower, and sure enough, it looked like a paw print.

"Cool," I breathed.

Leo smiled, his eyes studying my features. "May I put it in your hair?"

My lips parted slightly, and my heart lurched.

I needed to be careful.

It was apparent Leo knew how to say what a girl wanted to hear.

"Sure," I finally said.

He stepped close and slid the flower through my hair, so it rested behind my ear. "Beautiful," he said.

"Thanks." I placed a hand on his chest. "Now about the mists. What were they?"

Leo's features darkened. "Those are the Witch Mists. Traveling from where we were to our land requires we go through them. It can be very dangerous if you don't concentrate."

"I heard whispering and felt something like feathers touching me as we passed through them." Remembering made me shudder.

He gave me a sharp look. "You heard them? Felt them?"

"I - Yes, I think so." I stepped closer to him, suddenly afraid. I knew nothing about where I was.

Leo placed his hands on my bare arms. "Those are the Cursed. They are creatures who turned their backs on Polonias and the goodness of the magic in the land. They are like the demons of your world. Some are desperate for a way out of the darkness, while others seek to pull unsuspecting travelers in. They are the cause of the Sickness." He shook his head. "Did you understand them?"

"No," I answered firmly. No sense telling him it felt like I should've understood their language, that it felt like I was close.

"Good." He nodded like that was the end of it.

The air was fragrant with flowers, and I stepped to one of the blooms on a low hanging branch. Near the middle, it had burgundy freckles.

"These are beautiful," I said, reaching out to touch one.

Leo stepped beside me and put a hand on my finger. "Careful, they're huggers."

"Huggers?" I giggled at the funny name.

"Watch." He placed his first finger on one of the petals, and it curled around his finger. The other petals lengthened and reached for his finger as well, wrapping around it until it was no longer visible.

I was momentarily scared. "Does it want to eat you?"

Leo chuckled. "No, the petals are drawn to warmth. But they won't let go until you scratch or tickle it near the stem, like this." With his other hand, he rubbed the bottom of the flower-like one would scratch behind a dog's ears.

The flower immediately released Leo's finger and sighed.

"I just thought you might want to know before you thought it was attacking you." He smiled, flashing one dimple.

"Yeah, good call."

"Want to try it? The petals are soft." He watched me curiously.

I shook my head. "Maybe later."

He caressed a few more blooms the way he had the first. Each exhaled with delight.

"They like you." I laughed, thinking everything swooned at his touch, not just me.

"Nah, they just liked to be caressed." He shrugged and started walking through the orange and yellow flowers.

A glittering ebony path appeared below our feet.

"How did you - ?" I began, then stopped. Of course, he used magic.

Leo turned back and smiled. "Come on. There's someone I want you to meet."

SOUL OF POLONIAS

WE FOLLOWED the path through the forest for a long time.

Everything around us buzzed with life.

The more we walked, the deeper into the woods we went until the path barely allowed us room to get through.

Tall, skinny trees with furry silver trunks grew tightly on either side of the trail. Or maybe they hadn't grown there but moved to make room after Leo's spell.

With him, such magic felt possible.

"Where is this person?" I finally asked after more than thirty minutes of non-stop walking. I wore my wedge sandals, the most comfortable heels around.

Still, enough was enough.

"At the Center," he answered, but didn't elaborate.

I huffed. He said the words, but they told me nothing.

Still, I strived for patience and kept walking, admiring the vegetation, the colorful flowers, and the random animals and birds we startled.

Probably an hour later, I was tired, hungry, and my feet hurt. Leo finally stopped.

"We're here," he said.

"Here" was truly magical.

A mountain wall shot straight up so high I couldn't even see the sky, from which tumbled five different waterfalls.

The sound should've been deafening, but it wasn't. Instead of a roar, it was like the sound of heavy rain. The water slapped against flat rocks and meandered down until the waterfalls all came together and emptied into a pool of turquoise water.

Colorful dragonflies flitted around the edges, landing on flowers in lavender, pink, bright yellow, and red. The air was clean and fresh, making me feel relaxed and happy.

To the right of the pool bloomed a rose the size of a manhole cover. Without a stem or leaves, it grew from the ground, not on a bush. Its petals were mauve around edges, then buttery yellow and cream.

"That. Is. Incredible," I said, moving toward it.

"That is Polly," Leo said, respectfully.

"The flower has a name?" The closer I got, the more glorious the flower became.

"She goes by many names. She is the heart and soul of Polonias."

I stopped directly in front of the flower. "Well, she's lovely," I said, confused about why he would bring me all this way to see a flower, even if it was the biggest, most beautiful flower I ever saw.

Leo stepped next to me. "She is beautiful. And she needs you."

He sounded sad, and I glanced over. He looked as miserable as he sounded.

"She needs me?" I pressed a hand against my chest. "Why?" I watched him, mesmerized by his emotion.

It was sweet; he cared so much about the end of a flower.

But that was how flowers worked.

They began as a seed. Grew into a bud. Bloomed. Flourished a while. Then died.

Hell, it was how life worked.

I patted his arm.

"Does she need more water? A spell? I'm confused," I said, shaking my head.

"Speak her name and let her tell you herself."

My head snapped toward the flower. "The flower can talk?" There were many things I became aware of after I discovered I was a witch, but talking flowers was a total shock.

"Yes, Cinderella. Because she's more than a flower. Say her name."

"Okay." I wiped my hands on my dress. I was instantly nervous. "Uh, Polly?" I glanced at Leo, and he nodded encouragingly. "Polly, would you mind speaking to me?"

The petals shuddered and opened, revealing a young woman, my height, with hair, the color of cream, and blush pink eyes stood before us. In her hair was a small rose, and she wore a dress made of rose petals.

"Hello, Cinderella. Thank you for coming to see me." She bowed slightly.

I tried to speak a few different times, but nothing came out. "Hi," I raised my hand in a lame wave.

She smiled, walked over to the edge of the pool, cupped her hand, and lifted water to her lips. "Nothing better than drinking water," she said in a voice that sounded like the soft chiming from a music box.

The tips of her fingers looked bruised - deep purples and navy.

Polly followed my gaze and held her hands out in front of her. "Oh, dear. It's getting worse." She turned her hands back and forth, studying them intently.

"Why are they bruised? Did you hurt yourself?" I asked, abruptly filled with concern.

"The Sickness. It's getting stronger. I can't hold it off much longer." Polly looked at me, and a zing of emotion shot through me.

Her eyes were filled with terror, sadness.

The hopeless look of a person who knows they are going to die and can't do anything about it.

I saw that look once before in my grandfather as stomach cancer took him. Day by day, hour by hour, second by second.

It was the most challenging thing I ever had to watch.

"What can I do?" I asked, taking her hand in mine without thinking.

As soon as I touched her, the bruises left her fingers.

I gasped and pulled away. "What happened?"

Polly smiled, glancing over my shoulder to Leo before focusing on me.

"It is you, isn't it." She took my hands in hers and pressed them to her cheek. "Will you help me, Cinderella? Please?"

My eyes met Leo's, but he just stood there, his features unreadable.

Both he and Quilla asked me to come, and I turned them down.

But Polly? I sensed her magic, her natural goodness.

Without a doubt, she needed my help.

"I'll help in any way I can," I answered, and knew in that instant everything in my life was about to change.

DEAR DIARY,

Today I entered a new world and met a girl by the name of Polly. She's a beautiful flower girl.

I know that sounds kind of funny.

No one is getting married.

She's just a girl who is sometimes a flower.

She's also the heart of the world of Polonias - the world I entered today. If she gets sick, Polonias gets sick. If she dies, Polonias dies.

She asked me to help her, and I agreed.

I've no idea how I'm going to do it, but I feel utterly drawn to her. So I'm staying here.

Leo put me up in a room in the castle. His family's castle. It's beautiful.

Filled with thick tapestries and a large four-poster bed.

Tomorrow, Leo will give me a tour of the land, and I'm nervous about what I'll see.

I'm also worried about home and the Seven Magics Academy, and about Heather.

But I know Snow and Coco will take care of her. I'm also concerned about Sera and her powerful magic.

And Gabe, too, though I hate to admit it.

Yes, I'm still sad about our breakup.

But there's nothing I can do to change his mind. If he wanted me, he would've fought for me. I'm not saying it doesn't hurt. It does!!!

And there's no way in hell I'll be dating another guy anytime soon.

But I can look. Admire the view that is Leo. Right? Right!

I'm sending notes via magic to my parents and Snow and Gabe, telling them where I am.

Quilla, my fairy godmother, agreed to deliver them.

I have to keep telling myself time is different here than in Sharra or on Earth.

They will be fine. I'll be fine, and according to Leo, I can stay here a year, and it will only be a day in Sharra.

I'm counting on that!

A DIARY AND LETTERS

DEAR MOM AND DAD,

This is to let you know I'll be in Polonias a while.

Not sure how long.

It could only be minutes your time, but I didn't want you to worry.

Polonias is somehow connected to Earth, but not a part of Earth - Yeah, it's all very confusing.

The thing is, I mentioned Polonias to Mom at breakfast this morning, and I'm sure from her comments she already knows about it, which means you probably do too, Dad.

If I'm wrong, talk to Adam Henry.

He can explain everything to you.

Please know I'm safe. And thank you so much for all the love and support you've given me over the years.

All my love,

Cindy

HEY SNOW,

Just wanted you to know I'm in Polonias.

If I can't make it back in time, please have someone cover my classes for the day.

You know how much I love teaching.

I wouldn't abandon my classes unless it was serious.

But I've met someone. And before you freak, it isn't Leo.

I can't move on from Gabe so easily.

It's a girl by the name of Polly.

She's adorable. Weirder than you.

She's a flower and a girl.

Like an actual effing flower.

She grows from the ground.

She's also the heart of Polonias, and I have to help her.

Please help Heather and keep an eye on Sera for me.

Both girls need extra attention, and I'm sorry I'm not there to give it, but this is really important. I feel it deep in my heart and soul.

Take care. I may be back in a few hours but wanted you to know what's going on, just in case.

Hugs,

Cindy

GABE,

I've written several letters today.

Yours is the hardest.

Mostly because I know why you broke up with me, thanks to Snow.

It hurts that you didn't feel like you could tell me the reason.

I get it, though.

There's a new law in place for the chayot: no interspecies dating. Fine.

I would've understood.

Maybe you didn't love me the way I believed.

That knowledge hurts, but whatever.

It's done.

I'll be supportive and stay out of your way.

Hell, I'm not even on Earth anymore, so you're safe from my wicked witchy ways.

If you're curious about where I am, talk to Professor Pops about Polonias. He has the answers.

Take care of yourself.

Cindy

DEAR DIARY,

I've been in Polonias a week already.

The land is beautiful, if not a little old-fashioned.

Imagine living a hundred and fifty years ago.

There's no modern technology in the land.

No cell phones, microwaves, or cars.

It isn't because those things can't be created.

They can. Instead, those things don't exist because they aren't necessary.

Everything happens with magic - because of magic.

It's as much a part of this world as the grass, the many moons, or the violet-blue sky.

This past week has been quite the lesson for me, and when I return to Sharra, I'm going to add my newfound knowledge to the curriculum.

My students need to understand what a gift it is to be a part of magic.

But also, as beautiful as magic can be, that it can also be deadly.

It's a little weird watching the people here in Polonias use magic for everything.

The first time Cook prepared a meal, I nearly fell over.

Eggs, milk, butter, flour, and salt flew through the air and into a large bowl, all on their own.

Then a whisk mixed the ingredients.

When it was finished, the bowl rose into the air and poured the batter into a pan.

The pan went over to the oven where the oven opened, and the pan slid inside.

The whole time, the cook used magical words to make the items do as she commanded instead of manipulating them with her hands.

It made me wonder why there couldn't be fast food created by magic.

I told Leo what I was thinking, and he laughed.

"Magical fast food. You might be onto something, Cinderella," he said.

I still hate it when he uses my full name, but I let it slide that time.

There is more to Polonias than I first realized.

Each day I see something new, something different. I have to tell you, I feel at home here.

I don't know if that makes sense.

It's like I've finally found the place where I belong.

The people are kind and seem interested in getting to know me except the king.

He is genuinely perturbed by my presence, even though I believe he sent Leo after me.

My only guess as to why he would do such a thing is he hoped I would say no.

Either way, I caught him giving me foul looks more than once, although I'm not sure what I did to offend him.

Since my arrival, I spend a lot of time with Leo. We hang out every day. He's very kind and good-hearted, not to mention beyond gorgeous.

More than once, I tried to magic a mirror so I could talk to Snow in Sharra, but it didn't work.

When I told Leo, he explained it's because while Polonias is tethered to Earth, it isn't part of the planes or realms within the planet.

My magic doesn't work the same here, either.

Like using different languages in different countries, magic requires different words depending on where I am.

I tried to use Luminous to produce tiny stars in my room like I would on Earth.

Instead, I lit up the whole castle, bright as a Christmas tree. Whoops!

Then there's the people and the creatures.

They dress the way you might expect in a fairytale.

The men wear trousers, and the women wear skirts and gowns.

All of the animals can talk, including the tiniest insect - at least, that's what Leo told me. He also said most of them choose not to speak since it requires a great deal of magic to understand different languages, and they don't want to be bothered.

I might actually believe that last part.

So far, the ones who have spoken are grumpy.

Earlier today, I encountered a spotted leopard.

When I saw her, I screamed in terror at seeing the large cat wandering freely around the city. I ran away.

Leo later shared that the leopard is the records keeper for the land, and she lives in the castle. Her name is Violet, and she can speak as well as him or me.

Now I think about it, she looked adorable.

She walked on her hind legs and wore a brightly colored gown.

The funniest part is she keeps a pair of spectacles balanced on the tip of her nose. I'm guessing they don't fall off only because of a spell.

I haven't officially been introduced to anyone but the king.

Leo says it's because the people want to have a formal welcome party for me.

The party is tonight. I'm hoping the guests will like me.

I haven't seen Quilla since the first day I arrived.

Perhaps it's because she's mad I treated her like a magical mail carrier. I don't know.

Polly is back in the forest, next to her waterfall.

She came to the castle with us and stayed for a few days.

I noticed she was getting antsy, though. Finally, she came to me and said she needed to get back to her dirt beside the waterfall.

I was sad to see her go, but I understood.

She's a part flower, so it seems like she should need the ground.

She also said something weird to me right before she left.

She said, "We're sisters, you and me. There's a gift I must bestow upon you. Be ready. It's a gift with a curse, I'm sorry to say." She looked a little unhappy at saying those words, and I wanted to reassure her.

"Sure, Polly," was how I responded, keeping my voice light even though inside I felt really weird about her saying we are sisters.

Also, the "gift" sounds like it isn't a gift at all, but a total pain in the ass. When I see Polly again, I'll tell her I don't want it.

That's everything.

Oh, except for one random note.

I've seen two brown rabbits wandering the castle.

One seems genuinely interested in me while the other plays tricks.

Last night it dumped a satchel of dirt in my bed and the day before it put worms in my shoes.

I've tried to talk to them, but they hop away before I get the chance.

When I get to the bottom of it, I'll let you know.

CHAT WITH QUILLA

FROM THE DEPTHS OF A DREAM, I heard someone pounding on the door.

"Come in," I mumbled out of habit before remembering where I was.

Quicker than I usually move, I went over to my robe and threw it on, opening the door. A swift glance at the old-fashioned grandfather clock revealed it was late morning.

In the doorway stood Quilla.

Hands on her hips, she tapped her foot impatiently.

She wore a dress the color of an eggplant, a bright red painter's hat, spotted blue tights, and pointy black boots.

Before I could say anything sarcastic, she walked past me into my room.

"Why didn't you use magic to open the door? Not that I'm complaining. Stupid allergies. But Polonias is a world full of it. No one cares whether you use it or not. In fact, they expect you to." She whirled around the room like a bird who drank too much coffee.

"You were just being polite, weren't you?" She sighed before plopping down on my bed, bouncing several times. "Cozy." Then she gave me a once-over.

My head spun.

Quilla always seemed to move in fast forward.

I shook off the lingering effects of sleep, working to keep up.

She clucked her tongue at my attire, as though I should already be dressed and ready.

My robe was split open, showing my blue polka dot boxer shorts and light blue tank.

Quilla wrinkled her nose. "Is that what you're wearing to your party tonight? It's," she paused and sniffed before continuing, "enchanting."

I tightened the robe around myself and took a steadying breath. "Hi, Quilla. No, this is not what I'm wearing. Sheesh. But my party doesn't start for several hours. Still, it's nice of you to finally come by and see me. Where've you been?" I went to the closet as I spoke.

Apparently, it was time to get dressed.

The closet was more substantial than my room back home and filled with hundreds of shoes, underclothes, and dresses.

They began arriving almost immediately after I did.

Most of the dresses were in various shades of blue, I'm guessing because Leo told the dressmakers blue was my favorite color. I wondered how he knew.

The gowns weren't as short or as stylish as I was used to, but they were still beautiful.

I ran my fingers over the different fabrics, some soft, others stiff.

They were all lovely, almost sensuous.

I chose one in sky blue, the material was soft and functional.

The shoes I selected were black flats.

My reflection in the mirror revealed I looked pretty but too sweet. It wasn't my style, even if I did love the color.

I stepped from the closet and smiled at Quilla. "What about this for the party?"

She snorted. "No. No. No." She twirled her index finger. In the air between us, moving at the same speed as her finger, a tornado of materials spun in a flurry of silvers, blues, and blacks.

Before my eyes, a stunning dress took shape. The bodice was fitted and a combination of glittery silver and sky blue. The jagged tulle skirt pooled out from the waist like a cloud.

"That's gorgeous," I said, reaching out to touch it.

"Th-th - " Quilla sneezed. "You can wear this tonight. I'm sure the dressmakers have plenty of choices in that gigantic closet of yours, but this will be perfect."

"Thank you." I took the dress Quilla created from the air and used magic to hang it up in my closet. Another glance in the mirror and I decided to wear the dress I had on for the day. When I returned, Quilla was staring at me.

"What? This will do until my party, right?"

She waved my question away like batting at an irritating gnat. "It's fine." She shook her bouncy curls. "What is it about you and handsome men anyway? First, that attractive chayot - Gabe, right? And now, Leo. "

"I have no idea what you're talking about." I went to the bathroom, thankful the facilities weren't old-fashioned, and ran a brush through my hair.

"I asked you to come to Polonias way before Leo did, even telling you how important it was to all of the people here, and you refused. A handsome prince with perfect hair and gorgeous eyes asks and, hocus pocus, you're here." She paused, and I waited, tying my hair in a braid. "I thought you were stronger than that."

"It wasn't Leo who convinced me. It was Polly," I said, pulling the hourglass charm necklace over my head and tucking it under my camisole.

It had been sitting on the counter beside the sink.

Then I studied my reflection, steeling myself for Quilla's continual barrage of my character.

She sniffed loudly. "Yeah, right."

I washed my face before patting it dry and moisturizing. Usually, I enjoyed taking the time to do my makeup without magic. Not today. "Compli makus," I said, and my makeup was handled.

A little mascara, some gloss, and some glow.

Quilla still sat on my bed.

"Compli makus amara," I said.

The magic moved Quilla into the air as my bed was made.

I smirked at her shocked expression. She was the one who told me to use magic. I was just following orders.

"It was Polly and not the crown prince who brought you here?" she asked, floating to the ground and adjusting her skirts.

"That's right." I didn't need to explain my reasons to her.

Still, I thought about what she said and wondered if she was right. "Did you want something?" I finally asked.

"Nope. Just wanted to see for myself you were up and about and make sure you had the proper dress for your party." She crinkled her nose. "See you later."

With a poof, she was gone.

"Thank you," I whispered, wondering if I should go find Leo. My thoughts were interrupted by a knock at the door.

If it was Quilla again, I would give her a piece of my mind.

It wasn't.

It was Leo, and he looked like a fairytale prince.

He wore a burgundy and black jacket, gray pants that hugged his muscled thighs, a matching black belt and boots.

"Hi," I finally said after perusing his body more than once.

Leo did the same to me, and I blushed.

"Did you tell the dressmakers I like the color blue?" I asked, trying to cover up my embarrassment by fluffing a pillow.

He shook his head. "No. Is it your favorite color?"

"Yes, it is." I shut the door, and we walked side by side down the hall.

Leo smiled, and his eyes sparkled with mischief. "What else do you like?"

"All sorts of stuff." I shrugged. "I hope you're here to take me to the kitchen because I'm starved."

He winked, reached out, and took my hand.

Everywhere our fingers touched was like ice and fire, burning cold. I gasped but didn't pull away.

The tingling filled my veins.

I wanted to ask if he felt it, but I was afraid if the feeling were one-sided, he would think I was putting the moves on him.

My heart still clung to Gabe.

My emotions for him weren't so easily erased, even if that wasn't true of my ex-boyfriend. The chayot leader was an idiot, but I still loved him.

"Breakfast is our first stop. I've got a special place in mind for after," Leo said.

I gently pulled my hand away and quirked an eyebrow. "Are you flirting with me, Leo Loyalor?"

He chuckled. "What if I am?" He started down the steps, and I followed, my mouth hanging open. He was blunt. I liked that.

"I - I'm sort of - " What did I tell him? Gabe had broken off our relationship, shattered it to pieces, but - "I'm not ready."

Leo smiled. "Let's eat."

He gave me a quick tour of the castle the day I arrived, but his castle was expansive.

Halls intersected with each other like a spider's web.

I knew there had to be a spell to help me find my way, but it was too much fun having Leo show me around.

I was happier when he was around.

Probably because I liked him, but I didn't allow myself to settle into such foolishness.

I glanced sideways at him.

It was true. I did like him, but I wasn't sure how I felt about it.

He caught me staring when we reached the bottom of the stairs. "What?"

"Uh, nothing. It's just I'm glad you're here to help me find my way around. This place is gigantic. It's like a labyrinth."

Leo stuck out his elbow. I took it. "You're most welcome," he said.

We walked in silence down the hall.

After several turns, I knew we were getting closer to the kitchen because of the delicious aroma.

Blueberry muffins. My favorite, I thought, swallowing.

"I hope you're hungry," he said as we entered the kitchen, and he directed me to sit on a wooden chair.

"I am," I said when he sat beside me.

Cook, whose name was Mrs. Flamico, brought over a platter of muffins, some creamy butter, and bacon.

"Thank you," I said, taking one of the muffins and placing it on my plate.

With my knife, I spread the butter until the muffin was covered.

I broke off a piece and popped it into my mouth.

The edge was crisp and the inside tender. "Mmmmm," I said, closing my eyes. "It's perfect."

Leo chuckled. "Mrs. Flamico makes the best food."

I glanced at the cook and caught her face burning with embarrassed pride. "Stop it. Your compliments won't get you thirds," she said, bringing over a big plate of scrambled eggs and potatoes.

She set them in front of him, and Leo dug in.

I had a feeling she would give him fourths if he asked.

"So, what are you making for the banquet tonight?" Leo asked her between bites.

She waved a hand at him. "It's a surprise. You'll find out."

Leo smiled and stuffed another forkful of food in his mouth.

We ate in silence.

When we finished, we thanked Mrs. Flamico.

Leo magicked the dishes clean and then magicked them back into their position on top of a bunch of others.

When we were out in the hallway, he asked, "You ready?" He grabbed my hand, and again I felt the cold heat of fire and ice.

"Sure," I replied, trying to ignore how my skin tingled as he gripped my hand tighter.

POSIES

"AVANDEY." Leo spoke the word quietly.

There was a gentle rush, and our bodies traveled like apparitions down hallways, through rock walls, and out onto the grounds.

I watched in awe as we floated past groundkeepers through bushes, trees, and a large lake. Until we reached a garden surrounded by thick bushes and covered in what looked like roses.

"Stolenvey." At the word, our bodies stopped, and my feet touched the ground.

I took a deep breath. "I always wondered what it would feel like to be a ghost," I said, feeling the slightest bit woozy.

"Is that the normal way people of Polonias travel, or were you showing off?" I turned in a circle, taking in my surroundings. We were in a garden filled with flowers.

"A little of both," he said, sheepishly. "It's quick and easy. Think you can remember the words?"

"Sure," I said, repeating them in my mind.

"Good." He walked to the edge of the garden and picked a flower that sort of looked like a blue rose.

Then he turned and brought it to me.

I took it from his hand.

The petals were buttery soft and smelled like roses too.

I pressed the center to my nose and inhaled. Something pinched me.

"Ouch," I said, pulling it away. At the center of the flower was a little - girl.

I could just make out her head, shoulders, and arms.

She had her arms crossed and was glaring at me, or at least trying to.

"What in the world?" I asked, handing the flower girl back to Leo.

She reminded me of a mini Polly.

"These aren't really flowers, but posies." He held his hand flat, and the petals turned downward, becoming a lovely dress, the same as Polly's.

The little posie walked to the edge of Leo's fingers and shook a fist at me.

"I'm sorry," I whispered, covering my smile in my hand. "I didn't mean to hurt you."

She crossed her arms and turned away in a huff.

Leo chuckled and put his face close to the posie's.

"It's my fault. I told her your garden was special. I wanted to show you to her. She thought you smelled lovely. Am I right, Cindy?"

I stepped closer. "Yes, he's right. You do smell really good." I gave her an encouraging smile.

She faced me and stepped closer. Then four of what I thought were petals turned to wings at the center of her back.

I never saw Polly do that, but I wondered whether she could.

The posie lifted off Leo's hand, flew closer to me, and patted my nose.

A strange noise came from her mouth.

I had the feeling she was speaking to me, but I couldn't understand.

I looked at Leo for help.

He smiled. "The posie language is a little strange, but you'll get the hang of it. You just need a little magic." He cleared his throat. "Say this: deotha spranza."

The little posie and Leo waited.

I took a deep breath. "Deotha spranza."

As soon as I spoke the words, a strange wave of air struck my eardrums.

The feeling touched my throat, as well.

The posie flipped her long red hair. "Greetings, Cinderella. It's lovely to meet you. My name is Cyan. Welcome to my garden."

I blinked several times, surprised her mouth moved, and I understood. "Nice to meet you," I finally said.

Cyan flew higher and out toward the middle of the garden.

Leo sidled up next to me and took my hand.

As Cyan waved her hands, thousands of posie creatures flew off the shrubs, bushes, and stems and into the air.

I thought of the pixilettes from Sharra.

They were around the same size, but a pixilettes' wings were more like a dragonfly than a flower.

As we watched, the posies performed a sort of dance.

Each moved in sync with others. They were beautiful.

"What do you think?" Leo asked.

"I love them," I breathed. The posies twirled and swayed to music I couldn't hear.

"Are they flowers or something else?" I finally asked.

Leo chuckled. "Flower isn't acceptable to you?"

"Most flowers don't talk and dance, but after all I've seen here, I'll accept pretty much any explanation." I smirked.

"Remember, everything here is created of magic. Most can talk. You just have to be able to understand them."

I nodded, thinking of the words I used to understand Cyan. "Will I always be able to understand the posies now that I've spoken the magic words?"

"You will. Yes." He led me over to a bench where we sat.

I couldn't take my eyes from the flowers. They were incredible.

"The posies are a type of fairy," Leo went on. "Here in Polonias, they are in charge of reseeding in the spring and fall. Since it's summer, they're in full out party mode."

"Cool. In Sharra, there are creatures called pixilettes. Posies remind me of them a little," I said, smiling.

"I've met a pixilette before. She was known as Ryden."

I glanced over at the prince. "I know her," I said, surprised and thinking even though we weren't on Earth, it was a small world.

We sat comfortably together for a long while, enjoying the posies, and each other's company. Leo was really easy to talk to. It was nice to speak with him about nothing at all. A sense of calm overtook me, and I smiled. I really did like it here.

"I should probably get you back. The celebration will begin in a few hours, and I know you'll want to get ready."

"Alright," I said, allowing him to help me up.

He tucked my hand into the crook of his arm, and we walked together to the edge of the gardens.

Several of the posies held petals in their tiny hands.

Cyan flew forward, presenting me with one. "We wanted you to have these in honor of the celebration tonight."

"Thank you," I replied, as she placed it in my hand.

After her, dozens of posies came forward, dropped petals into my cupped hands, and then flew away.

When they were finished, my hands were filled.

I looked at Cyan, unsure about what to do with all of them. I didn't want to be disrespectful, but they were petals, though the aroma coming off them was incredible.

Cyan hovered just above my hand.

From within her dress, she pulled a wand and waved it.

The petals spun together and transformed into a small bottle.

The top was shaped like a flower.

Inside the iridescent glass bottle was a light blue liquid.

"Wear it, and all who catch a whiff will be unable to do anything but agree with all you say," Cyan said.

"Thank you," I said, studying the bottle more closely.

It was more a potion than a perfume.

I knew and knew the contents could be exploited. I needed to keep it safe.

"I am so grateful to you, Cyan, and all posies for your welcoming Cinderella and for your lovely gift. Good day," Leo said and bowed.

In response, the posies flew around him, speaking their returned gratitude.

Leo grasped my hand and uttered the word, "Avandey."

As I waved goodbye, we drifted out of the garden, over the river, and onto a path near the castle.

A RABBIT TRUTH

"STOLENVEY." Leo used the word to stop our supernatural travel. "Be careful with that potion. The gift is as she said. If someone discovers you've used the concoction on them, they won't be happy."

"I kinda figured. So why would they give it to me?" I tucked the bottle into the pocket of my dress so it wouldn't be seen.

"Posies have lived a long time. Some believe they can see the future. Others believe their power is even stronger than that. They believe posies can travel to the future and the past as well as predict it."

"Merde," I swore softly.

It seemed the little creatures had some elven blood in them as well.

Leo shook his head. "I don't know the truth. No one really does, but it's nice to have them on your side, especially if they know something we don't."

I agreed, and we continued back to the castle. When we reached my room, Leo stopped.

"I'll see you tonight, Cinderella." He gently stroked my cheek with the back of his hand.

My body tingled.

I swallowed back the feelings coursing through me. "See ya," I said, and quickly shut the door, leaning against it.

I removed the bottle from my pocket and studied the liquid inside. I couldn't catch a whiff of the scent, but I knew it would smell amazing, and I debated dabbing a bit on for the party, but quickly decided not to.

The dress Quilla made for me, the one I put in the closet before leaving earlier, fluttered through the air and stopped near my bed.

"What the hell?" I went to the closet and tucked the potion in my underthings drawer, way in the back.

As I walked away, I changed my mind, deciding the hiding place wasn't secure enough.

I retrieved the bottle and searched for a dress with pockets, finding a periwinkle gown similar to the one I had on.

After a quick glance toward the closet door, I slid the potion inside the pocket closest to the wall.

Satisfied, I left the closet, shutting the doors.

The dress moved so it was beside me and I screamed in fear.

"Stop it," I said, grabbing at my racing heart. "You're worse than an apparition." It seemed to sulk, the sleeves drooping slightly.

"Sorry," I said quietly, running a hand over the skirt.

Movement from my bed turned my attention there.

Curled atop my covers were two furry brown rabbits.

"Why?" I gasped in surprise.

The bunnies woke in unison, their ears twitching.

They weren't small bunnies; each looked to be at least a foot in length.

I guessed these were the rabbits I saw around the castle, one of which continuously played tricks on me.

"What do you two want?" I asked, figuring they would run off the way they had in the past.

Instead, they carefully hopped to the end of the bed and stopped.

I took a tentative step toward them. "You aren't going to run?" I crossed my arms, not expecting a response.

At the sound of my voice, one of the rabbits scooted backward while the other sniffed me.

"I won't bite," I said, holding out my hand.

Twinkling lights appeared suddenly around them.

Just a few at first, but quickly more and more surrounded them until the light was so bright, I looked away.

When I turned back, the twin bunnies were gone and, in their place, sat a girlish creature.

Pointed ears poked through hair the color of chestnuts.

Her eyes were amber.

She wore a forest green dress and matching shoes that reminded me of leaves.

Between her shoulder blades grew two beautiful, gossamer wings.

They fluttered rapidly, like a fan turned on high. I blinked and brushed some fluttering hair out of my face.

"Oh, sorry," she said, her voice high and soft.

As she spoke, her wings slowed until they came to a stop.

"What happened to the bunnies?" I asked, trying not to stare, but I couldn't help it.

Between the posie, Quilla, Polly, and now this girl, I was beginning to feel that possessing magic in this land was nothing unless it was accompanied by a set of wings - or at least a flower dress.

Neither of which I owned.

The girl's body changed to a bright shade of yellow.

"Uh, I - I'm the bunnies. They are m - me. W - we are each other," she stammered nervously, clutching her hands together.

"You are the bunnies?" I asked, watching her.

She looked more confused than I felt. "A - a spell." Her eyes darkened. Her thin brows scrunched together. "A cu - curse is more like it."

She hopped off the bed.

She was taller than expected.

Her head came to my shoulders.

"You were cursed? By whom? Why?" What a terrible thing to do to someone.

She sighed. "Mizrabel did it."

I was about to ask for more information on Mizrabel but the girl continued.

"Mizrabel is a dark sorceress. She lives on Thorn's Peak, to the east of the castle, past the Golden Forest." She turned her face in the direction of my window.

Her wings fluttered slightly.

"My name is Anna - Anna Belle Sun." She turned her amber eyes on me. "I'm a woodland fairy. My family lives in the Golden Forest."

"Mizrabel sounds miserable," I said, smiling at my joke, trying to lighten the mood, but Anna Belle didn't join in.

I cleared my throat. "Nice to meet you." I stuck out my hand to shake hers.

I didn't know why, but it seemed like the right thing to do.

Anna Belle fell to her knees and took my hand in both of hers, kissing my knuckles. "It's an honor to make your acquaintance, Cinderella."

I was more than a little shocked. "What are you doing?" I asked, pulling her up by her elbow. "There's no need for that."

She turned a bright yellow. "I'm showing you my respect. As you are the one true ruler of Polonias, it's my duty and honor to bow before you." She bobbed a curtsy.

I took a step back as a sudden and strange panic curled through my stomach. "You have me mistaken for someone else. Leo and his family are the rulers of this land. I'm just a guest."

She walked forward and placed a hand over my heart.

I let her, too stunned to move away.

The palm of her hand seemed to radiate warmth.

I looked down and would swear I saw an orangey glow coming from her.

"What are you doing?" I whispered, locking eyes with her.

"Checking." After a few moments, she nodded. "You are the one, Cinderella. And contrary to what you may think, or even what the king may believe, you will rule this land. Honorably, too, I think." Anna Belle pulled her hand away and stepped back.

"Your heart is strong, full of magic, full of the blood of this people, and more. There is much you must learn, but as a lowly forest fairy, it is not my place to be your teacher. Talk to the pretend prince. Ask him to tell you whether or not I'm lying."

Anna Belle started to breathe heavily. She bent over, trying to catch her breath. "That's what I - I came to t - tell you."

"What's wrong? Anna Belle, are you okay? Do I need to take you to the doctor?" As I said the words, I realized I didn't even know if there were doctors in this land.

Maybe there were medicine people, or perhaps everyone knew magical spells to heal themselves when they were wounded or sick.

"Call me Anna when I'm like this," she choked out. "That is what my friends call me."

"I will, Anna." I rubbed a hand across her back.

I also tried to remember a healing spell, but I didn't know what was wrong with her.

SENOR SAUCY PANTS

"Is there something I can do?" I asked, wishing I wasn't so magically inept in this land.

Anna shook her head. "No, it's the curse. No one can help me except Mizrabel, and she won't." She spat the last word out.

Bright, sparkling stars surrounded her entirely and then she was no longer a woodland fairy, but two brown rabbits again.

They wiggled their noses at me.

I kneeled on the floor next to them.

The one on the right climbed into my lap and burrowed under my arms.

The one of the left bit my outstretched finger and darted behind the curtains.

"Hey, where are you going?" I called after it.

Of course, there was no answer. I glanced at the bunny still in my lap. "I'm guessing you're Anna, and the other, more offensive one is Belle?"

She looked at me with her dark eyes, then hopped behind the curtain after the other one.

Though all the animals in Polonias could speak, I guessed Anna and Belle couldn't because of Mizrabel.

Or perhaps it was as with the posies. I didn't understand their language.

I followed them over to the curtain and pushed the heavy material back, but they were gone.

After carefully checking around the sill, I noticed a little door in the wall under the window.

I pushed, and the wooden door fell open.

Lying on my stomach, I tried to peer inside, but it was too dark. Using one finger, I closed the door and stood.

And made a decision. I wanted to talk to Snow.

Wrapping my hand around the hourglass, I closed my eyes and thought of Sharra. The castle. Snow's door just outside her bedroom.

With a whoosh, I sailed through the witch mists.

This time, I listened intently to see if I could understand what they were saying, but to no avail.

The noise was gone, replaced by the smell of old drapes and vanilla. I had arrived.

"Cindy," Snow said. She sounded as surprised as I felt. At least I didn't have to search for her.

I heaved a breath and opened my eyes. "How did you get here?" she asked, hugging me.

"This," I said, relieved to be here.

"You'll have to explain what it is some time." She glanced over her shoulder.

We were in the hall, and several worker vampires were waiting at the door, watching me curiously.

"I don't have long, but I needed to see you." Sometimes I got the nagging suspicion Snow didn't need me anymore.

Growing up, I was the one she went to and held for comfort and cheering up.

But she had Dorian for that now as well as others like her, so where did that leave me?

She hugged me again. "I'll always need you, Cin," she said, saying what I was thinking aloud.

Tears touched the edge of my lashes. "It's good to see you." I sniffled.

"And you. How are things going in Polonias?"

"Fine, I guess." I sighed.

"Tell me what's the matter." She took my hand and led me into her living room.

I flopped onto the couch and covered my eyes with my hand. "What isn't the matter?" I said, wiping my eyes.

"How can I help?" Snow sat next to me, propping my legs on top of hers.

I let out a sob, unable to understand what my problem was. "Maybe I'm going to start my period or something," I said and sat up.

"Tell me what you're doing tonight." Snow encouraged, changing the subject.

"I'm going to a party," I said, glancing at her.

Crap. Time passed much faster there than here.

I literally had only a few more seconds, and then I needed to get back.

"Ooooh, a party sounds fun." Snow clapped her hands in excitement, and I couldn't fight the smile that sprung to my lips.

She wasn't one of those girly-girls.

I was the only girl she hung out all through high school, so her acting all girly was pretty funny. "Who is hosting? The prince, Leo?" she asked.

I chuckled. "He'll be there, and really he's been nothing but charming. It's his father who doesn't seem to like me."

Snow took a deep breath, returned to her usual serious self. "Why does going to a party make you cry?"

I sat up. "The party will be fine. It isn't that - " I paused and rubbed my eyes.

How did I tell her everything?

How did I tell her about the posies and Polly? About Quilla and Anna Belle? How could I -

"Just tell me, Cin. Tell me what's going on with you. I'm listening." She touched my arm, and I looked at her.

"Okay." I thought about where to begin.

"There's a woodland fairy named Anna Belle who's cursed and changes randomly into two gigantic bunnies," I said.

"I have a fairy godmother. Her name is Quilla and she's allergic to magic. Then there's Polly, the girl who is also a rose. She asked me to help her save this world. She said I'm her sister."

I shook my head. "I've been there a week, and I haven't done anything really, just walked around the castle. Plus, well, I'm still so sad about Gabe. How could he be such a jerk? And Leo is kind - to me and to everyone I've seen him come in contact with. I feel at home there, but at the same time, I'm also lost and lonely." A tear trickled down my cheek.

"Does that make any sense?"

"I get it." She shrugged. "Why not stay here? Don't go back."

I started, and my heart began to race.

It was my moment of clarity.

I had an effing choice.

Snow was right. I could stay and forget about all of it.

Then I remembered Polly and Anna Belle.

They needed me there. I still wasn't sure why, but it didn't feel right to abandon them. "I can't."

"Remember when we were little, and your dad would give us each a giant plate full of pasta?"

"Of course. I remember the tummy ache after we finished the whole thing." I wondered where she was going with that.

"As we got older, we were able to eat more and more. That's all you need to do. Take what you're doing, who you're meeting, what you'll become, one bite at a time, 'kay?"

I smiled. "I like it. Thanks for the pep talk."

"Welcome. Is that it?"

"How do I do all I need to and not feel so lost at the same time?" I studied her, knowing if anyone understood what I was going through, it was Snow.

"Take a forkful. Chew that. Do your best with that. Then, when you're ready, move on. It really does help."

"Are you saying being the vampire queen isn't all it's cracked up to be?"

Snow snorted. "Let's just say if I could choose to go back to the way things were before Christopher bit me, I might consider it."

"But then, what about Senor Saucy Pants?" I meant Dorian, of course.

Snow burst out laughing. Sucked in a breath and purred. Like, actually made a rumbling sound in the back of her throat. "We still would've ended up together, I promise you that. He's - " She trailed off, and I had a momentary pang of jealousy.

Why couldn't I have that?

I wanted to smack the smug right out of her voice.

"So glad one of us is happy," I admitted, knowing my time was nearly up. "I need to go."

"You will be too. I know it. Have fun at your party." She stood, and I did too.

She hugged me, and I returned it before stepping back and closing my eyes.

I took hold of the hourglass and thought Polonias and my room.

The witch mists were noisier this time like they recognized me, and I knew I needed to keep away from them.

After several moments, I opened my eyes and breathed with relief.

I was back in my room in Polonias.

The clock said my party started in five minutes.

Crap!

Well, at least I hadn't missed it.

Using magic, I did my hair and makeup and had the dress cinched up.

Then I slid on my glass slippers.

A knock sounded at my door.

MAGICAL TREES

LEO STOOD in the entrance looking handsome. He wore a blue and silver jacket and black pants, the ends tucked into shiny black boots.

His sandy-colored hair was combed back, but one lock kept falling over his right eye. He whipped it out of his face, then brushed his hair back with his fingers.

Perfect lips curved upward in a smile as I watched his eyes slide from my face down my body and back up again.

"You look magnificent, Cinderella. I hope you don't mind if I escort you to the party."

I smiled, glad he was there, that I didn't have to go alone.

"Thank you," I responded. "I would like that very much."

Especially since I didn't know where the party was being held.

Leo stuck out his elbow, and I took it.

We walked together down the hall, past several closed doors, through a large sitting area, down several sets of stairs until we finally arrived at a grand ballroom. It was twice the size of the one in Pops' house.

Music played in the background, and several elegantly dressed couples danced in perfect unison around the dance floor.

There was a large display of food next to a fountain of pink liquid. Round tables covered in thick blue linens took up one half of the floor while the dancers and the musicians shared the other side.

When Leo and I entered the ballroom, several heads turned toward us. Leo pressed his hand over mine.

Tendrils of cool warmth shot through my fingers.

I sucked in a breath and looked up at him. "Be strong. Don't let them see you're nervous."

I wanted to tell him I wasn't nervous, that I felt fan-freaking-tastic, that I didn't care what these people, my people, thought of me.

But all of it would be a lie. "Okay," I said softly.

Leo turned. "Care to dance?"

He gave me a look, one I couldn't comprehend, and bowed, just exactly as the prince in the Cinderella movie had, right before they danced.

It was like deja vu and an episode of Supernatural combined.

"Um, I have no idea how to dance the way they are dancing," I said, indicating the couples moving on the floor.

They seemed to move like liquid, each step, and sway flowing into the next. It was breathtaking, but way out of my league.

Leo's bottom lip brushed against my earlobe, and I shuddered. "You can with magic," he whispered.

I turned into him, so I could see his eyes. "Really?"

"Yes." He took my hands in his.

This time I was prepared for the cooling-warm jolt his touch brought, but it still surprised me, filled me with fluttery butterflies. "Exhailith duatith," he said, his eyes focused on mine.

An ache of magic shot into my fingers, up my arms, and through my body.

Leo winked. "Think you can handle it now?"

My body already responded as though it knew the steps since before I was born.

I grinned. "Yeah, actually. I do."

I allowed him to lead me onto the floor.

People observed us as we progressed to the middle.

Then Leo spun me into his arms.

"Here we go," he said, and our bodies began to move just like the others.

Those dancing stopped to watch, but only for a moment.

Soon they began dancing along with us.

It was exhilarating, being in control of my body, but at the same time not.

Leo was a great dance partner, and I realized I was laughing. Like, out loud.

When the song ended, Leo released me, and my body shuddered.

"That was amazing," I said.

His eyes raked over me.

"That it was." He took my hand.

I realized we were the only ones left on the dance floor.

Everyone's focus was elsewhere, and they spoke with excited whispers.

I sighed with relief until I felt Leo's body get stiff.

"What's the matter? Did something happen? Did I do something I shouldn't have?" I asked, afraid to hear the answer.

"No," he said, his voice filled with awe. "Look at the trees."

I did. Before that moment, I didn't notice the decorations, including the trees potted and resting along all of the walls. The trees suddenly bloomed into flowers of all shapes, sizes, and colors.

My breath caught in my throat. "How beautiful," I said, stepping closer to Leo.

From the way everyone was speaking, and the tension in the room, I got the feeling the trees blooming wasn't a regular occurrence.

"Is this something new?"

Leo lifted my chin. "You did this." He seemed genuinely surprised.

"It's just as Polly said. You will save this world." He spoke as though he finally grasped something he hadn't believed before.

Like he didn't believe what Polly said until that moment.

If that was so, why would he make such an effort to bring me here?

"Is that bad?" I finally asked.

"No, it's good." A huge smile broke out across his face. "Very, very good."

"Dinner is served," a man in a fuchsia suit said in a booming voice.

"You hungry?"

"A little," I said, only the teeniest bit nervous.

Leo led me over to a table where his father and two other people were sitting. He held the chair for me, and I sat while he pushed the chair under the table.

I was impressed by his chivalry.

Most of the boys back home seemed to be under the impression that chivalry was truly dead. Not that I could blame them.

Many women didn't like it when men did anything for them because they took it to mean they were more, and we were less.

I didn't see it that way at all.

Chivalry was kindness.

Once Leo was seated, food appeared in front of us.

It looked like vegetable soup and smelled delicious.

I was hungry but didn't move to eat it because I worried about doing something I shouldn't.

What were the customs of Polonias, especially when around the king?

I peeked over to see what the king was doing.

He seemed to be waiting for something.

I noticed one of the other women seated near him picked up her spoon and sipped.

Leo leaned over. "It's custom for the ladies to take the first bite, and then the men will follow."

"Oh." Crap, they were waiting on me.

I picked up my spoon and dipped it into the soup, lifted it to my lips, and tasted. It was every bit as delicious as it smelled.

Leo and the other men followed, and soon, thank goodness, everyone was eating.

Glasses filled with something dark red.

Thirsty, I moved to take a drink, but paused, leaning into Leo.

"Is there a custom for drinking I should know about?"

He smiled and seemed pleased I wanted to learn to do things right.

"Yes, the men usually drink first to make sure the wine is suitable for the ladies."

"Okay." I put my empty hand back in my lap and waited, thinking the king would probably prefer to see me choke on an onion rather than do something for me out of the kindness of his heart.

PARTY CRASHER

WHEN THE SOUP course was finished, the bowls and wine glasses disappeared.

Thankfully I was able to empty my glass before it vanished.

The second course was plates filled salad greens, along with chunks of pear and cranberry and celery, cucumber and slivered carrots.

Another wine glass appeared at the top of my plate. It held a clear, bubbling liquid. I took a bite of the salad, enjoying the textures and flavors as I waited for a blasted man to drink from his glass.

When no one did, I leaned over to Leo. "Care to take a drink so I can?" I winked, and he chuckled.

"Of course." He picked up his glass.

I watched his expression as he gulped down a large swallow.

He was focused on his father, as though they were having a conversation only they could hear.

Finally, Leo set his glass down. "I - " Leo began but wasn't allowed to finish before the king stood.

He raised his glass, and everyone else in the room followed suit.

"To Cinderella. We welcome you to our humble land of Polonias. May you live forever in harmony, and may you and your seed prosper in the land eternally." The king lifted his glass. Everyone followed, and a sea of hands, each holding their own glass of champagne, echoed the king.

"To Cinderella," they repeated, cheering before toasting in what seemed like a pleasant manner, then the moment was gone.

The men drank first, followed by the women before everyone returned to whatever they were doing before.

A feeling of loneliness swept over me.

That was the worst part about being here.

Feeling like I didn't have any friends.

With time, I thought Leo and I could be friends.

It felt like we were on our way toward that sort of bond.

I glanced over at the prince.

He was about to take a bite of salad.

"What?" he asked, then stuck the forkful into his mouth.

I enjoyed watching his lips move.

"Nothing." I popped a pear into my mouth, enjoying the sweet flavor.

Before I could say more, the lights flickered once, and then again, and then went out.

"Having a party without me? How typical." The voice was female and scratchy, like the growl of a prowling cat.

A red orb of light appeared in the center of the giant room.

The face of a woman materialized, and as the light grew brighter, I could make out more of her.

Black hair streaked with gray and green hung in a braid over one shoulder and down to her hips.

Her black dress glistened like eel skin, the collar low, barely covering her breasts. A slit in the hem went up to the middle of her thigh.

She wore some type of ankle boots; in the glowing red light, they seemed to writhe and hiss like snakes in a cage.

"Where is she? Where is the girl who's destined to save this world?" She raised her voice to ask the questions, searching the room until her eyes fell on the king.

Scared whisperings drifted along with the air.

"She'll kill us."

"Why has she come?"

"Tell the sorceress where Cinderella is."

I could just make out the outline of the king.

His fork was midway between his mouth and his plate, but he looked frozen.

Leo was on the edge of his seat. The gleam of a knife shone in his hand. He seemed ready to stand and fight.

"Show yourself, girl, or I'll start killing the guests." A red light shot from her fingers and scorched a table near her.

The occupants wailed and screamed in fear.

I stood hurriedly before I could talk myself out of it.

"My name is Cinderella. I've come to - do what I can to help Polonias. I don't know if it's my destiny, but I get the feeling everyone in this room believes you're looking for me." As I spoke, I lifted my chin, something my mother had taught me.

Leo placed his hand in mine and rose beside me.

I could feel the tension in his body, but I didn't have time to worry about whether I upset him.

"Mizrabel, leave this castle at once. You are not welcome here," Leo said.

Each word sounded like the boom of a drum and sent a shiver of trepidation down my spine.

In the next instant, the lights came back on.

Mizrabel sauntered over to us.

I studied her and realized she was probably beautiful once.

Her eyes were black as coal, and even her lips were dark.

I wondered if she wore black lipstick or if she came by the color naturally.

As she came closer, I could see the veins through her paperwhite skin.

Black blood seemed to pump through them.

Mizrabel kept her eyes trained on me, studying me with the same intensity I did her.

Not for the first time, I tried to picture myself as she would see me.

Blond hair. Perfect makeup. Lips glossed.

A sweet blue dress on my body along with sparkling silver shoes adorning my feet. I was nothing but a child.

Fear snaked through my belly and ate up all of the butterflies.

All my life, I believed I was brave.

Staring at the woman before me, I realized I never understood what fear was.

Until now. Until her and this very moment.

She reached out a hand, and I noticed her long black nails.

I wanted to shrink away, but I held firm and took her hand in mine.

"It's nice to meet you," I said, and immediately felt stupid.

Her eyebrows lifted.

She stared at our hands, clasped together as a myriad of emotions traveled across her features.

Sadness, happiness, and anger, as well as others I couldn't figure out.

Finally, her eyes lifted and held mine. "It's nice to see you again, daughter."

Stunned, I didn't respond.

Leo stepped between us and separated our hands. "I'll not ask you again to leave. The next time it'll be with a witch blade to your navel."

Mizrabel lifted her head and cackled. "Dear boy, don't make threats you aren't prepared to keep."

I was still in shock.

Had the woman called me her daughter?

Did she mean it literally or figuratively?

Like, we can both do magic, so that makes me part of a long line of witches, which means we're somehow connected -

"Merde," I swore quietly. My head and heart pounded as one.

"I'll leave as soon as I make my toast." She spun in a circle, taking everyone in at once. A glass appeared in her hand, and she raised it.

"To Cinderella." She wrapped her free hand around my waist and pulled me against her side. "To save them, she must leave them and search for the glass lyre," she said aloud. \

Then leaned down to whisper in my ear. "When you find it, bring it to me. I'm not the evil monster I'm made out to be. You need my help to save this world from the Sickness. Remember that, Cinderella. My daughter."

She stepped back and spun me so we were face to face.

People were talking loudly, but it was only background noise.

It felt like there was just Mizrabel and me, and the rest of the world was nothing but landscape.

Her words repeated over and over in my mind.

I really wanted to ask her about the whole daughter thing, but now didn't feel like the right time.

What seemed important was finding the damn glass lyre.

"Where do I begin to look?" I finally asked, not expecting an answer.

She gave me a wicked smile before blowing some kind of red powder in my face.

I flinched when it touched me and began to see stars.

From what sounded like far away, I heard her say, "You'll find it in a place you may call home beneath books and wonderous foam."

"Direction?" I mumbled, wiping at the powder, but feeling woozy like I hadn't slept in days.

"Go home, child." With those three words still lingering on her lips, the sorceress vanished.

I'LL GO WITH YOU

WHAT HAPPENED after Mizrabel left was kind of a blur.

People spoke words, but it all sounded like a muffled foreign language.

Someone lifted me, and I was carried, then laid on a bed.

Quilla appeared.

Between her sneezing and bright yellow and green outfit, there was no way I could mistake her for anyone else.

Her concerned face came close to mine.

She peered into my eyes - so did Leo and the king. Even Anna Belle and the leopard I hadn't talked to yet -

What was her name? Violet.

Even she came into the room and looked at me.

I couldn't figure out what they were doing or what was wrong with me. I knew I needed to get out of bed and begin looking for the glass lyre.

When the room was quiet, I closed my eyes, trying to imagine what Mizrabel meant about going home.

If she was my literal mother, wouldn't that mean Polonias was my home?

But if she actually meant where I was raised, I would need to go back to Salem, which made no sense.

I would remember seeing something as strange as a glass lyre. Wouldn't I?

My mind ran through different places within my parents' house.

Next, I moved on to Snow's, and finally, Professor Pops'.

Could it be at his home?

I scoured each of his rooms with my mind, trying to remember all I saw, but I couldn't recall every detail. I needed to be inside them and look around.

Which meant doing as Mizrabel said and returning home - to Salem Massachusetts - the place where I'd lived nearly all of my life.

Had this past week in Polonias been a total waste?

I knew the answer was no.

If I hadn't come, I wouldn't have met Mizrabel.

And meeting her seemed like the most important thing at the moment.

She told me what to do to save Polonias.

But why?

I guessed she had ulterior motives.

As I debated the answer, exhaustion won out in the end, and I fell asleep.

I DON'T KNOW how long I slept, but when I woke, all my dreams were in the forefront of my mind.

They were of my mother - well, the woman claiming to be my mother.

Mizrabel.

She terrified me, filled me with sadness and fear like I never knew.

But a tiny part of me, buried deep in the corner of my mind, wanted to get to know her.

Guilt raged through my body.

She was an evil witch.

I should be trying to find ways to defeat her, not get to know her.

Sunbeams touched my cheek, and I opened my eyes.

Leo stood at the window beside the bed.

He peered through the glass, and I wondered what he saw, what he was thinking.

He no longer wore his party clothes but wore dark jeans and a forest green button-up shirt, the long sleeves rolled up to his biceps.

Light shone in his hair and on his thick dark lashes.

I admired his lips, the shape of his jaw, and the trimness of his waist. He was gorgeous.

"How long have I been asleep?" I asked, sitting up. My throat was parched.

Leo turned slightly, and a smile bloomed across his face. "You're okay?"

I slid to the edge of the bed. "Yeah, I think so. I'm just thirsty."

He poured me a glass of water, handing it to me.

I drank gratefully before handing it back.

He took it. "Sorry, your party didn't end the way it was supposed to. Cake and fireworks were on the agenda for the finale." His face grew dark. "But Mizrabel showed up and ruined everything. Do you remember that?"

"I do. I'm not sure what she meant or what I should do." I tried to stand, but my legs were shaky.

I guessed whatever the red powder was, it affected me negatively, like a poison.

His eyes left my face and drifted toward my body. I followed his gaze.

"Crap." I was in a white tank and boy shorts that didn't cover much. "How did I get in this?" I asked, pulling the bed covers up to my chest.

Leo rubbed the back of his neck, then turned away. "Anna Belle started to help, but then she turned into Anna and Belle and, well - " Leo trailed off and shrugged.

"Got it," I said with a short laugh.

"Quilla came in and finished getting you ready for bed."

"Oh." That made me feel a little better.

"Why don't you get dressed, and then we can talk." He used magic to open my bedroom door and strode to it.

"Sure."

"I'll meet you in the kitchen in thirty minutes." He walked out of my room and was gone.

I washed my face, put on some lip-gloss, and threw my hair in a high ponytail.

Since Leo was in jeans, I wanted to be as well, so I magicked a pair of sandblasted skinny jeans, a boho-chic white blouse with a gray tank underneath, and gray suede boots.

The heels were flat, and the tops zipped just under my knees.

Totally casual, but adorable. It made me feel more like me.

When I was finished, I used magic to open the door.

Quilla was pacing just outside.

A hand flew to my throat in surprise.

Her outfit was flamboyant as usual - bright yellow and pink dress, hair teased with butterflies pinned in, black pointy boots, and black and pink polka dot tights.

"What the hell?"

"Sorry, Cinderella," she said breezily, walking past me and into my room. She sneezed.

"I was just leaving to meet Leo," I said, but followed her back inside.

She didn't seem to hear me. The door shut, and Quilla grabbed my hand. "I've been up all night thinking about Mizrabel and what she said. Have you had a chance to think about it? Her fritzy toast, or curse, or whatever you want to call it."

I gave her hands a squeeze and dropped them. "Not really." I went to the same window Leo was looking out earlier and studied the landscape.

Polonias was beautiful, full of color, and vibrant with life.

"No?" Quilla asked, moving to stand next to me. "How could you not?" She waved her hand, and my bed was made.

Then she sneezed. "I mean, that woman is dreadful."

I sighed. "She's my mother?" The question moved off my lips with the hope Quilla would deny it.

She didn't. "It's true. We hoped to wait a while before you found out."

"So, who's my father?" I crossed my arms and turned away. "Never mind, I don't think I want to know."

Quilla shut the curtains, throwing the room into darkness. "It's better if you know everything. The sooner, the better at this point, but first, you need to find the glass lyre. I spoke with Violet, the records keeper, and she said it's been mentioned several times in the Life Scrolls."

"What about Mizrabel? Why would she even suggest that I find it? Why would she try to help me if she's trying to destroy Polonias?" That part made no sense.

Quilla shrugged. "It isn't that your mother is against us, she's just never been with us."

"Well, that's as clear as mud." I tucked my hands into the pockets of my pants. "I think I'm supposed to go back to Salem, on Earth. If I go, will you come with me?"

Quilla's face softened, and she touched my hair. "Haven't you figured out that I'm always with you? Even if you can't see me."

She didn't answer my question directly, but I got the sense that she would be there if I needed her. "Okay, well, I guess I'm going home. Or back to Salem." A lump settled in my throat.

That meant back to the house where I grew up and the room where Gabe and I spent so many nights together.

He also broke up with me there.

If I returned, I didn't want to go alone.

"You won't be alone," Quilla said and opened the door.

"I won't?"

Leo walked in. He must've grown tired of waiting for me. "My magic is stronger than yours. I'll go with you."

EASILY LOSE MYSELF

I LIKED the idea of Leo coming with me. At the same time, I didn't.

It could get awkward. "Um, that isn't necessary." My heart sped up.

Leo tucked his hands in his front pockets. "I'm going." He threw his shoulders back. "That's final, Cinderella."

For him to use my full name made me feel like a child being scolded by an unhappy parent. I didn't like it.

Through gritted teeth, I said, "Since when did you start making decisions for me?"

He crossed his arms. "This isn't only about you. It's about this land. As the Prince, I feel it wise to go wherever you go." He raised an eyebrow, and I got the feeling he wanted me to understand more than what he was saying.

This had to do with his father, the king.

He must've ordered Leo to go with me, which meant he had to go. He wasn't given a choice.

"Fine," I said. "When do you want to leave?"

Leo stepped close. "Now," he said, taking my hand.

I didn't mention I used the hourglass to travel to Sharra the day before.

Instead, I took hold of it and said the words that would take me home while I thought of Salem, my house, and my room.

Leo's arms came around me, and I moved closer, enjoying his scent, like citrus.

As we moved through the mists, I saw the shadows of those dwelling there - beady eyes watched, as though hungry to consume me, and I clung harder to Leo.

When the wet air vanished, we stopped.

Leo opened his eyes, and a little piece of my heart softened. "You're a good guy, right, Leo?"

The question was sort of moot because if he wasn't a good guy, he wouldn't want me to know. But I hoped he was.

His hands found the belt loops at my hips, and he pulled me closer. "I'm your guy, Cinderella."

I didn't respond, pushing away from him.

We were in my room.

"Okay," I said, going to my phone, charging on the bedside table. I checked the date and time. Not only was it still morning, but it was the morning of the same day I'd left more than a week ago. Weird.

"It's good you brought us here. It's a great starting place in our search for the lyre." Leo wrapped an arm around my waist.

"You are an old pro already at traveling, too. I'm impressed."

"Thanks," I said as he walked over to my shelves, starting his search.

"I think I would know if the glass lyre was in here." I put my hands on my hips as he picked up one of my old journals and flipped through it.

I took it from him and returned it to its proper place.

His eyes captured mine, and he held my gaze. "We need to look around just in case. Sometimes things get put down and forgotten. Mizrabel said you should go home. It's logical we start here." He shrugged.

"Might as well start in your bedroom." He leaned down like he was going to kiss me. It wouldn't be the worst thing in the world. In fact, it might be great, his lips claiming mine.

But an image of Gabe filled my mind, and I resisted.

Leo glanced past me and at the bed before looking at me, an unspoken question on his lips.

It was obvious what he wanted.

Both of us together, rolling around in the sheets.

I don't know why I was shocked.

He was a man, and he had needs, just like me.

The old me might have taken him up on the subliminal proposition.

But since Gabe, my feelings for him, and Snow, seeing the way she loved her husband - I wanted that more than just sex.

Not that I was against sex.

Not even a little bit.

But, I wanted my own happily ever after.

Everything else felt like settling.

Exhaling, I moved away and checked under my bed.

Nothing but carpet. I stood. "Nothing there."

He watched me a moment longer before returning to his perusal of my shelves.

Everything looked exactly as it had when I left. Even my clothes were still thrown over the chair near my closet.

"Do you have anything that might be considered musical or, I don't know, something made of glass? We should check it out. See if there's magic within it." Leo moved over to my closet and went inside.

"You have a lot of shoes," he called.

I snorted and followed him. "Yeah, so? What's your point?" I pulled a pair of Jimmy Choos from their box.

They were made of crystal and cost over three thousand dollars.

When my dad got the bill, he nearly blew a gasket.

I thought for sure he would take away my credit card.

He didn't. Just told me not to spend that much money on a pair of shoes ever again.

As I studied them, searching for something lyrical, I wondered if he let me get away with so much because of guilt or because he didn't care one way or the other.

It hurt to think the people I believed were my parents were just puppets, pretend parentals. I felt like all this time with them was a lie, that everything I ever believed was a mirage.

Leo took the shoe from me, interrupting my thoughts.

He flipped it over, studying the sole.

"They're glass slippers. Do these count?" I asked.

He smirked. "They're - pretty. Definitely not the glass lyre, though. You should send them to Polonias."

I raised a brow. So he knew what the lyre looked like? "Leo?" I began, but he turned away, taking the other shoe out of its box.

He whispered. "Prelilith Polonias." The shoes vanished.

"What the hell?"

"I've sent them back to your room. When you return to Polonias, they'll be in your closet." He smiled. "Now what about a glass lyre? Have you seen one of those?"

I wasn't sure how to react to him sending away my shoes without asking - without finding out if I was okay with it.

"Cindy?" Leo asked, touching my shoulder.

I needed to concentrate. Shaking my head, I sighed. "A lyre is what, exactly?" I asked, opening one of my drawers and pulling out a pale peach scarf.

"It's like a harp you hold on your lap," Leo answered.

He opened a drawer and pulled out a pair of black lacy undies, holding them up with one finger. "Nice," he said, and I blushed.

"Put those back. There's no glass harp in my underwear drawer." I returned my scarf and closed the drawer.

He put my undies back and shut that drawer too.

"Fine. Does this house have secret passages, secret rooms, a basement, or an attic of some kind?"

I thought about that. "Not that I know of, but anything is possible."

"Hmmm, okay." He placed a hand on the wall nearest to him and spoke a few words. Magic pulsed from his hand like the walls had a heartbeat.

He closed his eyes, concentrating.

I waited, knowing he must be searching the house with magic for secret passages.

I went back into my closet and explored some of the other boxes on the top shelf.

There were trophies, pictures of Snow and me as well as old boyfriends, trinkets, costume jewelry, and letters, but no lyre.

"Know anyone who might have a hidden passage or room in their house here in Salem?" Leo asked.

I returned the box I was looking through to its rightful place on an upper shelf and faced him. "I don't know," I said, though I immediately thought of Pops' mansion.

"This house doesn't have anything," he said, coming to me and putting his hands on my hips, invading my personal space.

He was so close he towered over me.

There was an island in the center of my closet, and he walked me back against it. "At least not that my magic can see." He eyed me. "What are you thinking?"

"Nothing." I shook my head, looking down at the space between us. "Just old memories." I tried to push him away, but he held me fast.

"Can I kiss you?" His eyes searched my face for an answer.

I pressed a finger to his lips, ignoring the zing of white-hot cold racing through me. "I can't," I said, my voice barely audible.

It would be so easy to lose myself in Leo. His kisses. His hands on my body.

I felt sure the experience would be pleasurable yet also meaningless.

He held me a moment longer before letting go. "Why are you fighting us?" He asked the question though he didn't seem to want an answer because he turned away, running a hand over my clothes.

I steadied myself as I tried to think. "I'm not ready to move on," I said, honestly.

Changing the subject, I continued, "There's - " I tried to tell him about the secret passage in Pops' library, but for some reason, nothing came out.

"Cinderella?" He faced me, his features questioning.

I tried again, but the words wouldn't come. So I sidestepped. "Off the top of my head I can't think of any place," I said, surprised I could lie. "Let's just keep searching my house."

I was confused. I didn't know why I felt nervous about telling Leo about Pops' house.

That seemed like a great place to go next.

"Okay," he said.

We rummaged through my room from top to bottom.

I checked to make sure my mom was gone before going into my parents' bedroom. I found plenty, most of which I didn't need to see, none of which was what we were looking for.

Then we searched the spare room, followed by all of the closets and the kitchen.

By the time we finished, I was hot and sweaty and hungry.

Leo magicked us some fried chicken.

We didn't do much talking, probably because I was so tired.

"Let's get some sleep and get a fresh start in the morning." I yawned and stretched, trying to figure out where we could sleep.

If we slept here, my parents would question the letter I had Quilla send, not to mention they would want to know about Leo and how Gabe felt about everything.

That would lead to a conversation I wasn't ready to deal with.

My parents loved Gabe.

Too bad, he didn't love me.

"Great. Let's go." He started for the stairs and my bedroom, but I stopped him.

"Not here," I said.

"Where then?" He looked confused.

"I don't - Hang on," I said, and ran into the bathroom down the hall from the kitchen.

MY THIGHS TREMBLED

CLOSING THE DOOR, I called Snow using magic. "Mirror, mirror, made of glass, find me Snow White, do as I ask."

Immediately I was able to see into Snow's bedroom. The vampire queen's husband stood, naked, his derriere turned toward the mirror.

I cleared my throat, looking away.

Dorian was handsome, but he was also like a brother to me, and there was something so wrong about ogling him.

He yelped. "Son of a - Snow, the damn mirror's for you." He dashed into the bathroom, mumbling something like, "Why can't mirrors just be used the way they were intended?"

I fought back a snicker.

Snow appeared in nothing but a towel. "Hey, Cindy. Long time no chat." She laughed, tucking the bath sheet more tightly around her.

"What the hell do you two do all day? Are you even handling the queenly stuff? What about the school?" I huffed. "Or do you spend all your time in this room? Doing - I mean damn." I shook my head, only a little jealous.

Okay, a lot.

Snow snorted. "We're newlyweds, Cin." She glanced back toward the bathroom then lowered her voice. "The truth is," she leaned in close, "I love sex with him. I really, really love it."

I snorted. "Merde, yeah. Sex is good stuff." I thought of Leo and his brazen offer earlier. Maybe I should change my mind.

It might help me relax.

"So good," Snow's cheeks flushed. "We did this thing earlier where - "

"Stop," I said, but laughed. "I don't want details."

Snow laughed too. "Sorry. It's only I had no idea what I was missing."

"Yeah, yeah." I put my hands in front of the mirror and shook them. "Look, I'd love to compare notes with you, but I have a question."

She put her hands on her hips. "I figured. What's up?"

"Well, I'm - no longer in Polonias. I'm back at my house in Salem, and Leo is with me. It's just the two of us. Alone." I lowered my voice. "And we need a place to stay."

"Why not stay there?" Her face darkened. "And why's he with you? What are you doing?"

I huffed, knowing she was questioning my being with another man when I still loved Gabe.

"We can't stay in my room because I don't want the complications that would go along with introducing Leo to my parents," I growled.

"Anyway, he's here to help me look for a glass lyre. Ever heard of it?" I wanted to tell her about the sorceress, Mizrabel, and that she claimed to be my mother.

But I didn't. Instead, I gulped down resigned breath.

"You know, I was at a meeting the other day where the glass lyre was mentioned. It's said to hold great magic and will give the one who possesses it untold power."

"That sounds about right. Did the person at the meeting happen to say where to find it?" I leaned against the counter, suddenly wishing my biggest worry in life was what to wear to school the next day.

Snow shook her head. "No. It was actually discussed as a myth. We were debating whether to bring it up as part of the Seven Magics curriculum."

"A myth? Snow, you're a vampire, and you live in a magical land with all sorts of creatures we believed were fictional not that many years ago. I don't believe in myths any longer. If someone mentions something, it's most likely true."

"Possibly. I'll ask around, but I think the last time the lyre was seen was in Earth's realm. I bet Pops or Abernathy would know."

"Okay. Thanks, Snow. Do you mind if we stay at your house?"

"Great idea. Not at all."

"Are you done yet?" Dorian hollered from the bathroom.

"Coming." Snow laughed, not the least bit embarrassed.

In high school, she was kind of a prude.

It was true, being loved and loving the right person made all the difference in the world.

I bit back more jealousy.

Once, I thought Gabe and I had the same sort of love, or at least we were getting there, but now things were such a mess.

I swallowed my irritation. "I'll let you get back to - whatever," I said, smiling wryly. Snow deserved all the happiness in the world.

"Alright. Love ya, Cin."

I blew a kiss. "Love you, too."

Snow waved and disappeared out of sight, heading into the bathroom.

I spoke the words to shut the connection between us and took a deep breath.

When I returned to the kitchen, Leo was gone.

"Leo," I called.

There was shouting upstairs.

I ran up to my room.

Gabe had Leo backed against the wall, his forearm at his throat, and a sword at his stomach.

"What the - Gabe, stop!" I yelled.

My heart flip-flopped at seeing him again.

At the same time, I couldn't let him hurt Leo.

"You know this douche?" Gabe growled.

I sprang into action, hitting him on the arm and trying to pull him off the prince. "Yes. And he isn't a douche."

"You moved on already, huh? That was quick." Gabe shoved Leo, his piercing green eyes scrutinizing me, questioning.

Behind him, Leo coughed and leaned over, trying to catch his breath.

I knew I should go over and help him, make sure he was all right, but Gabe's gaze held me captive, and I didn't want to be let go.

"I haven't moved on," I said, swallowing down my need. "He's helping me with something."

"Cin." Gabe swallowed hard and took one giant step forward, scooping me into his arms and pressing my body against his.

I was momentarily lost in him, his strong arms that were so familiar.

Gabe smelled like light and crisp air and some kind of cologne - and - I missed him desperately.

"Gabe." My body fit into every one of his hard lines, and I longed to kiss him. "You - " I stopped.

Saying any more would lead to fighting, and I wasn't ready for that.

Not yet. I didn't want to let him go.

"When I sensed you were back, I came over. And found this clown in your room," he motioned toward Leo, "and no sign of you."

Gabe hugged me tighter. "Cin, I'm sorry," he whispered into my hair.

I met his gaze, my face hovering just below his, and he kissed me.

Softly and filled with questions, like feathers against my skin.

Everything else was forgotten, and I kissed him back with all the love still in my heart, opening my mouth to allow him in.

Leo coughed. "Um, I'm still here," he said, irritated.

I heard him but couldn't make myself care.

My body begged me to forget everything.

Forgive Gabe.

Give him the chance to explain.

Snow gave me the details, but I wanted to hear the words from him.

After what he said, I deserved an explanation.

And, I realized, I wasn't quite ready to forgive him.

He deliberately hurt me then threw me away.

Sure, he was begging for my forgiveness now, but what if he changed his mind again?

I wasn't sure I could survive the hurt a second time.

"Sorry for what?" I asked, breathing heavily, my knees trembling from the intensity of our kiss. "Saying you never loved me? Breaking my heart into tiny pieces and then leaving? Lying? Or maybe it's your complete asshole façade." As I spoke, tears welled in my eyes.

"Tell me, Gabe. What are you sorry for?" I pleaded with my eyes, begging him to say something that would tell me everything was okay.

"I'm going to - step out," Leo said.

Neither Gabe nor I acknowledged him.

Gabe clenched his jaw, and I watched the muscles in his face tighten and release. "Why don't you ditch that guy, and then maybe I'll believe you're actually sad about me leaving, and we can talk."

He was so arrogant. "You have no idea what you're talking about or what's going on because it's always about you. I matter too, and I have a lot going on right now. Which you'd know if you ever bothered to focus on someone besides yourself." I turned away, wishing I could make him disappear.

Gabe wasn't supposed to be around me anyway.

It was like a new commandment or something.

"Stupid chayot rules," I whispered.

Gabe touched me, and it was like fire, the heat of him burning through my shirt.

"You're right," he said. "You can tell me everything."

I missed him. Terribly.

Missed the way my body reacted to his touch.

Missed our time together.

But there was Polly, and Mizrabel, and Quilla, and a whole world that needed saving.

And I belonged to their world. They believed I could help. I wouldn't let them down.

Not only that, but the last time we talked, he said things I couldn't forget.

"I can't right now." I took his hands in mine and squeezed, hoping he would show me he understood and take an interest in what I was doing.

He didn't.

I exhaled and decided to set aside my feelings and ask him for help. "I'm looking for something," I said quietly, feeling defeated. "It's a glass lyre. Ever heard of it?"

Gabe snorted. "Sure." His eyes darkened again.

"It's said that possessing the lyre will give the owner untold power. Why?" Distrust filled his eyes.

He loved me, but only as far as it mattered to him.

"Do you know where it is?" I asked through gritted teeth, wishing things could be different.

"No." He shook his head and let out a mirthless laugh. "Ask the false prince to tell you why he's lying."

I was confused. "Lying?" I glanced at the closed door, wondering what Gabe meant.

Did he know Leo? I thought about what I saw when I found them and wished I knew what they said to each other.

Leo came back into the room like he was listening on the other side of the door.

"Shut the hell up," Leo said, interrupting my thoughts. "If I'm a false prince, then that makes you a play angel." Leo was so mad his entire body shook.

Holy merde, I thought.

"Are you lying?" I asked tentatively.

"What would I have to lie about?" Leo threw his hands in the air and moved to stand near me, but I stepped closer to Gabe.

"I don't know." I shrugged. "You tell me."

My eyes kept going back and forth between the two men, and I couldn't help but feel a little sorry for myself.

Despite everything, I still loved Gabe.

I knew I was acting like an idiot, but the feelings wouldn't go away.

Gabe rolled his eyes. "I don't have time for this shit." He went to the window and pushed back the curtains.

"The glass lyre is a who, not a what." He slid the windowpane open and stepped over the sill, straddling it. His eyes held mine. "Leo knows that."

Without another word, Gabe stepped over the edge and dropped out of sight.

"Gabe," I whispered.

He kept leaving me.

Someday, I was going to have to do something about that.

STUPID BOYS

LEO CAME up behind me and touched my shoulder.

I shrank away, repelled at having someone other than Gabe touch my body. I was still mad at Gabe, but I didn't love him any less.

I couldn't shake the fact that Leo might be lying.

Stupid boys.

"Is it true? The glass lyre is a person?" I asked the question but already knew the answer.

Gabe had no reason to lie about that.

Leo went over to my bed and sat. He stared ahead, not looking at anything. "I hoped to wait until we found it - him or her or whatever."

I was frustrated. "Well, which is it? An it, him, or a her?" The words came out clipped, sarcastic - my way of dealing with things I didn't understand or was afraid of.

Also, I was tired and needed this day to be over.

So tired.

A spell from The Eye of Abernathy flitted off my lips. "Bohemia coverith irreavilth."

That would keep us invisible to anyone who came into the room.

I should've done that in the first place instead of asking Snow if we could stay at her old house next to Pops'.

My limbs were heavy with exhaustion as I made my way over to the bed.

"Why did you do that?" Leo sounded frustrated, but he looked as tired as I felt.

I pulled back my covers, got under them, and rolled away from him. "I can't do this anymore tonight."

"Cinderella?"

I sighed heavily. "Get some rest."

My heart still ached. "Sleep next to me if you want, but don't try anything. I'm not interested. Got it?"

He didn't respond, but I knew he heard me, so I relaxed. "Night, Leo."

I heard first one and then the other of his shoes hit the floor.

He lay down and adjusted the pillow next to mine. After several minutes, his breathing deepened.

I tried to sleep, but after several hours, I carefully got up and went downstairs and out the front door.

One moon - Earth's moon - hung full in the distance with thousands of stars twinkling against the night sky.

Puffs of smoke billowed from random fireplaces like dancing phantoms. I looked back and sighed.

This used to be my home, I thought, nostalgia creeping over my skin like tiny spiders.

I focused and spoke the word that would allow me to travel like a ghost.

"Abrevas." I skimmed along the ground, past and through fences and trees, down streets, through random houses and garages, even a bookstore until I reached Professor Pops' house.

But I didn't stop there.

Without a second thought, I went out the front door, past the kitchen, and down the stairs to the basement.

The door at the bottom was closed, but I went through it into the enormous room filled with stuffed or waxed or - whatever figures.

It was the Museum for the Supernatural.

I moved past the vampire, werewolf, fairy, and troll, each enclosed in their own casing, and over to the wall where the secret stairs were located.

It looked like an ordinary wall. Flat. Painted a light cream.

A picture of a seaside landscape hung in the center, but I knew it was all a mirage. I went through it and floated down the stairs and into the secret room.

Mizrabel's words ran through my mind so many times until it clicked. This secret room under Pops' library.

"Lumia." At the word, a blue light appeared over my head.

"Lithlia." The light rose toward the ceiling and got brighter.

This room was the same as the last time I was in here, complete with a TV, a bean bag chair, and the hole where the twisty slide exited.

There were shelves on either side of the TV, filled with movies, statues, a potted plant in desperate need of watering - and a glass freaking lyre.

"Really?" I walked over, and the light followed, causing the beautiful instrument to sparkle.

It was the height of a hardbound book.

I picked it up, noting that the glass was smooth and dense.

"I thought you were supposed to be a who," I said, grazing my fingers against the long, thin glass strings.

It didn't make any noise, just shone soundlessly. "This can't be right."

I spun in a circle, at a loss about what to do next.

Had Gabe lied?

Or maybe this wasn't the glass lyre I was looking for.

Perhaps it was just a coincidence.

It seemed too easy.

Gabe would've known if it was down here, and if he did, why not tell me, or use the power it supposedly contained for himself?

Dozens of questions thumped inside my head, making it hurt.

I was so tired.

The bean bag chair looked way too comfortable, and my head hurt way too much.

So I did the most logical thing possible - I sat down on it.

The soft material hugged my body.

It felt wonderful.

And I realized, for the first time in a long time, I felt safe.

No one knew where I was.

Closing my eyes, I allowed my mind to wander over the past, and the time I spent in Polonias with Leo, Quilla, and Polly.

Meeting Leo's father.

Wandering their old castle filled with tapestries, large paintings, and fireplaces bigger than an SUV.

My mind went to one fireplace in particular, and the picture hanging above it.

I was only in there twice, but I walked past it every day on my way to the kitchen.

The painting was of a family: a man, a woman, and two sons.

The woman and sons smiled, but the father kept his face stoic.

On his head, he wore a large golden crown, as did the woman. I guessed it was the king and queen when they were younger.

There was something familiar about the boys, but I couldn't put my finger on it.

Was it their eyes, the way they wore their hair?

Perhaps it was the clothes.

Precisely the same, right down to the boots -

I DREAMED OF DANCING CLOWNS, their faces covered in white paint, red Styrofoam pinched on their noses. Orange curly hair bobbed on their heads.

They wore white one-piece suits with various colored polka dots, and they rode a unicycle, one clown doing the pedaling while the others sat atop his shoulders.

There were hundreds of them rising toward the ceiling, and they were all the same, exactly like the one below.

I looked up, trying to see the top-most clown, and a large clown face appeared on the ceiling, its evil black eyes glaring.

He opened his mouth and said something, but I didn't understand the words.

Over and over, he repeated the same thing. I could tell by the way his mouth moved, but there wasn't any sound.

I shouted for him to tell me again, keeping my eyes on the cycling clowns, but no matter how hard I listened, I couldn't hear the words.

The movements of the clown pedaling the unicycle became more sporadic until it seemed he was trying to run me over.

As one, their faces watched me, staring.

Abruptly, sounds erupted from their mouths, like a thousand buzzing wasps, but I still couldn't make out what they said.

Finally, I couldn't take it any longer and covered my ears.

One voice cut through the sounds of the others, and I heard it as clearly as though I spoke it -

---

"THEY'RE TWINS," I whisper-shouted, sitting straight up, knowing that was the word the clown from my dream spoke repeatedly.

I was still in the secret room.

The blue light from my spell continued to shine overhead, bathing everything in its peculiar glow.

The glass lyre rested on my lap.

I had no idea what time it was or how long I slept.

Grabbing the lyre, I rose and was about to put the instrument back on the shelf when something shimmered in the glass.

It scared me so badly I nearly dropped it.

Instead, I took a deep breath and peered closer, figuring it was just a shadow cast by the light I conjured.

"What the - " There was definitely movement inside the glass.

I was about to figure out what was going on when a noise sounded on the stairs.

Male voices.

They were irritated.

Before they found me, I quickly pulled a book from a row on an upper shelf, stuffed the lyre behind it, and slid the book back and whispered the words I used earlier to make Leo and me invisible. "Bohemia coverith irreavilth." Then I dove for the bean bag chair and acted asleep.

Keys jingled, and then the door opened.

I rubbed my eyes, pretending to wake up, and glanced sleepily at Professor Pops, Gabe, and Leo.

They stood in the doorway, various forms of shock and surprise and worry spread across their features.

Gabe, my mind shouted, happy to see him again so soon.

My heart started pounding.

He looked terrific if a little disheveled.

He studied me shrewdly as though he knew I was faking, but I played innocent.

Professor Pops came forward and held out his stand. I took it and stood.

"Hello, Cindy. Have a nice sleep?"

"Hi, Pops. Sure," I said, unable to take my eyes from Gabe.

Leo stepped in front of him, looking angry. "I woke, and you were gone. I hoped to find you here." He crossed his arms.

I was surprised he knew where here was.

Gabe took my hand. "I was worried when Leo said he couldn't find you."

Relief radiated from his face.

It was obvious he was concerned, but it was his own damn fault.

He lost his right to worry when he told me he didn't love me anymore.

He couldn't expect me to sit around and sulk, even though that's what I wanted to do.

"Don't you have humans to save?" I asked sarcastically, though I squeezed his hand.

He gave me a look I couldn't read. "I didn't ask for this job. I didn't want it. I can't believe you thought - "

Leo interrupted. "We don't have time for this," he said, grumbling. "Did you find the glass lyre?"

He searched the room, looking along the shelves.

I held my breath, hoping my magic held up and praying he wouldn't be able to sense the lyre.

He went through the shelves and the drawers before straightening.

"There's nothing in here."

Professor Pops gave me a look.

He knew the lyre was down here and was surprised I didn't share that knowledge with Leo. Before he could say anything, I gave the slightest shake to my head. He seemed to get my meaning and nodded.

"Mr. Henry, are there any other secret passages in your house? Any other rooms that might hold the glass lyre?" Leo walked over to the circle where the slide ended and looked inside. "What about up there? What's at the other end of this?"

Gabe responded. "That's the library. There isn't a glass anything in that room. It's filled with old books, a map of the world, and stubborn dust."

At one point, the library was Dorian's room, but after he married Snow, they returned the room to its original purpose.

Professor Pops patted Gabe on the arm. "It's okay. We should let Leo look, verify for himself. Who knows? He might find something."

Gabe gave him an odd look before agreeing. "Did you want me to take you up?" he asked Leo.

Leo gave him an unhappy glare. "That would be great."

The two of them went to the stairs.

"You coming, Cinderella?" Leo asked.

"I'll catch up with you in a few. I need to talk to Professor Pops alone."

Leo and Gabe went, and I waited until they reached the top of the stairs.

Then I went to the shelf, moved the book, and pulled out the lyre.

"Revealith."

"I had a feeling you found it." Pops wore a peculiar expression, as though he was thinking a question, but didn't ask because he already knew the answer. "Why not tell Leo?"

I shrugged. "I intended to, but something held me back."

I handed Pops the glass instrument. "I thought I saw something - someone - inside the glass."

"Really?" He studied the lyre, turning it over, searching for what I meant.

A face appeared inside. "There!" I shouted and then lowered my voice.

"Did you see? It looked like a guy." He looked like Leo, but that couldn't be right.

Professor Pops checked over it again. "I didn't see anything."

I took the lyre back. "Gabe told me the lyre was a person, not a thing." I studied the instrument more closely.

"I swear I saw the face of a man." The words of a spell came to mind.

I opened my mouth to speak it, but Leo's voice sounded from the top of the stairs.

"There was nothing in the library. Shall we go, Cinderella?"

I quickly tucked the lyre back behind the books and spoke the words to hide it.

Emotions radiated from the lyre - anger, sadness, fear.

For some reason, the lyre didn't want Leo to find it either.

"Please don't say anything, Mr. Henry. I don't know why, but I can't tell him."

"Leo won't learn of the lyre from me." He still looked to be holding something back.

"What is it?" I asked.

Pops shook his head. "Nothing, Cindy. You'd better go."

"If you're sure." I walked over to the stairs.

Turned back to Professor Pops. "I'll be back for it when I can," I whispered.

He nodded. "That'll be fine."

STOPPED LOVING YOU

WHEN I REACHED the top of the stairs, I gave Leo a sideways glance and knew I couldn't go. "Can I meet you later?"

I didn't know where he would go, and at that moment I didn't care.

It was apparent Gabe still wanted to talk.

Leo scrunched his brows together. "I thought you were through with him." He threw his hands in the air, frustration oozing from his pores.

"Please," I added.

"Sure. Whatever." Leo walked out of the kitchen, and I heard the front door slam.

Professor Pops came up the stairs and cleared his throat. "I've got some work to get done. If you need me, I'll be in my office."

"Thanks, Professor Pops," I said, suddenly feeling nervous Gabe and I were going to be alone together.

"Of course." He disappeared inside his office, closing the door.

Gabe came forward and wrapped me in a hug. "I hoped to see you again."

I clung to him and tried to forget everything he said to me that night, not so long ago.

But I couldn't. I stiffened. "I'm here," I said, but stepped back, pushing against his chest. "But has anything changed?"

I crossed my arms. "Did you decide you still love me?"

Gabe's face contorted, and he ran a hand through his hair. "I never stopped loving you," he whispered. "I lied. Your spells don't work on me."

"But you're still not supposed to be with me." Fatigue overwhelmed my body, and I went over to the kitchen island and collapsed on one of the stools.

"What I said - There was no excuse." He ran a hand over the scruff on his face.

He hadn't shaved, and it looked good on him. "Forgive me." He put his hands out, pleading.

"Nothing has changed, including my feelings. Please don't lose faith in me, Cin," he said softly.

"I don't want to," I admitted, wishing my heart didn't hurt so much.

He leaned down and kissed me lightly but full of emotion. "I love you. Whatever happens, know that."

"You mean it?" I asked, blinking back the tears.

"I'm fighting against the ruling, though to a degree I understand why the command was issued, but I can't be without you. I won't." He ground his teeth together.

"I need you to know that." The way he looked at me, with so much love, for the first time in a long time, I believed him.

I saw how much he loved me by the way he looked at me.

"I don't want to be without you either," I admitted, touching my hand to his chest.

Gabe let out a huge breath of relief. "I brought you something." He reached into his pocket.

"You did?" Gabe wasn't the kind of man to bring gifts. At least I hadn't thought so.

He held up a bracelet.

Made of leather with a pair of silver wings attached. "May I?" He held it out, and I brought my wrist up.

When it was on, he turned over the wings.

Carved on the back were our names and the word forever.

"This is beautiful, Gabe, and so thoughtful," I said, touching it lightly.

The wings were cold against my fingers. "I love it."

"And I love you. I always will." He leaned down and kissed me.

It wasn't a marriage proposal, but it was more than Gabe ever gave me before.

He wanted to be with me forever.

It said so on the bracelet.

I wanted him. I wanted to wrap myself around him and show him how much I loved him, but he stiffened as though hearing something I couldn't.

"What is it?"

"I'm being called," he said. "I need to go."

His body seemed to move toward the exit of its own accord.

I clung to him, desperate for him to stay.

"I'm sorry," he said, frustration evident on his features.

He glanced away before giving in to the pull and walking away.

I pushed down a cry, willing myself to stay strong, my fingers tightening around the silver wings like a lifeline. At least he hadn't wanted to leave. That much I could tell.

"Gabe," I whispered, wishing I knew a spell that would fix everything between us.

When I heard the front door slam shut, I jumped.

Come to me.

The words shook me to my core.

This time I knew they came from whoever was inside the lyre.

Alone, I used the opportunity to go back downstairs.

The secret room was locked, so I used magic to get through.

I paused at the shelves, taking a deep breath before removing the instrument from its hiding spot.

"Revealith," I said like before, and it appeared.

Now that I had it, I was unsure what to do next.

The words to a spell entered my mind. "Forathua escapa revealantha fortimbrania."

Once I finished speaking the words, the lyre began to shake.

It left my hands and floated into the air. The shaking got faster and faster until it became a whirling blur.

There was a twinkle of light, and then it disappeared.

In its place stood a guy.

He looked just like Leo. I squinted, taking him in. "Leo?"

He straightened. "You know my name?"

"Do I?" This guy was thinner than Leo, his cheeks hollow.

His clothes hung from his body, as though he hadn't eaten a good meal in a really long time.

His hair was much longer than Leo's, and his hazel eyes were more golden around the outer rim.

"You aren't Leo, but you look like him." I took a step toward him.

Wow, he smelled terrible. "Plus, you stink." I pinched my nose.

He smirked. "Let's see how you smell after a decade stuck in limbo."

"Limbo?" I pursed my lips together, confused.

"That's right." He rolled back his shoulders and stuck out his hand.

"My name is Leolas Loyalor. Thank you for saving me, Miss - Cinderella?" A smile splayed across his lips.

I waved his hand away. "What the hell? How is that possible? I just saw him a few minutes ago."

I rubbed my eyes. "You can't be Leolas."

My heart raced with surprise and frustration.

There was so much about my own land I didn't understand.

This guy had similarities to the Leo I knew, but I sensed he wasn't the same man.

The guy's features turned angry.

He let out a frustrated growl. "You must be talking about my traitorous twin brother, Lawson."

"Lawson?" I said the name, feeling like I was in a dream.

Leo went over to the bean bag chair and sat. Then he let out a giant sigh. "Oh, wow, this feels like heaven."

He placed his hands behind his head and closed his eyes. "Why didn't I have this in limbo?"

Confusion settled over my features. "Will you please explain what the hell is going on?" I shook my head before pinching myself.

It hurt.

Yep, I was awake.

"Where are we?" he asked, glancing around the room.

"Adam Henry's house."

He gave me a once over and then asked, "This isn't Polonias?"

I shook my head. "No, this is Earth."

"Earth?" He shook his head. "My brother is a coward."

"Why?"

He ran a hand through his hair before shaking it. "Have you heard of Polonias?"

"Yes," I huffed. "I recently learned it's my world too." I wanted to say more but now wasn't the time.

"Right. I knew that." He smiled a bright smile that reached his eyes. "Excellent. Surely, you've heard the story of the twin princes?"

"Um, no. I haven't."

He gave me a strange look. "But you're Cinderella?"

"Cindy," I corrected. "I've only recently found out I'm from Polonias. I was actually raised by humans on this planet." It still felt crazy saying that.

"It's true then. You are the - " He didn't finish.

"I'm what? What do you think you know?"

He held up his hands in the universal sign of I surrender. "Let me tell you a story." He sat up and leaned forward, scooted over and patted the spot on the chair next to him.

"Have a seat. This is going to take a few."

I turned back to the locked door and breathed in.

"Sure. Why not? What's one more thing?" In truth, I was more interested than I pretended to be.

After I was situated, he smiled. "Many years ago, my mother gave birth to twin boys, a feat unheard of in our land. She died not many years after we were born. My father raised us to become future rulers. He didn't give us a lot of love. The queen's death seemed to have sucked all of that out of him, but he taught us the necessities. As we grew, Lawson developed a knack for cunning. He was shrewd and more willing to make choices I thought were wrong. My father favored him. They started excluding me from training and outings. By the time I turned seventeen, my father and brother were more like friends than father and son.

"One night, Lawson came to my room and asked if I wanted to go hunting. I was excited and packed in a hurry. It was so long since the two of us did anything together."

He shook his head at the memory. "Looking back, I should've seen something was wrong, but I didn't. All I saw was an opportunity to spend time with my brother, the way we had when we were younger."

He paused, and I leaned forward, caught up in the story.

"What happened?" I asked.

"We snuck out of the castle and made our way into the forest. It was fun, like old times. At a stream, we set up camp and swapped stories over the campfire." He stopped, and I knew he was reliving that time in his life.

"Near midnight, Mizrabel showed up. Have you heard of her?"

I shivered at the name.

Of course, I heard of her. She claimed to be my mother. "I have," was all I said.

"Right, well, apparently Lawson conspired with her to kill me. As soon as she appeared, he overpowered me and tied me up. I tried to use my magic, but the cords around my wrists nullified my magic. Fearful of what would happen, I pled with my brother and Mizrabel, but they wouldn't listen.

"Mizrabel conjured the magic needed to kill me. As the spell left her hand, one of my trusty friends, an amifox called Vale, sent his magic firing into hers as it reached me, making it, so I didn't die, but became trapped inside the glass lyre."

"What's an amifox?" I asked, knowing I couldn't follow the story entirely unless I had a visual.

He snapped his fingers and a creature that looked like a fox, except it was green with grass-green eyes, appeared in his palm.

"Amifoxes used to roam Polonias freely. They were everywhere." A shadow crossed over his face.

"After a year without being able to release me from the lyre, Lawson made a deal with the shadows within the witch mists, and the amifoxes vanished from Polonias." The magic he conjured to show me the amifox evaporated, and he let out a sad breath.

"Did you want to eat something? We can finish this later." He looked like he might be starving - literally.

"Not yet. I need to get my story out. I've been alone for too long. Talking to someone feels good." A wry smiled lifted his lips.

"Then, please continue."

He nodded, crossing his hands over his stomach. "Mizrabel said her debt to Lawson was finished, and she left him and me alone."

He shook his head. "Those within the witch mists betrayed my brother as well. They took the lyre from him and cursed the land of Polonias into a deep sleep." He looked at me. "You understand the time difference between Earth and Polonias?"

"Kind of. A day here is a hundred days there."

"Right," he said, closing his eyes a moment.

"After a while, I lost track of who had me or why, but I'm pretty sure I stayed on Earth. If I've been trapped in the lyre a decade here, how long have the people in Polonias been asleep?"

"A long time," I said, thinking their land was like a fairy tale from childhood. "It was Mizrabel who told me to find the glass lyre," I added softly.

He nodded. "That's only a little surprising. She's a sorceress of great power, and she has no ties to the kingdom. Before everything happened, she and I were friends. If I had to guess, Lawson discovered her secret and threatened her."

He turned away. "It's the only reason I can think of for her to betray me." He tilted his head, giving me a strange look. "She didn't seem particularly thrilled about killing me." He held my gaze. "I know Mizrabel's secret. Do you?"

I wrung my hands together, thinking I might, though I didn't know why it was a big deal. "Do I what?" I asked, feigning innocence.

But truth blew through my mind like the spells that were coming to me recently.

He took me by the elbows. The stench of him nearly knocked me over. "Come on. Don't play coy. You must know."

I crossed my arms. "What do you mean?"

"You are Mizrabel's daughter." He said the words matter-of-factly.

I pulled away. "How would you know that?"

"I told you she and I were friends." He looked down.

"I knew she was pregnant. When she delivered you, I helped her.

Minutes after you arrived in the world, you glowed like the sun, and we thought you might burst into flames." He smiled at the memory.

"It was scary at the time, but then you settled and looked the same as any other child of Polonias." He winked. "But you aren't like anyone else. You know that, right?"

I pulled from his grasp. "I have no idea what you're talking about."

He shook his head. "Even though I considered her a dear friend, she never told me who your father was." He went back over to the bean bag and fell into it with a sigh. "I helped her get you into the human realm."

Fury roared through me, so strong it made me a little afraid. "Why didn't she want me? Was I so awful?"

"Dear Cinderella, no. But you were the answer to an age-old prophecy that bespoke of a fiery girl destined to save Polonias. The king, my father, believed that meant he would be overthrown. He kept a careful eye on every child born in the land as did his father before him and so on back for many generations." He heaved a deep breath.

He looked pale, but I had another question. "Why would he - Lawson - take on your name, though? Why not just say you died?"

"I was born first. That means I'm the rightful heir to the throne. Also, I was well-loved by the people. The people didn't like Lawson. They knew him for what he was. Corrupt, cold-hearted, and unfeeling. On the other hand, they knew that I cared a great deal for everyone - from the tiniest water sprite to the biggest tree troll." He squeezed his eyes shut.

I needed to get him some food. And a shower.

"So they would've been less upset to see Lawson go? Is that what you're saying?" I was glad we moved away from Mizrabel being my mother and the prophecy.

It was still too weird.

I had a mom and a dad here in Salem. They weren't perfect, but I loved them.

"Basically," Leo answered.

He pressed the palm of his hand against the side of his head. "Whoa, now I'm out of limbo, I'm really, really hungry. Does Earth still having amazing burgers?"

"I'll make you something," I said, not fully listening. My mind went over his words, and I recalled the way Mizrabel looked at me with a mixture of happiness and worry.

The king didn't seem to like me.

I wondered if he knew the truth about what Lawson had done.

If I had to guess, I would say he did.

"Do you think the king knows?" I took Leo's hand and helped him stand.

He leaned on me. "I hope not, but it's certainly possible. We'll have to broach the subject with care."

I opened the door and led him through the Museum of the Supernatural and up the stairs to the kitchen. "If that's true, the kingdom is going to be a mess."

Leo sighed, "The kingdom is probably already a mess - " He paused and closed his eyes.

"Has it really been ten years since you ate anything?"

"I think so, which was fine when I was in limbo, but now?" He put a hand to his stomach, and I could tell he was woozy. "Let's just say I could eat."

"Sit," I said when we reached the kitchen, pushing him onto a stool. "I'll be right back."

"Sure." He looked like he might pass out. There was a bowl of fruit on the granite countertop. I grabbed an apple and set it in front of him.

"Eat this. It'll help until I can whip you up a burger."

He took a huge bite. "Thanks," he said as apple juices leaked down his chin.

I smiled and ran down the hall to Professor Pops' office.

I slid to a stop, surprised the door was open. Professor Pops looked up.

"Tell me." He took his reading glasses off his nose and tucked them into his pocket.

I stepped into his office and quietly shut the door. "There was someone in the glass lyre. It's - " I shook my head. "Have you heard of the queen of Polonias having twins?"

Pops' face broke into a smile.

He leaned forward, clasping his hands together. "As a matter of fact, I have."

"Why didn't you say anything before? I might've been a little more cautious."

He gave me a skeptical look. "Really?"

I shrugged. "Maybe. I would've at least asked about it."

Professor Pops nodded. "I'm sure you would have, but it wasn't my story to tell."

Always a teacher, I huffed inwardly.

I sat in the chair, even though I knew I needed to get back to Leo - the real Leo. "Mizrabel is my real mother."

Professor Pops let out an excited laugh. "Good. This is good. You're finally beginning to understand and see your real life."

I stood, shocked. "You knew?" I sputtered.

"You know. You - you - Does Snow know?" Did he know who my father was too?

Pops nodded. "As soon as Snow became the vampire queen, she learned about Polonias, including the land once had twin princes, but one was lost, even believed dead."

"Holy merde. I'm going to have to have a serious effing conversation with Snow the next time I get a chance." I crossed my arms. "Right now, I need to feed a starved prince. Is it okay if I use your kitchen to make him something?"

"Have at it."

"Oh, and can I borrow a bathroom and some clothes? He really needs a bath." I waved a hand in front of my nose.

"Of course." He grinned. "Take whatever you need."

I leaned over the desk and hugged him. "Thank you, Pops."

THEY ARE BROTHERS

I WASN'T the greatest cook.

Okay, I sucked at all things cooking related, but I was at least proficient enough to put some ground meat in a pan and slap it on a bun.

I got him some chips, a pudding cup, and a large glass of ice water too.

When he finished it all, he was still hungry, so I made him a banana split.

That finally satisfied him.

"You are amazing," he said when he sat back in his chair.

I resisted the urge to blush.

It dawned on me after I put the cherry on the banana split that I could've used magic and made him a meal fit for a prince.

Too late now.

"Thanks," I said, putting the empty bowl in the sink and rinsing it.

He got out of the chair and came around, taking my hand. "I guess we need to go confront my father and brother."

I held my nose. "First, I think you need a bath."

If I had to be around him, he needed to smell tolerable.

Also, I wasn't ready to give him up just yet.

I hated to admit it, but I enjoyed being around him.

He gave off a quiet, kind aura.

Without a doubt, he and I would be friends.

Plus, he knew my real mother.

Despite myself, I wanted to learn more about her.

"You'll make a stronger impression if you don't look like that." I indicated his raggedy and stinky clothes, and he chuckled.

"I suppose you're right." He allowed me to pull him toward the bathroom.

He began unbuttoning his shirt.

I shifted uncomfortably. "You got it from here?"

"I'll manage." He laughed as he closed the door.

After a moment, I thought of something and knocked.

"Hi," I said when he opened the door.

He watched me with what looked like amusement in his eyes.

"Remember to hurry. Your brother, uh, Lawson, is around. He was helping me look for you. He could be back anytime, 'kay?"

His eyes went dark. "He's here?"

I nodded. "When Mizrabel told me to seek the glass lyre, he insisted on coming."

Leo gritted his teeth together. "Got it. I'll hurry." He shut the door.

I sat and leaned against the wall next to the bathroom, crossing my legs, waiting.

Quilla appeared and sneezed.

She wore a bright lavender dress with red and purple accents. Her hat was black, along with her tights, and her shoes were a shimmering red.

"Cinderella," she said, touching her nose to mine. "What's going on?"

I swallowed and shot a sideways glance at the bathroom door.

"N - Nothing. Just waiting for Leo to finish his shower."

She leaned her ear against the door. "There's definitely something going on. I can sense these things."

She put her hands on her hips. "Tell me. It's better if I know. Maybe I can help." She sneezed again.

I pulled a tissue from my pocket and handed it to her.

She waved it away, sniffling. "I don't need that."

"You sure?" I asked, covering up a worried laugh.

"Psshhhh." She sneezed again. "A - Are you sure everything is alright?"

"Yes, Quilla. Of course." I heard the water shut off.

Crap. Crap. Crap.

"I'm going to do a spell here in a sec. You better vanish before I give you a sneezing fit."

She pondered what I said, but only for a moment. "Fine. Tell Leo I said hello, won't you?"

"Of course, I will."

"Okay. Bye." She disappeared, leaving behind a sparkle of magic.

The real Leo opened the door.

He was obviously naked, his bottom half covered by the door.

He was lean and extra pale but still handsome - I tore my eyes from his glistening chest and met his grinning face.

"Where are the towels?"

"Just a sec." I ran to the linen closet and grabbed him a towel.

"Here. Sorry about that." I closed the door and turned, burying my face at my embarrassment.

I couldn't help but wonder about magic and cleanliness, and my mind went into the gutter for a second.

I heard him whisper some words, and then he immediately opened the door. "Ready," he said, looking dry and nicely dressed.

He had on a pair of jeans, loafers, and a navy blue rugby shirt. His hair was still damp and flipped up against the bottom of his collar.

It occurred to me he could've magicked himself a towel too.

"Now what?" he asked, standing next to me.

"I - um, am not sure." I thought about Mizrabel and the way the king treated me.

I thought about Leo or Lawson or whatever his name was.

"Cinderella," Quilla popped in between Leo and me.

I screamed.

Leo fell back.

"Twixit. I knew it. I knew it!" She sneezed as she flew back and forth between us. "He's the lost prince." She clapped her hands with glee.

I put a hand over her mouth. "Quilla, keep it down. We have to keep Leo's return a secret."

"Oh, I know. I've always known."

She clapped again. "I can't believe you did it. I'm so proud of you, Cinderella."

I gaped at her. "What do you mean you've known?"

She huffed and put her hands on her hips. "Obviously, I knew who was inside the glass lyre."

"You could've told me," I said, stomping my foot with indignation.

Her eyes got soft. "If I told you the truth, would you believed me?"

We went down the hall toward the front door.

"I like to think so," I said and sighed.

Honestly, I wasn't sure.

With my hand on the knob, I turned to Leo and Quilla.

"What are we going to do about Lawson? He'll be back anytime. I don't think he'll be thrilled to see him." I pointed at Real Leo.

Quilla gave Real Leo a look.

He nodded while I stood there like a fool, wondering what was going on.

"It's simple, Cinderella. We need to go someplace where Lawson and his father can't find us until we want them to."

"Agreed. Where's that?" As I said the words, a swirl of magical dust enveloped the three of us.

Professor Pops' house blurred and disappeared.

We were in a vortex of fuzzy color as though we were speeding through space.

The only sound was the rush of the wind.

Real Leo took hold of my arm and held fast.

The colors changed from bright to dull to gray and finally to black.

The world around me stopped moving and came into focus.

Old, knotted trees grew all around, their branches tangled together above so I couldn't see the sky.

The only sound was our breathing.

Quilla had a blue light in her hand, and it gave the creepy forest an unnatural glow.

The floor was covered in dirt and moss, and directly in front of us stood a door. It was carved into a giant tree trunk.

"Where are we?" I whispered.

Quilla stepped closer, as did Leo.

"It's the only place Lawson and his father's magic won't reach us," Quilla said.

The door flew open.

Mizrabel stood there, looking like she wasn't surprised to see us.

"Not to worry, Cinderella. You're safe with me," she said.

"Forgive me if I don't believe you," I said, unbidden anger rushing to the surface.

THE TRUTH

"GET INSIDE, AND WE CAN TALK." Mizrabel ushered us through the door to her home.

I expected the place to be small, a hovel, something that went along with the inside of a giant tree. I figured the furniture would consist of branches, leaves, and a fire pit.

Instead, the home was spacious and airy with billowing white curtains, a chandelier made of different colored gems, and a large open kitchen.

The floors were black marble.

A lush black rug sat in the center of the living area and surrounded by dark red furniture and a slate gray fireplace.

"The bedrooms are down the hall through there."

She looked at Quilla.

"You won't be staying here. You and your strange fashion sense will go back to wherever it is you came from."

She flicked her finger, and Quilla's outfit changed from lavender to a putrid green.

"Oh no, you don't," Quilla said with a sneeze and changed her outfit back. "Rude."

Mizrabel snorted and altered it again.

"Twixit. That's enough." Quilla switched it back.

Mizrabel walked into the kitchen and flicked her fingers, transforming Quilla's outfit again.

"Merde, are you two serious?" I looked at Leo, who smiled.

Mizrabel cleared her throat. "You're right, Cinderella, dear." She snapped her fingers, and Quilla's clothes went back to her special kind of crazy.

"I'm out of here. If you need me, I'll be around." Quilla disappeared, leaving behind a trail of sparkles.

"Finally," Mizrabel said, walking to the fireplace.

She moved her hand, and a fire ignited, the heat striking my skin immediately.

Then she turned toward us. "Have a seat, you two." She clapped her hands together as we sat on the red sofa. "It's good to see you both again."

I glanced at Real Leo, uncomfortable and decided I should just call him Leo.

"I'm so sorry, Leo," Mizrabel said, and honestly looked sorry. "He was going to kill her. I didn't have a choice."

"All is forgiven," he said and meant it.

She didn't apologize to me. I wasn't sure how I felt about that.

"Good." She sat on the chair next to us.

"So, what's our plan? How are we going to get Cinderella on the throne where she rightly belongs?"

"Whoa. Hang on. I don't want to rule." I thought about Snow and all the trouble she was going through, trying to make everyone happy, keeping the peace between creatures, even between realms.

It was a lot to handle.

I didn't want that.

I wanted to marry Gabe and have lots of babies.

Where and when we would do those things, I wasn't sure.

The human realm didn't want me, and Gabe didn't like Sharra.

Leo looked at me. "It's your destiny. You were born for this." His eyes shone with admiration. "You found me and set me free. I'm positive you can do anything."

My heart started to beat faster, and I felt the heat rising to my face.

"I appreciate the vote of confidence." I patted his knee. "It isn't that I don't think I can do it."

I crossed my legs. "Of course, I could." I paused and smiled. "It's that I don't want to."

Leo's mouth fell open, and Mizrabel glared.

"So those humans raised my daughter to be a cowardly guttersnipe. Great." She began pacing, her long black robes swishing through the air.

The way she spoke to me about my parents pissed me off. "At least they cared. They took care of me. Fed me."

When they weren't busy, I thought. "You didn't want me. You're the cowardly guttersnipe. So, like mother like daughter, I guess." I went to the door, desperate to leave.

Leo came over to me. He gently took my hand. "Where you go, I go, Cinderella."

It was a sweet gesture, it really was, but I needed some time by myself. "I need a time-out." I yanked the door open.

Leo looked ready to stop me, but I slammed the door in his face and started walking.

I took a deep breath, moving over to a group of trees, toward a stream, I could hear a little ways off.

Prickly bushes scratched at my skin, but I ignored the pain, too overwhelmed to care.

At the stream, I walked along the edge.

There was a waterfall a little ways off.

When I reached it, I found a rock and sat, watching the water rush, allowing the noise to drown out all of my anxieties.

"Cinderella?"

I turned at the high voice, fear shooting through my belly until I saw it was Polly. Her rose petals opened so I could see her face.

"What are you doing here?" I asked, and then realized I somehow made my way to Polly's spot.

I didn't remember using the traveling spell or doing anything that would allow me to move quickly from one place to another, so maybe Mizrabel lived close to her.

Polly rose out of the ground and came over to me, beautiful rose petals still a part of her, but she held a human form. "Is everything alright?"

I let out a ragged breath. "No, it seriously isn't."

She sat at my feet and leaned an arm across my knees. "Tell me about it."

Her kind eyes shone with her genuine concern.

I gave her a kindly smile; positive she didn't want to hear my problems.

She had her own issues, like that she was dying.

I noticed signs of wilting along the edges of her hair along her eyelashes and fingernails. My problems were pitifully lame compared to hers.

Lawson told me it was the Sickness killing her but was the Sickness and the witch mists the same thing?

Everything was so complicated.

As I watched her sweet face watching me, I knew I had to help her.

Whatever the truth, I wouldn't let Polly down.

"I mean it, Cinderella," she said after several long moments. "Tell me what's going on."

So I did.

It was cathartic, sharing all of my fears and doubts with a virtual stranger.

When I was finished, she took my face between her hands.

"You poor, poor thing."

"Thanks, Polly. I feel much better." I gathered my wits and went over to the waterfall.

The spray misted against my face and arms.

"What are you going to do?" she asked gently, coming to stand beside me.

I noticed the slight hunch of her shoulders. Last time I saw her, there was a spring to her step. Now there was nothing. "Well," I said, plastering on a smile, "I'm going to do whatever I can to help you get better."

"I appreciate that." She grinned, clasping her hands together, and bouncing up on her toes.

My heart skipped a beat, then several more.

"What must I do for Polonias to be healed?" My throat was dry and scratchy.

A part of me still resisted, but there was no use. I needed to save her.

Polly took both of my hands in hers and turned me to face her. "It's easy, I promise."

I nodded. "Okay. Tell me."

"You must be married here at the heart of Polonias, where I was born, and it must happen before the winter solstice."

"Or what?" I swallowed.

"I'll die, Cinderella, as will Polonias. It's a horrible truth, but the truth just the same." She shook her head, forlornly.

"I can't hold off the Sickness much longer. I feel it overpowering me even now."

My heart pounded so hard I thought it would burst through my chest. "You said, saving you would be easy."

She nodded. "It is. You already know who you should marry. He knows as well."

A sob choked off any words I might speak. I wanted to cry.

"I want to marry Gabe," I said quietly, touching the bracelet against my wrist.

"I know, Cinderella, and you should." She batted her long lashes, watching me from beneath them.

"But there are laws against it. Some say our love is a sin." I choked on the words, hating to even say them out loud.

"That doesn't mean it is the wrong choice. Bring Gabe here." She smiled knowingly. "Your love will be safe here. Polonias isn't part of Earth."

I shook my head. "I don't think he'll come. He has a job to do on Earth. Protecting humans from scary creatures like us. It's sort of in his DNA just as magic is in mine."

I blinked back my anger, a flicker of hope burning in my chest. "But I could try. I could go to him and ask."

This was the twenty-first century.

I was waiting for Gabe to ask me to marry him, but I could ask him.

On Earth, our union wouldn't work, but here?

I knew it was a long shot.

He was the leader of the chayot.

Their sole purpose was to protect humans, but maybe he would do it for me.

"Go," she said kindly. "I'll be waiting."

"I'll hurry." I touched the hourglass and thought of Gabe.

WITCH MISTS

"WILL YOU MARRY ME?"

I said the words aloud, hoping practice would calm my nerves and steady my beating heart.

It didn't.

So I tried again. "Gabe, my one true love. Will you marry me?" I grunted. That sounded stupid.

I had just left Polly and was clinging to the hourglass charm dangling from the chain around my neck, desperate to reach Gabe. Before entering the witch mists, my thoughts were clear and focused on Pops' mansion since that was where Gabe lived when he wasn't out saving humankind from evil supernaturals. But then I became distracted by all I needed to do.

"I'll marry you." The voice came from within the witch mists and I started. Those words were the first I understood coming from the beings who dwelled within.

I turned at the sound, slowly seeking out the one who spoke. Though I knew I wasn't supposed to.

Leo - no, Lawson - advised some of the creatures within wanted to trap unsuspecting travelers.

"Who said that?" I squinted, searching for the culprit, my steps slowing.

All I saw were shadows.

Dozens of voices began whispering at once.

Some I understood.

Others I didn't.

The shadows pressed against my body, like wet clothes clinging after an unforgiving summer rain. My throat constricted and my pulse raced erratically.

Everything muddled and I couldn't remember where I was or why I was there.

I couldn't think of anything, except for the mists and the darkness and sleeping. I no longer caring about -

"Gabe!"

His name brought me out of my stupor.

A quick perusal of my situation revealed I was no longer standing but lying on the ground within the mists.

Thick, thorny vines, so dark green as to appear black, enveloped my body, squeezing and constricting like a killer cocoon.

"Sereth habitha," I said with as much might as I could muster.

As the words of my spell filtered into the air, the vines withered, and I broke free.

Tearing away the ashen husks, I rushed to stand.

The voices started again, begging me to stay, to remain with them, to save them.

I ignored the words, grabbing hold of the hourglass.

Closing my eyes, I thought about home. That was the only word I could conjure.

Home. Home. Home. I repeated the word over and over in my mind.

After several minutes, the voices subsided, as did the cloying thickness.

I took a deep breath and opened my eyes to see I was back in Sharra, inside my room in the castle.

Relieved, I fell onto my bed.

I knew I needed to hurry.

Polly and Polonias were depending on me, but I was exhausted.

Peace enfolded me and I closed my eyes.

Part of me longed to sleep.

Just for a minute or two.

The rest would rejuvenate my mind.

Since traveling back and forth, I couldn't remember the last time I got more than an hour or two of sleep.

My hands at my sides, I drifted -

A knock jerked me awake. "Yes," I said, my voice thick with fatigue.

"Miss Croswell, it's Heather. Are you busy?" She sounded upset.

"Just a minute." I had no idea what day it was here.

"Revealith daneth." The words left my lips slowly and a calendar appeared in front of my face, showing me it was Wednesday.

"Aneth," I said, and the calendar disappeared.

At the full-length mirror I used several spells to clean up and change into a light pair of jeans and a cranberry peplum top with short sleeves and a scooped collar as well as a pair of tan ankle boots.

The hourglass dangled from the chain and I tucked it inside my shirt. Getting ready like this wasn't the same as a shower, but it would have to do.

Next I said the spells to fix my makeup and hair, keeping my makeup sparse with mascara, gloss, and some blush, and my hair tied back in a loose braid.

The whole thing took less than two minutes.

"Miss Croswell." Heather knocked again.

I gave my reflection a once over, noting my blue eyes were still vivid, but tired.

"You'll do," I whispered to my reflection, and threw the door open, planting a smile on my face. "Hi, Heather. I wasn't quite ready."

"Sorry," Heather said, looking down at her hands. "I know we aren't supposed to disturb the teachers at their rooms, but - " She swallowed, glancing sideways.

Two more girls appeared in the doorway beside her.

Kaylan and Kimberly, her roommates.

"We really need to talk to you," Kaylan said.

"About what?" I closed the door and headed down the hall, deciding I should take the conversation to my office.

The hall was big enough all four of us could walk side by side. Heather on one side of me and the girls on the other side.

"We know Heather identifies as transgender and we don't care. She's our friend and we want her back in our room," Kaylan said with a huff of frustration.

Kimberly nodded her agreement.

I smiled, glad the girls were so good to Heather. "I appreciate you letting me know. We will take your feelings into consideration."

"Good," Kimberly said, coming to Heather's side and taking her arm. "It isn't the same without her."

"You have some great friends," I said, looking at Heather and she agreed.

"Still, we have to take into account the whole school. There are rules and while I agree she should be with you, there are those who don't feel the same way. It's better Heather is moved, and the school not come under condemnation then the school get closed, right?" I met the gaze of each of the girls.

"Miss Croswell is right," Heather said, her voice soft but resolute.

I squeezed her shoulders. "We are still working out the logistics, but for now, I think the arrangement of you sleeping in your own room is the safest option." I gave her a serious look.

"Not only for your friends, but for you as well." I was thinking of Sera and the way she and Heather interacted.

She nodded. "Thank you, Miss Croswell."

"How's things between you and Sera?" We reached my office and I unlocked the door by touching the handle.

It was enchanted so only my hand could unlock it.

Pretty ingenious, I thought.

"Fine," she said. I sensed she meant she was freaked out, insecure, neurotic, and emotional, but I kept that to myself.

I knew what happened when adults got into the middle of teenage squabbles without allowing them to work on them first.

Of course, Heather's case was a serious and sensitive matter.

At the same time, I didn't want her to feel isolated or humiliated either.

I rolled my shoulders.

"Good," I said as the girls followed me in.

When I was seated, they were still looking at me expectantly.

"Is there something else?"

SCHOOL DANCE

KIMBERLY STEPPED FORWARD.

"It's about the Halloween dance." She was tall with curly blond hair. Her lips where painted red, but she wore no other makeup.

"Oh?" I shuffled around some papers on my desk, waiting for them to go on.

The last two years, on October thirty-first, the ballroom was transformed into something out of a scary movie with blood spatter on the walls, cobwebs dangling from the ceiling, eyeballs floating in the punch bowl, and ghosts flitting around the frigid air.

The decorations were awesome, but change was good too.

"We know the student body officers are in charge, but we were hoping to do something a little less blood and guts and more light and fun," Kaylan chimed in.

She didn't wear make-up either, except her for lashes, which were thick and black, accentuating her brown eyes and brown skin.

Her hair haloed her face in a short afro.

"Yeah, like based on the movie, Hocus Pocus," Kimberly added.

Kaylan and Heather agreed.

"We could still do the haunted house, but just change up the dance decorations," Kaylan added.

"That's the dumbest effing idea I've ever heard."

The girls turned and I stood in time to see Sera lean against the doorframe. Her red hair was a tangle of waves, framing her creamy freckled skin.

The girls were in uniform - white shirt, plaid skirt, knee highs, and black shoes.

Somehow Sera made the outfit look edgy.

Her sleeves were rolled up to her biceps, her blouse unbuttoned more than was appropriate and her skirt was shorter than the others.

Sera was a conundrum.

When we first met, she was angry at everything, throwing her magic around like it was axe and everyone around her the target.

Briefly, I saw a kinder and more timid side of her and now, she was back to being a troll. I figured her truth was somewhere in the middle.

She was probably more confused than me. Perhaps she needed to see a therapist.

Some of the other students did and that seemed to help.

"Why is it dumb?" I asked, trying not to let the girl get under my skin.

"You must know the origins of Halloween." She came in, pushing past Kimberly and Kaylan, completely ignoring Heather, and sat across the desk from me.

There was another seat available, but the other three girls remained standing.

"It's about honoring the dead, not dancing, pigging out on junk food," she paused, eyeing Kimberly before continuing, "and dressing up in slutty costumes."

"What are you saying?" Kimberly snapped, crossing her arms defiantly.

Sera rolled her eyes. "Two things. Lay off the junk and pick a costume you aren't busting out of."

"What makes you think I would wear something like that?" Kimberly put her hands on her hips, glaring down at Sera.

She was indignant and rightly so. "You don't even know me, Sera."

"Because I've seen your pajamas. You might as well go to sleep naked."

"What's it to you what I wear?" Kimberly took a menacing step toward Sera, a flash of magic electrifying her fingertips.

"Why not use dark magic and actually bring someone back from the dead?" Sera's eyes twinkled with mischief. "That would feel more authentic and be damn cool."

The other girls paused, and the magic on Kimberly's fingers went out.

"Is that even possible?" Kimberly asked.

"Of course it is. Look at this place. Anything is possible," Sera said, every word filled with anticipation.

I needed to nip this line of talk in the bud immediately. "That's enough, ladies." I moved so my body was in front of Kimberly's. "Sera, you need to learn how to use the magic you have before you mess with something so sinister it could get you killed."

Sera looked away, but I got the feeling she wasn't going to let this go. Yet another thing I needed to mention to Snow and Coco.

"Get to class," I ordered Sera, pointing at the door.

"Whatever," she huffed and walked away.

When she was far enough down the hall, I faced the others. "You three need to get to your classes as well. I'll let Ms. Redding know your thoughts on the dance and we will see. Okay?" I casually crossed my arms. A move my mom used to make when I was a teen. "But remember, if you want real change, you need to step up."

"What do you mean?" Heather asked.

"Become a student body officer. Don't just expect change. Be the change. Got it?" I said quoting something I heard a long time ago.

Sheesh, I felt like a grownup.

When did that happen?

They mumbled their agreement and left, heading the same direction as Sera.

In the hall I heard Kimberly call Sera a bitch.

I couldn't completely disagree, but I couldn't agree either.

Sera grew up hard and fast as did many of the kids here.

But everyone dealt with adversity differently.

While Sera seemed to be acting out, I had to wonder what she would become. Something told me she was neither super nice nor a total bully.

After sending a magical note about the girls' Halloween idea to Coco, I opened a portal to Professor Pops' house.

I still needed to find Gabe.

The sooner the better.

Polly and the land of Polonias were depending on me.

Outside Pops' front door, I climbed the steps, took a deep breath, and knocked.

Waited. Knocked again. No one answered.

"Great." I descended the porch, debating where to go next when the door opened.

"Cindy?"

"Hi, Gabe." Ignoring his obvious surprise, I ran into his arms, hugging him tightly. "Just the person I was looking for."

He held me close, and I breathed in his scent, like baked apples and cinnamon. Home.

He was my home.

I hugged him tighter before meeting his lips with my own.

He tasted like cinnamon too.

As my tongue explored his mouth, I found his gum.

"What's up?" he asked, walking back into the house.

My hand in his, I followed him past the grand entrance with the enormous staircase leading upstairs and into the kitchen.

"I'm making breakfast. You hungry?" he asked.

"Starved," I admitted, clasping my hands together. Now that I was with Gabe and we were alone, I was nervous about what I needed to do.

Marriage was a big deal.

"Pancakes and bacon or a ham omelet?" he questioned, heading to the refrigerator.

Both sounded amazing.

"Omelet." I loved me some pancakes and bacon but thought the protein would do me good.

Gabe nodded, getting the ingredients and setting them on the counter next to the gas stove.

As he whisked the eggs and warmed the pan, I licked my lips anxiously.

He noticed and paused. "What is it? Has something happened?"

"Kind of," I admitted.

"Well, then, give me the details." He suddenly sounded tired, but I ignored that, thinking only of Polly.

She was dying.

I had to help.

Taking a deep breath, I told him about Mizrabel, Polly, Lawson, and Leo.

When I was finished, I heaved another breath, held it several seconds before blowing it out.

"What can I do?" he asked, sprinkling chopped ham, shredded cheese, and scallions on the second omelet then folding it in half.

Before I could talk myself out of it, I decided to blurt it out.

"Marry me, Gabriel." My voice didn't sound like my own.

I swallowed, glancing down at my hands.

One of my nails was chipped. I studied it like it held the answers to all my questions as I waited for Gabe to respond.

Several long moments passed, and I couldn't take the silence any longer.

I looked up.

Gabe smirked at me, sliding the omelet from the pan onto a plate before setting it in front of me.

His green eyes met and held mine. "Getting married will solve this Polly's problems?" He wasn't convinced. "Or are you that desperate to tie the knot?"

OceanofPDF.com

I flINCHED at both of his questions.

They were equally true but they were both important, too.

Gabe needed to understand the seriousness of the situation. At the same time, marriage was a big deal.

I knew that.

Millions of people struggled to make it work.

But for some damn reason, my marrying Gabe would save Polonias. How could that be a bad thing?

Frustrated and stalling, I picked up the fork and cut into the egg before shoving it into my mouth.

And sighed. The food was so good.

"Where did you learn how to make omelets?" I asked, changing the subject while I collected myself.

He took a bite of his eggs, chewing slowly. "Chayot headquarters. One chayot in particular, Delphina, is very adept at great-tasting art. She showed me how to make them."

"Delphina?" I ignored the jealousy forming in the pit of my stomach.

While she had a beautiful name, surely she had wrinkled skin, sagging boobs, and short curly white hair.

He nodded before shoving a huge bite in his mouth and chewing.

"She's been cooking for the chayot a long time," he added.

See? I knew she was old. "That's nice. She definitely has skills."

We ate in silence.

I thought of all the things I could say to make him understand how important it was for us to be married as soon as possible, but each time I opened my mouth to speak, nothing came out.

After he rinsed our dishes, Gabe came around to me, and took my hands. "I do want to marry you. Someday." A shadow crossed over his face.

"But not now. You know I'm not even supposed to be dating you. Just doing this," he paused, taking my fingers in his and shaking. "Touching you is against the rules."

"I know, but in Polonias you won't have to worry about the rules. It's not connected to Earth, so the chayot rules don't apply." I swallowed.

My heart pounded in my throat.

I was asking him to give up everything for me.

If he came to Polonias, he would no longer be leader of the chayot.

He would no longer have to worry about the humans and whether or not they were treated fairly.

He and I could start fresh there.

Sure, it would mean I would have to stop teaching at the academy, but I felt certain we could build a life together in Polonias.

"Thank you for asking, Cin, but I can't." He dropped my hands and went back around the island and began wiping down the counter.

Frustrated anger flared up. "You can't or you won't?" My eyes found the wings attached to the leather around my wrist.

He wanted us to be together forever. That was what he said.

"Does it matter?" he asked, pausing to give me a surprised look.

Desperation shot along my veins. "It does to me," I said, rising and coming over to him. "I love you and you love me. It shouldn't be so hard to choose me over everything else."

His face fell and he rubbed a hand over his eyes. "I can't," he said softly.

"Maybe in a year or two when everything settles down, but right now, I can't step down. Too many people are counting on me." His green eyes caught and held mine.

There was love in them. I saw it, but his love wasn't greater than his job.

He loved me as long as I didn't interfere with what he thought he needed to do.

"I understand," I said, removing the bracelet from my wrist and placing it on the counter.

"What are you doing?" he asked when I turned to leave.

"You've made your choice." I ground my teeth together, telling myself not to cry, but tears filled my eyes anyway.

I didn't want to break up with him.

I loved him, but I also wanted to be the most important person in his life. I was competing with billions of humans. Their safety, their needs came before me and always would.

He took hold of my wrist. "Cindy." He spoke my name quietly.

"What?" I faced him, hoping he would see how much I loved him and recognize what a gift that was.

His hands cupped my face. "I do love you. Know that." He shook his head. "But I can't stop helping humans and frankly, I'm surprised you would ask me to. They need me."

I snorted, pulling away. "The humans need help, I know. But there are thousands of chayot available and willing to come to their aid. I need you. I love you. The two of us marrying and living in Polonias will save the entire land. You still get to be the hero," I added, putting some distance between us as I clung to the counter's edge.

If I let go, I might crumble into a ball and I couldn't let that happen.

He crossed his arms. "It isn't about being a hero. You know that."

"Do I?" I was done.

Asking him took every ounce of courage I had but I failed.

I'd hoped with everything in me he would say yes.

Now that hope burned into a bitterness difficult to swallow.

Gabe and I were over.

"I need to get back." Pulling the hourglass from my shirt, I hesitated.

The last time I travelled through the mists, I was nearly strangled to death by malicious vines.

"Cindy," Gabe said again, imploring.

The bracelet he gave me still rested in one of his hands.

His plea angered me.

Gabe be damned.

The mists be damned.

I thought of Polonias.

"Good-bye, Gabe," I whispered, closing my eyes.

In my mind, I thought of Polly sitting beside the waterfall, her petals even browner.

I kept my thoughts on her as I traveled through the witch mists.

There were voices, but I blatantly ignored them, concentrating on reaching the heart of Polonias.

The noise of the water crashing into the pond filled my ears and I knew I was there.

Back in Polonias.

My heart sank because I didn't have good news.

My failure would mean the death of all in Polonias.

Opening my eyes, I saw Polly.

She leaned against one of the boulders, allowing the spray to dampen her petals.

SACRIFICE

"I'm glad you're back, Cinderella." Polly gave me a small smile.

"You won't think so when I tell you Gabe said no." The words caused my already broken heart to fracture further.

"I am sorry, Cinderella, but there is still a way. Do not lose hope yet, sister."

"How?" I asked, wiping at my eyes, resolute in my willingness to do whatever it took to save her and this land.

That she called me sister didn't go unnoticed, but I thought perhaps it was a way of greeting others within the land and not literal.

At least that's what I wanted to believe at the moment.

"Your marriage to Gabe would have saved our land. He is your soul mate, regardless of what those above him say. I sense the truth of it. But had you never left Polonias, you would never have met the angel, which means there is one from this land you can marry. His name is -

Before she could continue, Leo pushed through the lushness of the forest surrounding Polly's secret spot.

He lifted a hand. "Is it okay if I come over?" He directed the question at Polly.

"Of course, your highness." She bowed slightly and stumbled.

I took hold of her elbow, steadying her, alarmed by how super light and easy she was to move.

Leo came forward, taking hold of her other elbow and helping her sit on the boulder. Spray from the waterfall dampened our skin. My hair became frizzy, I could feel it. Leo's hair turned wavy and made him even more handsome.

"She told you, didn't she?" he asked softly after a long while.

"Told me what?" The way he looked at me made my insides quiver.

He was exceedingly hot in ways Gabe wasn't.

At the thought of Gabe, the fractures deepened.

"I'm the man you should marry. Doing so will not only bring us lifelong happiness, it will save our land. Together we can rule Polonias in love and kindness," Leo said, a slight smile pushing up his mouth.

As he said the words, I felt their rightness just as I felt there was no way I could go through with it.

I hardly knew the man.

Why would I tie myself to him?

But if marrying him was the only way?

If doing so would save Polly and all Polonias, could I be selfish enough to say no?

He reached around Polly and held out his hand.

"Should we do it now? Once we are bound, the mantle of power will automatically fall to you and Polonias will heal immediately."

"But why me? Shouldn't the authority fall to you? You are the prince after all." I pulled away and Leo retreated, crossing his arms.

I didn't want to be queen.

Seeing all Snow went through for the supernaturals showed me exactly what I didn't want. I liked teaching at the academy.

That was good enough for me.

"The Loyalor bloodline is adequate, but if they possessed true power, then the Sickness would have no control over the land or me. You, Cinderella, come from the original bloodline. It is you who can accomplish this task." Polly looked at her hands before meeting my eyes. "I am sorry, but it's true."

I shivered at her words as something dawned on me. "You called me your sister. If I have the power to save the land and free you and it from the Sickness, then why don't you?"

Her smile was sad as she studied me. "We are sisters, that is true. When I was born, it was for the purpose of forming Polonias. Our parents were narcissistic enough to think that fashioning a realm separate from Earth but still attached wouldn't have any consequences."

A tear leaked onto her cheek. "They were wrong. After a few hundred years, they saw I was beginning to die and knew they needed to produce another heir to save Polonias. By then, our father abandoned the land and our mother became Mizrabel, the sorceress. During those years, her hatred for our father grew, but she still loved him and agreed to create another." Her eyes caught and held mine. "You are that creation."

"You were born solely to be the heart of this land?" That disgusted me.

How could Mizrabel and my father be so cruel?

She nodded. "But do not feel sorry for me. It's been such a pleasure to be part of this land for so long. I have loved it - "

Her voice trailed off and she gave Leo a sideways glance before her cheeks tinged with color.

"My only sadness is I didn't get to experience what it means to fall in love, marry, and have children of my own." As she spoke, she looked at her hands. "It's my one regret."

"That really stinks," I said, taking her hand in mine. "It wasn't right, what our parents did to you. But - "

"Because," she said, cutting me off.

I was going to ask why our parents sent me to Earth.

Polly seemed to read my mind.

"Once you were born," Polly continued, "our father saw just how far gone Mizrabel was. It was he who took you from our land and sent you to the human realm."

She smiled sadly. "He did it to keep you safe."

"It worked for a while, I guess, but if I knew about you, about Polonias, I could've helped sooner." I shook my head, frustrated with all that was happening to a people and land I knew nothing about.

They were my people though and Polly was my sister. "So Leo and I must marry?" I asked, getting us back to the subject.

I still had unanswered questions.

The biggest? Who was my father? But knowing wouldn't change anything.

"Yes," she said. "The two of you married will heal the land completely." Polly pleaded with her eyes, asking me to do the unthinkable and marry a man I hardly knew.

I didn't want to. I wanted to marry the man I loved, but he didn't want me.

So, if Polly said marrying Leo would heal her and Polonias, then I would do it.

Because the alternative - standing by and letting an entire land as well as my sister die - was out of the question.

I only wished there was something I could do to fulfill her one regret.

She deserved to fall in love.

I didn't know how, but I would find a way.

After more than a thousand years of serving Polonias, helping her was the least I could do.

"Cinderella?" Leo asked, bringing me from my thoughts.

He moved, kneeling in front of me, holding out his hands.

I slid my fingers between them and felt warmth followed by a shock of emotion similar to the white hot cold I felt with Lawson, but with him it was a lot stronger.

I flinched, my eyes watering at the sensation.

"A part of me had doubted, but this - " His voice trailed off as he considered our entwined hands.

"It really is you. The one we've heard about since before anyone can remember," he said, his voice awed. "Will you do me the honor of becoming my wife?"

I glanced at Polly. Her face shone with hope.

That blasted word again.

"A bond is there, not as strong as the love that would have developed between you and Gabe, but your marriage will work, Cinderella," Polly said through a coughing fit.

Purpose filled my veins.

I would do this.

It was worth the sacrifice to save her.

"Yes," I said.

The time was right.

Perfect, in fact.

"Let's get married right now."

POLLY'S PARADISE

IF I HAD to pick a place to be married, this wasn't bad.

It wasn't Paris. Definitely not.

And that was okay.

In a lot of ways, Polly's garden was even better.

The magnificent waterfall colliding into the crystal clear pool, to the lily pads with lilies floating along the surface, to the way the lush grass danced lazily in the soft wind.

There were dozens of flowers growing wild along the edge.

Trees surrounded this place - the heart of Polonias.

Polly's Paradise.

That was what I wanted to call the place.

Beyond the physical beauty was Polly herself.

My sister.

Her sweet disposition radiated around her.

She belonged here.

That much was obvious.

Maybe it was because it was part of her.

Then there was Leo.

We were nearly strangers.

He didn't love me any more than I loved him, but this wasn't about love.

It was about magic, and it seemed our magics bound together would save Polly.

I needed to go through with this.

"You'll marry me?" Leo asked again, and I saw the doubt behind his eyes.

He thought I would say no.

"It's the right thing to do. So yes. Yes, I will marry you." Nausea formed in my stomach.

What would Gabe think when he found out?

Not that it mattered.

I asked him first and he turned me down.

Polly was dying and Polonias was dying with her.

This was the only option.

As soon as I agreed to marry Leo, Quilla appeared.

"Cinderella." She clapped her hands excitedly, sending magical sparkles into the air, which caused her to sneeze.

She sniffled. "It's a wonderful day."

Leo stood and pulled me up with him.

"Hi, Quilla." It was apparent she knew much more than she ever let on, making me curious about her fairy godmother status.

But I didn't have long to debate as she pulled me into a quick hug before turning her focus back to Leo.

He smiled at her. "Nice to see you again, Quilla."

My fairy godmother became nervous and excited and a giggly girl all at once.

It was adorable.

"Let's get you out of those ugly human clothes and into something that befits a king of Polonias," Quilla said.

"Work your magic," Leo replied, smiling down at her.

I didn't know whether to take offense or not. I was a big-time fan of many human clothes. Fashion was my forte.

Quilla spoke several magical words and Leo's outfit changed from jeans and a tee shirt to dark gray pants, a navy and gray jacket, and black boots that stopped at the kneecap.

Leo looked down, watching the transformation of his clothing in awe.

"Nice," he said. "I'm thinking I need a haircut as well."

"Absoltootinlutely," Quilla said, walking around him like one would study a sculpture. "Not too short, but something to enhance your square jaw and handsome face."

The two of them were funny to watch together.

I couldn't help but laugh.

"Traxes freemus." As soon as the last word left her lips, his hair shortened to just below his ears.

The rapid change in his appearance surprised me, but he looked good.

Just like his brother, though Leo's eyes were softer than his brother's, kinder, yet at the same time confident and powerful.

"What do you think?" Leo asked, turning in a circle, his arms out.

"Not bad," I admitted.

I would've said more, but Anna and Belle, the twin rabbits that created one whole woodland fairy, hopped out of the forest at Leo's back.

When they moved past the prince, Anna came over to me and rubbed her furry side against my leg.

I leaned down and scratched behind her big ears.

Belle scurried atop Leo's shoe and pooped pellets.

"How charming," Leo said, shaking them from his boot.

Anna and Belle darted into each other, but before they collided, there was a flash of light and poof! They changed from two bunnies into one woodland fairy.

"Anna Belle." I clasped my hands together, happy to see her.

When she stood, she bowed. "Please, just call me Anna."

To Leo, she said, "I'm so sorry about your footwear, your highness."

Leo's gaze showed surprise as he looked from the fairy to me and back again. "Anna Belle, that was you? I - " he ran a hand through his hair. "Don't worry about it."

It appeared Leo hadn't known she was cursed into two bunnies.

I sensed a story there.

One I would be interested in hearing, especially since Leo seemed so uncomfortable.

Anna Belle peered closer at him. "It is you. The lost prince. The king told us told us you were dead," she whispered, her face going pale.

Leo smirked without humor. "Surprise."

Anna blushed. "Where have you been? What happened?"

While Leo explained about being trapped in the glass lyre, I turned to Polly. "It seems we're going to have an audience for the nuptials."

She giggled and her petals changed from a pale pink to fuchsia. "That's good. Witnesses." She scooped a handful of water to her lips and drank.

Leo came to stand beside me. Anna was behind him.

"Should we start?" He took my hand in his.

Tingling magic skittered up my arm. "Yes, I believe we should."

I turned to Quilla. "Have you told anyone else? Leo returning was supposed to be a secret."

If Leo's twin brother Lawson found out, there would be trouble.

"I only told Anna Belle and - " she paused and put a hand to her head. "I believe I told Violet as well. She should be coming too."

"That isn't good, Quilla," I said, butterflies fluttering in my belly. "I think we better hurry."

"Yes, let's get this ov - " Leo paused. "I mean, let's do this." He ran a hand over the back of his neck, only slightly embarrassed at his slip.

His words were like a knife to my guts.

This wasn't how I saw myself getting married, not even in my wildest dreams.

"Someone's coming," Anna whispered.

Rustling echoed through the forest.

There were snapping twigs and the sounds of growling and panting.

A big cat appeared.

A leopard wearing a lilac dress.

She walked on her hind legs briefly before falling onto all four.

I covered my mouth to keep from laughing as I relaxed.

"It's Violet," Polly said, hugging herself.

The historian let out an anguished roar as she came through the trees, stopping beside Leo.

"Violet, it's good to see you," Leo said.

"I've waited for this day for many years," she said and bowed, her spectacles sliding down her nose.

"So, I was right, and everyone knew about the twin princes but me." I placed my hands on my hips, pouting.

"It wasn't that we were keeping secrets on purpose, Cinderella. Most of us didn't have a choice." Violet pushed her wiry glasses further onto her nose and adjusted her dress.

"Everyone is here, I believe. Shall we begin?" Polly asked, placing herself in front of Leo and me.

WEDDING A STRANGER

ANNA, Violet, and Quilla stood off to the side of us.

Quilla kept wiping at her eyes like a doting parent watching her only child being married off.

I found it comforting since my actual parents weren't here.

Polly cleared her throat. "Now is the time of restoration. Our land has waited for this day for more than a thousand years. To be a part of this mending is - "

"Twixit. By all that is magical, wait!" Quilla jumped in front of Leo and me, waving her hands in the air.

Sparkles flew everywhere, causing her to sneeze.

"What is it?" I asked, concerned.

"You aren't dressed for a wedding."

I looked down at my basic human clothing and shrugged.

"It's okay." It really wasn't.

I wanted to look gorgeous on my wedding day even if I wasn't marrying the man of my dreams.

But how I looked wasn't as important as getting married and making things right in the land.

"It is not okay." Quilla stomped her foot, speaking words I didn't understand.

As she spoke, my clothing was replaced by a stunning dress.

Airy and whimsical, the color was the palest blue, almost like ice, the bodice strapless and formfitting and covered in pale blue gems.

The skirt was long, gauzy, and had three tiers with thousands of small, pale blue gems attached.

"It's beautiful," I said, turning from side to side, trying to take it all in.

I lifted the dress, so the hem came up to my shins. I was barefoot. "Shoes?"

"Ah, yes. I saw a pair in your closet." Quilla spoke the words to a spell and they appeared on my feet.

They were the ones Lawson sent via his magic to Polonias. It felt like forever ago even though it wasn't.

Leo chuckled. "Are those made of glass? They're pretty."

"They are," I said, smiling. "Thank you." I let go of my dress.

"What about my hair?"

"On it," Quilla said. She spoke some words and I felt my hair rearrange itself. Before I had the chance to ask for a mirror, one appeared in her hands. "What do you think?"

My hair was up in a chignon with a black ribbon wrapped around the top of it.

Around my neck still hung the chain holding the hourglass, but there was also a black ribbon choker with a diamond seven point star dangling from it.

The charm was lovely, and I reached out to touch it.

"You've outdone yourself, Quilla." I lifted the star between my fingers, feeling the vibrations of magic within.

It was obviously a very powerful charm. "Where did this come from?"

She gave me a brilliant smile. "Me. As your fairy godmother, I had to get you something as extra special as you are," she said and sneezed heartily.

Quilla clasped her hands together. "Another time, I'll tell you where I got it and how best to use it."

"Thank you," I said, taking her hand.

She smiled, pleased with herself.

"Can we continue now?" Polly asked, moving so she was in front of us again.

Quilla covered her face with her hands. "Yes. Sorry, Polly."

"It's alright," she said to Quilla.

Then she turned to Leo and me. "Take each other's hands."

Leo wrapped his hand around mine and winked, then held up his free hand. "May I say something first, Polly?"

"Please." She smiled, obviously smitten by him.

"Cinderella, I don't really know you, and we're kind of going about this backward, but - " He ran a hand through his hair. "After the ceremony is finished, I think we should celebrate. Throw a ball. Invite everyone. Let it be a new beginning for all of Polonias and for us. What do you think?"

My broken heart fluttered to life. He really was a good man. Marriage to him would be full of surprises, all of them exciting and wonderful.

Leo leaned forward and whispered in my ear. "Also, there's something I'd like to ask you."

I shivered at the way his breath disheveled my hair. Thoughts about what he would ask crossed my mind, but I pushed them aside.

"I can't wait." I gave him a small smile.

He grinned and kissed my cheek. "You look stunning," As he spoke, his lips brushed against my ear, sending sparks of icy heat into my veins.

I bit down on my bottom lip to keep from sighing.

"Okay, Polly. I'm ready," Leo said, stepping back.

Polly started speaking again.

"Now is the time of restoration." She gave Quilla a pointed look.

My fairy godmother blushed.

"Our land has waited for this day a thousand years. To be a part of this mending through marriage is something to be treasured."

She glanced first at Leo and then me. "Magic created this land and magic will heal it. That magic is the essence of each of us, of the trees, the flowers, the sky, the water, and every living thing. With the return of Cinderella and her marriage to Leolas Loyalor, our land will become whole again."

Quilla let out a sob as Violet purred happily.

Anna blinked back tears.

"Leolas, Prince of Polonias, do you take Cinderella into your heart? Will you protect her, love her, cherish her, and do all in your power to bring her happiness?"

Leo swallowed.

I wondered if he was nervous but when he answered, his voice rang out confident and clear.

"With all that I am, I will. I do."

My heart hammered against my ribs.

Hard and fast.

I was suddenly afraid.

This was really happening.

I was effing getting married to a stranger.

Polly glanced at me. "Cinderella, Healer of Polonias, do you take Leolas Loyalor into your heart? Will you protect him, cherish him, and do all in your power to bring him happiness?"

It felt like rock shards were in my throat. "I - Yes, I do. I will," I said, my voice raspy.

A dark cord appeared and wrapped itself around Leo's wrist and mine.

I felt my eyes go wide as wonder coursed through me.

On my ring finger, what looked like a tattooed vine wrapped itself up to my knuckle.

I saw the same thing happening on Leo's ring finger.

There was a strange pulling from inside me, near my heart.

When it finished the pull became stronger and it brought tears to my eyes.

I looked at Leo.

The tattoos on our ring fingers flitted back and forth between silver and gold. His stayed on silver. Mine twined half silver and half gold.

A large diamond appeared in the center, sparking in the sunlight.

"Wow," I whispered.

"It's beautiful, though not as lovely as you," Leo whispered.

"Sweet talker," I said, my voice shaking. I knew I was doing the right thing, but that didn't stop my nerves.

Polly smiled, showing her childlike teeth. "As the heart of Polonias it is my honor to pronounce - "

"Stop," Mizrabel shouted.

She appeared at the top of the waterfall, seemingly floating above the center of it.

Holding out a hand, she sent a bolt of magical lightning into Leo.

He flew backward, the bond holding us together severing.

TRUST IS FOOLISH

"LEO!" I cried as pain tore through my insides.

I worked to ignore it, focusing on the fallen prince. His head had smacked hard against a rock and he lay on the ground, his eyes closed. I knelt in front of him, placing his head in my lap, trying to think of a spell to heal him.

One came to mind and I raised my hand as the words formed on my lips.

"Silence," Mizrabel said, shooting a blaze of magic at my chest.

Unprepared, for the impact, I fell back.

"Do not speak," she yelled, twisting her hand and causing my mouth to seal shut. She floated down, getting closer to us.

I was confused. Was Mizrabel on my side or not? It appeared all she knew was how to betray those she was supposed to love.

Quilla and Violet were huddled together, and I wondered why until I saw Polly behind them. They were protecting her.

Anna jumped into the air, her wings beating against the air as she moved toward Mizrabel. She held something in her hand, but I couldn't tell what it was. "You will leave Polly and Cinderella - "

Mizrabel turned her hand clockwise and Anna doubled over as she cried out in pain.

I tried to help, carefully laying Leo on the ground beside me before I stood. There were multiple spells I could use against the woman who supposedly birthed me but my damned mouth wouldn't work.

Still, I knew some magic could be used without words and I held out my hand and thought of stopping Mizrabel.

She glanced over at me and smiled as she turned her wrist again, squeezing her fingers into a fist.

Anna's wings stopped beating and she fell to the ground.

"Her demise is on your hands, child," Mizrabel said.

Tears streamed down my face as I crawled over to the woodland fairy. Her skin was ashen, the color of death. Her eyes were still open, but there was no life behind them.

I closed them tenderly. I'm so sorry, I thought.

Violet roared and ripped off her encumbering dress.

Then she went after Mizrabel on all fours. She was a big cat. As the historian leaped in the air, Mizrabel spoke some words and Violet turned to stone before crashing to the ground.

When she hit, the stone body cracked into four pieces.

"No," I screamed, breaking through the spell and rushing over to Violet. I hadn't had the chance to know her well, but I guessed she would've been an invaluable friend.

Quilla glanced over, giving me a sad smile. "Save this land, whatever the cost, Cinderella," she said and turned to face Mizrabel.

"What do you think you can do to me? You're allergic to magic and you have no wings. You are nothing but a glorified sparkler," Mizrabel said, sending a bolt of magic from her hand.

My fairy godmother countered it and sent it back. "I can stop you," she said before sneezing.

Mizrabel cackled, preparing to send another blast of magic at her.

"Don't hurt her," I shouted, rolling onto my knees, trying to stand, but my blasted shoes caught on the hem of my dress and I went down again. "Please." With my skirts practically around my neck, I stood, huffing angrily.

"Isn't that sweet. My daughter already cares for the people of this land." She gave me a mocking smile and sent her magic into Quilla with such ferocity, it shot into my fairy godmother's chest and came out the other side.

A final breath escaped Quilla before she fell to the ground.

"No. No. No. No. No." I grabbed hold of my head, weeping uncontrollably.

In a matter of seconds, three of my newly acquired friends were dead.

Leo was probably dead too, and Polly didn't have long left either.

Tears fell from my cheeks like rain as grief filled every crevice.

"How could you?" I cried. "Leo trusted you."

"Trust is foolish," Mizrabel said, her eyes blazing with fury. She pushed her sleeves up past her elbows and came at me.

I crawled over to Leo, thinking perhaps if I kissed him, even though he was unconscious, I could still somehow save this land.

A final effort before my mother killed me.

At the moment I reached Leo, the king burst from the forest followed by the false prince, Lawson. Both were on horseback and they rode toward Leo and me, stopping just short of trampling us.

I looked over at Polly.

She was on the ground, clutching her stomach as though Mizrabel had taken a piece of her when she killed our friends.

Another wave of grief washed over me, but I fought it back.

Giving in wasn't an option. Not now.

"Get back in the ground," I hissed at Polly, worried Mizrabel would come for her next.

I still didn't understand why she and the king and Lawson were doing this.

If Polly died, Polonias died, and the only way to save the land was Leo and me marrying. Everyone should be on board with this plan. Not so.

Polly raised her head and looked at me. "I will do as you say, but our mother won't kill me. At least not yet. Her goal is revenge." She pressed one hand into the dirt and roots surrounded her, pulling her into the ground before she settled like a lily blooming on its pad.

I heard her sigh with relief at being surrounded by the earth once again.

That her suffering was lessened, if only momentarily, eased my tension slightly.

The king stepped over Polly and came to stand directly in my path, blocking out the light. He glared down at me like I was a thing to be scraped off his boot.

Mizrabel moved to stand beside him, her features a haze of triumphant malice.

"You see, King Loyalor. I told you she was here."

"Very good, Sorceress," the king said, sliding off his horse. His face was red with anger and he blustered, "But are we in time? Has she married the boy?"

His eyes glittered with such resentment, it almost felt palpable, and for the briefest moment I debated using the hourglass around my neck to get out of Polonias.

But I knew I couldn't.

On shaky legs I stood, rolling my shoulders back and lifting my chin, though my bottom lip wouldn't stop quivering.

My friends are dead, I thought, as another wave of grief overwhelmed me.

I swallowed down the sob building in my throat and gripped my hands into fists.

"I was just in time," Mizrabel said, crossing her arms like she was superior in every way to those around her.

"Good." King Loyalor slapped me. "How dare you come into my kingdom and try to usurp me? Did you think you wouldn't be met with resistance? That because you're from the supposed original bloodline, you can just waltz in here and take what is mine?"

Stars danced before me as I went down, my eyes watering as the pain exploded along my jaw and cheek.

My hand went to the place where it burned, knowing there was a handprint.

I wanted to be strong. To stand up to him, but my body shook with devastated sadness.

It was like the blow jolted everything I was holding back to the surface.

Burning beneath the sadness was anger. At him. At Mizrabel. At my father, whoever the hell he was.

I wanted to destroy them all for what happened.

SAVE THIS LAND

"GET UP," King Loyalor shouted, grabbing me by the arm, shaking me. "Answer me."

"Keep what's yours. I don't want any of it. All I want is to save Polly and this land and if you were smart, you would want that too," I spat, shoving away all emotions but the anger.

"She's lying," Mizrabel said. "She only came here to take her place as queen of Polonias."

My moth fell open in shock before I quickly closed it.

Mizrabel was playing the king.

That much was obvious.

"Why are you doing this?" I asked her, ignoring the king, even though my arm pulsed with pain where he still held me.

She rolled her eyes. "I'm here to help the king save his land from the likes of you," she said.

"You're the one who's lying," I said between clenched teeth and knew without a doubt Polly was right.

My mother wanted revenge. Did she want Polonias destroyed? It seemed that she did.

Turning my focus back to the king, I tried to relax. "Mizrabel doesn't care about you or Polonias. Let me save this land and then I promise you can keep it. All I want is for Polly, Leo - " My voice trailed off as I thought of Quilla, Anna, and Violet.

Part of me didn't want to believe they were gone.

Mizrabel killed them like they were nothing.

My devastation turned to anger, and I fueled it until it was brimming. "I don't care about ruling."

"Is that so?" His grip on my arm loosened as doubt clouded his features and he looked at Mizrabel.

"Don't believe a word out of her deceitful mouth." Mizrabel sidled up to him, pressing her body into his. "You know the truth, your majesty," she said lustfully. "Let's talk privately a moment."

The king released me and the two of them went over to the edge of the falls.

With the roar of the waterfall in the background, I couldn't hear what they said and didn't care.

I needed to know that Leo was alive. He was still on the ground with Lawson standing beside him, like he was in some sort of a trance. I had a momentary worry that Lawson killed his brother.

"He's alive, Cinderella," Polly whispered from beneath the petals of her flower. "The ceremony won't be complete until you and Leo kiss. That seals the magics and gives you the power to heal Polonias." She poked her head out from the center of the petals.

"I'll make it happen." I glanced over at King Loyalor and Mizrabel.

They were still talking, their backs turned.

Before moving away, I had a thought. Like a magical lightbulb pinged on inside my head. "Why can't you marry Leo? You like him, don't you? And you know him a lot better than I do."

Polly was my sister after all, which meant we were from the same bloodline. And if she married Leo, that would also solve her desire to marry and have children.

"I - " she paused. "I never really thought about it," she said, tears filling her eyes. "But no." She shook her head. "I am the heart. If I married, I would change as would my power. Our land might die anyway."

I wondered whether that was true. Why couldn't she still be the heart and marry? "I guess," I said, knowing there wasn't time to figure out the truth.

"Okay." As stealthily as possible I snuck past Lawson.

"Leo," I whispered.

His chest still rose and fell, giving me hope.

Our lips were inches apart and I leaned down, closing the distance between us.

"No, you don't." Lawson grabbed me around the waist and threw me away like trash on garbage day.

My knees hit the ground and pain shot up my legs as my skirt tore.

"Wake up, Leo" I shouted, hoping he could hear me.

There was blood in his hair and on the grass beneath him.

He moaned and one eye fluttered open before closing again.

"Quiet, daughter." For the first time I saw the hatred blaring within Mizrabel, like the glamour finally fell away and her true feelings were revealed.

I shuddered, trying to pull away.

"Tie her up and get her on the back of my horse," the king ordered.

Before Mizrabel could respond, he turned his anger on Lawson. "Why didn't you kill your brother like I asked?"

"I - " Lawson looked around like he wasn't sure what happened.

To keep him from discovering what Polly had done, I screamed.

When they were looking at me, I held out my hands to the king. "You don't want to kill your son. And you don't want to kill me. You need us to keep the Sickness from taking over the land." This was old news.

I already said as much, but I had to try something.

Mizrabel was on me in two steps, lifting me off the ground by the neck.

I clawed at her hand.

Gasping and choking, I pleaded with my eyes, hoping this was just another ruse, that once again she was tricking the king and Lawson, and was on our side.

"I can kill her now and be done with it," Mizrabel said, her grip tightening.

"No. She must be made an example," the king said. "The people need to watch her die so they know I will not tolerate dissention. You do your part and find another way to save us."

Spots danced before my eyes and the edges turned black. I would be unconscious in seconds and all would be lost. The words to a spell filled my mind and I spoke them as best I could. "Rua-tha grislin-gr we-nwillow."

As the spell filled the air, Mizrabel's eyes grew wide.

She released me, falling back.

"What have you done?" she demanded, studying her hands as they began to shimmer.

From my crumpled position on the ground, I watched as the spell took effect. I meant to keep her away from me, but it was doing more than that.

She was disappearing.

"How could you do this to your mother?" Her voice was laced with anger and fear as spears of light cracked through her skin like the rays of the sun shining through stormclouds before it set.

"She must suffer death in the magical fires of Evanoa," Mizrabel screamed. "It's the only way to stop her." With her final word, she was gone.

A hush fell over everyone. Even the waterfall seemed to quiet its rumble as we stood in stunned silence.

Lawson yanked me off the ground and held me to him. "It'll be a pleasure to watch you die," he whispered.

Then he cast a spell to bind my hands together before tossing me on the back of his horse.

"Bring your brother as well," King Loyalor ordered. "I'll deal with him myself."

AWAIT MY FATE

AS WE MADE our way back to the castle, I could see Leo's eyes were open. He was watching me but said nothing.

What was there to say? We failed.

Several times I tried to utter words to a spell that would set me free, but they wouldn't leave my mouth.

Frustrated, I huffed. "What's wrong with me?"

Lawson chuckled. "It's the cuffs. They won't allow you to perform any magic."

"Figures." I sighed, wishing there was something else to do, but it seemed I was out of options. Merde. I was tres pissed and couldn't do a thing about it.

"You were supposed to be my bride. Now you'll burn. What a waste." Lawson glanced back at me. "Perhaps I can have my way with you before you die." His smile turned oily.

"That will never happen," I spat, disgusted.

He didn't speak again.

We rode through the forest, over a hill, and into a lovely meadow filled with pink and violet flowers. We kept going through the town built around the castle.

The streets were paved with stone.

Four wooden bridges went along the outskirts, passing over a river.

As we passed cottages, bakeries that smelled of freshly baked bread and cinnamon rolls, the townsfolk stopped what they were doing and watched.

No one spoke.

A giant fountain stood in the town square.

On it a statue of a boy who looked a lot like Lawson stood next to a girl. Both had an arm around the other's waist.

In their other hands they each carried a pail.

Water poured from the pails into the circular well below.

We continued on like ghosts, moving through town like the people weren't even there.

When we reached the other side, we crossed a drawbridge that led to the castle.

At the front doors, the king climbed off his horse and told the guard to take Leo away.

Lawson slid off his horse and carried me himself, throwing me over his shoulder.

I beat against his back and kicked my legs until he muttered a spell that left me unable to do anything but hang there like a dishrag.

No one stopped him or tried to help.

If someone noticed me, they turned away.

Lawson climbed several sets of stairs, puffing as he went, before traipsing down a hall and up another set of stairs.

At the top, he adjusted me on his shoulder before going to a door, which he opened before walking inside.

The room was thick with dust and darkness. Drapes covered the windows and grubby sheets covered the furniture. Obviously, the room hadn't been used in a while.

"Where are we?" I asked.

He didn't respond but went to another door where he climbed another set of stairs.

These were circular and narrow and my head kept bumping against the slick rock wall.

At the top, he opened another door. The interior was dark like the other one but didn't seem as dusty.

"Home sweet home," he grunted, yanking open a set of curtains.

Bright light shone in, allowing me to see the sparsely decorated room with a bed, a chair, and a small table.

"This is where you'll remain while we prepare for your execution." He dropped me onto the bed, his eyes raking over my body.

There wasn't much to see since I was still in my wedding dress, but his gaze made me feel dirty.

Like he could see through my clothing to what lay underneath.

My hands were still bound together with the unseen enchanted cords, but I moved my arms to try to cover more of myself.

Lawson smirked. "You should be afraid." He climbed on the bed, an arm on either side of my head and one knee on either side of my hips.

He tried to kiss me, but I turned my face away, pushing my hands against his chest.

"I'll take what I want and there's not a damn thing you can do about it." He pressed closer, grabbing my chin in one hand.

"You're mine to do with as I please," he whispered, pressing his lips to mine. "At least until you die."

I fought against him, but he weighed nearly twice what I did.

Without my magic, there was only one thing left to do. With as much force as I could muster, I sent my knee into his groin.

Pain crossed his face before it went white and he rolled off me, curling into a ball, moaning obscenities.

Grabbing hold of the covers, I used them to heft myself off the bed. I moved to the window, which was as far away from him as I could get in the small room.

A quick glance outside revealed I was at the top of the castle and the ground was a long, long way down.

"Don't you dare touch me again," I said, my breath coming in irregular bursts.

He gave me a look of pure evil as he got off the bed and went to the door.

"I'm going to enjoy watching you burn," he said, slamming the door shut.

He locked it and I breathed a small sigh of relief.

Taking the hourglass from my cleavage, I thought of Sharra.

Of the beautiful land, my room there, and all of my things.

The magic began to work, but only for the briefest moment before I slammed into the wall.

"What the hell?" Undeterred, I lifted my dress and threw my leg over the window sill. Though the window was open, it was like an invisible wall was there, and I couldn't get out.

A sob of desperation racked through my chest.

Leaning against the wall, I stared out the window, trying to run through my options.

A slight breeze blew into the room, smelling of roses.

Below was the town.

In the distance, was the fountain of the boy and the girl in the center. People milled about. Some seemed focused on their tasks. Others meandered. Beyond the town was the hill, the forest and the heart of Polonias - Polly's Paradise.

"Help," I screamed. "Please! Someone! Help!"

Either no one heard me, or they pretended not to.

I stayed beside the window until my legs quivered and I fell to my knees.

Even then, I didn't leave the opening.

Soon after the sun set, a slot I hadn't noticed before slid open and a plate of food was pushed through before it sealed shut again.

It was vegetable soup, bread, and water.

It tasted good and I ate it all.

When I was finished, I climbed on the bed.

Exhaustion pulled my eyes closed.

Sleep would be a kind respite.

BURNED AT THE STAKE

I WOKE to the smell of smoke. I opened my eyes and saw I was tied to a stake.

A roaring fire blazed only a few feet from me.

People were standing around, gawking and whispering as they watched.

A bulky guard with beefy hands unrolled a parchment. His voice boomed out across the open field.

"Cinderella, by order of King Loyalor, supreme ruler over the land of Polonias, you are hereby sentenced to burn at the stake until such time as you are dead." He glanced at me, and through the billowing smoke I held his gaze. He cleared his throat. "Do you have anything to say for yourself?"

Only one word popped into my head. "Merde." A curse word in French.

One of my favorites.

Truthfully, it was the only one I remembered.

The man rolled his eyes along with the parchment and stepped off the podium and into the noisy crowd.

"Gabe," I whispered before repeating his name in my mind over and over. "I need you."

Another guard shoved a torch into the fire, lighting it.

When it was fully ablaze, he moved toward my pyre.

My knees quivered with each of his steps.

Death was mere moments away.

"Don't do this," I pleaded, catching hold of his eyes with my own. "Please."

He glanced down at the wood under my feet before sticking the torch into it until flames appeared, then moved to another spot and did the same thing.

Noise from the crowd picked up. I suddenly noticed the rotten fruit in people's hands. A woman threw a tomato and it smacked me on the forehead, the juices leaking into my eyes.

I wanted to cry, to mourn my impending death since no one else would. Tears filled my eyes as the guard came around from the other side, tossing the burning torch onto the wood. It stopped just before reaching the edge of my dress.

"Ignithea," he said and the fire roared higher.

I wasn't ready to die, but I didn't see a way out of my situation.

If Gabe knew what was happening, surely, he would come for me.

At least I hoped.

Maybe he would be happy to be rid of me.

Smoke filled my nose and I coughed as my eyes watered and tears streamed down my face.

Frightened butterflies beat frantically in my belly.

Memories - some recent and some from long ago - careened across my mind.

I thought of Gabe and wondered why I wasn't enough.

Lawson appeared through the haze wearing a cruel smile. "After you die, I'll make sure no one remembers your name." His arms were crossed, and his feet were hips-width apart.

He intended to stay until I was burned alive and witness the whole thing.

I couldn't meet his gaze and focused on the magical flames swirling around my feet, scorching my dress and my shoes.

The heat became so unbearable I wished I could shrink from it but moving wasn't an option.

I was bound to a stake. Several spells came to mind and I shouted them, but the magic did nothing to the fire or my situation, like the blaze had melted away my magic.

The crowd laughed and jeered, pointing at the crazy girl in the fancy dress.

"I'm so sorry," I cried out.

Sorry for my friends dying and sorry I couldn't save them.

Sorry for letting Polly, Leo, and all those in Polonias down, though they didn't know it.

The taunting from the crowd got louder and I knew the end was close.

I thought of my adoptive mom and dad.

They would be sad I was gone but wouldn't know what happened.

I knew they would miss me, and I would miss them too.

I thought of Snow, my best friend, and my ex-angelic boyfriend and wished things between us were different.

My students at the academy came to mind next.

Heather, Sera, and the others.

I thought about Professor Pops, of the other teachers, and about how much I enjoyed shaping young minds.

As the fire caught hold of my dress, I lifted my chin, the only part of my body I could move, and defiantly waited for the end, wishing it wouldn't be painful.

Knowing I would suffer and thinking perhaps I deserved it since I hadn't been able to save Violet, Anna, and Quilla.

As their faces appeared in my mind, I cried out.

Whatever came after death, I hoped I would see them again.

I closed my eyes as the fire melted my dress and burned my skin. It was more than I could bear, and I screamed out in pain.

From the haze of my suffering, I heard a roar followed by shrieks of fear.

All I could think was they were disgusted at seeing the way my skin flowing from my bones.

I screamed again and again, hoping it would end soon.

"Ecudous!"

At the word, the flames vanished, but my skin still burned, and I sobbed in agony.

"Make it stop! Make it stop!"

"Just who the hell do you think you are?" Lawson asked, sounding like the entitled asshole he was.

"Oratheth subdueth," the other male voice commanded.

His words filtered through my pain, like a dream I could almost remember.

Then the pain was gone.

A healing balm overtook the agony and my skin felt cool and refreshed.

At the sudden change, I opened my eyes.

A man wearing a fifteenth century surcoat with a hood covering his head had Lawson by the throat and lifted him in the air.

Lawson's feet dangled like he was a puppet without strings.

"You will not harm another soul," the man said.

There was a snapping sound as he broke Lawson's neck.

Then the body landed in a heap at the stranger's feet.

I blinked several times, unable to believe what I witnessed. The man had saved me and murdered Lawson in less than a minute.

"My son! You killed my son," the king cried from a distance as he began flinging black magic at the man.

With the flick of his hand, the stranger flung the magic back at the king who fell to the ground and didn't move again.

The royal guards came at the man next.

Dozens of them, but he defended himself as though they were nothing more than annoying fleas.

When they were all down, the man turned to me.

"We need to get out of here," he said. "Refusith," he added, and the bonds holding me broke.

I fell to my knees, fumbling as I worked to get off the smoking pyre.

My rescuer stepped onto the wood and took hold of my arm, lifting me like I weighed nothing and helping me onto solid ground.

"Thank you for saving my life," I said, rubbing at my sore wrists and ankles.

My voice was shaky and hoarse from all of the smoke I inhaled.

"Of course," he replied.

As he spoke, some of his face came into view, but not enough that I could make sense of what I saw.

He turned away and let out an evil laugh before addressing the remaining onlookers.

"All of you would do well to open your eyes to the destruction your king is bringing forth. Go back to your homes and ponder whose side you wish to be on." As he spoke, his eyes swept the fearful crowd. "In your hearts, you already know the truth. Stop turning a blind eye and fight for a change!"

People were weeping and moaning now.

The man let out a disgusted breath and faced me.

"Let's go." He wrapped an arm around my waist and we lifted into the air.

"Who are you?" I asked, unable to believe we were flying and wondering how.

"In Polonias I am known as Stryker, the keeper of the witch mists." He didn't elaborate further and I didn't press.

He didn't look like the type to suffer questions either.

We floated past the town and all of the houses, the hill, and through the forest.

When we arrived in a meadow on the other side, Stryker brought us down.

"Stand clear," he said, pushing me away even as he moved farther from me.

When he was twenty feet away, his body began to shimmer.

Before my eyes, Stryker transformed into a golden dragon.

"Abernathy?"

STRYKER

"HELLO, CINDY," he said, breathing out two puffs of smoke.

I shook my head in shock, unable to believe my eyes. "What the hell? Is it really you?" Part of me wondered if I died back there and this was some kind of afterlife dream. I hadn't seen the dragon in two years, since he helped me save Snow's mom. After our return, he simply vanished.

"Yes, child, it's really me." Like a cat, he curled himself into a ball and rested his head on his front paws. "It seems your life is still crazy. I thought after you saved Ariel and began teaching full time, you would settle down a bit. Perhaps even marry your chayot boyfriend. Obviously, I was mistaken."

"Obviously," I said, crossing my arms.

He chuckled, sending twin clouds of smoke from his enormous nostrils.

"How did you get here? How did you know I was in trouble?" I wiped the soot and tears from my cheeks before rubbing my palms on the bodice of my dress.

It had a really rough day, but it still seemed to be in one piece.

"I've been alive a long time. I've seen many realms and worlds begin and end. Polonias is relatively new. I like it. The fairies treat me like I'm royalty. They like to polish my scales. It tickles." He closed his eyes, making a purring sound. "I knew you were in trouble because we are connected, you and I."

Connected? I guessed it had something to do with The Eye of Abernathy, the spell book I was given when I first discovered I was a witch. "Oh," I said. After everything that just happened, I was shell shocked. I couldn't figure out why the dragon seemed so calm about what occurred. "You killed Lawson," I blurted. Over the last two days, so many had died. In my mind, all of their deaths were needless. "Why did you do that?" I didn't like Lawson and I was glad to be rescued, but killing him? It was so final. What if he could have been rehabilitated?

"The boy was wrong. There wasn't an ounce of good left in him. His death saved the lives of many." Abernathy opened one eye, licking his chops before settling down.

"They're all dead," I said, falling to my knees on the grass as my body tumbled into the fetal position. The memory of friends' deaths washed over me, drowning me in sorrow. And though I was parched, that didn't stop me from sobbing for many, many long minutes.

Abernathy let me get it all out without a word. When I was spent, I dragged myself over to the pond and drank before rinsing off my face and arms. Feeling a tiny bit better, I searched for Polly. We were in her garden. When I left, she was in the earth, her petals keeping her safe. I didn't see her now.

"Have you had enough?" Abernathy asked quietly, opening his eyes and studying me not unkindly.

"Enough what? Death. Yes!" I sat on a rock and glared him. "What are you doing here?" I was thankful he came. Definitely. But why? How had he known I was in trouble and why did he care?

He nodded. "I don't like death either, but Lawson got what he deserved, and I don't regret my decision." His golden eyes were unflinching, and I shuddered. "And I would think my presence here was self-explanatory. You were in danger and needed rescue, so I came."

"Who told you I was in trouble?"

"It's a good question. One I will answer when the time is right." He closed his eyes, letting me know he wouldn't say more.

Damn dragon!

I tried another tactic. "So what do you know about all of this?

About Polonias dying? About my marriage to Leo? About Polly?"

"Quite a lot, actually." Abernathy yawned, flashing all of his sharp teeth.

"Then tell me," I said, trying to hold in my fear and anger and sadness. "Please," I added belatedly.

"Polonias is different from Earth. It was created with a heart, just as you and I were. In the case of this world the heart is a living, breathing, beautiful creature."

"Polly. Yes, I know. Our parents created this world and her. My mother is Mizrabel. Blah. Blah. Blah. Tell me something I don't know. Like who's my father? Then I'll know who's to blame for this mess," I said, tucking some wayward hair behind my ear. It was wet and sticking to me face.

"Since you're unwilling to listen, perhaps you should tell me what you know," Abernathy said, his voice quiet.

"Fine." I explained about Polly, Leo, and why he and I needed to marry. Abernathy listened intently and I was surprised. I half expected him to close his eyes and start to snore. When I finished, the dragon blinked.

"You haven't completed the ceremony. Kissing Leo will save this land as you say. Finding him should be our top priority." The dragon stood, shaking himself. "Your husband might still be in danger. If the king hasn't killed him yet."

"He isn't my husband," I said, sounding defensive. I really didn't want him to be. "But he is a friend and I would very much like to save him." I stood too, adjusting my blasted skirts. They needed to go. "Verity homelith," I said. Jeans and a tee shirt as well as Chuck Taylor high tops replaced my dress and glass slippers. The attire made me think of Snow. She would be proud of this outfit. It's practically all she wore during her sophomore year at Salem Academy.

"Climb on," Abernathy said.

I only hesitated a moment before using one of his legs as a step and gripping his scales to heft myself up. When I was settled, he leaped into the air. Though I wasn't normally a fan of flying, I appreciated the crisp and clean breeze. It was rejuvenating and I took a deep breath, though I worried the townspeople would see the giant flying dragon and sound an alarm. After several moments, I realized no one was about. Not even a single guard at the castle. It was like a ghost town and I guessed they were probably mourning the death of their prince.

"The fate of this land goes all the way back to how Polonias was created," Abernathy said, his deep voice choppy against the wind. "This world possesses a heart, a living, breathing heart, as you know. But she's more than that. Her feelings, her desires, her happiness and sadness flow into this world and into its people, linking everything and everyone. Polly gives them, you, and all of us life. At the same time the connection allows her to know everything and everyone. Because of this continuous ebb and flow the people of Polonias feel things more intensely than they would on Earth. That is why here you feel so much for your friends, even for Lawson, and especially Leo, though you've only known them a short time." His chuckle whipped against the air.

I listened intently. Did Polly love Leo? Was that what he was saying? "Is that why she must spend time in the ground?"

"It is. Doing so fosters her connection."

"Interesting," I said softly. It was more than interesting, actually. It was fascinating. And it made sense. It explained so much. Part of them existed in me and part of me existed in them. But then - "How can the people not know King Loyalor lied, that he and Lawson intended to do Polonias harm?"

Abernathy smacked his lips but didn't answer.

"Abernathy?"

"Deep down they know. But it's difficult for people to rebel against wrong, even when they know they should. In a lot of ways the people are numb. The Loyalor family ruled Polonias a hundred and five years before the curse fell over the land, causing it to sleep for a thousand more. While the Loyalors' rule hasn't been the greatest, it hasn't been bad either."

"There's so much I don't know about this place and it's my home," I said, softly as I watched the town and the castle come into view.

"Before the curse, a prophecy was revealed stating one whose power came from the original family would be born and would save Polonias," Abernathy continued without acknowledging my sadness.

"Are you saying that's me?" I studied his fantastical golden mane before gazing out over the beautiful town.

"So it would seem," he said, but didn't elaborate. The dragon was infuriating.

"But if my mother - if Mizrabel comes from the original family, then why can't she save Polonias and her own daughter as well?"

"Because the magic needed to heal the land doesn't come from her side of the family tree. It comes from your father's."

My pulse quickened. "And do you know my father?"

"Of course I do."

TO THE RESCUE

ABERNATHY LANDED on a patch of grass behind the castle. Again no one was about.

"Where is everyone?"

"In Polonias, when a member of the royal family dies, everything shuts down and the people go into seclusion until the funeral." Abernathy lay down on the grass, crossing his front paws and resting his head on top.

"But then how will they know when the funeral will be?" His answer seemed too easy.

"It's always the same day and the same time and will be held in the grand hall of the castle."

"Does that mean there won't be anyone guarding Leo?" That gave me a ray of hope.

"There shouldn't be. Be ready, just in case." He smacked his lips. "Leo is in the cellar. Enter through those doors there." He indicated a set of double wooden doors just off the castle, near the base, angled into the ground. "Off you go. Rescue your husband, Cinderella."

"I - He isn't my husband." My thoughts were everywhere as I slid off his back and went over to the doors.

"If you say so," the dragon said.

"Will you wait?" I didn't want to go alone.

Abernathy stood, and I thought he would, but then he flapped his wings.

"I'll be around when you need me, my child," he said, and took off into the sky.

The sun was setting, but there was still enough light to watch the vine tattooed on my finger was already fading, and I guessed our bond was weakening as well.

Leo and I needed to seal our marriage with a kiss as quickly as possible.

As if to enunciate the urgency, the ground began to shake, scattering the leaves and causing the shutters to shake. Was it an earthquake or something worse?

I didn't ponder further but quickly used a spell to unlock the door before opening it.

With only a moment's hesitation, I went down the stairs.

They seemed to go on forever, the air getting chillier.

A stench like stale water and dead fish lingered.

"Gross," I said, wrinkling my nose. "Lumia." At the word, a ball of light appeared, illuminating the long hallway.

Steeling myself, I moved slowly. "Leo," I called softly, searching within the cells on either side. They were empty and my heart sank when I reached the end. "Leo," I said a little louder.

There was another hallway turning left, leading to another set of stairs. Down at the bottom, I opened another door.

With each step, my fear increased. What if this was a trap?

"You can do this," I said aloud.

The stone walls were covered with moss and leaked water where the ceiling met the wall. It was so cold now, I could see my breath, and that made me worry.

If Leo had been here two days, he might be frozen.

At the single door, I glanced inside. Someone lay in the center of the cell. Even in the blue witch light he looked bad.

"Leo," I whispered and ran forward.

He moaned lightly. "Cinderella."

Using magic, I unlocked the door and went to him, rolling him on his back.

"I'm here," I said, brushing some hair off his face. "You're going to be alright."

He coughed and his breathing rattled like old cans tied together.

"Ho - How are you alive?" he asked.

Even as sick as he sounded, I could hear the surprise in his voice.

"How did you find me?"

I pulled his head into my lap. "I had help from a friend," I said, stroking his cheek.

"I - Do you have any water?"

I didn't, but I knew a spell. "Miras." Water filled in my hands. I brought it to his lips. "Drink."

He drank until my hands were empty.

I filled them again and he drank until they were empty again.

"Better?" I asked when he was done.

His hair was matted, and dried blood caked a portion of it. His shirt was torn and it hung off his shoulder, and there was a large gash in one thigh.

Blood soaked the pant leg. It didn't look like it was still bleeding, thankfully.

"Yes." Leo tried to sit but grabbed hold of his ribs and fell back.

"We need to get you out of here. Can you move?"

"I don't know." He tried to stand, but flinched, letting out a howl of pain.

"Why didn't you use your magic to heal yourself?" Now that the ropes were gone, it wasn't blocked for me.

"My father took it from me," he said, wincing as he hobbled into an upright position.

"Bastard." I stood back and examined him.

Part of me wished I felt something other than friendship for him.

During our vows, Leo said we would be happy together.

I didn't doubt that.

He and I could make a marriage work.

But I wanted more.

Not just the icy hot feelings I received every time Leo and I touched.

I wanted - fire.

I wanted Gabe.

Exhaling my frustration, I shook the feeling away.

The damned angel didn't want me.

"Let me fix you up. Hold still." I started with his head and worked my way down. When I was finished, I magicked him some new clothes.

Then I stepped back and examined my work.

He looked like a model.

"How do you feel?"

"Much better," he said, placing his hands on my hips and pulling me to him.

I smiled, knowing this had to be.

Our kiss would save this world. But -

"I have an idea," I said, placing a hand over his mouth.

It was my left hand and I saw the vine tattoo was nearly gone.

"What is it?"

The ground shook again, sending dirt and debris down around us.

"Let's get out of here." I took his hand and led him out of the cell, up the stairs, down the hallway, up another set of stairs, and outside.

"Talk to me," he said, when we were safely out of the cellar. "Cinderella, what is the matter?"

I looked at him. "Do you love me?"

He looked away a moment before taking my hand. "I barely know you, but I believe, over time, we can fall in love."

Giving him a bright smile, I squeezed his hand.

"Let's go find Polly." With the hourglass in one hand and my arm around Leo's waist, I thought of her waterfall and her beautiful paradise.

With the magic we made great time.

Polly was out of the dirt and seated beside the pond, hunched over, her bare feet swinging in the water.

"We don't need to be here to kiss. Anywhere will do," Leo said, his eyes lingering on Polly.

"I know, but I have a plan." I knew he wasn't in love with my sister, but he loved her, and I felt confident she loved him too.

How could I stand in the middle of a love that could be beautiful if given a chance to grow?

"Come with me."

IT'S MY TURN

POLLY HEARD us coming and glanced over her shoulder.

A smile splayed across her lips but didn't reach her eyes.

"Cinderella. Leolas. It's good of you to come. It won't be long now," she said, her voice soft, her eyes lingering of Leo's face.

I could have just kissed Leo and had the whole affair over with, but while I was in the fire, about to be burned, a thought came to me.

And I knew as I stood there that my plan would work. "Listen, Polly, I have an idea."

She turned her body so one leg was draped on the rock. I sat beside her, pulling Leo down with me.

"What is it?" she asked.

"Well - " I didn't know how to begin so just blurted it out. "You love Leo," I said, blatantly putting it out there.

She sucked in a breath but didn't deny it.

I hurried on. "And since you and I are sisters, that means if you married Leo, it would save the land just the same as if I married him."

"We already talked about this. Polonias needs a heart." She coughed, her shoulders shaking violently.

Leo ripped off a piece of his shirt and gave it to her. "I'm sorry I don't have a hankie," he said.

The man was thoughtful and kind. I was a fool not to be in love with him.

"Thank you, your highness." She dabbed the blood on her lips.

"Yes, I remember. Our land needs a heart," I said when she was settled.

I glanced from Leo to Polly, knowing what I was about to do would be a sacrifice, but it was about damn time someone stepped in to take this burden from Polly.

She'd suffered long enough. "And I'm going to take your place."

Her eyes widened in horror, but there was also a glimmer of hope.

"You've been the heart for more than a thousand years. It's my turn," I went on, swallowing down my fear.

I didn't know what being the heart entailed exactly, but I did know I would never love another the way I loved Gabe.

And if Leo and Polly could find the kind of love Snow and Dorian had - the kind of love I wanted for myself - then trading places with her would be worth it.

"I can't let you do that," Polly said, taking my hand.

I glanced at Leo. "What do you think about this?"

He looked shocked, but only for a moment.

A huge smile brightened his face. "Polly," he said softly, coming to stand in front of her.

In that moment, I realized there was so much about the two of them I didn't know.

Being the heart would allow me to get to know them better, to get to know all of Polonias. It was the right thing to do. I could live with that.

"What needs to happen to make me the heart so the two of you can marry?" I asked, blinking back tears.

They weren't of sadness but determined commitment.

With Gabe out of the picture, taking her place wouldn't even be much of a sacrifice on my part, except I would miss teaching.

Polly stood, her legs trembling. The ground began shaking again as well. "Are you sure about this, Cindy?"

"I am," I said, nodding my head.

Seeing her happy would make me happy. Maybe she could be happy enough for the both of us.

"Then Leo and I must marry immediately and as soon as we kiss, the power of the heart will leave me and transfer to you." She glanced shyly at me and then at Leo.

The way he looked at her, I knew without a doubt he already loved the girl. "Cindy, are you certain you want to do this? It's such a gift and one I will treasure." He looked at Polly. "I will always treasure you."

"I'm completely certain," I said.

Polly nodded, all business now. "We must take each other's hands," she said to Leo.

As he did, a cord appeared and wrapped around them.

"Cinderella, you must place your hands over ours so that the power of the connection can pass from you and into me. At the same time, my powers as the heart will transfer to you." She smiled encouragingly.

"Okay," I said, swallowing nervously.

The ground shook, longer and harder this time.

"Quickly now," she said.

Once my hands were on top of theirs, the cord circled my hands as well.

I watched with gritted teeth as they spoke the words to each other.

The same words Leo and I had said to each other.

When Polly finished speaking, the vine tattoo left my finger and appeared on hers followed by the beautiful diamond.

It sparkled in the nighttime sky as though the stars themselves came down to shine upon their union.

"You may kiss to seal this union and save Polonias," I said.

With those words I felt a new power.

It travelled from the tips of my fingers and throughout my body.

Suddenly I could feel so much more, an overwhelming wash of emotions all at once.

I fell back, landing on my butt.

Pain shot through my spine, but I barely acknowledged it.

With blurry eyes I watched Leo and Polly kiss.

Not understanding how or why, I witnessed the icy hot connection form and blaze between them.

When they broke apart, Polly touched her lips and smiled, but only briefly before she ran over and knelt beside me, taking my hand. "We need to get you into the earth so you can heal Polonias."

The land groaned, and a crack split the ground near me.

"Hurry, Cinderella." She and Leo helped me climb into the crack.

As the ground closed around me, I felt it sigh with relief.

Warmth and cold.

Roots and worms.

Death and life.

Happiness and sadness.

Good and evil.

It all pulsed around me and through me, making me claustrophobic.

Like my life force was being siphoned from me as the land renewed.

It was my moment of truth.

The life I had known was over.

No more Gabe, no more Snow or marriage or children. No more teaching.

I closed my eyes, desperately wishing Polonias would just swallow me whole so I would no longer feel.

Leo and Polly were talking.

I heard their voices, but they were muffled and seemed far away.

Other voices came and went as the land healed, eradicating the Sickness.

After what felt like a lifetime, some semblance of control returned and my body relaxed, giving in to what I had become.

HEALING TAKES TIME

MY EYES BLINKED OPEN. I appeared to be surrounded by a cocoon.

Pink and white.

I pulled my hand from the dirt and touched it.

So soft, like a petal, and I knew instantly that's what it was.

As the new heart of Polonias, this was my flower.

Soft footsteps came toward me. I wasn't sure what to do, so I waited inside the blossom, listening.

In moments, I sensed it was Polly and Leo.

They were happy. So happy! And there was more. She was already expecting.

Without knowing how, I came out of the ground, my flower, a vivid pink peony, became clothing as I found purchase atop the grass.

My eyes first caught and held Leo's.

He looked the same, only the worried edge to his features had gone.

When I noticed Polly, I gawked. She no longer looked like a thousand-year-old child, but a woman with long blond hair, bright blue eyes, and womanly curves.

She looked like me. "Polly, you look beautiful," I said, utterly shocked.

Going to her, I took her outstretched hands.

"Hello, sister," she said warmly.

We embraced for a long moment. "How long have I been in the ground?"

"Nearly a year," Leo returned, resting a hand on Polly's stomach.

I clapped my hands with joy. "And you're going to have a baby."

"Yes. A girl. We'd like to name her Cinderella, if that's okay with you," Polly said, her eyes searching my face.

My hands found their way to her stomach. The child kicked and I laughed. "Of course," I said, beyond pleased for them.

"Care to sit?" Leo asked.

"Yes, we have so much to tell you." Polly grabbed hold of my hand again, walking us over to her favorite spot along the edge of the pond.

Everywhere I looked, from the forest to the grass, even the water seemed brighter, more alive.

As though all this time Polonias had been existing in a shadowy room. When Leo and Polly married and after I became the heart, the shadows vanished, allowing Polonias to be full of light.

When we were situated, Leo and Polly shared their lives with me.

I already knew most of their story and guessed it had to do with being the heart.

But it was still good to have them tell me.

For the next several hours, they shared about Lawson's funeral, about the funerals held for Violet, Quilla, and Anna.

They also told of the king and his imprisonment and the changes that came over the people.

"What about Mizrabel?" I asked when there was a lull in the conversation.

"We haven't seen her. Not once has she shown her face. We aren't even sure she's still alive," Leo said.

"She is," I said, not knowing how I knew, but feeling the truth just the same. Then I raised an eyebrow. "You look so much older now," I said to Polly, still unable to believe the changes to her physical form.

She smiled. "As soon as the magic of the heart shifted from me and onto you, my body changed into the woman I was meant to be." She looked down at her rounding belly. "But I look alright, don't you think?"

"Amazing," I said, reassuring her and only feeling a small pang of jealousy. She had everything I ever wanted.

"In a lot of ways, I think you and I look alike." She smiled shyly.

"We do." I hugged her tightly.

Leo watched the two of us, a content look on his face. "We appreciate all you did for us. Polonias is saved. Our people are cheerier than they've ever been."

He took Polly's hand. "We are happier than we've ever been too."

"Good," I said, my heart filled with gladness for them.

They deserved every happiness. "It's time for me to go," I said, standing and heading back over to my hole in the ground, though I wasn't ready to get back into the earth just yet.

Still, the dirt called to me, yearned for me.

"Do you want to have dinner with us tonight at the castle? We would love to visit with you longer," Polly said.

"That sounds - " I stopped at the sight of Abernathy in the distance, using my hand to shield my eyes as I watched him fly in a meandering pattern across the sky.

His scales shone in the early afternoon light like a golden mountain.

"Don't be afraid," I said as Abernathy came closer, though neither of them looked worried.

"Of Abernathy?" Polly snorted and Leo laughed.

"He's like an oversized kitten, though don't tell him I said that," Leo added, covering his mouth while he chuckled.

"You've met him?" I was surprised.

Usually the dragon kept to himself.

"He's been to visit us many times since our marriage," Polly said, her eyes sparkling with kindness and something else. Maybe devotion.

And I wondered at that.

"Cinderella, he's our - " But she didn't get to finish because the dragon whooshed past them, landing in the grass only a little ways off.

My hair blew around me like a fan until he tucked his wings at his sides and walked over.

"You're awake," Abernathy said, blowing smoke from his nose as he spoke.

"I am," I replied, surprised I was glad to see him.

"About time," he growled. "Because I cannot allow you to be the heart a moment longer."

I crossed my arms, studying him intently. "Why does it matter what you want?"

"Cinderella, the time has come for you to know the truth." He sat back on his haunches.

"What's that?" I didn't hide my confusion. Being the heart of Polonias let me know everyone's truth. At least I thought so.

"I, dear girl, am your father." Abernathy paused to let his words sink in.

It took a minute. That was a revelation and one I wouldn't have seen coming in a million years. "You?"

"That's right. Mizrabel and I are your parents." He curled himself into a ball but kept his eyes on me.

"You're a dragon," I said, incredulous. "How did you and Mizrabel - " I couldn't finish. Sure interspecies mating occurred once in a while, but a dragon and a sorceress? Unless she used magic to transform herself into a dragon.

Or he transformed into a man. Stryker! That was the body he used with Mizrabel.

At that thought, my mind went to Heather, but I pushed my student's woes from my mind.

I couldn't do anything for her now.

Snow and Coco would handle the situation just fine.

I was where I needed to be.

"That's true, but as you know, I can be so much more." He shifted before my eyes into the man I knew as Stryker.

In that form, he'd killed Lawson and he'd saved me.

And apparently, in that form, he'd done his part to create me.

Anger sprang to life from a place deep within and I gripped my hands into fists.

"Then you and Mizrabel are to blame for all of this. Polly and I were nothing but a means to an end for the two of you. What? You were bored, so decided to create this land, and who cared if Polly and I had to suffer for it?" I was shouting, stomping in a circle and throwing my hands in the air at the same time.

Leo and Polly looked at each other before focusing on me. They already knew. That much was obvious, which meant they'd had time to let the truth about our parentage sink in.

Me?

It was going to take a while.

"Because of you, Polly spent more than a thousand years as the heart of this land, unable to grow, unable to fall in love, unable to have any sort of a real life.

How could you do that to your own daughter?" I was standing directly in front of him, so close I could feel the heat from his breath.

Abernathy closed his eyes a moment before focusing on me. "You are right, of course. This is our fault. Mostly mine."

He lifted his head. "Before the curse put a sleep over the land, I intended to perform the spell necessary to free Polly from her role as the heart. But by then Mizrabel was so angry with me for leaving her that she placed a curse over Polly, making it so Polly could never be free of her bond. Mizrabel is a miserable woman and wants the whole land destroyed, which is why she also created the Sickness."

He blew out his breath with such force I had to take a step back. "The only way to break her curse was through a selfless act of sacrifice from you, Cindy." He shook his head and smacked his lips like there was a bad taste in his mouth.

"But why not tell me all of this a long time ago?" It still shocked me that someone could harbor as much hate as Mizrabel did, but over the last year, as the Sickness in the land was healed, I felt it.

Burning and twisting like the vines in the witch mists.

"If I told you, then the act wouldn't have been a selfless sacrifice.

I wanted to, believe me, but I couldn't risk either of your lives." Abernathy smiled, showing all of his sharp, white teeth. "But now you are awake, and the time has come."

"So you can fix this?" I was incredulous. But more than that, I was still angry, though I wasn't sure why.

I slapped his muzzle, but doubted he even felt it through his thick scales.

"You son of a bitch. You evil, good-for-nothing dragon. You horrible, rotten, awful excuse for a dead-beat dad!" I was back to walking in a frustrated circle, trying to work off some of my anger.

"I am sorry, daughter. This was not what I meant to happen when we created the land. Mizrabel and I were in love. The creation of this land, of Polly and you was supposed to be a branch of our love - " His voice trailed off.

"The way we went about creating Polonias was a mistake, but I intend to remedy our folly now." With more energy than I'd seen from him before, he leaped to all four feet, shaking out his mane.

"Stand back."

THE DEATH KEEPER

A NOISE CAME from deep within the dragon, almost like the sound of a thousand men humming at once.

As it grew louder, I moved back to Polly and Leo.

They took hold of my shoulders, protecting me.

As well as the uproar coming from Abernathy, the color of his scales began to change. Shifting from their usual golden to an orange-red.

Heat radiated off him, like a fire in an enormous furnace, causing me to sweat.

The noise grew louder and louder until Polly, Leo, and I had to cover our ears.

The sound reverberated off the dragon and all around us until I moaned at the pain.

Abernathy's scales changed again from orange red to a stark white and his eyes rolled back into his head.

When I didn't think the noise could get any louder, he lifted his head to the sky and opened his mouth, sending a stream of fire into the air.

It shot high into the sky before arcing in every direction like a spider's web until the whole land was covered in a fiery ball.

The air became thin and it was momentarily hard to breathe.

But before I could become truly afraid, the fire turned to ice and then shattered into billions of tiny sparkling crystals falling down around us.

It was beautiful.

Polly said so as we watched them twinkle.

I would've agreed, except something was happening inside me.

Like the souls of a million beings were forcing their way out and through me.

I screamed, my legs sagging as my knees buckled.

"What's wrong?" Polly and Leo asked, hanging on, working to keep me for falling on the ground.

"It hurts," I said, as vine after vine, appeared on my skin, green at first before turning black. They seemed to sear themselves into my skin as they burned.

"Make it stop," I cried, tears raging down my cheeks and dripping onto my hands.

The petals of my flower dropped from me one by one.

Each withering and turning to gray dust before hitting the ground.

Vines grew up at the location of the ashen petals, pulling the ash into the earth.

As each petal fell, the pain subsided.

When the last one was taken into the ground, I felt better.

Until I looked down and saw I was completely naked.

On my skin light scars, almost like vine-shaped burns, covered the entirety of my body. I would've been shocked, except I was too embarrassed.

Polly quickly said a spell, clothing me in a sky blue dress.

"Thank you," I said, gratefully.

"Are you alright now?" she asked, concern weighing heavily on her features.

"Yes, much better." I took a deep breath, held it, searching for the power and magic of the heart, but it was gone.

"Is she no longer the heart?" Leo asked the dragon.

I was shocked to see he had changed as well. He was no longer golden but black as a moonless night. Even his golden eyes were changed to a deep blue.

He looked scary, but he also looked tired.

It was the first time I saw Abernathy looking weak.

"Correct. The heart is no longer a person, but the land itself. It courses with magic." He dropped onto the grass and closed his eyes.

I went to him, worried, even though I was still upset with him. Polly was right there with me.

"Father," she whispered.

"I am fine, child," he said, opening one eye as he spoke. "I just need some rest."

"And the witch mists?" Leo asked.

I appreciated his concern for the land. It was obvious he was a good king.

"They are no more. The creatures within have been freed. Returned to the land. Polonias is a clean slate, Leolas Loyalor. Treat it well." He was snoring in an instant, but woke again almost immediately, his eyes fixed on me.

"And time in Polonias no longer moves more quickly than the other realms. It will pass here the same as in Sharra." With that he gave a snuffle-snort, closed his eyes, and was asleep.

A rush of gratitude over what Abernathy had done for the land and for me filled my veins. I didn't even care that I was covered in white vine tattoos. It was worth it to be free.

Free!

I loved Polly and I loved Leo.

They were my family and I wanted to know them both.

But first I wanted to go home.

I went to grab the hourglass from around my neck but it was gone, though the diamond star Quilla gave me was still there.

At thoughts of her, I wanted to pay my respects. "Can you take me to see the graves of Quilla, Anna, and Violet?"

Polly nodded. "Of course, sister."

WE MADE our way back to town, leaving Abernathy to rest.

I had no idea how long it would take for him to recuperate after what he'd done.

When he was better, I would thank him, though I didn't know whether I could ever forgive him.

That wasn't true. I was alive because of him.

I had Polly because of him. And I was no longer bound to this land because of him.

Free!

The graveyard wasn't quite like those on Earth.

It was surrounded by an enormous fence and at the entrance stood the statue of a woman. In one hand she held a scythe.

The other hand was out and there were coins resting on her palm.

Leo took three gold coins from his pocket and placed them in her hand.

"Now we can enter," he said, stepping over the threshold.

Polly went after him. I followed close behind.

As soon as I passed through the gate, a thick blanket of magic pressed against me as though it were testing my worth.

"What am I feeling?" I asked, moving closer to my sister and Leo.

"It's Evenlyra, the death keeper. Her magic resides here. It's harmless if you have a long life ahead of you. However, if you're close to death, her magic assesses and measures the worth of your soul while she decides whether to let you live and exit the graveyard or die and keep you within."

My heart raced as I waited for her to decide whether I should be snuffed out or not.

The heaviness of her magic eased and lightened, and I breathed easier.

Apparently, it wasn't my time to go.

"They're over here," Leo said, walking us along the edge near the fence for a moment, until we came to a path leading to the center of the cemetery.

There was a large white building with a wooden door in the center. No one spoke. We didn't want to offend or disrespect the dead.

At the door, Leo knocked twice before pushing it open.

I swallowed and went in.

As my eyes adjusted to the low light within the tomb, I noticed there were three people standing in one of the corners, speaking softly.

One of them turned and I recognized her.

"Quilla?" I covered my mouth, unable to believe what I saw. She wasn't dead but alive. Or was it her ghost? I wasn't sure.

Polly gasped beside me. "Anna. Violet."

"How?" Leo asked, an arm going around Polly, desperate to protect her.

"Are you real?" I went to the three of them who looked as shocked as we felt.

"I can't believe it," Violet said and then roared. "I know that asshole killed me. I felt my life leave my body." She still wore her black dress, her glasses perched on the end of her nose.

"As did I," Quilla said. She also wore a black dress, but it had undertones of burgundy and shimmered as she moved.

She wore black stockings and shoes as well as a funny hat that suited her perfectly.

Most surprising of all were her see-through black wings.

"My wings," Quilla exclaimed, tears filling her eyes.

They fluttered behind her, lifting her off the ground.

Anna ran her hands along her body, crying happily. "How is this possible?" she asked, her eyes on me.

"Abernathy," I guessed, rushing to them and pulling them unceremoniously into a hug, not even caring that I was crying so hard, snot was running down my face.

"This is amazing," I said, my heart softening a little toward the dragon.

The six of us made our way back to the castle.

Leo, Polly, and I took turns catching them up on all that had happened since their untimely demise.

We worried the townspeople would freak when they saw the three of them back from the dead, but it was as though they couldn't remember the funerals or even that they died.

People greeted us as though all was right in the world, and I guessed it was, thanks to Abernathy.

His magic was incredible.

And I was his daughter.

After we enjoyed a lovely dinner together in the castle, I explained how I needed to get back to Sharra.

My heart ached to be teaching at the academy.

Even though these people were my family, teaching was my calling and I had missed it terribly.

It was a joyful goodbye because I promised it wouldn't be for long. Not only did I want to get to know my sister and her new husband as well as Quilla, Anna, and Violet better, but I also wanted to meet my niece when she arrived.

"But how will I travel?" I asked, wishing I still had my hourglass.

Quilla touched the seven-pointed star necklace. "With this, of course." She grinned. "It works just the same as the hourglass only it's much prettier and suits you better."

I hugged Quilla. "Thank you."

She waved the words away. "I hope you'll use it often."

"I will." I placed the star between my first and second fingers and my thumb. "Do I just think of where I want to go, like the hourglass?"

"That's right. Give it a try." She stepped back, giving me a once over. "Goodness alive, let's get you changed before you go."

"What's wrong with her dress?" Polly asked, putting her hands on her hips, only mildly irritated with my fairy godmother.

"Oh, it's lovely, dear. Only Cindy needs something a little less princess and more kick ass when she returns to Sharra."

I decided not to mention that Polly's dress was great for Sharra and let Quilla use magic to whip me up a pair of black ankle boots, jeans, and a black tee shirt covered in a long, rainbow striped sweater that was almost like a duster. "This is amazing, Quilla. See you all soon." I adjusted the necklace in my hand and thought of Sharra, of my office and of my best friend Snow White.

HE'S LOOKING FOR ME

I KNEW I was back in Sharra because of the smell of musty old spell books.

Travelling was different this time.

There were no witch mists.

Nothing to distract me or sway me from my goal.

It was a relief and yet another reason to be grateful for what Abernathy had done.

Happy to be in my office, I used a spell to check the date and time.

It was late Friday night. Snow was probably asleep, but I needed to speak with her. Only a little hesitant, I went to the mirror hanging next to the door. "Mirror, mirror - " I paused. It was the first time seeing my reflection since the magic I held when I was the heart left me.

My face looked the same, but the white-looking burns of the leaves and vines still covered my face and neck. I checked my arms as well and knew they were all over my body.

At the sight of myself, tears formed and fell onto my cheeks.

It wasn't vanity.

I didn't mind the marks and whether they stayed or not mattered little to me.

That they were there reminded me of all I'd been through the last year while in the ground in Polonias.

Now I was free!

Until I became a part of the land, I hadn't understood the scope of all I gave up to free Polly.

What it meant to exist only for others.

Wiping my tears, I blew my nose, working to make myself stop crying. When I was mostly under control, I leaned against the sink.

"Mirror, mirror, made of glass. Show me Snow, do as I ask."

My reflection wavered until it vanished, revealing Snow's room.

It was dark, except for a small glow of light coming from the left.

"Snow," I whispered.

There was a tiny gasp before Snow came to stand in front of the mirror. "Where are you?" She looked frazzled.

"Home. Back. I'm here in my office." The intensity of her question had me flustered. "I'm safe," I added.

She glanced back at the bed before sighing heavily. "Can you meet me in my sitting room?" she asked.

"I really want to talk." Her brows furrowed and her lips were turned down in a frown.

"I'll be right there."

"Good." She came in closer, her eyes roaming my face. "Are you sure you're alright? What happened to you?" She touched the mirror.

"I'll tell you everything when I see you."

I used magic to return the mirror to normal before leaving my office and heading down the hall and up the stairs.

At the door to Snow's floor was a vampire, Dina.

"What is your business here?" she asked, flashing her fangs.

Surprised, I held up my hands. "Snow is expecting me, Dina."

She tilted her head to the side a moment before nodding. "Very well, but keep it down. The princess Jasmine is sleeping." She carefully opened the door, letting me through.

As I walked down the hall, I worked to keep the heels of my shoes from making too much noise, but it was literally quiet as a tomb.

At Snow's sitting room, I knocked once before entering.

Snow wore a white bathrobe with blue trim and held a goblet of blood in her hands.

When she saw me, she set the glass down and ran to me, giving me a hug.

"You're okay," she whispered, lifting me off the ground slightly.

For me, it was nearly a year since I last saw her, though it was only a little more than three days for her. "Yeah, I'm good," I said, between gasps for air, grateful to see my best friend.

She released me, taking my hands as we sat. "What happened to your face?"

I told her everything.

About Mizrabel, Leo, Polly, and all that happened since I'd been gone.

Snow listened intently, only interrupting when she needed clarification.

When I finished, she blinked back tears, a finger tracing the vines on my face.

"Do they hurt?" she asked softly.

"No," I said, twining my fingers with hers.

"I'm fine. More than fine. I'm so happy to be free."

She swallowed, pulling her braided hair over her shoulders and tucking some hair behind an ear.

"When you became the heart, I sensed the change. Like you were alive, but also not. It was strange and I was scared." She looked at me, tears brimming along the edges."

"I'm sorry Snow." I hadn't thought about how my decision might affect her. That wasn't nice.

"Now that you're okay, all is forgiven." She smacked my leg lightly. "Just don't let it happen again."

"I won't," I promised.

"I was so worried, I tracked down Abernathy. When I told him what I was feeling, he agreed to take care of it." She picked up her drink and sipped. "It's a good thing since he was responsible for the whole mess."

How grateful I was for Snow. She understood me without even knowing why.

"He's my father," I blurted, crossing my arms, holding in all the emotions about him I wasn't ready to deal with.

Snow leaned forward, resting a hand on my knee.

"Shut the fracking door. He's also my cat, Gatsby, and Kenmei, too." She shook her head. "If there's one thing I've learned lately, it's that the more I think I know, the less I actually do. Also, is it just me or does Abernathy seem to have more than a few issues?"

It was my turn to be shocked.

The cat and Kenmei?

"Right?" I snorted in disgust. "I thought I was an only child, but there's Polly and who knows how many more. Abernathy has been alive so long, I could have hundreds, even thousands of half-siblings." I shuddered at the thought, though there was a small part of me that wouldn't mind.

I considered Snow my sister and now I had Polly too. It might be cool. Or maybe not.

"Cool, but gross." Snow stuck out her tongue, interrupting my thoughts.

"What is it with grownups? Aren't they supposed to be an example?"

"Sadly, I think we're considered grownups at this point." I didn't want to believe it.

"I guess." Snow let her head fall back against the couch and let out a noise of disgust. "I still feel like a kid."

"I know. But the other day I told some of my students to be the change! Like something a grownup would say. What the hell?" I stood, going over to the window.

"After all we've been through, nothing should shock us, but here we are, completely shocked."

Millions of stars hung in the sky and I stared, using the moment to ponder all that I learned in the last few hours.

"He's Gatsby too?" I met her gaze and she nodded. "I guess if I were thousands of years old, I would want to switch things up as well."

"I guess," Snow added.

We were silent a few moments, each lost in our own thoughts.

"So Polly told you Gabe is your soul mate?" Snow asked, breaking the silence.

I rolled my eyes. "That's right," I said, clamping my teeth together before turning. "But I'm not sure what to do about it. I proposed and he turned me down."

"You did?" She pushed her bangs out of her eyes, glaring.

I nodded, sheepishly. "Yeah, I forgot to mention that part."

"He actually came to Sharra looking for you," Snow said.

"I told him where you were, and he demanded I show him how to get there." She clasped her hands together, grabbing hold of one knee before crossing it over her other one.

"I told him the magic of Polonias was beyond the scope of my power." She shook her head at the memory. "Needless to say, he was really upset and left cursing and mumbling about asking Abernathy."

It was my turn to be shocked. "He came looking for me?" I went back over and sat beside Snow. "When?"

"A couple of days ago. I'm surprised he didn't find you. That guy was determined." Snow tucked her feet under her butt and took another drink. "But you haven't seen him?"

"No." I shook my head, my heart racing.

Had he changed his mind about marrying me? It would've been nice to know a year ago, at least according to Polonias time, but still.

I wanted to see him - to know what he was thinking.

"Maybe he realized what an amazing woman you are and that he would be damned lucky to call you his wife and decided to tell you so?" Snow raised her eyebrows before downing the rest of the blood and setting the goblet on the end table.

"It's possible."

Could I leave Sharra and find him? Should I?

I was both invigorated and exhausted.

Plus there were other issues to worry about. "Has anything more happened with Heather?" I asked, changing the subject.

That was a question I could've saved until tomorrow, but I didn't want to be alone yet.

"She's still in her own room." Snow crossed her arms. "And Sera is a handful. That girl is getting herself into trouble almost daily. One of the students told me he overheard her saying she wanted to raise someone from the dead at the Halloween dance next weekend. I looked into it, but she swears he was misinformed."

She closed her eyes briefly before opening them again. "I know she's lying, and I have her advisor, Tori, keeping an eye on her, but Sera is devious and smarter than most, which is a terrible combination, especially with all of the magic she possesses."

"Counseling might do her good," I said, trying to think of a way to help both girls.

If only I could show them how alike they were and that a friendship was better than being enemies.

Easier said than done.

"I was thinking the same thing.

Mr. Lucian is on alert and he promised to make an appointment with her. I have Sera coming into my office on Monday after school to discuss how she's liking things so far." Snow sighed. "We'll see."

"You have a lot going on," I said, standing. "I'll let you get some rest."

"It's fine," Snow said, hugging me again.

"Come to family dinner on Sunday? Jasmine has been asking about you."

"I'll be there," I said, heading to the door.

"Oh, and Pops is going hunting tomorrow morning. There's another supernatural in need of our help."

"What time?"

"Seven in the morning at Pops' house." She smiled, heading toward her sleeping quarters.

"I'll be there," I said, opening the door.

"Good." Snow paused. "And Cin?"

"Yeah, Snow?"

"I'm so glad you're okay." She smiled sleepily.

"Me, too."

MAKE US WORK

I GOT ready for sleep the old fashioned way and climbed under the covers, after setting my alarm for six.

It was nice to be back in my own bed.

As I drifted off, I thought of Abernathy - my father - and hoped he was healing up okay.

In my dreams, I saw Abernathy flying through the night sky of Polonias, his black scales blending in until he was in a different sky, this time during the day.

He landed on the lawn in front of a castle I recognized.

He was in Sharra.

Several worker vampires and guards circled him, but after he spoke, they dispersed, going about their day.

"Cindy," someone called, knocking loudly on my door.

I glanced at the clock and saw it was a little before six. "I'm awake," I said, groggy, not knowing who it was.

"It's Abernathy. He asked to speak with you." The voice sounded familiar, but I couldn't put it to a name.

"I'll be out in a few."

There was no response.

Climbing out of bed, I hurriedly pulled on gray camo pants, a gray tank top, and combat boots. I tied my hair back and put on just the bare minimum of makeup - mascara and gloss.

As I dressed, I thought about my dream.

Had Abernathy sent me the vision of him flying through Polonias and into Sharra?

It seemed the likeliest answer.

Outside, I went down the steps and out onto the main lawn where Abernathy appeared to be sleeping again.

I walked slowly, checking out his black scales that were slowly changing back to gold.

When I was near enough, I touched one. It was hot and I flinched.

"Be careful. I don't want to burn you," Abernathy said, his deep voice rumbling the ground around us.

"Your color is coming back." I moved so I could see his face.

His eyes were lightening too.

"I don't know that I'll ever return to completely golden, but this works." He chuckled lightly.

"Thank you for what you did for me and for Violet, Anna, and Quilla." I checked my feelings and found I wasn't nearly as upset with him as last night.

Whether it was because of sleep or something else, I wasn't sure, but I was glad the anger was mostly gone.

"It's my pleasure," he said, blinking slowly, one eye trained on me. "I've come to tell you that I'm leaving for a while and wanted to say goodbye."

"Why?" I asked. "What about teaching?" I wasn't going to pretend I didn't know he was Kenmei.

His chuckle intensified. "You can take over my classes."

I swallowed, trying to understand what I was feeling.

Now that I knew he was my father, I wanted to get to know him better.

"Don't worry, daughter. I'll be back, but I need some time to finish healing."

"Okay," I said, my voice sounding small.

He stood, his wings stretching out behind him.

"Wait," I said.

"Hmmm." He eyed me tiredly.

I told him about Heather and her struggles.

"It's a tough situation and I feel for her," he said, when I was done. "With magic, there are limitations, even for me." He tucked his dark wings back at his sides.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

He'd just saved an entire land from destruction.

Surely there would be magic strong enough to change a girl into the form she desired.

"You know I can transform into other creatures, including the cat, Stryker, Kenmei - " He trailed off, closing his eyes.

"There are other forms as well, but they are of no matter. The thing is, each time I transform, I remain the same gender. A male. Regardless, and no matter how hard I try, I cannot transform into a girl."

"You've tried?" Those were stories I wanted to hear at some future date as well as his reasons.

"Yes. Heather's situation is delicate, and I wish there was a way to use magic to help, but after all these years, I haven't found a spell capable of doing what she wants."

He blew some smoke out of his mouth. "It seems ridiculous the magic doesn't exist and when I'm fully healed, I intend to see what I can do. But as things are right now - "

He blinked again and I saw how drained he still was. "Tell her the answer is no, but only for now."

"The humans can change a female body into that of a male and vice versa. You would think magic could do the same." I kicked at a piece of grass, frustrated for Heather.

"I'm sorry I cannot be of more help." He extended his wings again.

"I appreciate you looking into it - when you are able," I added softly, wishing he wouldn't go.

"Goodbye, Cinderella." Abernathy ascended, his enormous wings causing my hair to whip my face.

A question popped into my mind and I called after him, "Did you name me or did Mizrabel?"

He chuckled. "We named you together. Cinder, since I was created from the cinders of the first fire and Ella after her mother."

With that, he was gone.

No one had seen Mizrabel in a while.

Not since the spell I used on her made her disappear.

Part of me worried that I killed her.

The other part worried about what would happen if I hadn't.

Taking hold of the star necklace I always wore at my throat, I closed my eyes and thought of Professor Pops' house, his driveway, and his front porch. The smell of the air changed from sweet apples to cinnamon and a hint of the ocean.

Giddiness sent me up Professor Pops' porch stairs two at a time.

I knocked and didn't have to wait long before the door opened.

"Hi," I said, my heart stopping altogether.

Gabe's green eyes shone with happy surprise and relief when he saw me.

He was so handsome, his dark hair seemed a little longer than the last time I saw him, and his eyes appeared to be a deeper green.

"Cindy." He stepped out onto the porch and wrapped me in a hug. "I thought I lost you," he said.

"Almost, but not completely," I whispered, enjoying the spicy scent of him and the warmth of his body against mine.

"When did you get back?" He released me but studied my face.

"Last night," I said, softly.

"What's this?" His thumb gently trailed its way along the scars that crisscrossed my skin like white tattoos. They were everywhere.

I wasn't sure whether they would remain for good or fade.

He cupped my cheek and I leaned into his hand. "I'll tell you all about it. I promise," I said, taking his hand in mine.

His eyes searched my face before he nodded and we went into the house together, heading toward the kitchen.

"Tell me," he said, leaning down as though he might kiss me.

My lips parted, but we both remembered at the same time that we were no longer together. He'd told me he didn't want to marry me.

I moved away, heading to the refrigerator for some water and taking a long drink.

When I finished, I turned.

Gabe was watching me, his face soft. "Who did this to you?" He pointed at my wrist.

I told him everything, ending with how Abernathy removed the magic of the heart of Polonias, leaving these vines in its wake.

He wrapped me in another hug. "But you're okay?" he asked, clinging to me like I might fly away if he let go.

My heart softened a little. "I'm better than okay, actually. I'm free."

"I'm so glad." He squeezed me tight for one more second then moved away. "Are you here to go after the supernaturally inclined teen?"

I sighed. The chayot in him wouldn't be buried, even if he wanted to try.

"I am, if Pops hasn't left yet." I glanced at him from under my lashes, thrilled to see him, but nervous too.

"He hasn't." Gabe took a bite of a bagel smeared with cream cheese and topped with strawberries.

My mouth watered. I was famished for real food.

"Good," he said after chewing several times and swallowing.

I gave him a questioning stare.

He clarified. "It's good you're here to help. You're a calming influence on the supernaturals."

I took his compliment with a smile, wishing he would offer me the other half of his bagel.

"Do you want this?" He handed me the other half and I immediately bit into it without a word. "I'm taking that as a yes." He chuckled and I smiled around my mouthful.

After he finished his half, he wiped his mouth and went to the sink.

"Pops is in his office." He dried his hands before pushing them into his front pockets. "I can't go with you. Jesse - " He paused, shaking his head.

"My boss demanded I meet with him and I have to go this morning, but it'll be fine." His eyes softened. "I lost you once. I can't lose you again."

He took my hand. "If you'll have me, I want to make us work."

I took a napkin from the counter and wiped my mouth. "I'm not going anywhere," I said, studying the intensity of his face.

If he was my soulmate like Polly said, then I needed to put aside my need to make him into someone he wasn't and love the man he was.

"Good." He looked like he wanted to say more, and I waited.

"I love you, Cindy, and I'm going to do whatever it takes to prove that to you and win you back." There was fire in his eyes.

Chayots were the definition of stubborn and I wanted to believe him.

"Can't wait," I said, hoping it was true as I headed out of the kitchen and toward Pops' office.

PARTY SPARKLES

THE NEXT WEEK was back to work and I enjoyed every second.

Each class filled me with renewed vigor.

I also spoke with Sera about seeing our resident therapist, which she agreed to do.

We discussed the rumors that she wanted to bring someone back from the dead. She denied any part of it.

As Snow said, it was obvious the girl had lied, so I determined to keep a close eye on her by asking if she would help with the setup of the haunted house.

After some reluctance, she finally seemed to have a therapeutic breakthrough and for the briefest moment I saw a glimmer of kindness from Sera.

The student body officers agreed to change the theme from gory and horrific and instead would recreate several iconic scenes from the movie Hocus Pocus, although they were keeping the haunted house scary and even decided to amp it up.

I figured Sera would love that and each time I saw her, she seemed to be enjoying herself. Hopefully that would keep her distracted.

The decorating committee created magical cutouts of the Sanderson house as well as flying witches that looked a lot like the characters from the movie riding brooms and even vacuum cleaners.

At the entry to the haunted house hung a smoking cauldron that would tip over at random intervals, dousing party goers with sparkles.

On Friday, after classes ended, I was in the ballroom assisting with hanging the twinkling lights and a disco ball for the Halloween dance the following night.

Just as I stepped off the ladder, Gabe showed up.

I was surprised to see him and a little worried.

He hadn't been to Sharra in a really long time, not since Snow and Dorian were married. "Is Pops okay?" I asked, going to him.

Gabe smiled, kissing me thoroughly on the mouth.

Unable to resist, I lost myself in him.

Opening my mouth, deepening the kiss, and allowing our tongues to explore.

The kiss affected me everywhere and tingles covered my body.

I'd missed kissing him, especially like that.

When I reluctantly pulled away, I became aware of the students around us making jokes.

"I thought we were still broken up?" I couldn't hide my smile at seeing him here though.

He looked amazing in his dark jeans and a gray tee shirt.

"Get back to work," I growled jokingly at the students. "I'll be right back." I took Gabe's arm and led him out of the ballroom and into the hall.

"I don't want us to be," he said when we were alone.

He pushed his dark hair off his face.

His green eyes shone with mischief. On his left wrist was a leather bracelet with wings. Was it the one he gave me that I returned?

"But what about your angel boss. Has he changed his mind?" It was apparent Gabe was taking his words about getting me back seriously.

But nothing had really changed between us.

He was still the leader of the chayot, and he was still not supposed to be with me.

I was still a witch, not to mention the daughter of an ancient and very powerful dragon, supernatural to my core but not one ounce a chayot.

His face turned sour. "No." He crossed his arms. "Here's the thing.

I've thought long and hard. Hell, I've tried to fight what I feel for you, but that fact is, I can't be without you and I don't think I'm supposed to be. If the last several days have taught me anything, it's that I'm better with you. A better man and a better chayot."

He took the bracelet off his wrist carefully.

It was on tight since his wrist was so much bigger than mine.

"I want you to have this." He took hold of my wrist, but I pulled away.

Fear clouded his gaze, but he kept going. "Cindy Croswell, I want to marry you more than anything. There isn't a woman in the world I want to be with more than you."

I shook my head in frustration. "Gabe," I cried, so happy to hear him actually saying the words.

Things had worked out for the best in Polonias, but life would've been so much easier if he and I had married there and were living in that land.

We wouldn't have to worry about what his boss thought or whether Gabe was comparing me to other supernaturals.

"Is that a real proposal or are you just messing with me?" I asked as he slid the bracelet on my wrist, securing it.

"I'm completely serious, but I know you aren't ready to believe me," he said, a sad smile on his lips. "It's my fault, and I know I've made a lot of mistakes, but I want to prove to you that I'm not going anywhere. I spoke with Snow and as of Monday, I'm going to teach Abernathy's classes while he's gone."

I covered my mouth with the back of a hand. "But what about your duties to the chayot?"

He shrugged. "They aren't going anywhere, but I put my second in command, Anna, in charge. She'll handle the day to day. If she needs me, she can come and get me or send someone for me."

Gabe's smile grew. "I'm going to stay here and see you as often as I can. I'm going to take you on dates. Or, well - " He chuckled, looking a little sheepish, which was entirely too adorable because Gabe never wanted to look vulnerable, "I don't know Sharra as well as you do, so I'll ask you out and then you can show me around this land, if you want."

I was still trying to comprehend what he was saying. "You're going to live here?"

He took my hands, kissing the back of each one, his eyes shining with pleasure. "That's right. I've already secured a room and moved over some of my stuff."

"But - " I seriously couldn't believe it.

Joy like I hadn't felt in a long time bubbled inside my chest.

"You're sure about this?"

He was still a chayot and responsible for the lives of the humans in their realm.

It was more than his job, it was his sacred duty.

Ingrained in his DNA like blond hair and blue eyes were in mine.

But he was willing to set that aside for me.

That was new.

"Very sure." He leaned in, pressing his lips softly to mine.

Desire roared up inside me and I wound myself around him, wrapping a leg around his hips.

"Gross," Ignacio said.

I growled before taking a deep breath and stepping back, wiping my mouth as I looked at the elf magic student over Gabe's shoulder. "Did you need something or are you just here to rattle me?" I tried to smile, but I'm pretty sure it was more a bearing of teeth.

Good thing I wasn't a vampire.

Ignacio glanced down the hall, checking to make sure we were alone before tucking his hands in the pockets of his pants. "Look, I'm no snitch, but I heard Sera telling some of the other students she was going to raise someone from the dead tomorrow night during the dance. She said she found a spell and already has most of the ingredients." Worry frustrated his features and he bit his bottom lip. "Is that even possible?"

"It's highly unlikely." I'd read through that particular spell before and knew it was a very complicated black magic ritual that required several items that were very difficult to collect.

Gabe faced the kid, tucking his hands in his pockets the way Ignacio's were.

Apprehension over what Gabe would say about how all supernaturals were bad filled my stomach and I placed a hand on his arm.

"Where is she?" I asked.

"Last I saw, she was in the haunted house, but she asked some people to help her collect one of the missing ingredients and they took off." He shrugged. "I'm not sure where they were heading."

Ignacio wiped a hand over his face. "I'm all for experimenting. Everyone does it, ya know? We all want to use our magic. Except I'm bringing my girl, Fern, to the dance tomorrow night and don't want her getting hurt."

"You did the right thing telling us. It takes a lot of courage to do what you did," Gabe said, clasping the kid on the shoulder and giving him a look that said he understood what the guy was going through.

My shoulders relaxed as relief washed over me. Gabe understood the mind of a teenaged boy better than I did and I was glad he remembered that. "Mr. Henry is right. Thank you, Ignacio. I'll look into it."

"We'll look into it," Gabe corrected, putting an arm through mine.

Ignacio raised an eyebrow, giving us a look that said we better, before heading back into the ballroom.

Gabe's arms went around my waist. "Mr. Henry, huh?"

I batted at his chest playfully. "Easy, tiger. We need to find Sera. The sooner the better."

"Any ideas where to start?" Gabe asked, turning serious.

His question raised my hackles and I answered defensively. "Not to worry. She's here in Sharra, so none of your precious humans will get hurt. We're all supernatural here, including you."

"Cindy," he said, looking hurt.

"Sorry," I said. And I was. I'd let myself fall into old habits with him and that's why I knew this whole soulmate thing between us was going to be tricky. We both had a lot of issues to work through. Taking his hand, I started toward the stairs. If I had to guess where Sera might go for the ingredients, it would be the basement. "I might have an idea."

RESURRECTION SPELL

SERA WASN'T in the basement, but I found the spell book I thought she would've taken since it contained the spell for raising someone from the dead.

That it was still in its place on the bookshelf concerned me.

Mizrabel had contacted and used her once before, which meant it was possible the sorceress might do it again.

The bigger question was why Mizrabel had chosen Sera in the first place.

Sure, the girl was vulnerable and thus easy to manipulate, but it had to be more than that.

It seemed too coincidental that Mizrabel had chosen Sera just before I found her.

Plus, Mizrabel was my mother.

Had she somehow known I would find Sera?

Did something tie Sera and me to each other?

If I knew how to reach Abernathy, I would have, but he was still recovering from the ordeal of freeing me as the heart of Polonias.

I was on my own.

The most worrisome question: Who did Sera intend to bring back from the dead?

If Mizrabel was involved, I thought I might know, I needed to find Sera and stop her before she did something she couldn't come back from.

After the basement, we checked the forest.

"So, are you going to invite me to the Halloween dance?" Gabe asked as we made our way back to the academy, intent on searching Sera's room for any clues.

I was surprised he mentioned it, but pleasantly so. "Do you want to go? I have to chaperone, but you could help me."

He smiled, kissing my fingers, and for a moment I saw the Gabe I fell in love with when we were still in high school. "Is that your invitation? No writing it out in a spider's web or chocolate or something?"

I laughed, and he joined in.

Pulling us to a stop, I thought of a spell.

"How about this?" I asked, sending the question "Will you go to the dance with me, Gabe?" into the air where it shone with golden dust.

Pixelettes fluttering in the distance saw it and repeated the question a hundred times around us, making Gabe and me laugh with delight. .

"Better," he said, his eyes shining in wonder. "And the answer is most definitely."

"I'm so glad." I watched his face, enjoying the joy visible in his expression. It'd been a long time since he looked so happy.

Gabe bent down and brushed his lips against mine lightly, and it was like I was lit on fire. Hungry desire had me throwing my arms around him as he deepened the kiss, his hands on my hips.

We were standing in the hallway near Sera's room and someone cleared their throat followed by a rattle of giggling.

I reluctantly pushed Gabe away and saw Kaylan and Kimberly were standing in front of us.

"We didn't want to interrupt, but you're blocking our way," Kimberly said, giving us a look that said we were too old for public displays of affection.

"Sorry about that, ladies," Gabe said, pulling me against the wall and giving them his most charming smile.

They both sighed noticeably. It was understandable.

Gabe was beyond gorgeous.

"Miss Croswell just asked me to the Halloween dance, and I was accepting," Gabe continued.

"Wow," Kimberly said, shaking her head as she moved past us before unlocking the door to her room.

"Did you need something from us?" Kaylan asked, batting her eyelashes at Gabe.

"We were looking for Sera. Can you see if she's in there?" I tried to let go of Gabe's hand, but he wouldn't let me.

"Sure, hang on." Kaylan went inside followed by Kimberly and shut the door. They were laughing and talking, but I couldn't hear what they were saying.

"One of them is coming back, right?" Gabe asked, a question on his features.

"I hope so."

Gabe gave me a sly grin. "Well, while we wait - " he said, kissing me again.

"For goodness' sake, we were gone like ten seconds." Kimberley had a hand on her hip in disgust, after she opened the door, but I could tell she was holding back a smile.

"Is she in there?" I asked, giving Gabe a sideways glance.

He was impossible to resist when he was so tender and sweet.

"No, but if we see her, we'll be sure to tell her you're looking for her," Kimberly said with a knowing smile.

"Great, thank you. See you tomorrow night?"

"Yep." And she closed the door in our faces.

"Where to now?" Gabe asked, his arm around my waist.

"Let's go to Heather's room."

When we arrived, Heather came to the door and told us she hadn't talked to Sera all day.

She looked relieved and I couldn't blame her. Sera was a bully to Heather.

I thought about telling her what Abernathy said, but I didn't think it was a topic I should discuss with Gabe there.

He was kind to her though, and I appreciated that.

It was good to see Heather had won herself another champion, but I kept wondering when enough would be enough for him.

The man was an angel created specifically to keep humans safe from the likes of me - from all supernaturals.

It couldn't be easy trying to help when he knew all the trouble we could cause.

"If she isn't doing the spell from that book, then maybe Sera is just blowing hot air, trying to get attention or seem cool," Gabe said, his hands in his front pockets. "She could be trying to find a way to fit in."

"It's possible." I took hold of his arm, grateful he was sticking it out and hadn't said anything degrading or mean about any of my students or the teachers at the academy.

"But highly unlikely," I added.

I didn't believe for one second Sera was joking.

The girl was powerful and set up a seance within days of arriving at the Seven Magics Academy.

From what I knew of her, if Sera set her mind to doing something, she would find a way to make it happen.

I couldn't remember all of it, but I knew the resurrection spell called for a seven pointed star to be drawn, with each tip accommodating a black candle.

In the center of the star would be placed a cauldron containing blood from the one performing the spell as well as a body part of the deceased, dirt from the deceased's grave, and a piece of a unicorn horn as well as other items I couldn't recall.

Since unicorns no longer existed, I was positive Sera couldn't complete the spell, but something told me my optimism was misplaced.

We searched for hours with no success, and it was after midnight when Gabe finally walked me to my room.

Curfew went into effect hours ago.

The kids working on the dance and haunted house were safely back in their rooms, but Sera still hadn't been found.

"Get some sleep," he said. "She has to eat. I'm sure we'll see her at breakfast."

He leaned in, kissing me lightly, and I clung to him, wanting to invite him in.

It had been too long since we were together and I wanted him.

But I also wasn't ready.

If he was going to win me back like he promised, then I needed to know he was serious this time - that he wanted all of me, including the supernatural parts.

"Night," I said, when his lips left mine.

"Want to meet for breakfast?" he asked, cupping my face in his hands.

"Nine o'clock?" I asked, leaning against the door.

"See you then." He touched the wings on the bracelet briefly before walking away.

I watched him go until he turned out of sight, surprised by the multitude of feelings I held for him.

It was love, no doubt, and I wanted more than anything for us to be together.

GLIMMER OF FEAR

I CLOSED my bedroom door and locked it before going to the mirror and asking it to show me Snow.

Thankfully, my best friend was still awake and alone in her study.

I shared with her my thoughts and theories and told her I was going to Polonias and not to worry if she didn't see me in the morning since I didn't know how long I would be gone.

Guilt pierced my heart momentarily after saying goodbye and changing from the dress I wore for school into a pair of jeans, boots, and an oversized indigo sweater with a V neck.

Why hadn't I asked Gabe to go with me?

He could have come and seen the place of my birth.

My bloodline had kept the land of Polonias alive.

Aside from that, the land was in my heart and I wanted Gabe to know that part of myself.

Confused and irritated with myself, I took hold of the diamond star attached to the black choker around my neck.

If my theories were correct, then Sera was in Polonias.

I didn't know how it was possible since travelling to my land wasn't as easy as creating a portal to go between realms.

Still, my guts were telling me that's where she would be, and I had to at least check.

Closing my eyes, I pictured the castle and the graveyard where Anna, Violet, and Quilla had been buried.

Violet had mentioned that Lawson was buried there as well and I figured that was the best place to start looking.

A slight wind caused the edges of my hair to tickle my face and the ends of my sweater to flutter against my stomach.

Darkness surrounded me as I opened my eyes.

"Lumia," I whispered.

As the light appeared, I noticed I was directly in front of the iron gate where the statue, Evenlyra, stood watch, her hand held out in anticipation of a gold coin.

"Damn," I whispered.

In my rush to get here, I'd forgotten.

Could I take one from her hand and then return it?

"Definitely not." My heart sinking, I took hold of my necklace, preparing to return to my room.

But before I closed my eyes, the gate swung open.

Surprised, I glanced up at the death keeper.

"You may enter," the statue said, her unseeing marble eyes on me.

It was disconcerting to have a conversation with an object that should have been inanimate, but I held my ground.

"But beware, there are those within the graveyard who seek to take away your life, dear Cinderella. If they succeed, I will have no choice but to reap your soul."

I stared a moment, unable to respond to her words. I was grateful she warned me, but she also threatened me as well.

Not a great situation to be in.

"I understand," I finally said, clamping my lips together in a determined line.

Before stepping through the gate, I snuffed out my light, knowing it would give me away.

Darkness fell over me and I waited for my eyes to adjust.

It took a few minutes, but I could finally make out the path running along the perimeter as well as some of the nearer headstones.

Tentative, I made my way inside.

"You can do this," I said, making my way along the path, working to remember when to turn. In the shadowy distance, I could see the tomb.

Nearly colliding with a tombstone, I finally reached the large crypt and moved slowly to the opening.

There were voices coming from inside and I stopped to listen.

"Take some of his hair then," the first voice said.

"It smells," the second voice responded.

I knew immediately it was Sera.

"Are you sure I have to do this?"

"Yes, girl. You must," the first voice returned, exasperated.

I knew the second voice then.

It was Mizrabel's.

My pulse pounded angrily.

She was coercing Sera into performing black magic, and it was obvious she wasn't completely on board.

Perhaps I could talk some sense into her.

I'd used a spell to make Mizrabel disappear once before, I could do it again. I even remembered the words.

Rolling back my shoulders, I stepped into the room.

"Sera," I said, sounding deceptively calm.

She gasped, spinning to face me, a jolt of magic shooting from her hands.

I saw it coming and stepped out of the way so it hit the wall behind me.

A chunk of stone broke off and crashed to the floor.

"Miss Croswell?"

"That's right, Sera. I've come to help you." I put my hands up, showing her I meant her no harm.

"Hello, daughter," Mizrabel said, ripping a chunk of something from an open crypt and shoving it into Sera's hand.

"Daughter?" Sera goggled at me.

I recognized the hourglass hanging around her neck from the silver chain.

Lawson had given that to me. It must've stolen it back.

"Oh, didn't you know?" Mizrabel moved to stand beside Sera.

"No," Sera said, shaking her head. "She's your mom?" she asked me.

"She brought me into this world, but I was raised by a human woman from Salem, Massachusetts. She's the only mom I've ever known." I took a step toward Sera.

"Don't listen to her. She lies. That's all she does. You can't trust her," Mizrabel hissed. "Now go. You need to get back to Sharra. The moon will be in the right spot tomorrow night. Do it then and not a moment sooner."

"Miss Croswell?" She kept switching her gaze from me to Mizrabel.

"It's okay, Sera," I said. It was better if she was gone. I didn't want her to be near when Mizrabel and I fought.

She nodded and I tried to smile. "I'll see you back at school."

The girl grabbed hold of the hourglass with her free hand and was instantly gone.

Her skills with magic really were impressive.

"There, now it's just the two of us. We can have some mother daughter time." She shoved Lawson's dead body back inside the crypt.

It snapped shut, but she didn't take her eyes from me.

"Why are you doing this?" Now that Sera was gone, I no longer wanted to be here either.

I got the best of Mizrabel once and felt sure she wouldn't allow me to do so again.

Still, the words to the spell I used on her before flitted across my mind. Rua-tha grislin-gr we-nwillow.

"Revenge," Mizrabel said simply. "I thought you already knew that."

"But then why not go after Abernathy?" His magic could defeat her, I felt certain.

A glimmer of fear crossed her face. "I could. He's weak after what he did for you, but I'd rather make everyone he loves hurt instead."

In that moment, I understood her.

At least to an extent.

Even though Abernathy didn't choose her, she still loved him.

Was this how Gabe and I would turn out?

Him going about his life while I suffered to the point that I became bitter and lashed out in revenge.

My eyes went to my wrist and the bracelet with the wings on it.

"I'm sorry, Mizrabel," I said quietly.

"You will be," she said and vanished.

I returned to my room in Sharra.

Exhausted, I got ready for bed.

Under the covers, I stared at the ceiling as sadness for Mizrabel weighed heavily on me.

Was I becoming my mother?

TIES THICKER THAN BLOOD

IN THE CAFETERIA the next morning, there was a happy buzz in the air.

The dance was that night.

Curfew was being extended to midnight and the students were excited.

I got myself some scrambled eggs, cottage cheese, and salsa, and coffee to drink as well as some water.

I searched for Gabe and spotted him over by Professor Pops.

The two of them were having a serious conversation and I didn't want to interrupt.

"Miss Croswell," Heather called, waving.

I went over and sat across from her.

She was by herself, which would give me the chance I needed to tell her what I found out.

"Hello, Heather," I said, sipping my coffee.

Mixing the eggs, cottage cheese, and salsa together, I took a bite. Then noticed Heather watching me.

"What? It's good. You should try it sometime. High in protein and delicious."

The girl made a face before dabbing some peanut butter on her banana and taking another bite.

Gabe and Pops were done talking and he waved me over.

I held up a finger.

"So, Heather, I wanted to give you an update on some things." I told her what Abernathy said and watched her joy deflate into sorrow. I couldn't imagine what she must be going through.

"I'm so sorry," I finally said.

Tears wet her eyes, but she sniffled and didn't let them fall. "Thanks for letting me know."

My heart broke for her. "Is there anything I can do for you?" I wished I could just fix the whole situation and make it all work out.

Life was so damn unfair sometimes.

Heather shook her head as Kaylan and Kimberly walked over and sat on either side her.

"I'll see you girls tonight," I said, picking up my tray and heading over to Gabe and Pops.

The men smiled as I made my way over.

My heart fluttered at the sight of Gabe.

He wore a white tee shirt that was tight against his biceps and brought out the tan of his skin.

"Hey," I said as I sat next to him.

He caressed my hand.

I glanced at Pops and he nodded.

"Everything is fine," he said. "We were just discussing whether or not he should be here."

That surprised me. "You don't agree with Gabe's decision to live here and teach?"

Pops' face softened. "I think it's wonderful what he's doing, and I wish you both the very best. The problem is, he hasn't resolved his issues with a certain archangel. He's only postponed them. At some point, Jesse is going to realize where Gabe is, and he might just show up here and punish my son on the spot." He gave Gabe a pointed look as he spoke.

Pops was such an amazing father. He truly thought of Gabe as his son, even though Gabe was adopted.

Some ties were thicker than blood.

"Should I go talk to this Jesse?" It made me nervous to think of confronting an archangel. This was the first time I'd heard Gabe's boss called that.

From what I knew of the angel hierarchy, an archangel was the highest, strongest form of angel while the chayot were one of the lowest.

Gabe shook his head adamantly, and I saw real fear on his face. "No. Please. He might smite you or worse."

"What if we went together? Then he could see how much we love each other?" There had to be something we could try.

If we were going to make our relationship work, we needed to get rid of the obstacles.

Pops sipped deep red liquid from his fancy pewter goblet.

I knew it was blood.

"It's a very kind offer, Cindy, but that isn't a good idea. With angels, there isn't any gray area. It's only good and bad," the old vampire said.

"And you and I are considered bad," I replied, meeting Gabe's eyes.

The food I'd eaten started to turn in my stomach.

I wanted to wallow in my disgust and walk away, but that wouldn't solve anything.

"To most chayot? Basically, yes," Pops said. "They've given me leeway since I raised Gabe when his father didn't want him, but they barely tolerate me."

Gabe sat back, obviously feeling the same way I was.

Since there was nothing I could do about his boss at the moment, I decided to change the subject. "Last night, I went back to Polonias."

They both relaxed, though I saw Gabe was upset I hadn't asked him to go with me.

I told them about Sera, that I strongly suspected she was raising Lawson from the dead, and what Mizrabel said.

Professor Pops stood. "I may have a copy of the spell she's using. It's incredibly dark. When I find it, I'll let you know."

"Thank you," I said as he walked away.

"What are you going to do about Jesse?" I asked when I believed Pops was far enough away that he wouldn't overhear our conversation.

Gabe pushed his leftover hash browns around his plate. "There is nothing to do. If he finds out, he'll be angry, but like I said before and was telling Pops, I can step down as leader. I'm sick of it anyway. I've been doing it for years and I can't have a life when I'm constantly worried about humanity."

I remembered well the many times while still in high school he left to go save someone or take a meeting with the human governments or the chayot or the other angelic beings he answered to.

Everyone else came first.

"If that's what you want, I'll support you. I like having you here," I said.

Gabe held out his hand and I took it. "I like being here." He laced his fingers with mine. "So about this dance? I hear the theme is Hocus Pocus. Does that mean I get to go around shouting, 'Amok, amok, amok'?" His lips turned up in a teasing grin.

I snort-laughed. This long-buried playful side of Gabe had my insides doing cartwheels. "If you did, that would be great."

"Amok, amok, amok." He winked before stabbing a piece of fruit and shoving it in his mouth.

I watched him chew, thinking he could chew on me anytime.

And more. Much, much more.

I bit my bottom lip.

"Why Miss Croswell, are you having dirty thoughts about me?" He wiggled his eyebrows before raising them in question.

"Wouldn't you like to know." I sipped my coffee, watching him and hoping this Gabe stayed with me forever.

Because I loved this Gabe.

Hell, I loved every part of Gabe, but there were parts of him that didn't love me.

And that effing hurt.

He couldn't just show up and make promises and expect me to be willing to believe him. Not after all he'd done.

It had to do with trust, and trust took time to build. A small, scared part of me wondered if he was using me for an undercover covert operation meant to extinguish all supernaturals.

I shook that away, stabbing a piece of egg and choking it down.

"Hey," he said.

I swallowed and cleared my throat. "Yeah?"

The way he looked at me let me see he worried about what I was thinking, but he didn't voice those concerns.

Switching gears, he said, "I know we need to stop Sera, and we need to do it tonight. So, what's your plan?"

OceanofPDF.com

IS HE AN ANGEL

My plan wasn't elaborate.

Find Sera.

Talk to her.

Make her see what a foolish idea it was to bring someone back from the dead.

According to Gabe that wasn't a plan at all.

Stuffing back several very rude comments revolving around him being the leader of an army of angels, I asked him what he would do.

Turned out his plan was basically the same as mine, just more elegant.

I thought it over as I put on my Sarah Sanderson costume.

Since I was blond, she seemed the easiest Sanderson sister for me to imitate, though she was a bit too bubbly for me.

Still, she was twisted enough and dressing as her would be fun.

I found the costume online and had my mom purchase it for me in the human realm then I brought it back to Sharra for tonight's party.

The bodice was lavender and laced up the back, so it fit tight against my body.

The skirt came to mid-calf.

At the hips, the material was dark purple and the panel in the center was fuchsia.

I wore black lace-up ankle boots with black tights and matching long, lacy sleeves.

My hair was easy. I parted it on the side and put natural waves in it.

To copy the character, I did my eye makeup dark - much darker than I normally wore it.

The diamond star dangling from my choker went with the outfit well enough that I left it on and I chose matching small diamond studs for my ears.

Gabe was meeting me at the dance since I was going early to make sure the music and haunted house were ready to go.

When I arrived, I couldn't help but smile, impressed by the decorating committee's hard work.

The ballroom was transformed.

Between the real and magical decorations, the whole area looked like a scene straight out of the movie.

"What do you think, Miss Croswell?" Jaxon asked, his smile filling his whole face.

He was dressed like one of the townspeople in brown pants and a matching brown vest with a white pullover shirt underneath. His blond hair was disheveled and there was a smudge on one of his cheeks.

Even in costume, he had that all-American boy look about him.

On his arm was his date, Melinda.

She was a vampire and tonight she looked the part.

Her short red dress was cut low and her dark hair was straight and slick.

She wore black eyeliner to enhance her eyes and blood red lipstick.

Her outfit came as a bit of a shock.

The girl was usually more reserved.

I smiled at them both. "You and your committee did a wonderful job. I'm impressed with how it all turned out."

"You helped," Melinda said, smiling and flashing her pearly white fangs.

We'd been lucky none of the vampire kids had tried to eat the other students.

It helped that Sharra's food was enchanted to taste like whatever the one eating it craved, so the vampires had a few extra dietary options here.

"I hardly did anything," I said, my gaze turning toward the entrance of the haunted house. "Have you been inside?" I asked, a knot forming in my stomach.

Melinda shuddered. "It's scary," she said, clinging a little more tightly to Jaxon.

He smiled dotingly at his date. "It isn't too bad, but that girl, Sera had a lot of, um, curious opinions."

Spoken like a born politician. This kid could run for president someday.

"Great," I said just as non-committedly. "I'll check it out in a bit." I did a quick perusal of the food and drink tables.

Chips, cookies, and other assorted treats were on one table while a cauldron of smoking drinks and plastic cups were on the other.

"Is there anything else that needs to be handled before the dance starts?" I asked Jaxon.

A large clock in a magically created clock tower showed the dance would start in ten minutes.

Jaxon shook his head. "Nope, it's ready."

"I'm going to make sure the DJ has everything he needs. Have fun tonight, you two," I said before heading over to the DJ's table.

The student handling the music tonight was Bale.

His costume consisted of a black tee shirt with the word SCARY printed across the chest in red along with jeans slung low on his hips.

His black hair was back in a man-bun.

"Evening, Bale. You have everything?"

"Oh, hey, Miss Croswell." He darted a look at me before sticking the end of a chord into the back of a record player. "I just need to hook this in and turn this on - " He paused, flipping a switch, and static crackled through the speakers. "Done." He smiled triumphantly.

"Great. Thanks for doing this. Have a fun night."

"I will," he said, already focusing of the music.

I turned, facing the front door, and saw Gabe standing near the entrance.

The angelic man took my breath away.

Definitely movie star material.

But it wasn't his beyond gorgeous looks or the way his blue jeans hung low on his hips.

It wasn't even the way his white shirt clung to his, torso showing off all of his muscles. It was the giant white wings on his back. They were fully extended, showing off like a peacock hoping to attract his mate.

It was working.

I thought he said he didn't have wings.

Had he lied?

Or was this a new development?

Were they fake? I didn't know which answer I hoped for the most.

Gabe saw me and smiled, though I sensed slight hesitation in him as he caught hold of my gaze.

His wings retracted and he raised an eyebrow, questioning.

Before I could say or do anything, Kaylan and Kimberly came in, walking past him, unable to keep from ogling.

"Damn, he's fine," Kimberly said, fanning her face.

"Yeah, he is. Shit, I wish he wasn't going to teach here. That probably means he's off limits," Kaylan added.

"He isn't that much older than us. Only like - " Kimberly began.

She paused as I came up behind them, putting a hand on each other their shoulders and leaning between them.

"Too many years, girls. Gross. He's old." I made a face and they laughed.

"Well, right, that's what I was going to say," Kimberly said, but she kept her eyes on Gabe. "Is he, like, an angel?" she asked, inquisitive.

"I know he's your man, Miss Croswell, but he is fine," Kaylan added.

"I totally agree," I responded, my body warming all over.

The man was definitely fine.

"Where's Heather?" I asked, changing the subject.

They looked around, surprised.

"She was right behind us," Kaylan said.

"Yeah, she's dressed like Winifred. Her costume is awesome!" Kimberly put her hands on her hips. "What happened to her?"

"Sera, probably," Kaylan said, her features turning angry. "Sera came up behind us when we were walking and she kept making snide comments,"

"It's alright," I lied, my intuition going into overdrive, worried Sera intended to use Heather in some way to bring Lawson back to life.

I needed to find them immediately.

Saying goodbye, I headed over to Gabe.

"Whoa, you look amazing. It's been a while since I've seen the movie, but you look just like the blond sister," Gabe said, taking me in.

He wrapped an arm around my waist, pulling me against him.

He smelled like heaven - a little spicy and warm with a hint of fresh air.

Unable to resist, I touched his large, white wings.

"Thanks," I said, though not with enthusiasm.

I was too worried about Heather and Sera.

"I thought you didn't have wings," I said, thinking they felt alive, as though they contained part of Gabe's soul.

But I remembered a dream Snow had about him a long time ago, and thought they looked exactly as she imagined.

"Tell me now," I said, stepping back and crossing my arms.

"They are real," he began, holding up his hands.

My mouth dropped open in outrage. He had lied.

"But I didn't lie," he went on quickly. "They only appeared a few days ago. Jesse said that sometimes happens with half angels, especially when they do as much for the humans as I have." His eyes bore into mine as he took hold of my arms gently. "I swear."

I sensed he was telling the truth.

Relief washed over me and I nodded.

"You always did like attention," I said, letting myself trust him further.

"True." He chuckled, kissing my cheek.

"So you can just make them go away?" I asked, studying them more closely. They were beautiful, like him, and seemed to fit him perfectly. If I were to design wings for Gabe, they would look just like these.

"I can," he said, watching me. "I guess that's one benefit of being only half chayot." He seemed to be waiting for a response and I tried to smile, but my mind kept going back to Sera and Heather. Where were they?

He moved in closer. "What's wrong?"

"Heather is missing, and Sera isn't around. We need to find them both before something bad happens."

Understanding washed over his features. "I'm with you," he said, grimly. "What can I do to help?"

"Did you see either of them before you came in?" I stepped from his grasp, walking over to Snow to ask if she'd seen either of them recently.

Coco was heading over to the stage but waved.

I waved back.

"Hi," Snow said, hugging me. "You look fabulous."

"Thanks," I said. She definitely looked like the queen of the vampires, in a deep red dress covered in black lace.

"Where's Dorian?" I asked, thinking the more supernaturals we had looking for the girls, the faster we would find them.

"He's with Jasmine. She wanted to come to the party and when we told her she wasn't old enough, she had a serious meltdown. He's reading her favorite stories. Also, there was talk of a dance-off before bed." She smiled wryly, though I sensed she was nervous too. I couldn't imagine having a toddler at our age.

It happened, of course, but I certainly wasn't ready.

"Hey, Gabe," Snow said, taking in his amazing white wings. "Where did these come from?"

He quickly told her as I scanned the room for Sera.

"What can I do?" Snow asked when Gabe finished.

"Stay here and if you see her, let me know. I'm worried she's going through with her plan now, and that somehow she involved Heather." I wanted Snow to come with me, but there were many other students here at the dance who needed her protection if we couldn't get to Sera in time to stop her.

Snow nodded. "Go after her. I'll make sure everyone here stays safe."

"Thanks." I hugged her again.

Gabe waved before following me out of the ballroom and into the hall.

HAUNTED HOUSE

"CAN'T YOU DO A LOCATOR SPELL?" Gabe asked.

"I can try." Locator spells could sometimes get wonky in Sharra because of all the enchantments surrounding the land and especially the academy.

Gabe continued to scan our surroundings. "At this point it's better than nothing."

"True. Let's get to the basement." I needed an item from there.

Passing more groups of kids in costumes, none of whom were Heather or Sera, we exited the hall and hurried down several flights of stairs and hallways until we reached my classroom.

There, I went to a shelf, searching for a map of Sharra.

When I pulled it from its spot, I knocked another paper onto the floor.

Frustrated, I picked it up and was about to put it back, but there was a word scrawled along one corner in old-timey writing.

I knew the word because I'd seen it before in The Eye of Abernathy.

The word was resuante and it meant resurrection.

"Do we have time for this?" Gabe asked when I handed him the map.

"I think we should make time. I'm quite certain this is the spell Sera is using to bring Lawson back to life."

While Gabe unfolded the map, I unfolded the paper in my hand.

My pulse quickened as I read the title at the top. Resuante da Morente, which translated to Resurrection of the Dead.

Moving an old skull out of the way, Gabe spread the map of Sharra on the table. "Wouldn't she have the paper with her?"

"Not if Mizrabel is guiding her." I studied incantation as well as the materials and actions needed, doing my best to translate for Gabe.

At the bottom of the page, in small letters, it said that only someone with the power to heal could perform the spell.

My heart rate sped up.

Like a puzzle, the pieces locked into place and I finally understood.

Mizrabel must've known Sera had unicorn magic.

But that wasn't Sera's only magical strength.

I remembered how the obsidian orb had glowed gold during the opening ceremony. There weren't a lot of dragons in the world - the only one I'd ever met was Abernathy, but Snow told me there was another living in the Mediterranean Sea.

Since Sera's magic was also part dragon, it looked like there was about a fifty percent chance she and I were related.

"Need anything else?" Gabe asked, interrupting my thoughts.

"I got it." I went to a drawer and retrieved a letter opener with an especially sharp tip.

With it I pricked my finger, dripping blood onto the map - which was enchanted, so my blood couldn't ruin it.

Then I spoke the words that would initiate the locator spell.

If my blood and Sera's were the same, it would find her.

Gabe's eyebrows raised in surprise but he didn't comment.

He'd seen me perform magic enough to recognize this wasn't how a locator spell usually worked.

The blood began to swirl and move until only a tiny dot remained. I pointed at it triumphantly. "It's got her."

Gabe bent his head in closer. "It looks like she's in the ballroom," he said, giving me a bewildered look.

We were just there, and no one had seen her.

I shook my head. She wasn't in the ballroom, but beside it, in the haunted house.

I knew from Jaxson's description that the whole thing was set up as a maze full of just about every magical pitfall the students could dream up.

Tracking her down in there would be especially difficult.

Sera and I were related somehow, so the fastest way to find her was by following the trail left by our shared blood.

I didn't mention any of this to Gabe.

There wasn't time to go into details now and I couldn't dwell on it without becoming distracted.

I focused on finding Sera and shoving any other questions to the back of my mind.

We could figure things out once everyone was safe.

"Fereneth arivia," I said. The glowing red dot lifted off the page and grew as it floated toward the door.

"We're following it?" Gabe asked.

"Unless you have a better idea." As leader of the chayot, he had assembled and carried out countless plans and tracked down and captured many supernaturals.

He could see things I didn't even know to look for.

"In Sharra, I'll defer to you." He winked, taking my hand, letting me lead.

I squeezed his fingers gently. Glad he was with me.

When we reached the ballroom, we walked along the edges to the entrance of the haunted house.

There was a line to get in.

"How long have you been waiting?" I asked the couple last in line.

"Fifteen minutes, maybe twenty," Beckham said.

The girl on his arm giggled. "I'm not really sure."

"Alright." I pushed my way up to the front, going straight to the students guarding the door.

"Hey, Sienna, Mr. Henry and I need to get in. Step aside, please."

She glanced nervously at me and then at Marcus. "We can't, Miss Croswell." Her eyes were wide with fear. "It's too full," she added.

I wasn't buying her lies for a second, knowing Sera had put her and Marcus up to keeping everyone else out.

What did she have over them?

"Either the two of you move out of the way, or you will both be expelled from the school and sent back to the human realm tonight. Am I clear?" It was harsh, because most of these students couldn't survive there alone, but I needed them to understand how serious I was.

She gulped and nodded before she and Marcus stood back, parting the red curtain.

The red dot glowed in the darkness, leading us forward.

Creepy music played softly in the background as we stepped into a room where two big-eyed aliens were pulling intestines from a corpse.

One of them held a wand and was looking at it in surprise as glitter shot from the tip.

The other had a witch's hat and what looked like fangs.

Blood covered the aliens' long fingers as well as the hat and wand, as if they had removed the items from inside the body.

"Twisted," I said.

"Ingenious," Gabe corrected.

He looked like a kid in a candy store and I remembered how he and his brothers, and Snow and I all used to watch horror films together in high school.

Nostalgia washed over me like a warm hug.

I'd wanted to be an adult so badly back then.

Now all I wanted was to return to those carefree days when all I had to worry about was which ring to wear in my belly button and how much skin I could show in school without getting into trouble.

Gabe released my arm, his body going on high alert. "Your red dot is leaving us behind," he said, pulling me back to the present.

We followed the dot into the maze.

"Keep your eyes open. I don't know what Sera has planned, but I know Mizrabel is involved."

He squeezed my hand and then released it. "We'll get through this together. I have your back. Promise."

"And I have yours," I said.

The maze looked like it was made of thick, green bushes covered in fake cobwebs. Enchanted spiders appeared, clicking their mandibles as they studied us with their beady eyes before skittering out of sight.

Overhead, twinkling lights cast an eerie light that didn't really allow us to see. Bats flapped just above our heads, their weird noises making me nervous.

The students had really outdone themselves.

If I hadn't been concerned about Sera and Mizrabel, this would've been a blast.

After walking for what seemed like an hour, I pulled on Gabe's arm, directing him to stop. Not too far off were the sounds of sniffling and crying.

"We're getting close," I said.

Gabe went to reach for the double swords he usually wore at his back but hit his hand on his own wings instead. "Damn," he whispered. "I forgot."

He wasn't allowed to have weapons on him in the school, but I wasn't too worried. He could fight better than most since he and his brothers had trained with Kenmei and Pops for years.

Though with so much magic about, his bare hands might be like bringing a knife to a gun fight.

We made our way soundlessly around several more bends. "Diminith," I whispered, calling the red dot back to me.

It lingered on my open hand for the briefest moment before entering my skin and going out.

Gabe watched in awe and I realized how much of my magic I'd hidden from him.

If we were going to be together, he needed to see and accept all of me.

"You're seriously the coolest person I know," he whispered.

Tingles crawled happily along my skin. That was exactly what I needed to hear.

"Thanks. You're pretty effing cool yourself."

"Do you want to go in magic blazing?" he asked with none of his usual disdain for my gifts.

"Let's listen first," I said.

Sera was my student.

I didn't want to hurt her, but if she was hurting Heather, then I wouldn't have a choice.

Fear rushed up my spine.

This was a lose-lose situation and I didn't like it one bit.

SIPHON HER POWERS

I PEEKED around the hedge and saw a plain room.

Several students were off to one side, behind bars.

Most of them were crying, though a few seemed more interested than afraid.

Maybe they thought this was all part of the fun.

Standing over a body in the center of an enormous seven-pointed star, Sera was chanting words I mostly didn't understand.

Large black candles burned a peculiar blue light at each of the tips.

On the ground nearby, wrapped up in make-shift cocoon, lay Heather.

Her eyes were shut, and there was a large splotch of red on her chest.

I covered my mouth to keep from screaming, praying she wasn't dead.

Gabe noticed her too.

He looked ready to attack.

But where was Mizrabel?

I didn't want him to rush in there until we knew what we were up against.

Thankfully, he was still letting me take the lead.

Sera held a wooden bowl in one hand and knelt down, placing the bowl on the ground beside Heather though she was clearly talking to someone else.

"Your life ended abruptly. Let the blood of this witch bring you back that you may live as you were meant to." As Sera spoke, smoke rose from the bowl and swirled above her before moving over to Heather's slack body.

"We need to do something now, Cin," Gabe hissed.

"I know," I said.

But what? What could we do to stop this?

It dawned on me why Sera had selected Heather as her victim.

It was because while Heather considered herself a girl, she still had boy parts.

And Lawson was going to come back to life using Heather's body.

I could not let that happen.

"Sera, stop this!" I shouted, coming around the corner and into plain sight.

Gabe stood beside me, exuding confidence and strength.

Even though I didn't know what I would do next, I was grateful to have him nearby.

Sera was smiling, but it faltered when she saw Gabe.

"He has wings?" she asked. Then shook her head as though trying not to be distracted. "I wondered when you would show," she said to me as she stepped out of the circle.

Beyond her, I saw the smoke had completely enveloped Heather.

With lightning speed, Sera sent a surge of magic at Gabe. It was so fast, I didn't have time to react and the magic hit him square in the chest.

He sailed backward, landing in the bushes.

At once, a thousand spiders were on him.

I went to help, except Mizrabel appeared in front of me.

"Hello, daughter," she said, her eyes glimmering with hatred.

"I see you figured it out," she said, glancing at Sera.

"Can you believe your father? He's a whore, that's for sure. There are more like Sera too, Cinderella. You aren't special. You and Sera are just two of his many children." She smirked. "And I intend to make you all suffer."

"What do you mean?" Sera asked.

I glanced back and saw confusion in her eyes.

"You told me I was special," she went on, pleading. "I did everything you asked. Now give me my reward."

From what I knew of Mizrabel, the only thing she intended to give Sera was a short life.

"Oh, you were special enough," Mizrabel said. "I wouldn't have been able to bring Lawson back without the unicorn in you." Mizrabel sent an eruption of magic at the girl, causing her to drop to the ground like a sack of onions. "But I don't need you anymore."

I didn't know who to help first.

Gabe? Heather?

Sera was closest, so I ran to her.

From the corner of my vision, I saw Mizrabel getting ready to send a blast of magic my way.

From deep within my mind came a spell I hadn't used before.

I mumbled the words in my head, and a nearly invisible barrier blocked the assault just before it struck me.

As Mizrabel's magic surged over it, the outline of the barrier looked like a shield.

I snatched it from the air and shouted the spell I used to stop Mizrabel the first time.

She cackled and side-stepped it.

"Come now, Cinderella. You are the daughter of a dragon and a sorceress. You can do better than that." She sent another surge of magic at me, and I blocked it again, holding the shield over my head.

Before I had the chance to counter, she sent another blast at me.

And another and another, until I felt the shield weakening as well as my strength.

I fell to my knees, fighting the tears springing into my eyes.

Now wasn't the time to cry.

"Help me," I whispered.

Sera moaned beside me and tried to sit up.

"Sera," I said, but didn't have time to say more as Mizrabel sent several more attacks at me.

A quick glance at Heather revealed an aura of Lawson's body forming above hers. I needed to stop it, but I had no idea how.

"Once I've ended you and Sera, I'll return to Polonias and kill Polly and her child. There's also a boy named Troy roaming around the human realm somewhere. I'll take care of him as well." She sent another, stronger force of magic into me as she spoke, the stream of purple forcing me back and into Sera.

"Are we sisters?" the girl whispered, trying to understand.

I nodded once as I tried to stand.

"I didn't know," Sera said.

"Neither did I." Putting my head down, I used my thighs to get to my feet.

With all my might, I shoved Mizrabel's magic away.

Abruptly it stopped, causing me to fall forward and hit my face on the floor.

I groaned, and scrambled to my feet in time to see Gabe had his arms around Mizrabel's, trapping them beneath his.

She shook and screamed in frustration.

"Let me go. Release me!"

"Gabe," I cried.

Mizrabel would do stop at nothing to hurt me, and I didn't want to lose him.

He looked at me, his bright green eyes overflowing with love.

In that moment, I knew he would do anything for me.

"I love you," he said as his wings came forward and closed around Mizrabel, a bright light shining around them both.

It was so bright, I had to look away.

And then it was gone.

So were Mizrabel and Gabe.

"Gabe," I shouted, standing and tripping over my costume.

Where was he?

How could I get him back?

"Miss Croswell, help me," Sera said, sounding frantic.

I turned and saw she was trying to move the bowl away from Heather, but it wouldn't budge.

Lawson's form hovered above her, looking sinister.

"You cannot stop what you've already started," he said with a sneer.

Fury boiled in my veins, like liquid gold, and it surged through me until it reached my brain.

Every page of The Eye of Abernathy flipped through my mind, each spell searing itself on my bones.

With each spell, the power within me grew until I felt ten feet tall and covered in magical armor.

Sera gasped and covered her mouth. "You're glowing."

I closed my eyes, holding back a scream.

The burning consumed me until I thought I would explode.

Then it was gone.

A ragged breath left me as my eyes opened and I saw smoke.

I studied my fingers.

They looked the same, but I felt wholly different.

And I knew what I needed to do to stop Lawson and save Heather.

Walking over to his smoky outline, I wrapped my arms around

Lawson, like I was giving him a hug, and spoke the words that chanted in my brain.

Lawson howled in fury. "Stop this. You cannot do this. I deserve to live!"

I didn't respond, just hung onto him until he was gone and my arms collapsed around air.

"You did it," Sera said, her hands still covering her mouth. "He's gone."

But I wasn't done yet. "I need your help," I called to her.

I knew a spell that would heal Heather, but it required Sera's unicorn magic to work.

She came over, and I pulled her down so we were both kneeling beside Heather.

"Place your hands on her wound," I said, with a voice I didn't recognize.

Once her hands were over the blood leaking out of Heather, Sera looked at me.

"Repeat after me." The spell would siphon away Sera's healing powers, but it was the least Sera could do after nearly killing Heather.

When she finished speaking, the wonder on Sera's face turned to pain. "It hurts," she said, about to remove her hands.

"I'm sorry, Sera, but you must keep your hands where they are or Heather will die." I placed my hands over hers, holding them in place.

"I don't want to," she said, wincing and trying to pull her hands away.

"You must." I wrapped my magic around her, refusing to let her break contact with Heather's chest.

After a few more seconds, Sera moaned, "I think I'm dying."

I ground my teeth together, trying to keep my cool.

Heather was on the brink of death at Sera's hands and Sera was whining that helping Heather hurt.

"No, Sera. The unicorn magic within you is restoring Heather's health. But doing so requires a sacrifice. You aren't going to die, but you are losing the part of your magic that is unicorn." I didn't add that it was for the best.

Unicorn was powerful magic, and she'd proven more than once that she couldn't be trusted with it.

I didn't remove my hands until Heather opened her eyes.

"Miss Croswell," she said, her words gravelly and her expression confused.

A smile crept over my face and I sat back, relieved.

"Hi, Heather."

She saw Sera and shied away.

"It's alright," I said gently. "Sera healed you."

Tears fell onto Sera's cheeks. "I'm really sorry, Heather. So, so sorry."

She sounded like she meant it.

That was a good start, but it would be a long while before I could trust her.

"You can remove your hands now," I told Sera.

She did, staring at them like she didn't recognize them.

"Where am I?" Heather asked. "I thought I was dead."

I used a spell to dissolve the cocoon covering her. "You're in the school and it's over," I said, not wanted to scare her by giving her all of the gory details.

"Can you stand?" I stood and held out a hand for her.

Beside us Sera stood as well.

After I hugged Heather and verified the girl seemed physically fine, I glared at Sera.

"Get those other students out of the cage. Now," I said.

Sera scurried over and undid the lock. "Sorry," she said as each student passed her.

No one responded.

No one said anything as they ran from the room, desperate to get out of there as soon as possible.

I didn't blame them.

"Let's get you to Heathcliff," I said, putting one arm around Heather's waist.

"Thank you," she said as we started from the room.

I glanced over at Sera.

She looked lost and I realized that was her problem from the beginning.

She was a lost little girl in need of guidance.

Heather followed my gaze. "I can get to Heathcliff on my own if you need to speak with Sera."

I nodded. "Thank you. I'll check in on you in a little while."

She hobbled over to the hedge and stopped. "I forgive you, Sera," she said quietly and left the room.

My hands went to my hips and I faced Sera.

She might be my half-sister, but she was also a menace. Arrogant, cold hearted, and she cared little for anyone but herself.

Sera wrapped her arms around herself. "I know," she said. "I don't know what came over me and I really am sorry."

"I appreciate the apology. But words aren't enough this time. There will be consequences."

"I understand." She looked at me. Her eyes filled with tears. "Whatever the consequences, I'll accept them if you promise we can get to know one another. I've never had a real family."

I took hold of one of her arms and opened a portal to the basement. Then with the flick of my wrist I opened the door to the cell. "Inside," I said softly.

Her head hanging down, she went in.

As I closed the door and sealed it with magic, I breathed a sigh of relief. For now, she couldn't hurt anyone else. "I promise to visit soon."

Sera sat on the bed, her hands in her lap. "My real father is a dragon?"

"It would seem so." I went to the door, opening it. "Get some rest. I'll be back."

She swallowed as she shook her head.

Before I shut the door, I heard her call, "Cindy?"

I poked my head back in, about to remind her to call me Miss Croswell, but since she was my sister, it didn't seem appropriate. "Yes?"

"I'm glad Heather isn't dead." She came to the bars, her face looking so sad, so lost.

"Had Heather died - " I shook my head. "It's good she's alive."

"That guy who was with you - Was he an angel? What happened to him and Mizrabel?"

I snapped my mouth shut, afraid I might scream.

I didn't know what happened to Gabe or even where to start looking for him.

Finally, I answered.

"I don't know. Goodnight." With that, I closed the door, locking it behind me.

WHAT HAPPENED TO GABE

BY THE TIME I arrived in the ballroom, all the students had been sent to bed.

Snow sat at the head of a long table where the teachers were discussing the situation.

"Is she locked up?" Snow asked me, her face concerned.

"She is," I said, falling into an empty chair.

For the next two hours we discussed what transpired and what needed to happen next.

I explained what I knew, which wasn't a lot.

I didn't know what happened to Gabe and Mizrabel, but I would find out.

Professor Pops agreed to help.

Coco would call a special gathering in the ballroom the following morning and have the therapist on hand for those who needed to talk.

For many of the students, the academy was all they had and if they couldn't feel safe here, then where could they go?

Classes would resume like normal on Monday and Tori agreed to teach my charms and spells classes until I returned.

We were short staffed already, but I was of no use to anyone until I knew what happened to Gabe.

The meeting over, I agreed to meet Pops at his house in the morning. But first I wanted to speak with Snow in private.

Neither of us said anything until we knew we could speak freely.

Seated in her living room, I explained how I forced Sera to give up her unicorn gift in order to heal Heather.

Guilt riddled my heart. "Was there a better choice?"

"You did the right thing," Snow said, shaking her head. "Heather would've died otherwise."

She sipped her drink before setting it down and leaning over to pat my knee. "There was no other call to make. I would've done the same thing."

I appreciated her saying so, but it didn't lessen the shame I felt, and I was about to tell her so when Jasmine came into the room.

"Mommy," she said, flying over, her wings carrying her right into Snow's outstretched arms.

"Jasmine, what are you doing out of bed?" Snow snuggled against the tiny vampire girl before giving her a playfully stern look.

"It was all the commotion." Jasmine wriggled out of her mom's arms and came over to me. "Cinderella," she whispered softly, her strange violet eyes watching me while her wings fluttered behind her.

"Call her Cindy," Snow said.

Jasmine didn't answer as she stroked my cheek and hair. With each caress of her little hand, I felt myself relax.

"It's going to be okay. Gabe is alive. He's just in the place where angels go when they aren't on Earth."

"Oh?" I said, my heart beginning to race. "How do you know this?"

She gave me a bright smile. "I know things."

The little girl seemed to have more wisdom than all of us combined.

"What do you think I should do about her?" I asked Jasmine, even though the little vampire had no idea who I was talking about.

Jasmine placed a hand on my cheek. "Sera shouldn't remain in Sharra. She is dangerous because she is like a wounded animal. She cannot be healed here, and she cannot be put down. There is a place in the human realm where she should go."

My mouth fell open and I looked at Snow. How did Jasmine know so much?

"Are you talking about the prison Gabe helped the humans to build? Isn't it more dangerous to send her there?"

Jasmine shrugged. "Perhaps, but unless you plan on killing her, there isn't a safer place."

Awed beyond belief, I glanced at Snow again as a magical thought formed. "What if we created a realm specifically for prisoners? They wouldn't be able to leave. We could keep it protected and secret. Then we could rehabilitate them at our whim."

"That is a great idea," Snow said, sitting beside me.

"That is a great idea," Jasmine repeated. Her eyes bore into mine. "Your magic is almost as strong as Abernathy's. I can feel your power."

I gulped as I remembered how I felt before sending Lawson away.

"You can help Mommy create a realm the way Abernathy and Mizrabel created Polonias."

Even Snow looked shocked at her words. "You know of Polonias."

"I see all things," Jasmine responded.

"Well, isn't that wonderful," Snow said, though she looked more scared than happy.

To me, Snow went on, "Let's get right on that." She stood and held out her hand for Jasmine. "But first, you need to get back to bed."

"I don't want to, Mommy. Let me help." The little girl put her hands on her hips and flew beside her mom, her face at level with Snow's.

"What about Mizrabel?" I asked, thinking Jasmine might know since she knew about Gabe.

Jasmine turned back to me, her eyes looking down at her hands before she considered me. "Your mother is no more, Cinderella. I am sorry," she finally whispered.

I gasped, thinking this girl was way to powerful for her own good. It was almost unsettling.

Snow lifted Jasmine into her arms. "Tell Cindy goodnight," she said, and I sensed the worry in my best friend as well.

"Goodnight, Cinderella."

"Night," Snow said, squeezing my outstretched hand.

When they reached the door leading to their bedchambers, Jasmine called out. "Don't worry. Everything with Gabe will work out."

I didn't use magic to get back to my room, needing the time to reflect as I walked.

When I reached my room, I removed my costume and took hold of my diamond star necklace. I didn't know where he was or how I would get there but I needed to see him.

Closing my eyes, I thought of Gabe and how much I loved him.

I imagined his face and his green eyes and his newly acquired white wings.

I thought of kissing him and the way he'd looked at me tonight. I thought about how much I loved him.

And suddenly I was travelling.

But to where?

When I stopped I opened my eyes.

I was in a completely white or silver room. It was so bright, my eyes couldn't focus on anything.

"Where am I?"

A man appeared. His clothes were the same silvery-white as the room, a stark contrast to his black hair, dark skin, and ebony wings.

He seemed to be glowing.

"You are in the angel realm. My name is Jesse and you are Cinderella." It wasn't a question. He knew exactly who I was.

I wanted to correct him but decided prudence might be the safest option. "You're Gabe's boss, the archangel over the chayot," I said, studying him.

"So he has mentioned me." He gave a mirthless smile. "Did he also tell you it is against policy for a chayot to be in a relationship with a supernatural?"

"He did mention that, yes," I said reluctantly, crossing my arms, feeling the need to protect myself.

"Well that's something." His grim smile got bigger. "Have a seat. Let's chat." A chair appeared behind me as did one behind him, though his had an opening in the back for his wings. He sat and I followed. "Why don't you tell me why you're here?" He crossed one leg over the other and clasped his hands together.

"I came to make sure Gabe is okay," I said, trying to sound confident.

"I can assure you he is. He saved you as well as a bunch of supernaturals from a woman called Mizrabel, who's also your mother. Have I got that right?"

"Yep," I said, clenching my teeth together.

"He isn't supposed to use his power to save your kind. He was created specifically to protect the humans. You can imagine how surprised I was when I learned what he'd done." His smile grew and now I could see all of his straight, white teeth.

"He rescued a bunch of innocent children and stopped an evil witch from using another child to bring a second evil being back from the dead. How was that wrong? He did it to save me, but also because it was the right thing to do." I looked down, tugging at one of the zippers on my camo pants. "He loves me," I added.

"I know and that's a problem," Jesse said, all but beaming now.

I wanted to smack the smile right off his face. "Why?"

"The simple answer is that we don't want chayot mixing with other supernaturals. The results can get messy. What kind of child would the two of you make together?"

"One that is loved," I said without thinking.

"Yes, but with a mother who is a witch with the combined power of a dragon and a sorceress and a father who is both human and angel? The child would be an abomination." He shook his head in disgust.

I wanted to punch him.

"So why don't you use your little magic charm and go back to Polonias and stay there where you belong?"

ANGEL FIGHT

MY MOUTH FELL open in shock. "Are you serious?"

"I'm dead serious." His smile vanished and he glared.

Somehow, I found that less intimidating.

"You've already befouled our realm with your presence. I will not allow you to corrupt the greatest chayot we've seen in centuries." Jesse uncrossed his legs and leaned forward.

"And if I don't agree?" I asked, unfazed.

I didn't care what he said, I wasn't leaving here without Gabe.

"You don't want me to cross that proverbial bridge, princess." Malice glinted in his eyes.

His threats were only making me angry.

"I want to see Gabe," I said. "Right now."

"Sure." He waved his hand and an image of Gabe and a beautiful angel with downy brown wings appeared.

They were in a kitchen.

She was baking and Gabe was seated at an island watching her, a soft smile on his lips.

"You see?" Jesse asked. "He belongs with his own kind. He's happy. Content."

I knew at once that this had to be Delphina. She wasn't old and wrinkly like I imagined, but beautiful and glorious.

My heart stopped and I hesitated.

Things would be so much easier if he was with Delphina instead of me.

"She's lovely," I said softly.

Gabe turned as though he heard me and seemed to stare right at me.

His eyes went wide and he pushed out of the chair. "Cindy?"

Jesse waved the image away and got to his feet. "Well that's unfortunate."

I heard the slapping of feet as someone ran toward us and knew it was Gabe.

He was coming for me and my heart soared.

Delphina or not, he loved me.

I stood as well, clenching my hands into fists.

I had more power, more magic than I knew what to do with and I wasn't afraid to use it on Jesse or any other angel of this realm, if necessary.

Gabe burst through the doorway, looking beyond gorgeous in angel attire. "Cindy. How did you get here?" he asked, ignoring his boss and heading straight for me.

"I'm actually not quite sure," I responded, unable to disregard the angel the way Gabe was. Probably because Jesse was glaring at me like I'd just killed his puppy.

"Well I'm glad you're here." Gabe finally acknowledged Jesse, taking my hand and pulling me behind him slightly.

"I am stepping down as leader of the chayot. I no longer want to lead. Nor do I want to be in charge of keeping the humans safe. I've already spoken to Anna. She is capable and will handle the job well, probably even better than me." He stepped in front of me, blocking me fully.

My heart thumped in overtime.

While the chayot were very powerful against humans and even most supernaturals, their power was nothing compared to an archangel's.

Thankfully for mere mortals, archangels cared little for humans or supernaturals and were more than happy to let the chayot take care of us.

It made me wonder what the other angels did with their time.

Jesse shot me an oily grin. "I see."

He turned on his heel and walked toward the door, closing and locking it with a click.

When he turned, his expression was scary.

"You think you can just walk away? Decide you no longer want to do the job you were born for?" The room shook at each of his thundering words.

I seemed to feel them in my soul and it quivered in fear.

"That's right." Gabe lifted his chin and for the first time I understood what Gabe was going up against to be with me.

I hadn't realized just how big a deal his job was.

No wonder he tried to break up with me.

No wonder he refused to marry me when I asked.

Jesse's grim smile returned to his face. "If that is your wish." His black wings spread out behind him a moment before he came at us.

Alarm shot through me.

His wings were bigger than Gabe's and I bet he had a whole lot more practice using them.

Desperate, I tried to think of a spell to stop him, but it was like my head was empty of any kind of enchantment.

Now was not the best time to realize that in the angel realm, supernatural power was no good.

Gabe pushed me out of the way before his wings spread and he leaped after Jesse.

The two angels impacted in midair.

It was like watching lightning fighting lightning as they grappled and punched, twisted and spun in a gravity-defying display of grace and power.

Jesse threw Gabe against the high ceiling, which exploded as he went tumbling up into the white sky.

A second later, Gabe managed to recover, then bulleted toward Jesse so fast he blurred.

Jesse dodged and caught hold of one of Gabe's wings.

"You will bow to me or you will die," he snarled, punching Gabe in the face.

Gabe's head snapped to the side and he fell, slamming into the floor in front of me.

"Gabe!" I shouted, going to him.

There was blood coming from his nose and his mouth, but he was already trying to move.

Jesse came through the hole, landing on Gabe's back and throwing another punch that sent Gabe flying against the far wall.

The smile never left Jesse's face.

It was like he was invincible.

He followed after Gabe, ramming a knee into his chest and slamming him to the ground. Then he was on him, fists flying as he hit Gabe over and over.

Blood was everywhere.

All of it Gabe's.

I'd never seen him bleed like he was at that moment and I knew Jesse intended to kill the love of my life and then kill me for defying him.

I had to do something to stop it.

"I'll leave," I said, trying to push Jesse off Gabe.

Jesse paused, his fist still cocked.

He looked at me.

There was a drop of Gabe's blood on his face and he wiped it away, rubbing it between his fingers.

There wasn't even a scratch on the archangel.

"Did I hear you correctly? You said you'll leave?" Jesse asked.

"That's right," I said, clasping my hands together as though in prayer. "I will leave and never come back and I will never go near Gabe again. Just please stop. He doesn't deserve any of this. He's served and helped and done all that was asked of him. That he loves me is my fault. I'm sure once I'm gone, he'll easily be able to forget about me and fall for Delphina." I was rambling, but without my magic, it was all I had.

"Cindy, no," Gabe muttered.

His eyes were purple and bloody and nearly sealed shut.

It was difficult to look at him, his face was so broken, but I met his eyes and nodded.

"It's all I can give," I said, before letting out a sob. "It'll be better this way."

"It won't. You and I - " His voice trailed off and his head fell to the side.

"But it's only a deal if Gabe lives," I added, lifting my chin.

Jesse laughed, the sound reverberating all around me. "If he dies, you have nothing to bargain with and I can kill you where you stand."

I didn't want to live without Gabe, but I didn't want to die either.

My hand went to my star necklace, but before I could touch it, Jesse was on me, his hands pinning my arms to my side and he walked us back until I was against the wall.

"Shall I just kill you now?" As he spoke, his hands went to my neck and he squeezed until dark spots clouded my vision.

"Please," I gasped, grabbing at his hands.

Suddenly he was flung away from me, his body smacking against another wall.

Gabe was on his feet somehow, his breathing heavy, his wings spread out behind him in their full glory.

It shocked me he'd only had his wings three days.

The way he used them, it was like he was born with them on his back.

Jesse laughed, using his wings to get himself upright.

"That was a mistake, boy." He flew at Gabe, his hands balled into fists.

A dark cloud appeared from above and Jesse's fists never connected with Gabe.

The darkness turned into two entities and they held Jesse where he was.

Fear slackened the anger on Jesse's face.

It looked like he wanted to talk but couldn't.

Features appeared in the twin mists as they became shapes.

Snow had told me about these two when she was with Silindra.

They were the Unknowns. They had created the vampires and dragons and probably the angels, which meant they were Jesse's bosses.

I wanted to gloat, but instead dropped to my knees.

Gabe was trying to get to me, but his body was wrecked, and he fell, cracking his head against the floor.

The Unknown with a certain feminine quality went over to Gabe. "You truly are one of the greatest chayot to ever live. That's saying something since you're only half." She gave him a kindly smile.

"The law keeping the chayot apart from other supernaturals is acceptable to us, but you and the witch are different. Certainly soulmates. As the creators of this world and everything in it, we can make changes to suit our purposes, especially when one such as yourself is willing to sacrifice everything, including your life, for the one you love." She touched his forehead and a blinding light shot from her body and into Gabe's.

He cried out, arching his back as though he were in agony before going still.

Somehow, he stayed on his feet.

"Gabe," I sobbed, still trying desperately to reach him, but unable to do so.

My eyes flicked to Jesse. The male Unknown held him fast and looked to be speaking to him, but I couldn't hear what was being said.

The female moved back over to the male Unknown as Gabe stood, his wings extending behind him.

They were still white, but the tips had turned black and gold.

What had she done to him?

"I understand," Jesse said, interrupting my thoughts.

The Unknowns merged together and no longer looked human in nature, but resembled a storm cloud.

It moved up and into a corner of the room, like a bat waiting for its prey.

Gabe eyed them before turning to Jesse. "I don't want to fight you, Jesse. Our quarrel is over. I am no longer a chayot and you are no longer my boss." Gabe held his arms at his sides loosely, as though waiting for Jesse to come at him again.

I blinked in confusion, trying to understand what just happened. If he was no longer a chayot, what was he? An archangel?

Jesse's shoulders relaxed and he moved to stand in front of Gabe. "Brother," he said, resting a hand on Gabe's shoulder. "I am sorry for the trouble I caused."

Gabe flinched, but relaxed immediately, resting an arm on Jesse's opposite shoulder. "All is forgiven, brother."

Jesse nodded and left the room.

"Gabe," I whispered, my eyes growing heavy. I couldn't keep them open.

Gabe ran to me and scooped me into his arms.

But before he could say anything the Unknowns were on us and my mind went dark.

A PROPOSAL

I TOSSED and turned and struggled to fight free of the haze. In my dream there had been an archangel and he and Gabe battled.

I sat up, looking around the room frantically.

It hadn't been a dream, but real.

Jesse had beaten Gabe to shreds, but the Unknowns appeared before Jesse could kill him, and they'd put me to sleep and -

My room in Sharra was just as I left it.

My costume still hung over my closet door, but my spelled calendar revealed it was Tuesday.

I'd been asleep nearly three days!

I went to my bedroom door, desperate to find Gabe, and noticed I was in pajamas.

"How the hell?" I ripped them off and threw on jeans and the first shirt I found before pulling on boots and rushing to the door.

Before I could open it, someone pounded from the outside. "Cindy! Open up, it's me."

I yanked the door open and threw myself into his arms.

"Gabe," I said, burying my face in his neck.

He growled, wrapping his arms around me as I clung to his hips with my legs.

"How are you here? What happened?" Tears streamed down my face as I touched him, checking for scratches or at least scars, but there wasn't anything new, almost like his fight with Jesse hadn't happened.

His face was still just as masculine and gorgeous as ever.

I wanted answers, but more than anything, I wanted him.

"Kiss me," I said.

His lips were on mine in an instant and together we stumbled to the bed, where he fell on top of me, his lips never leaving mine.

I didn't let him up for air, not that he wanted any.

He pushed open my mouth, deepening our kiss while his hands explored my face, my hair, my body.

I did the same, so happy to have him here with me.

Someone cleared their throat and we both looked over to see Snow standing next to the open door.

"I'd say sorry for interrupting, but you kind of deserve it," she said, trying to hold back a smile.

I burst into laughter.

How many times had I interrupted her and Dorian?

Gabe looked confused, but that was okay.

I would explain later.

He helped me stand. "Hey, Snow," he said, rubbing the back of his neck.

"What's up?" I asked, putting my hand in Gabe's. It might be a long time before I could be away from him.

"You are, for starters," she said and then cleared her throat. "It's about time, but I just came down to check on you. We were worried."

"Sorry about that." I looked at Gabe. "It wasn't a dream, was it?" I studied his eyes and knew the truth. "Are you an archangel now?"

He gave a brisk nod before a radiant smile overtook his face.

The brilliant joy radiating off him all but sparkled.

Now that I was paying attention, I noticed distinct differences in his body, but that smile told me the same Gabe rested within.

"Does Snow know?" I asked, knowing I would need all the details as soon as possible.

Gabe nodded. "Everyone does. And now we are free to be together forever and longer, my love." With those words, he got down on one knee.

"Wait, we are?" I knew the Unknowns had said something about Gabe and me being soulmates, but I still couldn't believe it was real.

"We are. Jesse and the others like him are no longer a problem, especially since I am no longer a chayot." He reached a hand into his pocket and pulled out a ring.

It was then I noticed he was on his knee. "What are you doing? What's happening?" My hands went to my cheeks as they grew warm.

He smiled as Dorian, Coco, and the rest of the teachers, including Kenmei - my dragon father - pushed their way into my little room.

Old Cindy would've been devastated that her hair wasn't perfect and that she wasn't wearing the perfect outfit. New Cindy - the new me - was just thrilled to be here.

"Cindy Croswell, will you do me the honor of becoming my wife?"

"Is that a proposal?" I asked. It was the same question he asked me in Pops' kitchen and Gabe smiled.

"Yes, it most certainly is." He winked and held out the ring, an enormous oval diamond solitaire surrounded by light blue gemstones.

It was beautiful.

I held out my hand.

It was shaking, not with nerves, but joy beyond anything I'd ever experienced before.

"Yes," I said, as he slid the ring on my finger.

He stood, pulling me into his arms and kissed me.

And kissed me. And kissed me.

Someone cleared their throat, but we didn't stop.

"I suggest we leave," Kenmei said, and I wasn't even embarrassed that my dad was watching me make out with the love of my life.

MUCH LATER, Gabe and I left my bedroom hand in hand and made our way to the cafeteria.

We were both starving.

After we got our food and sat down, Heather came over.

"Can I talk to you?" she asked.

The girl looked amazing, but I still felt guilty because I never checked on her like I promised.

"Sure," I said, glancing at Gabe, who nodded.

Heather and I went out into the hallway.

"You look good. How are you feeling?" I asked.

"Thank you. I'm alright. Heathcliff fixed me right up." She studied my face. "You look good too. Happy."

"I am." I looked down at my hands, not sure where to begin. "How's everything else?" I asked, knowing there was never a right time to have a hard conversation.

But I needed to do better with Heather.

She'd been through so much already and come out strong. I didn't want to fail her.

"Nothing's changed, except my attitude," she said, tucking her hands behind her back.

"Oh?" I met her eyes.

"Yep. See, I know there isn't magic right now that will permanently change me into the person I'm supposed to be, but if anyone can create the magic necessary, it's me." She lifted her chin and met my gaze and I sensed the newfound confidence in her.

"I believe that," I said. "And I'm so proud of you."

She shrugged. "Well, it's like you said. I need to be the change. I shouldn't wait around and hope someone else will come up with the solution. I need to educate myself and find a way."

I took her hands. "You are more mature than a lot of adults I know and I believe in you."

"Thank you, Miss Croswell." She hugged me tight. "And not just for saying that, but for everything."

I hugged her back. "Of course."

A WEDDING

"Are you ready?"

I glanced at my mom in the mirror's reflection.

"More than ready," I said, getting off the chair and adjusting my wedding dress.

White with a straight collar that went off my shoulders, it was glorious in its simplicity. The bodice hugged my curves and an enormous train trailed gracefully behind me.

My veil hung long from a small tiara Polly had placed around my head.

My mom cleared her throat, pushing me away. "You don't want to wrinkle your dress and I don't want to have you redo my makeup," she said, her eyes misty.

"Right." I glanced over her shoulder at Snow.

It wasn't that long ago that we'd been preparing her for her wedding.

Snow winked.

"Alright, well, I'll meet you out there. If we're not careful, your grandma will make a fuss over something and use her magic to get in a fight with one of the vampires. We don't need a blood-sucking war on your wedding day." Mom made a face before closing the door, leaving Snow and me alone.

"Can you believe it?" Snow fluffed my veil before taking my hand.

"It took a lot to get here. And there was a time when I didn't think it would ever happen." I couldn't stop the bliss bubbling up inside me.

"Can you believe I'm marrying an archangel?" It was weird to say and even weirder to think about.

Thankfully Gabe was much more relaxed after his transformation.

Archangels were supernaturals just as I was, and they could procreate, which was amazing since I wanted to have a little Gabe running around in the future.

Snow shook her head. "It blows my mind, but if anyone can handle an archangel, it's you." She laughed.

"It's time," the wedding planner said, knocking on the door as Jasmine flew in.

She moved past her mom and came right to me. "Thank you for letting me be your flower girl," she said, looking adorable in a blue dress cut specifically so as not to hinder her wings. She held a braided wood basket with blue and white rose petals.

"I wouldn't have it any other way," I said as she hovered, so we were eye level.

She brushed her fingers over my eyebrows and smiled like she knew all kinds of secrets but wasn't willing to share, then went to her mom.

The two of them spoke quietly before Jasmine winged her way to the door.

The light scent of the roses filled the room as a flurry of pixilettes, all dressed in blue, picked up my long train as well as my veil and fluttered behind me.

"We're ready," one of them said, and together with Jasmine leading the way, we went out and down the hall until we came to the opening that would lead into the outdoor chantry.

Snow kissed my cheek. "Thanks for letting me walk you down the aisle."

"There isn't another person in all the realms I would rather have." My dad was out of town, of course.

His job was a joke, but I still had plenty of family here.

Snow had asked if I wanted Abernathy to walk me down the aisle, but I didn't know whether he'd be healed enough to show.

He came though, and I was glad.

Currently, he appeared to be asleep on the grassy knoll to the left of the wedding party. His scales had nearly returned to their bright golden color as had his eyes.

My scars were gone as well.

When I looked in the mirror now, it was like the previous year never happened, but I still dreamed about it.

Sometimes I had nightmares.

At the thought I shuddered before pushing it away.

Today would be the best day of my life.

Leo sat next to my mom, holding my niece.

Beside her and filling out the rest of the row were all of my aunts and my grandmother. They beamed with excitement, especially my mom, and I thought maybe my mom would be a better grandmother than she was mother, though I couldn't complain.

Not after the way Mizrabel behaved.

I was grateful for one thing though.

Mizrabel showed me that while my mom wasn't perfect, she was the perfect mom for me.

She was all I'd needed.

As Snow and I walked down the aisle, I tried to take it all in.

The thousands of blue and white flowers, that were actually pixies and pixilettes, surrounding the arch where the elven minister stood. The white peonies and magical material draped over everything. As well as all of the floating candles.

To my left stood my sister Polly, looking beautiful and happy beside Quilla, who'd toned down her usual ensembles to a sky blue bridesmaid dress, though she still wore a matching blue painter's hat on her head, and under her pointy black shoes were blue and white striped stockings.

I had to smile as my gaze moved to Anna.

She was stunning in her blue dress, her wings fluttering lightly behind her and her hair done up and covered in matching flowers.

Last was Violet.

She also wore a blue bridesmaid dress that clashed only a little with her spots as her tail flicked back and forth behind her.

On her nose were her reading glasses, which I still swore must be held on by magic.

Seeing her eyes were wet with tears, I blinked, telling myself I wouldn't cry.

For the briefest moment I thought of Sera, wishing she could be here, but knowing it was far better for her in the prison realm.

There she couldn't hurt anyone and that was for the best.

She had accepted her fate, especially when I promised to return to visit as often as possible. Maybe, with time, she would be rehabilitated enough to leave the prison realm.

My eyes locked in on my husband-to-be.

Gabe was stunning in a black tux with a white shirt. His dark hair was cut short, letting his gorgeous face shine.

On his back were his enormous white wings, the tips glimmering in black and gold. He looked better than a superstar or even like he could be his own star.

Next to him was Dorian as well as the rest of the brothers.

All of them were handsome in their own way, but none could compare with the man of my dreams.

When Snow held out my hand and Gabe took it, I knew I was going to be the happiest witch in the world.

I had wanted a love like Snow and Dorian's, but as the minister spoke, and Gabe and I recited our vows, I realized it never would be.

Because Gabe and I weren't them.

We were us, and Gabe and I would make an incredible life together.

I knew that as surely as I knew my own name.

"Mr. and Mrs. Henry, I now pronounce you husband and wife. You may kiss your bride."

There were cheers in the crowd as Gabe and I sealed our happily ever after with true love's kiss.

SOME TIME LATER

I SLOWLY CIRCLED the dance floor, looking for trouble. It was the annual Spring Fling at the Seven Magics Academy, and I was one of the chaperones.

It still blew me away that I was older than the kids dancing. Somehow, I'd gone from a teenager to an adult. If asked, I would swear I was a high school student yesterday.

Someone squealed and I turned that direction.

Snow White's daughter, Jasmine stomped on her date's foot and moved toward the exit.

I debated going after her but knew the teen could take care of herself. She was a vampire created by the originals. She was unique in many ways. And her power?

I shuddered as memories of her as a child coursed through me. Her magic was stronger than anyone I'd ever encountered, including Kenmei or Abernathy.

A wave of guilt rushed over me.

"Hi Cindy," Professor Pops said.

"Hey, Pops." I swallowed, working to forget what I'd done to Jasmine.

He patted me on the back. "How's Gabe treating you?"

"Really good. He's around here somewhere."

Pops nodded. "I'll look for him. There's something he and I need to discuss."

I smiled. It probably had to do with their fantasy football teams. The two of them had gotten into watching professional football a couple seasons ago. They seemed to have fun talking about the players. Plus, it was an excuse for them to be together. "See you Sunday night for the game?" I asked.

"Yes, you will." He squeezed me lightly and continued in the opposite direction.

I returned my gaze to where Jasmine and her date had been, but they were both gone.

The guilt returned with a vengeance.

When Jasmine found out what I'd done, would she ever forgive me?

SPRING FLING DANCE

"YOU'RE MINE," I whispered, tracking the hottest guy in all the realms with my eyes.

He didn't attend the Seven Magics Academy. I knew that for sure because I knew everyone.

Maybe he was new?

"Say what, Jasmine?" Jennifer Flora had been giving me a play-by-play on how she turned rock into stardust during spells class when I saw him.

"Nothing. Sorry." I cleared my throat, tucking some hair behind my ear as I clutched my hands together. "Why don't you go back to the dance? I'll meet you inside later," I said, taking off after the guy.

"Sure," she responded but I was already heading down the hall, hoping to catch sight of him again.

As an original vampire, stalking was as easy as breathing, especially since the Seven Magics Academy was my home and had been from the beginning.

Even when it was still just an expansive castle and not a school for the supernatural.

I peered around the corner and he came into view.

Thick blond hair, dazzling eyes, lean muscle for days and tall.

Over six feet.

I wanted to know everything about him and I tuned in, using my vampire hearing. He spoke with someone about recruiting supernaturals for the Seven Magics Academy.

"Jasmine," Jonathon called.

My effing date was still a ways back.

"Gross," I hissed, and used my vampire speed to run away from him, momentarily losing sight of Hot Guy.

The annual Spring Fling dance was supposed to be fun. I'd agreed to go with Jonathon Mayfield, a recent addition to the school because he was good looking.

That had been a mistake. He was half troll and totally handsy.

When he'd grabbed my butt during a slow song, I stomped on his foot, leaving him standing in the middle of the dance floor.

Now, as I hurried away from Jonathon, I ran smack into someone.

It was Hot Guy.

"Whoa, where's the fire, Jasmine?" He took me in swiftly, surprised admiration on his face.

"How the hell did you do that?" I gauged my bearings as tingles raced along my arms. "And how do you know my name?"

He chuckled and it was damn sexy. "There aren't a lot of vampires with wings in the world. It was an easy deduction."

"And the speedy travel - "

"Jasmine. Babe. There you are," Jonathon said. Sweat had his dark hair sticking to his forehead. He sauntered over like he owned the castle and me.

My shoulders tensed. Jon may be a boorish troll, but I was a vampire and would beat his ass if he didn't lay off.

"I am not your babe, idiot." I scowled, extending my fangs. "If you don't get the hell away from me, I'll make you my late night snack."

Sure there would be consequences if I drank from the guy, but I was a princess.

The king and queen's only child.

There wasn't much I couldn't get away with under the right circumstances.

"Come on, babe. I just wanted to have a little fun." He licked his lips like I hadn't just threatened him.

Yeah, the dude was egotistical.

"I didn't give you permission to grab my ass. So, it seems your idea of fun and mine are completely different."

Hot Guy rested a hand on my shoulder as he came to stand directly behind me. "What's your name?" His breath warmed my neck and I shivered.

"Jon. What's it to you?" Jon had the audacity to cross his bulky arms.

"Well, Jon, you must be new. Because Jasmine here isn't just any vampire, she's an original. Not only that. She's the queen's daughter. And I would be well within my rights to end you this very moment and not think twice about it." Hot Guy wasn't as big as Jonathon, but I had no doubt he could do what he said.

"That isn't how you treat your date." I heard his teeth grind together.

Jonathon straightened to his full six feet five inches. "Is that right?" he blustered.

A low growl ruptured from the back of Hot Guy's throat.

There was about to be a fight. Unless I stepped in.

"Goodnight Jon."

I shrugged off Hot Guy's hand and even though I wanted to stay and learn more about him, I moved away down the hall, hoping to defuse the situation.

After a few steps, I turned back. "Thank you for taking me to the dance, Jon." My mom would be proud I remembered my manners.

As I spoke, I lifted the material of my aqua floor length dress and curtsied while making a face, before glancing at Hot Guy who watched us both with slight amusement.

Jon laughed. "It was not my pleasure, princess. You're an uptight and whiney bitch." He stomped away like a bull in a pen, knocking into the wall a few times as he went.

When Jon was out of earshot, I dared to look at Hot Guy. "That was fun," I said, not wanting to go now that Jon was gone.

In fact I wondered if I should ask this guy if he wanted to return to the dance with me.

Hot Guy tucked his hands in his pockets, flashing his muscles. "I have no doubt you could've taken him." He gave me a wry smile.

At the twinkle in his eyes, there came a glimmer of recognition. "Have we met before?" I asked.

"No, but your grandfather, my adoptive father told me all about you." He waited for me to catch on.

"Pops told you about me?" My grandfather used to adopt young men who were human and supernatural but struggling to make it in the human realm.

That was before the Seven Magics Academy came into being.

He adopted my dad a long time ago.

With Hot Guy in front of me, it seemed Pops started taking in new sons again.

Not that my grandfather couldn't handle himself.

He was also a vampire and had even been a hunter at one point.

My grandfather knew how to fight.

It was upsetting my parents didn't see fit to tell me about the Hot Guy though.

But I shouldn't be surprised.

My parents kept most things about the human realm from me. Everything thing I knew, I learned from Aunt Cindy or one of my dad's brothers.

"The one and only," he said, his smile growing. "He took me in a few years ago." There was gratitude and even love in his expression.

No surprise there either. Pops was the dearest man.

"Are you going to school here?" I asked, hopeful.

"I already did. Graduated three years ago." He used air quotes as he spoke.

"Oh." I tried to hide my disappointment, but it didn't work. That was probably why he looked familiar. "I don't remember seeing you."

He shrugged. "I only went for the last semester of one year after graduating early from my high school." He paused and then continued. "In the human realm."

"I know," I said, though I really didn't.

He continued, "Pops thought it would do me good to be around other supernaturals for a few months before I started recruiting them for the school." He shrugged again. "The Academy was fine, but I kept to myself."

"That makes - " I began but was interrupted by my mom.

"There you are. Come on. The meeting is this way." She wore her long dark hair up in a braided bun, her crown situated atop her head perfectly.

She wore a burgundy dress that perfectly matched her lips.

I faced her as she spoke, swallowing. "Hey, Mom. We were just talking." I don't know why I always felt like I was doing something wrong when she was around.

Maybe it was her serious face.

"It's fine, Jasmine. But why don't you go back to the dance." She studied my dress. "Or better yet, go to bed. It's late and you will be in attendance at the meetings tomorrow." She gave me a pointed look.

I curtsied again even though I wanted to stomp my foot and through a tantrum. I hated meetings. "Very well."

She waited a moment before heading back the way she came.

When we were alone in the hall once again, he flashed his white teeth. "Maybe I'll see you around," Hot Guy said.

"Yep." I watched him go, wishing I would've asked his name. By the time I decided I would, he was gone.

HEAVY CATERPILLAR

MONDAY MORNING, I woke, climbed out of bed and stretched my wings, showered, dressed, and then flew out my window to explore Sharra with my best friend, Abrea.

It was our usual ritual and my favorite time of day, like life stretched itself awake.

All was peaceful and filled with possibilities.

Abrea and I helped a fairy lift a particularly heavy caterpillar onto the branch it intended to use as a home for its chrysalis.

We also assisted an elderly troll in his desperate quest to reach some juicy berries at the top of a rather large tree.

Now we were seated on the stone ledge at the top of the turret closest to my room watching the sun finish its rise.

"Jasmine. Come inside. We have a lot to do today." My mom stuck her head and shoulders out my window near the top of the castle, searching for me. I stifled a laugh as I watched her head turn from side to side. She wouldn't find me though, because I sat directly above her.

I sighed heavily. "Fine."

My mom gasped and cracked her head on the top of the window. "You scared the light right out of me." She clutched a hand to her head and went back inside.

"Sorry." I tried to sound genuine as I rolled my eyes. "But really, you should get your vampire powers checked out. That you didn't sense me is surely a sign of old age." Of course she was older than me but by how much, I didn't know. She still looked the same age as me.

Abrea covered her mouth, trying not to laugh.

"Uh-huh. Inside, please." She was good at placating the situation without rising to my taunts.

But instead of obeying, I spread my large black wings and shot into the sky, enjoying the sweet flower scented air.

"Young lady." The words were sharp, but I ignored them. My mom always called me that when I frustrated her.

Still, I turned to see the emotion on her face in order to gauge just how upset she was, but she no longer stood in the window. "One more flight around the castle?" I stretched my wings wide, allowing the morning sun to warm them.

"Your mom seems pretty serious," Abrea said.

"Whose side are you on?" I asked, slowing down so she could catch up.

"Yours, of course." She stuck out her tongue. Her voice was barely above that of a tingling bell, but while my mom's vampire powers might be on the fritz, mine weren't.

"Good." We went higher, circling the enormous castle and the gardens beyond. Part of the landscape was immersed in shadow.

When we neared the forest behind the castle, I studied the pixilettes busying themselves. They were in charge of the seasons. Soon it would be autumn and they needed to gather seedlings to store until the following spring.

"Will you drink unicorn blood today?" Abrea asked, her little pixilette wings fluttering near my ear. She was dressed from head to toe in different tones of purple. Her dress was the color of lilacs and her tiny shoes were the shade of ripened plums. Lavender wings beat and fluttered at her back.

If Abrea weren't my best friend, I would've told her it was none of her business whose blood I drank. But she and I were close for more than ten years. We did everything together. Without her, I'd go crazy.

"I don't know." I spun in a circle, enjoying the gentle breeze on my face. Unicorn blood was my favorite, but I took what I was given based on offerings from the different magics within Sharra.

Abrea shook. It freaked her out that I was a blood drinker.

"Don't worry. I'm sure your blood is much too sweet for my tastes." I winked to let her know I was teasing.

She giggled nervously, the sound like tinkling bells. "I'm not worried," she replied. I could tell it was only a little lie. She glanced away, running her tiny fingers through her violet hair that was the same color as my eyes.

I waved off my irritation. There were plenty of vampires in Sharra. They all drank blood, just like me, but only the blood of animals like deer and antelope.

Plus, the vampires never killed them.

It was one of the first laws my mom, the new Vampire Queen decreed when she became ruler.

As the only original vampire, I required more than the others. In order to grow and thrive, I required the blood of magical creatures.

It powered my magic and kept me healthy.

Early morning sunlight broke through the clouds, basking the land in orange and pink hues. Warmth tickled my skin and I lifted my face toward the light.

"Can you hang out today after school?" Abrea asked, interrupting my thoughts. She went to the Academy too, but we didn't have any classes together.

"I'm sure I can." I held out my hand. Abrea flew forward, landing on my palm. "I'll find you - "

"Jasmine!" Her shout reached all the way on the side of the castle. Vampire hearing. It was a thing.

I jerked back at the sharpness in my mom's voice, knocking over Abrea. She tumbled through the air for the briefest moment until she righted herself.

"What the cherries, Jasmine?" she said, adjusting her dress.

"Sorry, my mom is in a mood. I better get back."

Abrea gulped. She had every reason to fear my mom.

"Coming, Snow," I retorted with sarcasm, rolling my eyes again.

"If she heard that, you're going to be in big trouble for that, princess." Abrea tried to smile, but it didn't quite happen.

I tried to be brave. "Nah." I lifted my chin. "But I better go."

"Yeah, you should." She waved and then took off toward the forest.

I watched her until she nearly reached the other pixilettes. Then I beat my wings hard against the air to hurry back to my window. Once I was back, I landed, folding my wings and jumping inside.

Mom had her hands on her hips. "Hey, mom." I rushed past her toward the bathroom.

She fluffed a pillow, a scowl on her ferociously beautiful face.

Her sleek black hair was the exact color of mine.

This morning it was pulled back in a tight bun.

I called it her work hair. She wore a bright yellow gown trimmed in red and blue. On her head was her crown and it twinkled in the light.

"How many times have I asked you not to call me Snow?" She followed after me, her skirt swishing with each step.

Crap, she heard.

I looked to Ciana, the vampire who helped raise me, but she sat in her rocking chair, knitting something.

She looked to be in her early twenties, but from stories she told me of when she was human, she was probably three hundred, give or take a decade.

Ciana wore her long blonde hair in a bun on the crown of her head. Her dress was long and looked confining.

She owned the same dress in three colors, brown, gray, and navy blue. The dress accentuated her tiny waist.

When I was younger, she was so full of life. We always had fun together doing little things like chasing butterflies, planting seeds, and digging up worms.

Of course I never ate the food, but my dad did, and I enjoyed doing things for him with Ciana.

In the last few years, Ciana's demeanor changed. She grew despondent.

At first, I tried to make her happy, but nothing helped, so I stopped.

Still, Ciana was loyal, a great find in Sharra, and I wouldn't dismiss her.

"Jasmine, did you hear me? I don't like it when you call me Snow." Mom's words brought me up short and my wings fluttered spastically.

I glanced back at her. "It's your name, isn't it? You're Snow White, the Vampire Queen." I forced myself not to make a face and sat at the chair in front of my vanity.

OceanofPDF.com

MY MOM'S stern expression softened as I watched her reflection. "Most importantly, I'm your mother." She leaned down, our heads side by side and she squeezed my shoulders. Her eyes sparkled with love. I studied the two of us together, once again astonished by our similarities.

We both had black hair, though mine had a streak of teal in it

The shape of our faces were the same as well as our high cheekbones.

Our lips had the same sort of thickness and we were the same height.

There were differences too.

Her eyes were an unusual color, reflecting the various hues within the spectrum of the seven magics while mine were always violet.

My skin was naturally tanner than hers.

And then, of course, there was the huge difference between us. I had wings, obnoxiously large wings that protruded from my back like those of a giant black bird.

The worst part was they never went away. Like fairies' wings did. I had them on my back at all times - no matter what.

Sometimes I longed to sleep on my back, but I couldn't without pain. Clothing was an issue too. My wings needed to go. If I didn't have them, I knew I would be happy.

Mom tilted her head and I knew she was wondering what I was thinking.

I relaxed my features hoping to make it unreadable.

Although she and my dad weren't my parents in the traditional sense that I didn't come from my mother's womb, they were my mom and dad.

I was born from a gem created by their blood and the combination of the seven magics. My parents told me it was their love for each other that brought me from the gem.

Sometimes, especially when I assisted my mom with the birth of an animal, it made me sad to realize I wasn't born the same way, that I was different from every other known creature.

My mom and dad always tried their best to make me feel wanted and loved, and most of the time I did.

But sometimes I felt like the freak that I was.

I knew Silindra and Sharra's story.

I would never admit it, but I could relate with Sharra.

"There are several meetings you must attend today after school so hurry, please. I want to make sure you've fed before we start." Mom left the bathroom and went back into my room.

"Okay." I dabbed some perfume my uncle Heathcliff brought for me from the human world. The smell was warm and sweet, and I loved it. Almost as much as I loved getting the magazines and music that Uncle Sebastian gave me. It was always my favorite day when one of my uncles or Professor Pops visited.

"Jasmine," my mom snapped, her patience wearing thin.

I put the lid back on the perfume and glanced at my mom. It was her fault I was like this. If she would let me go into the human realm - even on Halloween. But she didn't trust me. I wanted to ask her why. Why she thought I would pounce on the first warm-blooded creature I encountered. Sure, it was a problem when I was little. My hunger would take over and more than once I sank my fangs into something or someone I shouldn't. But that was years ago. Couldn't she see I was no longer a child but a grown woman. In a few weeks I would turn eighteen. Could I use some blood? Yes. Was I at the point where I would kill for it? Not even close. I squeezed some lotion on my hands and rubbed it into my arms. My mom seemed to be getting more and more irritated.

Zenny appeared in the mirror and clapped his hands together. "My two most favorite vampires."

"Zenny. Good morning." Mom bobbed a hello. "Jasmine is going to be late for school. Can you make it quick?"

"Hey Zen," I said, ignoring my mom. "Way to rock plaid and polka-dots."

He crossed his arms and popped a hip. "You know it." Then he said to my mom, "Your highness, I will be super-fast."

I covered the smile trying to wriggle its way from my lips with my hand.

Zenny lived in the castle's mirrors and assisted me with my hair and makeup. He always wore crazy outfits that somehow totally worked on him. Today he had on navy blue and orange plaid pants. They were tight and stopped just above his ankles. His shoes were orange as was his button down shirt, which was covered in small navy polka dots. The collar was up, and he had a white t-shirt underneath. His hair was cropped short and just as bright orange as his shoes.

"Never mind, Zenny. I've already picked out her uniform combination and her makeup - "

I frowned, unhappy my mom thought it was okay to choose what I wore. "I want him here. Why don't you go? I'll meet you in the dining hall in a few minutes."

Her face fell. "If you wish."

Guilt tore through my insides. I knew my mom meant well. And while it wasn't her intention to be annoying and bossy, she kind of was. All the time.

She walked to the bathroom doorway and paused. "Please wear what I chose. It's put together and waiting in your closet."

I bit back a retort. "I guess," I said.

My mom looked at me, her eyes sad and filled with frustration. My heart lurched. I knew I was letting her down somehow. Again. Like always.

She came back and gently touched my wings. "Why don't you have Zenny help you fluff and clean these?" She ran her fingers through the dark feathers, her touch soothing.

"Okay," I said, catching her gaze in the mirror and trying to smile. I didn't like it when we fought. But for the last several months we were at such odds over everything. It seemed no matter how I tried we didn't click like we used to. Lately she focused more on what I was required to do as the princess of Sharra and less on what I needed as a teenage girl still attending school.

If it weren't for my uncles bringing me the latest news in the form of entertainment magazines from the human world, I would be miserable. It just felt like my mom didn't understand. I had needs, desires, goals - I wanted a life outside the castle. Outside of Sharra. And my wings? Ugh. Why did I have to be the only vampire in the entire world to have them? My life was difficult, and my mom just didn't get it.

When I got to school, I had to contend with gossip of the worst kind. Jon tried to start a rumor saying he and I went a lot further than we did. Because ewwww. We didn't go anywhere, and we wouldn't be. Abrea told me she heard some students talking about it. During lunch, I determined to shut his crap down immediately. While I sat with my friends, I waited for Jon. He came in laughing and joking with a couple of guys. They weren't my favorite. Leave it to jerks to be drawn to jerks. One was a vampire. The other a fairy.

FIGHT MY BATTLES

As I watched them, I thought about how things changed since my mom became the vampire queen. Originally, male vampires were all hunters or drones who travelled into the human realm to mark possible future bodies for the vampire queen. Sharra gave them a portion of her magic so they could walk in the sunlight. They could only be killed by removing the heart. With female vampires or workers, they could be killed more easily by either the sun or a stake through the heart.

But since my mom came into power, she gave every vampire some of her blood. Now a portion of her magic flowed through each of them. Male and female. There were no more hunters, except Christopher. There haven't been for a long while. With that magic came some additional changes. Like the fact that killing a vampire now required their heart be ripped from their chest. It was gruesome, but fact.

As an original, no one knows how to kill me or even if I can be killed. Like the old originals, I came right from the seven magics. No diluted DNA or blood. That knowledge always gave me a bit of a rush, but so far, I hadn't tested any theories.

The guys travelled along the outer wall of the lunchroom toward me. As they went, the room became quiet and all eyes rested of me. Like they expected me to do something. The guys looked around, seemingly bewildered. When they saw me, they stopped, letting Jon continue on his own. Real courageous friends.

Jon's eyes found mine and they widened. I'm sure he saw murder reflected back at him because that was what I felt. I held his gaze as I flew over, hands on my hips. I probably looked like my mother, but I was too mad to care. It was all I could do to keep my fangs in check.

When I was close enough, I slapped his face so hard to swung to the right. My hand imprinted on his face and turned bright red. "Don't you ever lie about me again."

"Or what, pretty princess?" He rubbed his fingers over the cheek I slapped as fury spread across his features. "You going to run and tell your mommy?" He looked around the room.

A few people snickered. Mostly though, the room remained deathly still.

"You're new so I'll make this clear. My mom may be the queen, but I don't need her to fight my battles," I said, balling my hands into fists as my fangs pressed against the inside of my mouth. An image or a memory sparked across my mind. I was much younger and speaking with Aunt Cindy. Then I was alone on a road and talking to Christopher. That one shocked me more than the one with my aunt. She and I spoke many times, though I didn't remember that moment. Christopher on the other hand? He was off limits. The memory of him and I on the road and talking wasn't familiar. Clearing my throat, I shook the oddity away.

"You're a big talker for such a little thing. Must be those enormously awkward wings." His words lanced my heart. He saw it and leered. "I was doing you a favor by asking you out. Obviously, no one else wants to date a freak."

The blow hit me to my core. No one ever spoke to me like that.

Maybe there were whispers behind my back, but as the king and queen's daughter, I was naturally popular and never had a want of friends.

"You don't know what you're talking about," I said, but the fire escaped me, and I deflated.

He rose up to his full height and came in close, taking my arm.

In a quiet voice, he went on. "I've dealt with entitled brats like you my whole life. You may have fangs and stupid wings, but you're nothing except a puppet who can't do anything for herself." Then he stepped back and walked away.

I rocked on my heels, ashamed.

Was that how everyone saw me?

Was that the real reason I wanted to be ordinary?

More than ever, I wanted to leave Sharra and all of the supernatural behind. I wanted to know what ordinary felt like. Probably way better than this hot mess.

Without my wings and my fangs I wouldn't be a freak. I could just be me. Swallowing down my embarrassment, I went back to my table.

My friends kept their eyes down.

Except Abrea.

"Don't even worry about that brute," she hissed in my ear. "When he wakes in the morning, he's going to be in for a big surprise. And it will be coming out of his nose."

"Thanks, Abrea, but don't do anything that will get you into trouble. He means nothing to me." I tried to smile and act like everything was fine, but it was impossible. Jon got to me big time and I hated to admit it.

After school, I went to meetings. My mom made me because she said someday I might be queen. They were boring. Listening to the magical creatures of Sharra complain about how so-and-so stole a piece of fruit off their land and asking my mom what she was going to do about it was beyond tedious. I wanted to see a movie. I wanted to go to regular high school. I wanted to attend football games, and maybe kiss a boy or two. That didn't seem like too much to ask. I was almost eighteen and my life was passing me by.

It wasn't fair.

Both my parents attended regular high school. They lived an ordinary life for years before coming to Sharra. Why couldn't I be given the same consideration?

After meetings, I went up to my room and did homework on Physics of Plasma. As I got ready for bed, my dad knocked. "Hang on." I pulled my pajamas over my head and ran to the door. "Hi," I said opening it before going back over to my desk.

"Hey, sweetie. How's my girl?" He kissed my cheek.

"I'm too old for that," I said with pretend haughtiness, trying to act sullen. My dad didn't have to attend meetings. I really didn't know what he did all day.

He tapped the end of my nose with his finger. "Never."

My mom bustled in as well.

"Sheesh, I guess everyone is invited." I tucked my book away and faced them just in time to watch my dad take my mom into his arms and kiss her deeply a moment.

I knew my mouth hung open, though it shouldn't. They were pros at public displays of affection. When he lifted her, she gave him a secret smile.

"Gross," I said, turning away to hide my smile. It was actually sweet, but I wouldn't give them the pleasure of knowing that was how I felt. "Goodnight," I said, shutting off the light. "I'm going to bed."

"Night," Mom said.

"Night sweetie," Dad added before closing the door.

I heard them talking as they went down the hall to their bedroom.

Lying there on my stomach, I knew it was a moment just like theirs from a moment ago that I craved. I wanted to love and be loved by someone the way they so obviously loved each other. That wasn't going to happen in Sharra. According to Jon, no one wanted me. I was a freak.

The word echoed over and over in my mind as I tried to sleep. It was the word I secretly called myself. Like Jon saw into my soul and ripped out the part of me that was the most sensitive.

I punched my pillow, wishing I could have what I wanted and drifted off to sleep.

DESTROY ALL

"BREAKFAST. FIVE MINUTES," my dad said as he knocked on my door.

"Huh?" I forgot to set my alarm, but usually didn't need it. Pushing myself out of bed, I stumbled over to the window. I was late. Abrea probably wondered what happened to me.

"Jasmine?" My dad knocked again.

"I'm up. Thanks!" I needed to hurry but pushed open the window instead. As I stared aimlessly out at the landscape, I thought of the dream.

Two entities had been speaking and their words filled my mind like they were within. Or, maybe I'd somehow traveled into their minds.

"THE VAMPIRE CHILD is not performing as expected. She doesn't care about her destiny or the fate of her kind. She's a total disappointment." He slithered his body around the vast darkness that was everywhere and nowhere. The inkiness seemed to expand and contract, like breathing, around them.

"There is always our first inclination." She glided beside him, producing an orb of light, just big enough so they could see each other. Not that it was necessary, but she liked the way it shimmered.

"Destroy all magical creatures and start over?" he asked.

She came up beside him. Their eyes locked for several seconds or days. Time meant nothing. "They are ours to do with as we please. Why not?" she finally added.

He sighed. "I'm tired."

She bobbed in agreement. "Perhaps we should sleep for a few thousand years. The way these creatures are, we won't miss anything."

"I like the sound of that. But first - " He trailed off.

"You want to watch her fail." It was a statement and I heard the joyous anticipation in her voice.

"Yes. It shouldn't take too long."

"Right." She blinked slowly. "Especially if we help her along and I have the perfect solution. Let's make her lose everything."

His mouth curved into a cruel smile. "I like the sound of that."

AS I CAME BACK to myself, I shuddered.

What did they mean? And what or who were they? If they were talking about me, then what was the point of the conversation? Why let me see it?

Unless, for some reason, I wasn't supposed to.

Still reeling, I went into the bathroom to get ready.

In my chair, I applied some black eyeliner.

It was a little too heavy for my mom's tastes, but then she rarely wore makeup. It was Aunt Cindy who showed me how to apply it the way humans did.

Mom came in to check on me. "Jasmine, you aren't ready yet?"

"I just woke up," I said, trying to keep my voice even.

My mom grimaced at my reflection.

"What?" I asked, holding the liner like a pencil in my right hand.

She leaned over and kissed the top of my head. "I love you, darling."

"I know, mom."

And I did. I knew she and my dad both did.

Regardless of our uncomfortable conversations or lack thereof.

There was no doubt they loved me very much.

Dad appeared and I gritted my teeth.

"Hey sweet daughter, you ready to conquer your day?" He gave me a loving smile and I couldn't help but return it.

"As ready as rainbows," I responded.

He'd been asking the same question since I was five and I'd been responding the same since then too.

I was probably too old now, but I didn't mind.

"Do you think after the meetings today, I could go with Uncle Heathcliff to his lab. He said I could help him and then he'd take me to a movie. He promised he could hide my wings easily and that - "

My dad came over and squeezed my shoulders. "Honey, you know that's a bad idea. If anyone were to find out about your wings, about what you are, all sorts of bad things could happen. It's against the law for supernaturals to live in the human realm."

My shoulders sagged. They gave me the same lame excuses many times before.

"Whatever." I shrugged off his hands and bushed on some blush.

"Love you, Jasmine," he said and they both left.

After they were gone, I let my head smack against the counter before gazing at my reflection. My enormous wings hovered above my head. Freak, I thought.

Zenny cleared his throat. "Those two. Such a love story."

His hands were clasped together at his chest. It looked like he had tears in his eyes.

"So you gonna fluff my wings or what?" I asked, standing and turning around.

"Oooh, snappy." He clapped his hands twice and a machine like a blow dryer popped from the wall and worked on my wings.

When they were finished, I put my hair in a low side ponytail and placed my crown on my head.

"Perfect," Zenny said. "Use the rose colored lip-gloss, it'll really make your lips pop.

I applied it, rubbed my lips together, and ran a powder brush over my nose.

"So very beautiful." Zenny exhaled.

"Thanks." I walked to my closet and shimmied into my uniform. Instead of wearing the shoes I was supposed to, I chose the black combat boots Uncle Gabe got me for my last birthday. Finished, I turned in the mirror. The skirt was too long, and I rolled it once at the waist. I had nice legs. Might as well show them off. Then I stretched my wings wide to make sure they wouldn't catch on anything.

"You're magnificent," Zenny said, appearing in the full-length mirror.

I couldn't help but blush. "They are annoying," I said, referring to my wings.

"They. Are. Amazing," Zenny argued good-naturedly.

"Fine. Keep saying that. But you aren't the one that has to deal with them. Sleep with them. Shower with them - They are a nuisance." Which wasn't entirely true. I did love flying. There was no better feeling. At least not one I experienced yet. But that was the only good thing about my wings.

"It's worth it. You're unique and glorious. Never forget that."

I huffed. "Easy for you to say."

Freak!

The word flashed through my mind and I ground my teeth.

Zenny waved his hand. "Yes, it is."

I chewed on the inside of my lip, trying to ignore my annoyance. It was hard though. No one understood what I went through. No one got it, which was why I wanted more than anything to be normal - even if that meant being just an ordinary vampire - one without wings.

"You sure you want to wear those boots?" Zenny asked, interrupting my internal grumblings.

I studied them in the mirror. "Yep!" In Sharra, our clothes were created with magic. Not my boots. They were magic free.

Zenny sighed heavily. "If you say so."

I winked, studying myself one more time. I had to admit aside from my wings, I looked good.

"Jasmine?" Zenny asked. He wasn't a fan of my boots any more than my mom.

"Gotta go. Thanks for your help." I blew him a kiss and walked from the closet into my room.

Ciana had come in and sat in her usual place, kitting. "Why don't you do something fun today." I came to stand in front of her.

"Is that an order?" The words were harsh, but she asked calmly enough.

"No, of course not." I sighed, leaned in and kissed her cheek. "See ya."

WANT MORE LAND

SCHOOL WAS MORE of the same.

Except Jon seemed to have grown an overabundance of nose hair during the night.

I secretly high-fived my best friend.

"Good one," I said, remembering Abrea promised to do something to him.

After classes were done, I went to my rooms and changed into a teal gown with Zenny's help.

Rushing as quickly as a princess was allowed, I made it to the meeting just in time, sliding into the seat next to my mom.

She looked over disapprovingly since I was supposed to be early, but whatever.

At the moment, I was doing my best not to fall asleep. The troll leader, Geth had a rather monotone voice.

"We will continue to supply blood for the princess as you ordered, but we want more land," Geth growled.

We were all seated around a large round table in the Great Hall. A glittering chandelier hung above giving off an ambient glow. The room was lined in gilded wood and pictures of previous royalty from the seven magics hung precisely along the walls. I admired the newest. The soul of the fairy realm. Her name was Aurora. We met a couple of times. She was nice.

Someone cleared their throat and I searched the faces at the table. A representative from each of the seven magics was there, as well as several sub species. Christopher was even there. My parents had a history with the last remaining hunter, I knew that. He betrayed my mom at one point when she was eighteen, but over the years they came to an understanding. They weren't friendly with one another, and I could tell my dad barely tolerated him. When I was twelve, Christopher was brought before the council to discuss his place among the species. Most wanted him dead, but it was my mom who explained it was imperative all seven magics be represented in order for Sharra to survive. That included Christopher.

He gave off a certain arrogance. Occasionally I caught him watching me. A few years ago Mom decided to put him in charge of vampires. If one of them stepped out of line, that vampire was punished, but so was Christopher. I didn't know how, but I did know it was a rule. My mom and dad discussed it more than once over the years.

He also submitted the blood offerings required. Same as the others. But my mom wouldn't allow me to drink it. I didn't know what she did with it. Maybe it was still in the coolers beneath the castle. More likely she threw it out. Seemed like a waste, but I didn't know all the details.

As though he realized I was thinking about him, Christopher gave a half smile.

I returned it.

Mom noticed and narrowed her eyes before she responded to Geth. "If we give you more land, others will expect the same kind of provision. Then we would run out of room."

Geth slammed his fist on the table. "It's bad enough my family is required to live in Sharra, but now we're beyond crowded. Something must be done. We have no room!"

I jumped at the fury in his voice, my wings twitching nervously. As far as my taste buds were concerned, I would be fine if the trolls stopped supplying me with blood. It tasted disgusting. I drank it though because it increased my strength and agility.

It certainly made sense they wanted more land. The trolls were large creatures. They built on as well as below the earth, but they could always use more. After Sharra died, my mom created many realms for the creatures of the seven magics, though there were already dozens that existed outside Sharra's knowledge. Like the fairy realm.

All the creatures of the seven magics had at least one realm now. Many went to the human realm, too - at first. After a few years, humans no longer wanted them around. The government worked with the chayot to expel them all or imprison them or even kill them. Now it was against the law for supernatural creatures to live in the human realm, though some broke the rules - like my grandfather.

Edinia, the elven leader, spoke up. "We could all use more space, Geth. We elves live longer, and our procreation process is much easier than your kind. Our family is also becoming overwhelmed."

"We don't have the luxury of going below the earth," Kerra, the unicorn leader added. "Trolls have twice the land we do already." She whinnied, though she was in her human form, and stomped her foot to enhance her words.

"What do you suggest?" my dad asked. He rarely spoke up during these meetings, but when he did everyone listened.

"That our Queen take some of the pixilette land and gives it to us." Geth stood, but one look from my mom and the troll immediately sat back down.

I knew she would never agree to that. But I had an idea. "What if we let you live in your own realms instead of requiring you to stay?"

"I would agree to that," Geth muttered.

My mom patted my hand as though trying to appease a stupid child.

I pulled away, irritated.

"I appreciate Jasmine's interest in this important matter," my mom began. "But you must remain as the blood offering from each of the seven is required and was agreed upon. You chose this, agreed to this, and you will need to get by with what you have here in Sharra." Her features remained clear, but she was stoic and refused to break.

I felt bad for them. They had to remain in Sharra because of me. I required their blood offerings.

"What if we made sure an offering was contributed each week?" Geth still sounded like he might spit nails.

My mom tilted her head. "I don't know if that would work, Geth, though it is something to consider." There was a glimmer in her eyes as though she were thinking through all scenarios, her eyes still locked on Geth. She appeared to be in good spirits, but I'd seen the look before. Geth was close to crossing the line and my mom wouldn't have it.

Geth glowered. It was obvious he found me annoying. "Any other brilliant ideas?" he asked, his gave flicking to me.

I lifted my chin, forcing the nervous flutter of my wings to stop. I wouldn't cower to the troll. Or to anyone. "You'll be the first to know when I do."

"Do not belittle my daughter, Geth," my dad said. "Unless you wish to deal with me directly."

The troll huffed but backed down. "No, your highness. I'm sorry. I didn't mean anything by it," Geth said.

No one messed with my dad. His power was less understood than my mom's, but I had a feeling if he used the power of the seven magics within him, he could destroy realms.

When I was three, I drank poisoned fairy blood. It made me sick. For a while my mom and dad thought I would die. But as my dad rocked me, I bit into his hand and drank from him. Usually he and my mom discouraged that. They didn't want me biting anyone. It was better if I drank my blood from a glass like a civilized vampire. They believed it would help the magical creatures fear me less. But this time my dad didn't make me stop. His blood vaporized the poison from my body, and I was healed.

"Let's table this discussion for now." My mom looked directly at Geth. "Your concern has been heard."

Geth acted as though he wanted interrupt and say more, but my mom raised her hand and he clamped his mouth shut. "Since we don't have an answer at the moment, let's move on. Is that acceptable?" My mom asked the question, but the tone of her voice said the subject was closed.

Geth adjusted in his seat. "I'll wait. For now."

"And I too," Edinia said. "But I agree returning to our realm and our people would be nice."

"Excellent. I appreciate your input. Thank you." Mom smiled at the elf. "Now, what's next?"

I stifled a yawn. This was the first of several meetings and I was bored. After the meetings, I still had to sit with a private tutor, attend combat training, and speak with the pixilettes about a new grass seedling they were trying to create.

"Might as well settle in, this is going to take a while," Edinia said, crossing her legs.

I had no idea what more still needed to be discussed, but I didn't want to be in the room a second longer. My patience disintegrated. "This is ridiculous," I said without thinking.

My mom glared. "Jasmine. Mind your manners."

Dad squeezed my mom's hand. "Let her go. There's a lot she still needs to do today."

"Yes, but she needs to learn to be - "

My dad gave my mom a look and I knew they were having a conversation without using words.

"Fine," my mom said, obvious disappointment in her voice.

But I didn't care. Her disappointment in me was becoming more and more frequent. I could deal with that. What I couldn't deal with was listening to another second of this meeting. "Thank you," I said and stood.

As I walked away, I heard the troll mumble, "Why does she bother to come?"

I wanted to fall apart. Shout at him. Grab him around his meaty neck and drink directly from his foul vein. He was big and oafish, but I was at least twice as strong. Instead I rolled my shoulders and left.

SECRET CAVE

As fast as possible, I ran out of the castle. Immediately, I took off my shoes, making my way into the woods.

The wind against my toes tickled, but I didn't mind. Relaxing, I opened my mind, allowing my senses to feel, sense, touch, and hear the surrounding countryside.

There was a family of deer at the stream to my left.

On my right was a group of pixilettes collecting seeds from orange peonia plants.

I listened extra carefully for a moment to see if Abrea happened to be with them, but she wasn't.

The pixilettes were talking about creating a new flower color by mixing two seedlings together. It would be called tealender, which was teal and lavender together.

They wanted to create it in my honor since I had a streak of teal along the front of my hair and my eyes were lavender.

I beamed at their thoughtfulness and the intensity of their conversation.

They continued their light discussion.

Some believed my eyes were more violet than lavender and therefore the name should be tealiot. I thought that sounded too much like toilet, so I hoped they didn't go with that one. However they could use violeal. That wasn't bad.

"Silly," I snorted.

At the moment there was one place I wanted to be, one place I wanted to go.

That was the secret cave Abrea and I found four years ago. It was a total accident and it was our secret hideout.

We were flying together one day when a sudden rainstorm hit. As the water beat down, Abrea flew under me so I could keep the rain from hitting her wings, but unexpectedly the rain started going sideways, making it even more difficult for her. We needed shelter, and the opening to the cave appeared on the side of the mountain like it knew we were in need.

We flew in and stayed there until the rain subsided. It felt alive. Filled with the gems of the seven magics. The walls sparkled with rubies, emeralds, topaz, and sapphires. They lit up when I was near and whispered compliments telling me how beautiful my eyes were, how lovely the wings at my back had become, and so on.

But when I realized Abrea couldn't hear the whisperings I did my best to ignore them.

Freak! I thought again.

As I came upon the entrance point, I closed my eyes, focusing on my surroundings to make sure no one was around. When I was sure I was alone, I touched a charred looking rock. It shuddered and then the cave entrance appeared.

I flew inside. Immediately the whispering started. Happiness coated my heart. At least someone - or something thought I was amazing. In the cave I wasn't a disappointment. Here I wasn't expected to do something or be something other than who I was. It was refreshing.

"This place rocks. Like literally." It wasn't my voice but that of a guy. Deep. Earthy.

I swung around surprised someone snuck up on me. That never happened before. I might be losing my touch, same as my mom.

There was a guy near the entrance to the cave. He was gorgeous. A dark-haired, total-movie-star hottie. Like one of the actors or singers I read about in the entertainment magazines from the human world. He was tall, tan and muscled. He wore a short sleeve white shirt with an open collar and the sleeves rolled up. Each of his wrists were decorated with intricate black tattoos, like cuffs, but his were tribal with what looked like an eye in the center.

My first instinct was to kill him. But he was too pretty to hurt. "Who are you?"

He clasped his hands behind his back and took a step forward. "I'm Laeddin." Another two steps closer.

I swallowed. "How did you sneak up on me, Laeddin?"

He chuckled. Two more steps. We were toe to toe. I had to look up to see his face. His eyes, twin pools of glorious aquamarine, studied my face, my body, and my hair. He was amused. "This - is my home."

"Your home?" I answered. "You live in a cave?" I shook my head, trying to make sense of it. "I've been coming here for years. I've never seen you before." I took a step back. "You haven't been stalking me, have you?"

Laeddin copied my step so we were still close. "I thought you were stalking me." His eyes crinkled with mischief.

"Where do you sleep?" I looked around. It was empty except for the gems and a dirt floor. "On the floor? It's dirty. But you don't look dirty. You look gorgeous." I clamped a hand over my mouth, shocked I said that aloud.

My other hand touched his arm, felt the delicious shape of his bulging bicep.

"And perfectly clean. I mean look at your shirt, the way it clings to your chest and shows off the shape of your - " I pressed my lips between my thumb and first finger.

I was rambling, saying things I shouldn't be saying. It was a problem, talking too much when I was nervous, but I couldn't help it.

"I-I'm terribly sorry," I muttered.

He pulled my hand from my mouth. "It's okay." His gaze kept slipping from my eyes to my mouth. It was very disconcerting and sexy.

I licked my lips. "What are you?" I asked, and then blushed. Humiliated.

"Sorry." I turned away.

"I'm a genie," he supplied.

I felt him come up behind me.

He placed his hands on my bare shoulders.

I shivered at the warmth radiating from his palms. My wings fluttered of their own will and my face turned redder.

"Your wings are magnificent." With the tips of his fingers he stroked them.

I wasn't sure whether to be okay with him touching my wings or not.

No one except my parents was allowed. "Uh, thanks." I faced him. "So you're a genie?" I blinked, working to get control over my emotions. "What's a genie?"

He took my hand. "I'll show you."

The dirt floor and gem encrusted walls disappeared.

In its place was a room befitting any palace.

A giant chandelier hung from the ceiling and twelve billowing curtains all in different pastels were strung from the center to the edges of the walls and then hung down the walls.

The floor was covered in a thick white carpet.

I was barefoot and rubbed my feet across its surface.

"It's so soft." I gave Laeddin an incredulous look. "Is this real?"

"Of course it is, Jasmine." He brushed a piece of hair from my eyes.

"You even know my name?" Whatever a genie was, he had great magic.

In one corner of the cave, there was a gigantic four-poster bed.

Gauzy white curtains hung from it.

The bedding was also white and encrusted with what looked like white and black diamonds. At the foot of the bed was a sleek black trunk.

I walked over and touched it; sure it would vanish between my fingers. It didn't. The surface was solid, shiny, and sleek.

"This is where I sleep," he said, his voice seductive.

MASTER REQUESTS IT

I STEPPED AWAY, crossing my arms. "I've been coming here for years. Why didn't you reveal yourself before?"

He looked away. "I enjoyed listening to you and the pixilette, Abrea, talk. Sometimes I get a little lonely."

The idea that Laeddin, a strong and handsome man, felt the way I did immediately softened my heart. "Don't you have any friends?"

He looked at me, his eyes sad. "I'm not allowed to leave until such time as my master requests it."

"Oh, and who's your master?" My heart began to beat rapidly.

"You are, Jasmine." He came over and took both of my hands in his. "I am yours to command."

"You are?" For some reason that made my heart speed up and my face get hot. I tried to pull away, but he held me fast.

"Yes. And I can grant you three wishes." His eyes flickered to my lips. "Nearly anything you want."

"Really?" My mind whirled out of control at the possibilities. Most of my wishes were selfish. "I can ask for anything?"

"Well, sure. Anything within reason."

I wanted to snort. "What does that mean?" I walked over to the bookshelf and scanned the titles. There were titles I'd never seen before and several I had, like Wuthering Heights, The Great Gatsby, and To Kill a Mockingbird.

He came over, pulled Wuthering Heights from its place and started flipping through the pages. "I can't bring anyone back from the dead. I can't kill anybody." He turned and touched my cheek. "And I can't make someone fall in love." He caressed my jawline with him thumb.

I shivered and tried to cover it up with a smirk. "What can you do?" He smelled delicious, like exotic spices and oranges.

"Why don't you tell me what you want, and I'll let you know if it's possible." His thumb touched my bottom lip.

I inhaled and fell back. He caught hold of my arms and pulled me close. My body touched his and I turned into a gooey mess. He was the kindling and I was the match. I couldn't think and that was irritating. Well, okay, it was delicious, but kind of irritating too. It was important I be able to think.

He led me over to the bed. My heart raced faster. I sat, internally admiring how soft yet firm the mattress felt. When Laeddin moved to sit as well, I flinched and quickly stood. If he had salacious intentions, I wasn't ready. He was gorgeous, but I didn't know him and wouldn't be doing anything with him on his bed.

"So what is it you want?" Laeddin asked, disappointed.

Great, now I've upset him, too. He'd better get in line, I thought.

"Jasmine? I'm serious. I must grant you three wishes. Please?" He came over to me.

My breathing just started to calm down but the closer he got, the faster it went. "You seem anxious about it. Why do you have to grant me three wishes? Will you explode or something if you don't?"

Laeddin chuckled. "Maybe not explode." He crossed his arms, and I noticed the tattoos on his wrists. "But as I said before, you've been my master a long time already and there is an urgency that builds within my body the longer you go without wishing for something." He closed his eyes a moment. "It's painful almost beyond comprehension. But I wanted to wait until you were ready." His bright aqua eyes seemed to shine with the pain he'd been hiding. "That's why I showed myself today."

"Because I'm ready."

He acted guilty, like he was sorry he hadn't resisted longer. For some reason seeing him like this made me feel guilty, too.

"I planned to wait until you turned eighteen, but - Please." He gritted his teeth.

"Okay. All right." I tugged at my left wing, working to calm myself, one of my silly habits.

Laeddin noticed but didn't say anything.

I wanted my wings gone. "How about these wings? Can you get rid of them?" I asked, hopeful.

Surprise lanced across Laeddin's face. "Why would you want that?" He touched the same spot on my wings as I had only moments before. "They're stunning."

"I don't think so." I stomped over to the bench at the end of his bed, sitting furiously. "They might look pretty, and they are fun to use when I'm flying but - there's no one else like me." That was the part that hurt the most. Sure there were plenty of other vampires. But I was the only one with wings. "Because of these," I stretched out my wings to their fullest. "I'm not allowed go into the human realm at all. No movies. No high school. No - ugh! Living."

Laeddin's eyes beamed as understanding flashed through them. "So you want to go into the human realm then? Live like a human girl?"

"Yes." I clapped. "Is that a wish you can grant?"

He took my hands. "Yes, it is."

I jumped up, excited. "Okay. I like it." An image of my mom and what she would do when she found out flashed across my mind. "But what about my parents? Can they stop my wish? Can they make it so I have to come back?"

Laeddin paused thoughtful. "It's possible."

All the joy left my body.

Laeddin noticed and took my hands. "If you're specific, you'll be fine."

I thought about what I believed living in the human realm meant. There should be parties, trips to the local mall, good times at the movies, and hanging out at a friend's house. "How should I word it?" I asked, coming to stand near him. His scent was consuming, scrumptiously intense.

"I can't tell you exactly what to say."

My face fell. "Give me a suggestion, then. Sheesh!"

"My suggestion," he paused and chuckled. "Would be to word it like: 'I wish to be a normal girl and live in the human realm where I can go to high school without my wings and do so without my parents being able to bring me back to Sharra.' Or something like that." Laeddin stepped away and went over to a small table where a bowl of fresh fruit appeared. He took a purple grape and tossed it in his mouth.

I started to pace, thinking about exactly how to word my wish. When I felt like I knew, I said, "I'm ready."

Laeddin swallowed the food in his mouth and cleared his throat. "Then I am too."

I grinned. "Laeddin, I wish to go to high school in the human world and live like a regular teenage girl without my wings and without my parents being mad or being able to stop me." I paused. "Is that good?"

He thought it over a moment. "That works."

"Yay! So what happens now?"

"Now comes the magic." He clapped his hands together once. The black tattoos circling his wrists abruptly glistened the color of sunny gold. When they stopped my wings vanished.

"Oh, wow. That was fast." There was a quick pang of loss. They were a part of me almost eighteen years. But I shook off any regret. Life would be better without them. I moved closer and stood on my tiptoes. "What about school and living like a regular, normal human?"

He clapped his hands twice and we were no longer in the cave that was his home.

MY MOM'S HOUSE

"WHERE ARE WE?" I asked when the mist cleared. The room was dark, but I was able to make out empty shelves and pictures hanging on creamy walls. Lamps and furniture were covered in white sheets. Several inches of dust coated the room.

"This is the house your mom grew up in." He pulled the sheet off the couch and rolled it into a dusty ball. Thick dust puffed in the air. Laeddin coughed and tossed the sheet on the floor.

"Really?" I sneezed as I studied the room. I always wanted to see my mom's house, but she never let me. "And my dad grew up in the next house over, right?" My uncles teased that their house was a sprawling mansion while my mom had lived in a shack. She laughed but it was obvious there were some painful memories. For that reason I hadn't pushed her to come. Occasionally she would share a good memory, but it wasn't often.

The room Laeddin and I stood in was definitely small though. Smaller even than my bedroom in the castle.

"That's right." His words brought me out of my thoughts. "I believe a couple of Dorian's brothers and Professor Pops still live there, including some of your cousins."

"You know they aren't really my cousins?" I thought about Hot Guy. We weren't genetically related.

"No?" His eyes danced with joy. I wondered if he was as excited to be free of his cave as I was to have escaped Sharra.

"Professor Pops adopted the seven brothers."

Laeddin pulled a sheet off the TV. "Yes, I knew that."

I wanted to ask him how, but figured it had to do with his genie powers and so didn't bother. I was too excited. "I can't wait to see Pops." But then I hesitated. What would Pops think about my choice?

"Yeah, about that." Laeddin pulled a sheet off a high back chair. He wadded the sheet and tossed it, averting his gaze.

"What?"

He moved over to the couch and patted a pillow. Dust erupted in the air like a puff of smoke.

"No one can know who you are." His eyes connected with mine. They radiated sympathy, but also finality.

I felt my mouth drop. "But why?" That totally sucked.

"Because if they know who you are, they could tell your mom and dad, which would ruin your wish."

I sank into the overstuffed chair. That made sense. I wanted to live like a typical teenager, but if my uncles or Professor Pops knew who I was they would have to tell my mom and dad. Of course they would, because their loyalties were to them first and foremost. My uncles shared enough stories - sleeping out on something called a trampoline, hanging out until all hours. I knew what the brothers, Pops, and my mom and dad meant to each other.

"You get it, right?" Laeddin rested a hand on my shoulder, filling the air around me with his scent.

"I guess so." I took a small breath. "At least you'll be here with me."

Laeddin cleared his throat.

"Wait, you won't?"

He knelt beside the chair. "Think about it. How would it look if a teenaged girl and an unmarried guy lived together? People might get the wrong idea."

I jumped up and started to pace. "I'll be all alone. Where are you going? I don't know what to do. I need help. I can't do this without you. Besides what if I want another wish?"

He stood. "What do you suggest?"

I tried to pull on my wing like I usually did in stressful situations and then remembered they were gone. For some reason it made me sad. "I don't know. But you can't leave. You can't," I cried, full of desperation.

Laeddin snapped his fingers. The tattoos around his wrists lit up momentarily and suddenly the entire room was dust free and totally clean. "That's better." He snapped his fingers again and a figurine appeared in his hand. He set it on the empty glass shelf. "Look, it's your twin."

When I was young, my mom told me about a movie in the human world called Aladdin and that they chose my name from that movie. She said I looked a lot like the animated character. Cindy, my mom's best friend, snuck me a book about the movie. For weeks I read it at night after my parents tucked me in. I knew the characters' names by heart.

Another snap of Laeddin's fingers and the tiger, the genie, the monkey and the boy from the market appeared on the shelf next to Jasmine.

I came up beside him and touched the ceramic figurine. "My mom told me her stepmother had dozens of these when she lived here. She also said that her stepmother was kind of a coocoo crazy collector."

Laeddin laughed, bringing me out of my thoughts, and I joined in. It eased my stress. Now slightly more relaxed, I reached past my namesake to pick up the figurine of the tiger, Raja. "What if you became my tiger?"

"I might scare the neighbors or get shot. Tigers aren't exactly indigenous to the area." His bright eyes glittered with humorous sarcasm.

"Fine," I huffed. "You're right." Behind the Jasmine figurine and the tiger was Aladdin and his monkey, Abu. "A monkey?"

"Again, I'd be shot or taken to the nearest zoo." He faced me. "Why an animal? How about your twin?" Suddenly looking at him was like looking in the mirror. He changed into my exact duplicate right down to the aqua dress and the hair.

"Whoa. That's cool." I touched his face. "Okay, more freaky than cool. I don't know if I could deal with this."

He switched back to himself. "Well, I look too old to go to school. I guess I could play your father?"

"Gross," I said, trying to contain the strong attraction I held for him. It wouldn't do for him to play my dad when I responded to him the way I did.

"Why gross?" He reached out and grabbed my waist, pulling my body against his. He already knew why.

I stopped breathing. My mind stopped thinking. Everything froze and all that was left was Laeddin, his lips, and his very sexy body touching mine.

"Jasmine? What's wrong?"

I pushed him away. He was toying with my emotions. He obviously knew what he was doing. "Nothing. Just no to the parental idea." I meandered into the kitchen and opened a cupboard. It was bare, as were the rest. I flipped a switch, but the light didn't turn on. I tried to call upon my power to turn on the light, but nothing happened.

"No wings. No magic, remember?" Laeddin walked into the kitchen.

"Right, a regular teenager with a craving for blood."

"Correct," Laeddin smirked.

I pulled open the refrigerator. A pungent odor wafted out. "I'm going to need electricity and groceries and - " I spun in a circle. "I'm going to need a lot of stuff."

"Nasty." Laeddin wrinkled his nose at the smell. He snapped his fingers. The smell instantly vanished. Fruits and vegetables appeared on the refrigerator shelves, as did the light.

"Nice," I said, taking an apple and pressing it to my lips. Before I bit, I asked him, "So I'm regular, right? I don't need blood to sustain me anymore?"

Laeddin looked away.

"Come on. What kind of genie are you?"

Laeddin chuckled. "It has to do with your wish. What you asked for." He took the apple and bit into it. "Delicious."

I crossed my arms. "So what? Do I need to wish that I'm no longer a vampire?"

He threw the apple's core in the trash. "You could, but I don't think you should." He looked away. "I mean it isn't my place to tell you how to wish or what to wish for." Laeddin bowed low at the waist. "I am simply your humble servant."

I placed a hand on his shoulder. "Don't bow to me." Laeddin's scrutiny seemed to tear into my soul. "You aren't my servant. We're going to be friends." I patted his cheek, ignoring my pangs of desire. I wanted us to be more than friends.

Laeddin took my hand. "I appreciate that's what you might think, but the truth is, until your three wishes are granted, I am your servant."

RUB A LAMP

I GAVE AN EXASPERATED SIGH.

"I like you too. But if you knew anything about genies, you'd know we can't consider ourselves equal when one does the wishing." He pointed at me. "And the other," he smacked a hand against his chest, "must grant it."

I went to the bar stool and slumped over, resting my head in my hands. "Why should you be my servant - " I shrugged. "Or whatever, if I didn't call upon you - or something." It was confusing. "Wasn't I supposed to rub a lamp? Where is your lamp?"

Laeddin sat beside me. "The cave you and Abrea often visited. That was the inside of my lamp. Basically from the moment you found it, I've been your servant. I was just worried about showing myself to you too soon.

"Why me and not Abrea?"

"Simple. You brought Abrea into the cave. You found the cave. It's been you for a long time."

"Oh," I said, lifting my head and looking at him. "And I shouldn't wish to no longer be a vampire?"

He shook his head, a strange emotion flitting across his face. "No, please don't do that."

I bit my bottom lip. "Okay. So, I guess I'm wingless and I can't do any magic, but I still have to drink blood?" That was upsetting. There was nothing ordinary about a girl with the need for a liquid diet. Especially not in the human realm. But I could pull it off. Without wings, I was sure to look completely normal, at least.

"Now you get it."

"I guess," I said, straightening up. I had my wish. I'd figure out the blood situation later. "So what are the fruits and veggies for? Just part of the typical teenager show?" I asked, giggling not unlike a little girl.

"Well that." He paused and patted his stomach. "And I'm a vegetarian. You'll need to feed your servant, don't you think?" He bowed low again.

I giggled. "How very manly of you." Then I got serious. "So you're going to stay around? You won't leave me in this house alone?"

Laeddin picked up my hands. "Correct."

My fingers found the tattoos and I traced them. That seemed to make him nervous. He gently pulled away, taking another bite of apple. "But you're only allowed to boss me around when you have friends over. And then only within reason." Laeddin smirked. "Treat me like family."

"Fine," I said. That reminded me. "Do you know where my mom's dad and stepmother are? They won't come back to the house while we're here, will they?" Part of me was excited by the prospect of seeing my grandfather. My mom hadn't told me much about him, but I still wanted to meet him.

Laeddin's face fell. "Didn't you know? Your grandfather died a couple of years ago. It was very sudden. The doctors couldn't figure out what happened."

"Oh." Sadness ripped at my heart over the loss of a family member I would never meet. "My mom didn't tell me. I wonder if she knows."

"She does. She arranged for his funeral and took care of the other necessities required. She kept the house but recently put in on the market. We've officially purchased it. So it now belongs to you." He went to the front room and touched a green and white For Sale sign leaning near the door.

"Okay," I said, feeling bad my mom never mentioned such a sad moment in her life. She must've felt something at the loss of her father. I knew it would break my heart to lose my dad. "And my grandfather's wife?"

"Soon after your grandfather's death, Vivianne disappeared. No one has seen or heard from her for a very long time."

I got off the stool and went to the stairs. "You know where she is though, right?"

He shook his head. "I can't see her. I'm not sure what happened to her. It's as though she vanished."

"That's weird." I started climbing the steps to see what was on the second floor. Laeddin followed.

The house smelled of Laeddin, like warm spices and zesty orange. I inhaled deeply. When I reached the top, I looked over the railing, down into the living room.

"It is very weird," he agreed.

I looked at him confused, until I figured he was talking about why he couldn't see my step grandmother. Not that I wanted to meet her. Mom told plenty of horrible stories. "Should I be worried?" I asked, tracing his features with my eyes.

"I don't think so. She never really liked your mom or this place, so it's highly unlikely, if she is still alive, that she'll return."

"You're probably right." A mixture of emotions swirled through me at being here.

"Of course I am. Besides we own the property now. She'd be trespassing." He moved to the first closed door and pushed it open.

"Exactly right," I said, perking up as I stepped around him and into the bedroom. It was big. I guessed it was my grandfather's and his wife's room. It was nice.

"I want to see my mom's old room," I said, continuing down the hall. When I came to the only other bedroom door, I froze. The door was closed, but I knew it had to be my mom's. Suddenly it felt like I was spying. She hadn't shared a lot about living in the house or living in the human realm. It reminded me I didn't even know her favorite color.

"You going in?" Laeddin asked.

I turned the handle and pushed open the door. Purple. Every inch of the room was covered in purple. "I never would've guessed," I said, stepping inside.

"Me either," Laeddin agreed walking over to the dresser.

I followed him and leaned in, checking out the pictures pinned to the corkboard above. There were photos of all seven of Professor Pops' adopted sons, including my father, Dorian, as well as my aunt Cindy and my mom. Even though my mom still looked the same, she seemed younger in the pictures. She dressed like a tomboy. Her hair was short, and she wore no makeup. "Wow." I took down a picture of Cindy and my mom.

"Yeah," Laeddin added.

"My mom looks so young." I glanced at Laeddin. His closeness took my breath away.

"She's lovely."

For some reason his comment made me jealous. "I guess." I put the picture back and pulled open the top drawer. It was empty, as was the next. I went to the closet and pulled it open. It was empty too. "What am I going to do about clothes?"

Laeddin tapped his chin as though he were thinking about the question before he smiled. "Well," he walked into the bathroom. I followed. "I could just snap my fingers and you'd have more clothes than you knew what to do with." He caught and held my eyes in the mirror.

"Yes, I suppose," I said, thinking that might be the easiest.

"Or," he turned and leaned down so that his cheek touched mine, his lips next to my ear. "We could go shopping." His breath tickled my neck.

A shiver ran down my spine at the prospect. Yes, I wanted to shop! I was sure my face lit up like lightning during a thunderstorm.

"So shopping?" he asked his face so near mine. He already knew the answer.

"Yes," I said turning slightly so I could see his eyes. My bottom lip brushed against his and a bolt of electricity shot through my body. "Oh," I gasped.

He touched my lip with his fingers. "Let's go then." He seemed to be affected by me as well, though he was doing a better job at hiding it.

Heat touched every part of my body. I couldn't speak. So I nodded. "I'm ready." And I was. Normal life, here I come, I thought.

SHOPPING

LAEDDIN TOOK us to a place in New York City called Bloomingdales. We had a salesperson help us. It was fun buying clothes after the small freak out I had when I turned to study my reflection in the mirror and saw no actual wings.

Okay, a big freak out.

"What's wrong?" Laeddin asked, popping into the dressing room with me. I screamed again, quickly covering myself with the shirt I was about to try on.

His eyes roamed over my body quickly before focusing on my face.

"Look at my back," I said, turning it toward him, my teeth chattering.

His eyes got dark, like emeralds, and he licked his lips. I was mesmerized by the action.

When he didn't say anything, I continued on. "There are tattoos of wings on my back." "I tore my gaze from his face and focused on the reflection of my back in the mirror. The wings were outlined in black and filled in along the edges. I knew tattoos were a thing in the human realm, but I never thought about having one, let alone one that covered my whole back.

"May I?" Laeddin asked, reaching out.

My heart raced so hard and so fast; it was hard to hear anything. "Sure." I bit my bottom lip.

His touch was gentle as he traced one of the wings. I closed my eyes, sinking into the incredible feeling racing through my body, remembering this was a good thing. Normal. No wings equaled ordinary. That was what I wanted.

"They are trapped within," he said, interrupting my thoughts.

I opened my eyes. "Will they stay away?" I moved so I was inches from him. He grasped my shoulders and tipped his head.

We were going to kiss. I sensed it, knew it the way I knew which way was up. I lifted my face to meet him halfway. My first kiss, I thought.

I knew I should close my eyes. I'd seen pictures of couples kissing, but I was too fascinated with the way Laeddin moved. The length of his dark lashes and how they cast shadows on his cheeks, the slight dimple in his chin, his mysterious scent, and his warm breath.

Millimeters away. He was so close. I wondered how it would feel, if it would change me.

Someone knocked on the door. "How's it going, Jasmine?"

I squealed and jumped out of Laeddin's grasp. "Fine," I said, but my voice sounded strange.

"Did you need a different size?"

Laeddin smirked.

My face turned bright red, like rich blood. "I'm not sure yet. Hang on."

I heard her step closer to the door.

Laeddin moved so he could whisper in my ear. "I'm going."

He kissed my cheek and vanished.

I checked my cheek in the mirror. I expected to see a mark where his lips touched. The spot burned, but there was nothing.

"Jasmine?" the clerk said again, knocking with more urgency on the door. I peeked my head out and handed her one of the dresses I'd taken in. "I'd like to try this one in a different color."

She took it, happy to have something to do. "I'll see what I can find."

"Thank you."

When she was gone, I tried on a tan mini skirt that came to the middle of my thighs and a powder blue button up shirt. I turned back and forth, liking the look. Then I tried on a couple of different pairs of jeans, more shirts, some sweaters, and a couple of different dresses. They all looked great.

By the time the salesgirl came back, I was ready for more. "What do you think?" she asked, showing me the dress. "It'll match your beautiful eyes."

The dress was a bright orchid in color. "I like it." I took it from her.

"And what about the others? Anything you like?" She watched me with curiosity.

"I love all of it."

"Good. If you want to give them to me, I'll begin wrapping them up."

"Sure." I took the clothes and handed them to her.

"Anything you don't want?" she asked.

I shook my head. From the corner of my eye, I caught Laeddin watching our exchange. He had his hands in his pockets and was smiling. "Nope."

"Very good." Her quizzical expression changed to complete and utter excitement. The girl was going to get a huge commission.

"Also," I added, before she left. "I'm going to need shoes. And underthings. And socks, and tights - and coats, and jackets too."

She followed my gaze and saw Laeddin. "You're very lucky. He's gorgeous and generous."

"I know," I admitted and then blushed.

OVER THE NEXT FEW DAYS, Laeddin took on the role of tour guide. He showed me around Salem. He took me into Boston, where we walked the streets, until he surprised me with a movie. It was a romance called Across the Ages about a girl who travelled through time and ended up falling in love. There were several cringe-worthy moments. Like when the main character kissed the male lead. It was soft and passionate and romantic, and my cheeks went hot.

When the movie ended, I could tell Laeddin was relieved, but I wanted to see it again. So we did. He was very thoughtful. I had so much fun spending time with him. He didn't talk much about himself though. Mostly we talked about me, and my life.

Laeddin also magicked the documents needed for school. It was mainly just him snapping his fingers, but since Salem Academy could call and check on the information listed in the transcripts, he had to make sure certain things I didn't care to understand were in order.

Sunday night, he took me to a symphony. It was our last night together before I was to start school. All he did was snap his finger and he went from wearing jeans and a t-shirt to a black tux with a white shirt.

"You look so handsome," I whispered. It took me an hour to do my makeup and my hair just right and then to get dressed, but that was fine by me.

I chose a black dress with loose ruffles in the skirt. What I loved most was that the under part of the ruffles were teal, so when I moved, a pop of color would show. The bodice was tight and sleeveless. A small teal flower was pinned on the right side of my waist. On my feet were black pumps with a red bottom, but Laeddin changed them to teal. My hair was curled and pinned back on one side, leaving it long and flowing.

"Well you look beautiful." Laeddin rested his hands on my waist. His skin radiated his scent.

In that moment, I realized why he smelled so delicious to me. Because I was smelling his blood. My fangs pressed against my lips as I longed to taste him. "Thank you," I forced out.

I needed to get a handle on myself. It wouldn't do to drain my hot genie. But it had been a while since eating and I was starting to feel the ill effects of going without.

"If everything alright?" Laeddin kissed my cheek.

My throat felt parched, but I resisted. "Fine. Let's go."

With the snap of his fingers, we left my house and were seated in the theater. No one even noticed when we just popped in. It was as though we were there all along.

When everyone was seated, the conductor came out and spoke to us about the program. Then the orchestra began to play - and for the next hour I was lost in the beautiful sounds of the music.

HUMAN SCHOOL

ON MONDAY MORNING, I woke with a mixture of excitement and apprehension swirling in my belly. The sun was just starting to rise, and my first inclination was to fly because Abrea would be waiting at my window.

Except she wouldn't be this morning.

My emotions floated to the surface.

I needed Abrea. She was my friend.

Before I got out of bed, I took a moment to really enjoy laying on my back. It was heavenly.

Finally, I jumped out of bed and ran to the window, pushing it open. Birds chirped their song. Small animals rummaged in the trees that lined the back yard. A deer lifted its head and bounded away.

My throat burned at the sight of the doe. I needed blood. At this point, it was beyond bad. More than a week since my last breakfast, I couldn't ignore my hunger any longer.

"Where's a unicorn when you need one?" I whispered fiercely, turning from the window, surprised by how sad I felt. I missed my best friend. Having Laeddin was great, but I had to be careful of my attraction to him. Or his blood, my mind whispered. Whatever the reason, I couldn't totally relax. Hiding out in the human realm would be so much more fun if Abrea was with me.

Laeddin and I discussed bringing her. We talked and talked about it. But it wouldn't work. Abrea was small. If her presence were noticed, the full wrath of the laws would fall upon us and we would be imprisoned or killed.

I took a deep breath. I chose this life. Might as well get used to it. Normal. High school. It would get better once I found some human friends and started doing typical stuff.

"Focus, Jasmine." I went into the bathroom. Laeddin had changed the color scheme in there as well as my bedroom from purple to my favorite colors, which were teal and black.

The style was contemporary. A fresh jasmine flower sat in a pot on the counter near the sink and I leaned in to smell it. After my shower, I fixed my hair. The teal streak that had been in my hair for as long as I could remember was no longer there. I kept turning back and forth in the mirror trying to decide whether I liked myself better with or without it.

I decided it didn't matter. I left my hair down, curling the ends that hung to my waist with a hot iron. It took me a while to figure it out and I ended up burning two of my fingers. At least I was still a vampire. Then I could heal quickly. I kept my makeup simple, using neutral colors that enhanced my violet eyes, and applied neutral lip-gloss.

I picked out my outfit the night before, a tan skirt with five-inch heels in the same color and a powder blue button down shirt. I put on a matching lacy blue bra and undies. The bathroom seemed lonely without Zenny. Usually he was around to give me compliments and help me choose makeup colors, hairstyles, and the clothes I would wear. I missed him too.

But I reminded myself he wasn't part of my normal life.

I focused on my shoes. They were the favorite part of my outfit. The shoes had a peekaboo toe and a bow at the ankle. Completely adorable.

When I finished, I went down to the kitchen and Laeddin.

He leaned against the counter, eating an orange. He was dressed in dark jeans and a green t-shirt. His feet were bare, and his black hair was still wet.

I wasn't sure whether it was the orange or him that I craved more. But he made the orange look so delicious, especially with the juice dripping off his lips. I wanted regular food. I thought about wishing for it, but he already told me he didn't want to change who I was, and I didn't want to waste a wish.

"Morning," he said, pushing off the counter.

I unexpectedly felt shy. "Hi," I replied.

"Ready for school?" He opened the fridge and grabbed a bottle of water, twisted off the lid, and took a long drink. I was mesmerized by his movements. He smelled like ecstasy. It could've been his skin or his blood. I wanted to lick at the vein pulsing at his neck, sink my teeth in, and find out. I had a feeling his blood would be as spicy as his scent.

He saw me watching and stopped drinking, placing the lid back on the bottle. I licked my lips. Thirsty.

"You need to feed," he suggested as comprehension dawned on him.

"Yes." I took a step in his direction.

He faced me, spreading his legs shoulder's width apart. It looked like he was preparing for my attack. "You want to taste me, don't you, Princess?" His voice was low, deep and sensual.

"I do," I responded, moving closer. I was almost in a frenzy, and the need for blood made his smell so heady.

Laeddin tilted his neck as though giving me access. I was on him before I realized what I was doing. My tongue tasted his neck and my fangs released. I pressed against his warmth.

He cleared his throat. "Is this what you wish?" Laeddin asked.

That made me pause. "You mean I have to use a wish to drink your blood?"

"That's right," he said, clearing his throat and resting his hands on my hips.

That took the heat right out of me. I untangled myself, pushing out of his arms. "Never mind." I picked up my pink and light green polka dot backpack and walked to the front door. "I'd better get to school."

Laeddin was immediately wearing shoes. "Here." He pulled open the refrigerator and grabbed a glass. It was filled with something red. "It's blood. Drink. You're going to need it."

I grabbed and sniffed. "What kind?" I took a sip. It tasted a little sweet and salty with a hint of copper. It tasted different than any blood I tried before. Only the tiniest hint of magic laced within the blood. "Is it an animal?" If so, I knew it would keep me in control for a short time but wouldn't satisfy for long. I took another, bigger drink. It was delicious in a way I never imagined. Even better than unicorn blood. Had my mom lied about my not being able to drink animal blood? Would it keep me strong and healthy just like magical blood?

Laeddin smirked. "Something like that." A set of keys appeared in his hands.

I chugged the remaining blood until it was gone. Usually I drank it warm, but cold wasn't bad. I wanted more, but a quick check inside the refrigerator revealed there wasn't any left. "You're driving?" I asked, giving him a sideways glare. "Wouldn't it be faster to do your magical disappearing and reappearing thing? You know, poof."

"Of course it would be faster, but it might alarm the humans." He opened the door.

"Oh, right." I'd forgotten that in the human realm magic was outlawed. "I wish you were going with me. It'd be nice to know one person in the school."

Laeddin chuckled. "Is that an actual wish? Because it would be awkward, but your wish is my command."

I covered my mouth and swallowed down my worry. "Oh my gosh. No. You're right. That wasn't an actual wish."

He seemed relieved. "Good."

We walked outside. Sitting directly in front of us on the circular driveway was a gleaming white Mercedes.

"Cool," I said climbing in the passenger seat.

After he got in and the engine roared to life, I turned and looked at him. "You called me Princess? What's up with that?"

He glanced at me as he pulled forward. "It suits you - Princess."

"I don't like it," I told him, leaning back in the leather chair.

Laeddin turned, his face alight with mischief. "All the more reason I'll continue to call you Princess, Princess."

"Ugh."

Laeddin smirked. He did something with the shifter and the car lurched forward, down the driveway. Laeddin flipped a knob on the left of the steering thing as we came to a stop. A large silver truck flew past us. It honked and roared down the street.

"I'm guessing one of your uncle's kids." He looked like he had a bad taste in his mouth. Laeddin turned left and we followed the truck all the way to the high school.

FIRST DAY JITTERS

THE SCHOOL WAS BIG, bigger than the castle. Laeddin dropped me off at the front of the school. "I'll be back to pick you up at two forty."

I climbed out of the car. "Thanks. See you later." I watched him drive away. All my senses were heightened. New smells - weird smells - assaulted my nose. And there was so much noise. At the Seven Magics Academy, there were less that seventy-five students. Here it sounded like a flock of sea birds calling to each other. Hundreds of humans swarmed past. They went up the stairs and through the front door. I turned, trying not to wobble in my heels, and followed the brunt of them.

Inside the school, the air became denser, probably from all the bodies. Straight ahead was an open area with hallways breaking off to both sides. Ahead there were two sets of double doors, with a staircase to the right of the doors.

"Are you lost, honey?" A guy with short black hair and skin much darker than mine bounced in front of me. His face was friendly. Dark eyes sparkled and his smile took up a large portion of his face. He was wearing a hot pink button up shirt. It wasn't tucked in but hung loose. His shoes were blue with a hot pink streak. Both of his ears were pierced, and diamond studs covered the holes.

I couldn't stop staring. He reminded me a little of Zenny.

"Hey," he snapped his fingers. "New girl."

"Where is the office? I-I, uh am new."

He popped a hip and gave me a look that said duh. "Yeah, I figured." He took my hand. "Come on. I'll get you there."

I halted, surprised by his friendliness and shocked by the smell coming off him. It was like a bouquet of copper, rust, and sweet thick

- I smelled his blood. Laeddin gave me human blood for breakfast. I didn't know whether that was a good thing or not. I guessed it was his way of showing me I could get blood without drinking from animals. But I had to go to school with the people. I didn't want them to be my food. At least not if I wanted to be normal.

My fingers had a death grip on the guy's hand.

"Hey." He gave me a strange look.

"Sorry. Thanks." I relaxed and followed him.

"It's alright. Don't be scared. Most of the kids here won't bite." He glanced back while walking, his face alight with amusement.

I returned his with one of my own. But couldn't help thinking the humans might not bite, but I would. At the thought of his blood hitting the back of my throat, my mouth watered. When I saw Laeddin again I was going to give him a serious piece of my mind.

"My name is Cameron, but you can call me Cam. What's yours?"

"Jasmine," I responded before I really thought about it. The name on my transcripts said Jackie Ryder, which was the name Laeddin game me. They were fake, of course. But I couldn't come out and say I'd been going to school in a fairytale land called Sharra where my teachers were vampires and trolls and fairies. And oh, yeah, I drank blood for sustenance. Nope that wouldn't go well with my wish to be a normal teenager.

So I was from Las Vegas. I went to public school for a while and then I was homeschooled and taught by tutors. It was kind of true. Also, my mom and dad worked in the entertainment industry and liked their privacy.

"Well, it's actually Jackie but I like the name Jasmine." I tried not to blush, fiddling with my backpack straps, and readjusting my skirt.

Cam smiled bigger. "I like it, but I might have to call you Jack."

"Jack. Why?"

Cam's eyes shone with happiness. "You look like a Jack."

"I do?" I thought Jack was a boy name. I shrugged. "I guess that's fine."

"Best friends already." Cam squeezed my hand and pulled me along as he turned right. He walked me over to a door. Above it was a sign that said: OFFICE.

Cam dragged me over to the tall counter. A gorgeous girl with blonde hair and bright blue eyes sat behind the desk. "What's up, Cam?"

"Hey Sydney."

Cam turned to me. "This is Sydney. She's the student aide during first period."

"Hi," I said and waved.

Cam went on, "This new girl," he pointed to me, "has been caught in our web of evil and is here to attend our scary school." He did a faux laugh, like a villain.

Sydney snickered. "What's your name?" She gave me a once over.

This time I was prepared with the correct name. "Jackie Ryder." I glanced at Cam.

He slapped his palm on the counter. "We're going to call her Jack though, because it suits her."

"Okay." Sydney pressed some letters on a machine and then stood. "Be right back. You need to speak with the counselor, Mr. Butters."

Cam gave me a horrified look.

"What?" I asked after Sydney walked away.

"Mr. Butters is crazy, and he looks even crazier."

I giggled nervously and pulled at my hair. "Really?"

"He's looks like Einstein."

"Ohhhh," I said, even though I had no idea who Einstein was. And that had me worried.

"You'll be okay though. Just don't look at him for too long or you might turn to stone." He patted my hand.

When I gasped, he laughed. "I'm totally kidding." Then his face grew serious. "Don't test the theory though."

"Right." I couldn't tell when Cam was serious or joking. He kept bouncing back and forth.

Sydney came out of the office behind the desk with a man wearing a green bow tie, a blue, green, and white plaid shirt, and tan pants. His hair was thick and white like the driven snow. He had bushy salt and pepper eyebrows and a matching mustache.

"See?" Cam whispered.

"Adorable." If that was what Einstein looked like, he must've been a character.

Mr. Butters came around the desk. "Hello, Jackie." His voice was crackly and had an accent.

I took his hand and shook, knowing that was a human custom. "Hello."

Mr. Butters wrinkled his nose, which made his thick mustache move like a caterpillar. "Let's go into my office and we can discuss which classes will work best." He motioned for me to follow him.

I cast a glance at Cam, who shrugged. "Have fun, Jack. I'll look for you at lunch." He turned and walked out.

My shoulders folded in. I kind of already felt ready to quit. Why had I thought I would like living in the human realm?

"Jackie." Mr. Butters waved me inside his office. "Have a seat." He shut the door as I sat in one of the cloth-covered chairs in front of his desk. When he was seated, he asked, "Do you prefer to go by Jack? I heard Cameron call you Jack."

"Sure."

"Okay, then, Jack. Give me a second to pull up your file."

While he tapped some keys, I perused his desk. The top was a mess, with an assortment of papers, books, a screen and a telephone, which I 'd never actually seen in real life before but had heard about. He opened his drawer and took out a tin. Then he opened it, pulled out something round and white and popped it in his mouth. "Want one?" he asked, holding the tin out for me.

It smelled like peppermint. I did want one but wasn't sure how I would react to it. Best not to puke on my first day. "I'm good." One thing I did notice was the strong peppermint scent blocked out a lot of the smell of blood. I'd have to remember that. Maybe I could wear a peppermint necklace to block the scent of blood.

Mr. Butters shrugged, closed the tin, and put it back in his drawer. "Now." He scooted his chair forward and started clicking keys. "Jackie Ryder. Let's see." He pulled a pair of glasses from his pocket and put them on. "It says you've completed two years of English. Good." He glanced over, checking for verification.

"Yes," I said, allowing my backpack to fall into the chair beside me.

"Looks like you've taken one year of history and a semester of Spanish." He continued to look at the screen. "De donde Jackie?"

I had no idea what he said. "Uh?"

"Where are you from? That was Spanish." He shook his head. "You still need a semester of PE and a three semesters of Spanish." He eyed me seriously.

"That sounds right." I had no idea what PE was, but was sure I could figure it out.

"Since you're coming in halfway through the first semester, there is limited availability. You understand?" He tapped some more keys.

"Yeah, I get it." My heart was pounding rapidly. I had a feeling at any moment Mr. Butters would see I wasn't human and have me arrested. Hopefully he remained oblivious.

"Let's do this." He spoke while he tapped on his keys. I realized he was talking for his benefit not mine and used the opportunity to glance around the room. On the wall behind him were a few different certificates. I guessed they had to do with his schooling. On the wall next to the door was a metal cabinet. Books were stacked almost to the ceiling on top of it. To my right was a window and underneath it was a machine. I glanced outside. It was a bright October morning. The sky was a crisp blue. The office overlooked a grassy area. There was a couple kissing heavily, their arms roaming all over each other.

A bell rang and they broke apart, running in opposite directions.

I turned my attention back to Mr. Butters. He was watching me, a strange look on his face. "So," he began. "I think I've got it figured out." A noise came from the machine under the window. A paper came out the bottom. "That's your schedule."

I took the paper and read over it.

"I gave you the same lunch as Mr. Anderson, so you'll know one person at least." He flashed his crooked teeth. Somehow, they worked on his face.

"Um, okay?" I had no idea who Mr. Anderson was.

"Cameron. The young man who brought you into the office." Mr. Butters clasped his hands together.

"Oh. Thank you." That was considerate.

"Of course." He began typing again. "Your locker will be on the second floor, which is near several of your classes." He wrote something on a yellow piece of paper, pulled it off and held it out. "Here's your locker number and the combination."

I took it, studying the numbers though I had no idea what a locker or a combination was.

Mr. Butters went on, "Tell no one your combination. Memorize it and then throw the paper away. Got it?"

"Yes." I clung to the edge of my skirt.

He stood and opened his door. "Sydney, would you mind giving Jack a tour of the school and help her find her first class?"

Sydney nodded vigorously. "Of course, Mr. Butters." She grabbed her jacket. "Come on. You're going to love it here."

I wanted to believe her. I did. But I wasn't feeling excited. Instead I felt kind of sick.

LOCKER TROUBLE

THE SCHOOL HAD A days and B days. On A days I was supposed to go to different classes than my B days. Each class was ninety minutes long with a thirty-five minute lunch - except Tuesdays. That was what they called a "short day," which meant school started at eight-thirty instead of seven-thirty.

It was Monday, a B day, and according to the paper schedule I clutched in my hands, that meant I had Creative Writing, PE, something called Homeroom, Calculus, and history. On A days, I had accounting, Homeroom, chemistry, English, and Spanish.

Sydney walked me around the school, taking me to the cafeteria, the auditorium, and the gymnasium. She even showed me where my locker was.

"This isn't a bad spot." Sydney flipped her hair and turned around. She wore tight jeans, a long peach shirt that was see through and had a tie around the hips. Underneath was a white tank top. On her feet were gold ballet flats. She looked cute. But I noticed she wasn't nearly as friendly once we left the office.

"I like your shoes. Where'd you get them?" she asked as I tried to open my locker. I didn't respond right away, trying to figure out Mr. Butters' chicken scratch. He'd written left 32, right 12, left 7 so I had an idea what I was supposed to do, but I couldn't seem to get the locker to open.

"Bloomingdale's," I said, spinning the knob filled with lines and numbers.

"Shopping in New York. Nice." Sydney voice bubbled with enthusiasm. She scooted me out of the way. "Let me help you." She twisted the knob the opposite direction I'd been spinning it. "What's the combo?"

I remembered that Mr. Butters said not to tell anyone, so I hedged. "Uh, um." I glanced at the yellow paper with sticky stuff on one end.

"It's okay, Jack. I won't tell anyone."

I really needed her help, so I decided it was fine. I showed her the paper.

"Didn't your school have lockers in Las Vegas?"

"Yeah, but they were different." I grabbed a piece of hair and twisted nervously.

"Okay, well this is how our lockers work." She glanced at the yellow paper again. "Left 32." She turned until it reached a line two after thirty. "Right 12." She spun the knob to the right, going all the way around once and then stopping on the line two after ten. "Left 7." She turned to the line two after five. Then she pulled up on a silver lever and the locker opened. "See, easy." Her blue eyes twinkled.

I had a feeling it wouldn't be as simple as Sydney made it look. "Thanks."

"Sure. Did you want to leave your backpack?"

The inside of the locker had two hooks and a shelf but was otherwise empty. "No. I'm going to keep it just in case I need something." I patted the nylon strap.

"Cool." She shut it and leaned into my side. "What's your first class?"

"Creative Writing." I tried to inhale a quick breath, not wanting to drool at the scent of her blood so close. Hers wasn't nearly as sweet smelling as Cam's or Mr. Butters'. It was weird. Everything about this morning was weird. Humans seemed much more touchy-feely than I thought they'd be. I wasn't used to having my personal space invaded unless it was by my parents and more recently, Laeddin.

"Who with?"

I showed Sydney my paper.

"Ah, Miss Riplinger. You'll like her. She's also the cheerleading coach."

I had no idea what a cheerleading coach was, but I copied Sydney's word and said, "Cool."

"Her room is on the fifth floor. I think she's likes it up there because it makes her students have to work out. She's always telling us we're getting too flabby." Sydney patted her flat stomach. "You're lucky you don't have to worry about your weight."

She took in my body. I felt the urge to cover up but held still. "I do try to eat healthy." That sounds like the right response.

She snorted. "Yeah, which probably means you only have one donut instead of two?" She raised an eyebrow and slapped my butt. I yelped, surprised. "You'd be perfect on our cheerleading squad. You have a great ass. Maybe second semester you should try out."

"Try out?" I had no idea what she meant.

"Yeah. One of the girls got herself knocked up. Our coach, Miss Riplinger kicked her off the team. Safety issues or something, which means we're a cheerleader short."

I was getting frustrated. What was knocked up? I didn't want to ask Sydney though. So I just said, "Sounds fun."

"It totally is." She linked her arm with mine. "Come on. I'll walk you to your class."

We went up several more flights of stairs. Sydney asked about Bloomingdale's and chatted about all sorts of random things. I didn't pay much attention until she said my name.

"What?" I asked, snapping out of it.

A look of impatience crossed her pert face. "The cheerleaders and the sports boys sit together at lunch. You can join us if you'd like?"

It was an invitation and I wanted to accept. I had a feeling spending time with Sydney and her group would give me the exact teenager lifestyle I was looking for.

"Does Cam sit with you?" I asked, hopefully.

She shook her head. "No, Cam's all right, but he sits at a different table." She stopped walking, pulling me to a stop with her. "You'll figure out soon enough who you should spend time with if you want to have any fun at this school." Leaning in, she whispered, "I'll give you a hint though. My group is the group and I've decided you're a perfect fit."

I wondered how she could tell I'd be great for her group. She didn't know anything about me. Was it the clothes I wore? The way I did my hair? That always seemed important in the magazines. Or maybe it was because of my body. The way a person looked meant something to most creatures. I recognized that pretty easily. And I should be glad Sydney thought I fit into the human category where I had the right look. But what about Cam? Surely, he was perfect for their group too.

"Here's your class."

"Thanks."

"Where's your cell?" Sydney asked, holding out her hand. "I'll give you my number. Then we can text each other so I can find you at lunch."

I looked away, grabbing my elbow. How hadn't I remembered I needed a cell phone? My uncles all had them.

"Your parents won't give you one, huh?"

"Yeah. Jerks." I glanced at her from under my lashes.

"Well don't worry. You aren't the only one." She waved and walked away. "I'll find you."

"See ya," I returned, glad she didn't think I was too horrible for not having a cell phone. Facing the door, I placed a hand on the knob and was about to twist when it flung open and smacked me in the forehead, knocking me backward so that I fell on my butt. "Ouch." I rubbed my forehead. It smarted, but I knew there wouldn't be a mark. I healed too quickly for that.

"Hey, I'm sorry."

I glanced up at the sound of the deep voice and into the eyes of Hot Guy. "Hey, what are you doing here?" He said he graduated. I quickly stood and then remembered no one was supposed to know where I was. Double crap!

Recognition feathered over his face. "Working," he said, pulling me over to the side. "The bigger question is what are you doing here? Your parents - everyone is worried sick!"

"Don't say anything, please. I, uh - " Could I tell him about the wish?

"Where are your wings, Jasmine?" He was upset and shocked and trying to figure out what was happening. It was easy to read all of the emotion in his expressive eyes.

I couldn't believe my wish was ruined after such a short time. But who had I been kidding?

"They're gone, for now." I glanced over at two girls watching the two of us as they walked by. "I really want to try being normal. Just for a little while. Please don't tell anyone. Please." I was begging, but that was all I could do. Except - "I promise not to tell anyone you are too old to be going to this school." I scrunched my brows. "Why the heck are you attending classes and stuff?"

"Like I said, I'm working." He came in closer, and my nose was flooded with the scent of him. My fangs pressed against my mouth. "There's a supernatural attending and I'm trying to get in her good graces." He stopped, considering my request. "I won't say anything. At least not right away, but you really should let your parents know what's going on."

I appreciated his opinions and was beyond grateful for him. "I will."

He touched my forehead where the door smacked me. "You need to be careful."

"Promise."

He leaned in, peering closely at the nonexistent wound. "No wings but still a vampire." His chuckle was sultry, and my stomach clenched. Holy moly. Between Laeddin and hot guy, my heart might not be able to take it. "There isn't any bruising at least."

"Yep," I said, trying not to concentrate too much of the heavenly scent coming off him. It was a combination of blood and sandalwood and something else. It was magical, but I hadn't smelled the scent before.

He stepped back, releasing me. I tilted a little sideways. His hands came back out to steady me. "Maybe I should walk you down to the office where you can lie down with an ice pack."

I'd just come from there. "No, really. I'm okay. You mostly just startled me." I didn't add that was okay. He could startle me anytime. That sounded sappy.

"Are you in Miss Riplinger's class?" He pointed with his thumb back toward the classroom.

"Yeah," I said, trying not to sound shy.

"Awesome. Well my name is Troy."

"Call me Jack," I said, sticking out my hand.

He stuck a finger under my chin. "Jack, huh? That's adorable." He started jogging down the hall toward the stairs. "See ya round, Jack." He waved.

"Sure thing," I responded, facing the opening to the classroom. Then took a deep breath. "Here goes nothing." Just the first great moment in my life as a normal teenager attending high school, I thought.

VINTAGE RULES

IT TURNED out Miss Riplinger was fun, just as Sydney said, but she was mostly flirty. She strutted around like a peacock on the prowl. The guys ate it up. The way she leaned over them, her V-neck top exposing cleavage. The girls giggled like they thought it was funny, but I got the feeling it actually irritated them.

When I first went in, Miss Riplinger introduced me and had me take the only seat available, which was in the back. Then she continued with whatever she'd been saying before I interrupted. I spent the remainder of class playing catch up. Luckily the book they were discussing was Wuthering Heights. I read the story more than once, so I had that going for me.

She asked us to pair up with a partner and answer some questions on a worksheet she passed out. The girl in front of me turned. Her hair was a honey brown and cropped short so that it curled around her ears. She had dark hazel eyes and a friendly face. "Want to do this together?"

"Sure," I replied, grateful.

"I'm Abby." Abby wore a light blue t-shirt. On the front was a blue horse with a rainbow-colored mane and tail. It said VINTAGE RULES across the front.

"Jack," I said. It was getting easier to remember my fake name.

"Your parents named you Jack?" She gave me a strange look.

"Well, no. It's Jackie, but I like Jack."

"That makes sense." She grinned. "It doesn't quite fit, but whatever floats your boat."

"Thanks."

The teacher handed me a book. "You'll need this for the final."

I took it from her. It was a paper copy of Wuthering Heights.

"Have you read it before?"

"Actually, I have. A few times." I smiled.

She sniffed. "No one likes a show-off." She lifted her chin and glanced at a group of students before heading to the front of the room.

Abby turned back and laughed.

"She's a real sweetie."

"Yeah. That's the word I'd use." Sarcasm oozed as I spoke.

"At least to her face," she added and laughed.

"Right." I thought Abby might be a friend.

"So you've read the book before?"

"At least ten times. Have you?"

That seemed to surprise her. "It's only one of my favorite books."

"Mine too," I whispered excitedly.

We spent the next fifty minutes discussing why Heathcliff was the greatest character ever written, and when Miss. Riplinger called time and told us to face forward, I felt like Abby would be a friend for life.

"Make sure your name is at the top of your page and pass your papers to the front of your row," Riplinger said.

I quickly wrote Jack Ryder at the top of my paper and handed it to Abby. When the bell rang everyone stood and filed out.

"What's your next class?" Abby asked, coming up beside me.

"PE."

"I have that next too."

A deep sense of relief settled within my stomach. "It's on the first floor. Come on or we'll be late."

We shuffled along the crowded hall, down lots of stairs, until we reached the main floor. While Abby and I walked, we talked. It was so different than the conversation with Sydney. With her I'd felt like I needed to be something I wasn't. With Abby, I could just be myself.

Well as much of myself as I could be in the human realm.

"Did your family just move here?" Her face was inquisitive. A small dusting of freckles covered her nose. She wore no makeup but didn't need any. Her skin was so smooth.

"Yeah," I hedged, unwilling to go into more details. No sense trying to explain that my mom and dad were in a different realm known as Sharra and that my mom was the Vampire Queen. That would be awkward.

She turned to face me more fully. "Did you hear about the dead guy they found in the woods last night?"

"What? No." I leaned away.

"Everybody's talking about it." She picked up her phone and then continued, "But I figured what with you being new maybe you hadn't heard. I guess there was blood everywhere, like he'd been beaten to death."

"That's awful." My mind was reeling. "Does this happen a lot?"

A guy with strawberry blond hair and the creamiest brown eyes I'd ever seen fell into step next to Abby. He seemed to know exactly what we were talking about. I was surprised Sydney hadn't mentioned it. "They're saying it's the most brutal murder Salem has ever seen. At least that's what I heard." He reached across Abby and stuck out his hand. "The name's Charlie."

"Jackie." I awkwardly took his hand and shook it. He flipped my hand over and looked at it. "Your hands are so soft. You must eat right."

I choked on a snort. "Sure." If eating right meant drinking blood.

"So why'd your family move here? Didn't they check the local news? Jonathon Mayfield disappeared a few weeks ago too."

My heart sped up. What was I supposed to say? I sighed like I was bummed I was there. "It's my mom. She has family that's from here."

"Oh," Abby said. "What's the name?"

"Uh," I started, unsure what to say.

Luckily, we reached the gym. Charlie waved good-bye and we went inside the locker room.

There was a thick stench in the air, but that wasn't what had me most worried. It was that all the girls were in various stages of undress.

"We have to change into different clothes?" I hugged the copy of Wuthering Heights Miss Riplinger gave me like it was life support.

"Yeah, silly. Your gym clothes. Didn't you do that at your other school?"

"I was homeschooled," I said, deciding to tell Abby the truth. Sort of.

"Oh. That explains a lot." She glanced down at my super high heels that were actually starting to pinch my toes.

"It does." I followed Abby over to her locker and sat on the bench while she changed.

"I couldn't quite figure out the doe-eyed look you had going on. I wondered if it was a way to get attention." She shrugged off her shirt and kicked off her shoes.

"Oh. No." I glanced down at the floor while she took off her jeans and put her shorts on. "Nope this is just me being me." I tried to smile.

Abby sat on the bench and dropped her shoes in front of her. "I thought so."

A whistle blew. "Let's go, ladies."

"That's Mrs. Hadley. She's our PE teacher. Come on."

I followed Abby, thankful for the moment I didn't have to get undressed. I was worried about what people would think if they saw my wing tattoos.

When we reached the door, a tough looking woman in polyester shorts, knee highs, tennis shoes, and a white shirt with a red collar blocked our exit.

"Who's this, Ms. Jones?" The teacher looked from me to Abby and back to me.

"This is Jack. She's new."

A tiny smile lifted the teacher's thin lips. "Nice. Now why isn't she in her gym clothes?" Her small smile vanished, and she frowned.

"I - uh - didn't know I'd be taking this class, so I didn't bring anything." They say the truth will set you free. I tried it.

She lifted her clipboard and wrote something. "Abby go into my office and find her something to wear."

"Yes, Mrs. Hadley."

"And hurry up." She walked out of the locker room.

My heart sped up. Could I change in a room by myself? Ask Abby to turn around?

Mrs. Hadley's office was cluttered. A volleyball sat on top of a bunch of papers. There were trophies all along the dusty shelves and a picture of Mrs. Hadley with some man hung on the wall behind her desk.

Next to the door was a big cardboard box. Inside was a bunch of clothes. Abby bent over and started digging through it. "I'm sure we'll find you something that isn't too horrible." She pulled out a pair of black shorts. "How about these?"

I shrugged. "Sure."

She handed them to me.

"Here's a shirt." It was also black.

"And what should I do about shoes and socks?" I asked taking the shirt.

She looked down at my shoes and shook her head. "Are you kidding me with those stilts?"

"No." I looked at them. They seemed stupid now. "They're pretty, right?"

Abby snorted. "Oh yeah, if you enjoy wearing shoes that tear down a woman's spirit."

"Huh?" I lifted a foot, trying to understand what she meant.

"It's nothing." She laughed. "I have a clean pair of socks in my locker. What size shoe are you?" She went back to her locker and opened it. Took out a pair of white socks and a pair of tennis shoes. "These are size seven. Let's hope they fit." She glanced at my shoes. "Even if they're too small, I'm sure you won't feel a thing after wearing those."

I sat on the bench. My heart raced so fast I thought I might faint. What would Abby say when she saw my back? Maybe I could change without her seeing. I turned so I faced her. "Thanks for all your help." I took off my shoes and looked around, wondering where I should put them.

"Just toss everything in my locker," Abby said, understanding.

"Okay." I set my shoes at the bottom next to her ankle boots, keeping my back away from Abby as I unzipped my skirt and put on the black shorts. So far so good. I stood slightly and unbuttoned my shirt, pulling it off. Abby didn't look away like I had. She took in my curves and my bra.

"Cute."

"Thanks." I tried not to act embarrassed. I pulled off the shirt and was sticking it in the locker when someone gasped.

"That's a big freakin' tattoo."

My shoulders slumped. I should've known I wouldn't get away with it.

Abby glanced in the direction of the voice. I'd spent enough time with Sydney already to know the voice belonged to her.

"What tattoo?" Abby stood.

I put my back against the lockers and quickly pulled the black shirt over my head.

Sydney came over. Abby gave me a strange look.

"Are you old enough to have a tattoo?" Sydney asked.

"I'm nearly eighteen," I said, trying to sound mature and tough.

"Where is it?" Abby asked, looking surprised.

"It's on her back. A tattoo of wings." Sydney spun me toward Abby. "Check it out. The new girl is baaaaaad." As she spoke, she lifted my shirt.

Abby gasped. "Wow, it almost looks real." She lifted my shirt higher.

Blood rushed to my face. I was mortified.

"Can I touch it?" Abby asked. Her voice was a whispered awe.

My mortification gauge flew off the chart. "Sure." I swallowed.

"Me too?"

I hung my head. "Yep." No point saying no. I had a feeling if I didn't let them check it out now, they'd bug me later, and later there might be more people around.

"Whoa, the outline almost feels like real feathers." Abby traced the wings with her fingers.

"It does."

"What in tarnation is going on in here?"

The three of us jumped. Abby and Sydney helped pull my shirt down.

Mrs. Hadley had her hands on her hips. "Let's go, ladies."

I quickly put my shoes and socks on. Then went through the door Sydney and Abby had already followed the teacher through.

I WANT YOU

GYM CLASS WAS easy after the show and tell with Abby and Sydney. Troy was also in class.

"Small world," he said, running by with another guy.

"Yeah."

He winked and I winked back.

Mrs. Hadley blew her whistle. That meant we needed to gather around. I followed after Abby. At first, I worried she or Sydney would treat me differently. If anything, my tattoo seemed to have upped my coolness factor.

When Mrs. Hadley called Sydney and Troy up to be the captains in a game of volleyball, Sydney picked me first.

Troy seemed disappointed. "I wanted you, Jack."

I felt my cheek heat up. "No you don't. Trust me. I don't know the first thing about this game."

"What?" Sydney gave me an evil glare. "You'd better stay out of the way then."

Coolness factor back to zero, I thought.

Once teams were picked, we went to a net. The first set of people rotated in. That meant me. Troy was in the back serving. The ball went over the net and over my head and landed on the floor in front of another girl.

"That was yours, Jack!" Sydney shouted.

I thought maybe it should've been the other girl's, but I didn't know the rules to the game. "Sorry," I said.

Our team rotated so I was no longer in the middle but on the right. Troy served the ball again. This time it went right to Sydney. She put her hands together, bent her knees slightly and bumped the ball in the air. Then the girl standing in the middle tossed the ball in the air.

"Spike it," she yelled in my direction.

The ball was coming down fast. "I don't know what that means," I said, but copied what Sydney had done and bumped it over the net.

The girl in the middle looked at Sydney. "Why'd you pick her?" She shook her head in disgust.

Sydney made a face. "Shut it, Aimee."

Coolness factor was now a negative ten.

I was glad the person on the other team didn't knock the ball over, which meant a point for us, until the other team rotated. The girl serving saw our side's weakness, aka me, and she sent the ball right at my face. I backed up a little and tossed it in the air the way I saw the other girl do it.

Aimee glared disgustedly, jumped in the air, and slammed the ball over the net. "Spike it," she yelled, walking over. She stood several inches taller than me, but I wasn't intimidated. I contended with trolls. Aimee would have to get a whole lot scarier before I showed any sort of emotion. Except amusement. I flashed my teeth, hoping it looked like a smile and not a sneer.

Her eyes widened a moment before she turned away.

At least now I understood the game, to a degree. After that, I didn't miss a ball and by the time class had ended, each team won a game.

When class was over, I followed the others toward the locker room. Abby was talking to a friend, and I didn't want to interrupt.

Troy jogged over. "You're a fast learner, Jack. You spiked that ball almost better than me." He gave me a fifty-megawatt smile.

"Thanks." I wanted to find out more about him? Obviously, he possessed one of the seven magics, but which one?

"If you ever want tips, let me know. Volleyball is my favorite summertime sport." His green eyes twinkled. "For now, I better get back to work."

"Right. Your job." I wanted to ask why summer, but he took off toward some guys.

I studied each of them, trying to determine the supernatural student. One of the guys had slightly pointy ears. Perhaps it was him.

AFTER PE WAS HOMEROOM. Abby helped me find the class. It was basically just a ninety minute block of time set aside to do homework, read, or do what most students did, which was talk or mess around on their cell phones.

I pretended to read Wuthering Heights and tried not to eavesdrop. But it was so easy with vampire hearing. And listening to them talk was interesting. Really interesting. They were so -mature and immature at the same time. They talked like they lived their own lives. Then would talk in the next breath about curfews, allowances, and family trips. It was weird. And amazing. I couldn't get enough.

When class ended, it was time for lunch.

I tried to remember how to get to the cafeteria, and on more than one occasion I got lost. The school really was enormous. After spinning in a circle and letting out a loud sigh, I was ready to give up. It wasn't like I would be eating anyway.

"Hey, are you okay?"

In front of me was a cute couple holding hands. Somehow, they looked familiar. They felt familiar. Even smelled familiar too. I gave them a closer look. "Do I know you?"

The guy shrugged. "Don't think so. We're new. Just moved into town."

"So did I."

They gave each other a quiet look.

"I'm trying to find the cafeteria." I zeroed in on the girl. Something about the eyes -

"Yeah, I think it's this way." The girl seemed kind. She had short red hair, green eyes, and a friendly face.

They moved down the hall. I followed, trying to push away the strange feeling the two of them brought.

The guy was tall and had dark hair. I hadn't seen the color of his eyes, but he was handsome. Just as the girl was pretty. They looked like they belonged together. Which was strange. Why was I even thinking about them like that? I didn't know them.

The guy pushed one of the swinging doors open. The girl walked by, kissing him on the cheek. "Thanks, Peter."

He patted her cheek. "Anything for you, Zoe."

Peter and Zoe. I didn't know anyone in Sharra by those names. I hadn't met anyone at school with those names either.

"Thank you, Peter." I said as I went in. "I'm Jack."

"Oh?" The look on Peter's face suggested he didn't believe me.

Zoe smacked Peter in the chest and gave me a big smile. "Nice to meet you, Jack."

"Let's eat." Peter walked toward the long line of students.

I hung back. "No thanks. I'm not hungry." If I got any closer to the human food I'd puke.

A strange look, almost like approval appeared on Zoe's face. "Okay, well see you around." They walked away, hand in hand.

I stared after them, strangely unsure of the immediate connection I felt for them. I figured it was probably because they were new to the school, same as me. I knew they could relate to my apprehension. Except they didn't seem all that nervous. In fact they appeared to be right at home.

Sydney bounced over. "Hey, who are those two?"

"More new kids." I glanced at Sydney. "Their names are Peter and Zoe."

"Oh. Cool." She took me by the arm. "Come with me. I want to introduce you to everyone."

"Wait." I searched the noisy cafeteria for Abby or the guy I met earlier, Cam. I couldn't find either of them in the sea of faces.

"What? Let's go, Jack." Sydney pulled me through the tables and throngs of students carrying trays of food until we reached double glass doors. "I was a little worried when we played volleyball, but you figured it out quick."

"I'm a fast learner," I said and shrugged.

"Obviously." She took my arm, steering me along. "We like to sit outside. The smell of trashy academy food isn't so overwhelming out here."

When we exited the school, I took a cleansing breath. It was cool outside and did smell much better - like sweat mingled with blood.

Sydney led me over to a table filled with kids laughing, joking, and basically having fun.

"Hey guys. I want you to meet Jackie. She's new to the school. I had the chance to get to know her a little and she's totally cool."

Everyone stopped what they were doing and turned. It was weird suddenly having a dozen sets of eyes taking in my appearance, judging me.

I lifted a hand. "Hi."

They all greeted me, some more friendly than others. Then they went back to their lunches and horsing around.

"Sit here," Sydney said, grabbing an empty chair and patting it.

"Thanks."

She sat in the chair next to me and started talking to a girl with curly brown hair. "Lynn, Jackie has the coolest set of wings tattooed on her back."

"A tattoo? Let's see it." Lynn pushed away her salad.

A couple of others stopped talking and focused their attention on me too.

I shook my head, uncomfortable. "It's - "

Sydney interrupted. "It's huge. It takes up nearly her entire back."

One of the guys pawed my shoulder. "A tattoo, huh? You must get a thrill out of pain." His eyes raked over my body. "I can do things to you that'll hurt so good."

"Shut up, Drake." Sydney glared. So did Lynn.

All I was thinking is I'd like to see him try. "Pain doesn't really bother me."

"How do you know she has a tattoo? Been hittin' that?" Drake asked.

"I take it you haven't met your asshole quota for the day?"

Lynn laughed at Sydney's joke.

"Whatever. If we're keeping score, you obviously surpassed your bitch quota. Better slow down." He let out a raunchy laugh and the other guys at the table joined in.

Sydney's face fell. "If you must know I saw it when we were getting ready for gym."

"Saucy." Lynn forked a piece of fruit and popped it in her mouth.

"Well now we all want to see it," Drake continued, squeezing my shoulder. "Take off your shirt. I dare you."

I placed my hand over his and twisted. Pained surprise swirled over Drake's features. "Stop touching me."

I let go and he rubbed his hand. "What kind of freak are you?"

My face burned. That word again.

"Did you see what she did? No girl is that strong?" Drake's eyes burned with anger, but he didn't try anything.

Lynn threw a strawberry at Drake. It smacked him in the cheek and then landed on the table.

"Skank," he said. Picking up a napkin, he wiped the juice off his face.

"Douche," Lynn fired back.

I really didn't want to show them but decided I should. So I stood, pulled my shirt from my skirt and unbuttoned it.

The guys started whistling and laughing.

"Yeah, girl. Get on the table," one of them said.

"Here's some music." As he spoke, music blared from his phone.

I held my head high and gritted my teeth. When all the buttons were undone, I pulled my hair to one side and turned around as I lowered my shirt.

"Whoa." Drake said, his hand immediately forgotten.

"That's damn cool."

Abby and Sydney had already touched it. These guys were no different. They touched my skin and commented.

"Isn't it the freshest thing you've ever seen?" Sydney stood on her chair so she could look over the crowd. I kept my head down and didn't say anything. As a princess and the only vampire with wings, I'd been the center of attention on many occasions. Over time my uniqueness wore off. I hoped the same would happen in the human realm.

"I want one." I thought that came from Lynn.

"There's a fight in the cafeteria. Some guy is fighting Troy."

"Why?" I asked, only a little afraid for him. He was a supernatural after all. On top of that, he was a supernatural recruiter. Quickly, I shrugged on my shirt and buttoned it.

"Probably defending some girl's honor," one of the guys said sarcastically. "He's been here a week and already thinks he can take our place as ruler of the school."

"I hope he gets his ass kicked," Drake said.

"Let's go," a girl added.

While they packed up, I tucked in my shirt.

"Fame is fleeting." Lynn still sat at the table, watching me.

I shrugged. "I'm glad."

Lynn rolled her eyes. "Whatever. Your two seconds are up. Time to disappear." She stood, grabbed her books, and walked away, not even bothering to throw away her food. Sydney had gone inside already, leaving me alone. It was a refreshing reprieve. Though I wanted to know whether Troy was okay, I decided to wait. Sitting in one of the cold plastic chairs, I studied the courtyard. Huge trees with long, wispy branches dotted the landscape. It reminded me of home. I could imagine pixilettes fluttering through the leaves, collecting seeds. It made me miss Abrea. Maybe I should wish for her to become human. She could be like me - normal. But I shook away the thought as quickly as it came to mind. Abrea liked who she was. She liked what she did. Probably because she was like the rest of her kind. Every other pixilette had wings.

There weren't any vampires with wings. Except me.

"Hey, I've been looking for you." Cam slid into the chair next to mine. "Didn't you want to see the fight?"

"Is he okay?" Melancholy weighed on my heart, but I tamped it.

"Fine. Not even a scratch on him. The other guy wasn't as lucky. Troy gave him a bloody nose." He shook his head. "Yeah, the first day at a new school can be a bit overwhelming." He patted my hand.

His kindness and my mood caused tears to form on my lashes.

Cam leaned in. "No. No. You never let them see you cry." He shook his finger at me. "That's a sign of weakness and trust me the vultures will pounce." By the look on his face I guessed he was talking from experience.

"Got it." I wiped my eyes and sniffled.

"Better." He squeezed my hand. "What are your last two classes?"

"Calculus and history."

"Who do you have for history? That's my last class of the day as well."

I pulled the paper schedule from the front pocket of my backpack. "Mr. Henry." His last name was the same as my grandfathers. I hoped he was as nice.

"Awesome." Cam clapped his hands. "We have the same class. The teacher is great too. He makes history seem less like a snooze-fest and more like a time that was actually interesting."

"Hey pretty-boy, what are you doing at our table?"

I felt Cam freeze a second before he recovered. "See ya," he whispered to me. He stood and turned. "Hey Drake. Still sleep with your Dora the Explorer night light?"

I turned just in time to see Drake's eyes widen. "Shut your lying mouth before I shut it for you." He pushed Cam, causing him to stumble, but he held his ground.

Still, Drake was thicker and taller than Cam. If he laid so much as a finger on my new friend, I would break it.

I stood, preparing for a fight.

Drake gave me a once over. "What do you think you're doing?"

I pretended innocence, keeping my voice calm. "Cam is my friend. If he can't sit at this table then I don't want to sit here either." I moved closer so Cam and I were touching shoulders.

"Figures."

Sydney came outside. "What's going on?"

I stepped around Drake and walked past her. Cam followed. "Drake doesn't want us sitting at his table." I shrugged.

Sydney put her hands on her hips and stomped her foot. She didn't say anything for a second. I could tell she was having an internal debate, weighing the pros and cons of standing up for the new girl. Finally she said, "I'll see you around." She flipped her hair and walked over to the table.

I heard Drake. "She's a freak, just like pretty-boy. Stay away from her."

"I guess you're right," Sydney said.

I sighed.

Cam wrapped an arm around my shoulders. "Welcome to Salem Academy, home to witches, bitches, and trolls."

He wasn't all wrong. I laughed. "Good one."

TATTOO TROUBLE

CALCULUS WAS A JOKE. I had no idea what the teacher was talking about. He might as well have been speaking borkanese. I was beyond glad when class was over, even when the teacher had me stay after class so he could give me a syllabus and a book.

The layout of the school was beginning to make more sense and I found my history class on my own. If there was a dash and a number after the room number that was the floor the class was on. So history was 127-4. That meant it was on the fourth floor.

The bell rang as soon as I entered the room. Mr. Henry glanced up and did a double take. He stood, worry furrowing his brows. It was my grandpa. Professor Pops. But he told me he taught at Harvard. What was he doing here?

I waved slightly before sliding into the first seat I found.

"Jack. Jack. Over here."

I glanced up enough to see Cam waving me over. I got up and went over, sitting in the seat next to Cam's. In front of me was a very bulky guy. He might have troll blood flowing through his veins. He had a similar stench as well.

"You found the class. Good job." Cam gave me double thumbs up.

I returned the thumbs up but didn't have time to say anything before Mr. Henry started to speak. "Welcome. It appears we have new students."

Students plural? I searched the room for Peter and Zoe.

"Please stand, tell us your names and a little about yourself." I hunched down further in my chair.

"My name is Zoe. I moved here from Virginia with my boyfriend and his parents."

Mr. Henry gave her a strange look. "And your parents were okay with that?"

"My parents are dead. Peter's parents agreed to be my guardians since I had no other family."

"Oh, I'm so sorry to hear that." Mr. Henry wore his glasses resting on his forehead. He lowered them and glanced at a paper on his desk. "Peter, why don't you stand and tell us something about yourself."

I peered around the giant guy in front of me. Peter stood and surveyed the room before speaking. "I love football." He pumped his fist. Several guys in the room shouted in response, including the guy in front of me.

"Very good. Have a seat. There's one more. Where did she go?"

The students around me stared, waiting for me to stand.

I did so quickly. "I'm Jackie. I'm from Las Vegas. I like reading those trashy entertainment magazines."

Several students laughed, including Cam. "I knew we were meant to be friends."

Mr. Henry chuckled. "Excellent." He rested his glasses on his forehead again and clapped his hands. "Who can tell me how the second World War started?"

Over the next ninety minutes he talked about the war. Why it started. Which countries were involved. How many were killed. And so on. When class was nearly over, Mr. Henry passed out a paper. "This is your study guide for the test we'll be taking next week. Put it to good use people. I expect everyone to get an A, including you, Claude."

The large guy in front of me snickered. "Will do, Mr. Henry."

The bell rang.

"If the three new students could stay after class a few minutes, everyone else is excused."

I watched as the rest of the students filed out. Zoe and Peter sat a couple of rows over. They kept looking at each other. My heart raced so fast I thought I might keel over. Would Mr. Henry call me out? Make me go back home?

When only Peter, Zoe and I remained, Professor Pops waved us up to his desk.

Forcing myself not to look nervous, I picked up my backpack and made my way forward. Zoe and Peter didn't seem worried, but they didn't know my grandfather.

"This will only take a few moments." He handed each of us a few different papers. "As I said there will be a test next week. The rest of the students in this class have had weeks of in-class discussion and different assignments to help prepare them." He paused, tucking his reading glasses into the pocket of his sweater. "You haven't had the luxury. Hopefully in your previous school you studied the second World War?" He gave each of us a pointed look. Zoe and Peter answered they knew, so I said I did too. It was a lie, of course, and he knew it.

But he went along. "Good. Then there shouldn't be a problem. If you feel you need a refresher, do the handouts in front of you. I'll check them and give you extra credit."

Zoe and Peter put the papers in their bags and waited expectantly.

"That's it. Except - "

"Yes?" Peter asked, glancing first and Zoe and then me.

"I don't know if you heard about the brutal death in the woods south of us, but you need to be careful."

Peter and Zoe acknowledged they had.

"It's so sad," I said.

"Have they identified the body yet?" Peter asked.

"If they have, they aren't sharing." He rubbed a hand over his face. "I'm only telling you about it, so you won't go exploring without proper supervision." He glanced at me and said, "Better yet, just stay away from the woods altogether."

"Thanks, Mr. Henry," Zoe said, heading for the door. Peter waved.

"You're welcome."

They left the room.

"Yeah, thanks. I'm sure these will come in handy." I started toward the door.

"Uh, Jackie?" His face sparked with questions.

"Yes?" I turned around so that we were facing each other.

"Why are you doing this?" His eyes twinkled with genuine interest.

My shoulders sagged. Why hadn't Laeddin brought me to a school in a town where I didn't know anyone? Had he wanted me to fail? I knew wishes never turned out the way they were expected too.

"I just want to be normal for once." I forced myself not to stomp my foot in frustration.

"I understand. But where are your wings?" Worry creased his brow.

I glanced down at my shoes, unable to meet his kind eyes. "I wished them away."

He didn't speak for a long while. Finally I looked up.

"You're okay?" he asked. It was a simple question and I got the sense he wanted to ask a dozen more. I appreciated his restraint.

"I want this," I said, pleading with my eyes for him to understand.

"Very well. Be careful. Weird things have been happening around here of late. If you need help and can't get a hold of me, ask Troy."

"Got it," I said, glad we was going to let it go.

"If I sense there is a problem, I will have no choice but to tell your parents." His eyes narrowed. "But you should know your parents are smarter than most. They may already know where you are."

"Thank you, grandfather." I hugged him tightly.

He chuckled. "You're staying at your mom's old place?" He took a stack of papers and straightened them by banging one edge on the desk.

"That's right."

"All right then. Enjoy yourself. Don't do anything that would draw people's attention to me. Vampires are still outlawed here. Got it." He tapped the tip of my nose.

"Thanks. I will." As soon as I was outside the room, I took in a big gulp of air and immediately regretted it. The scent of blood pounded in my veins. That reminded me, I needed to ask Laeddin what he was thinking, giving me human blood. And on top of that, where did he get it?

SECRET PARTY

LAEDDIN WAITED for me exactly where he dropped me off several hours before. If I hadn't watched him drive away, I would've wondered if he ever left.

As I started down the stairs Sydney fell into step beside me. "Hey, Jack. Sorry about Drake. He's such a jerk."

"It's okay. Thanks again for all your help. I couldn't have made it through today without you."

She waved a hand in front of her face. "Sure. Sure. So listen. A bunch of us are getting together tonight. Just a little party to start the week off right. Want to come?" She was bouncing on the tips of her toes.

I glanced at Laeddin who was watching me.

"I'd love to. Thanks for the invite." I bounced on my toes. My first party.

"Great. Here's the directions. Wear something warm." She went down the rest of the stairs. "And Jack?"

"Yeah?" I clutched the paper she gave me. "Is that your dad in the car over there?" She pointed at Laeddin.

"Gah, no. He isn't my dad. He-he works for my mom and dad. He's staying with me until they can join me."

"Oh, lucky. Well tell your hot babysitter that you need a phone." Her laugh filled the air as she took the stairs.

"I will." I followed her.

"And Jack?" Her face was serious. "Tell no one about tonight. K?"

"I won't." I said, tucking the note into my backpack.

"I'm counting on you." She turned down the sidewalk and made her way to the parking lot. Drake was leaning against a tree and when she passed him, he pushed himself away from the trunk and fell into step with her.

"Everything set?"

"Yep. She's coming. Tonight's going to be fun."

Sometimes it sucked that I have super hearing. "What?" I whispered, a strange prickling feeling making hair on the back of my neck stand of edge.

"Jackie?" Laeddin looked at me impatiently.

"Hey Laeddin." I climbed in the car and buckled up.

"I see you made a friend. That's good." He started the car.

I turned to Laeddin and his eyes crinkled. He was happy for me.

"Yeah, I guess I did." No point telling Laeddin I was suddenly unsure if Sydney's friendship was sincere or part of something more sinister. I hoped I was wrong, but I'd never been one to back away from a challenge. If a couple of high school students thought they could hurt me, they'd be sadly mistaken.

"What's that look on your face?" Laeddin asked as he drove around the circle toward the exit.

"What look?" I raised my eyebrows, trying to settle my features as Laeddin pulled into traffic.

"The I'm-ready-for-a-fight look?" Nothing was getting past him.

He could read me already. I laughed, trying my best to make it seem like he had no idea what he was talking about. "You don't know me well enough to know my looks. It could've been my I-need-to-pee face."

"You forget I've been watching you for years. Tell me what's wrong."

I was stunned. He was right. I hadn't known he existed until just a few days ago, but he'd known about me for a lot longer. I didn't want to talk to him about it though. So I changed the subject. "Why did you give me human blood this morning?"

He gave me a bright smile. "I wondered how long it would take for you to figure it out."

"You're an idiot. What if I bit someone? Did you think about that?" I huffed. "Human blood tastes amazing, better than unicorn blood even."

He got serious. "I just wanted to make sure you could be satiated without blood from the seven magics."

"Well, I appreciate the thought. But there is no magic in human blood. It's kind of like those Pixy Stix you told me about the other night. You said they were like sugar crack, but that you couldn't survive on them. Human blood is like that for me. The taste is highly desirable, but it won't sustain me, at least not for long."

"Well you can't blame a genie for trying." He turned on the radio and we rode home without talking. When we got inside, Laeddin sat down on a stool. "Do you have any homework?"

"Yeah, I do. And I better get to it. That girl you saw me talking to?"

"What about her?" He bit into an apple.

"She invited me to a party."

"Tonight?" He chewed, swallowed and took another bite.

"Yes, tonight. I won't be gone long, but I do want to check it out. My first party invitation. I can't miss that." I grabbed hold of the banister and took the first step, still facing him.

Laeddin searched my face. "I guess." He turned and picked up a newspaper and flipped through it. "Have you heard about the dead guy?"

I was halfway up the stairs and I paused. "As a matter of fact, yes. I keep hearing about it. I promise I'll be careful."

"Stay out of the woods. Deal?" he continued as though he didn't hear me.

I took the steps two at a time and walked down the hall to the room that used to be my mom's.

"Deal?" he said louder.

"Yes, it's a deal. Sheesh!" I closed the door and fell back on my bed. Even after hours of meetings as the princess in Sharra, high school was still more challenging. I ran over the events of the day in my mind. It'd been very emotional, but I survived, even made at least two new friends - Abby and Cam. I thought again about Sydney and what she said to Drake. What did they intend to do tonight? Some kind of initiation?

I opened the piece of paper. Sydney's handwriting was neat but loopy. Some of her words were hard to decipher. She'd drawn a map though. I thought I could figure it out. It didn't look that far from my house.

DEMURA

I'D BEEN WALKING for ten minutes. I wasn't winded and I could see fine in the dark, but I was tired of getting around on two legs. I wanted to fly. The thought shocked me. I always believed I'd be perfectly happy without my wings. Happier even.

I shrugged the thought away. I needed to give myself more time to get used to life without them. I could do that.

At the end of the road was the forest, the one I promised Laeddin and Pops I would stay out of. A quick glance at the map verified I was to go in though.

I shouldn't be surprised.

Sometimes Abrea and I did things the grown-ups told us not to do. Nothing too serious. It was the way of children, I guess, to rebel against the wisdom of time. But I got the feeling the directions weren't telling me to go in for some harmless, rebellious fun. Instead, Sydney and Drake were planning something.

A jolt of anticipation shot through me.

Bring it on, I thought.

Stepping inside, I went stealthily forward knowing if there were really a party, I would hear it by now.

But the forest was so quiet.

The night draped still.

There wasn't even the sound of insects.

In the distance I could hear cars rushing by and the flicker of a streetlight, its hum sounding as it went off and on. Nothing more. No good would come of this.

If Sydney and her friends were waiting within, not even my vampire hearing could discern where they were.

I focused on a different sense. Breathing in, I searched for the aroma, the scent of their blood.

There was none. Not even that of animals. At least not nearby. How was that possible?

I continued on, heading over to a large boulder near what appeared to be a trail. I sat on the rock, cautious of the rough edges.

Obviously, there was no party, but it they wanted to hurt me, I would let them try.

At least until ten. If nothing happened in the next forty-nine minutes, then I would return to my new home.

The sky was lit up with so many stars. I searched for the constellations I'd seen from the night sky in Sharra.

The placement was different.

Still beautiful though.

A breeze picked up some leaves and rattled the branches. I watched them turn and sway.

Until a shadow appeared on the trail.

I hadn't heard him come up. He stood with his feet apart, his broad shoulders shrouded in a coat. I looked closer.

A red glimmer seemed to emanate from the area where his eyes should be.

"Hello?" I called.

The man took a step forward. "Come closer, little one. I cannot see your face."

His voice was low and carried along like a ghost. I was almost surprised when I heard it.

"Nah." I climbed off the boulder. "I'm going to go home."

Before I could move, he rushed over and had me by the throat.

A blade pressed against my neck.

With him so near, I could smell his sweat, the stench of his breath, even the steel of the blade.

I realized the reason I hadn't recognized he was there was that his scent was off. Like there was oil in his veins instead of blood.

"You picked the perfect night to die," he hissed slowly, pressing the knife into my flesh.

It pricked lightly, but it didn't hurt, only angered me.

I put my hand over his. "I'm not the one doing the dying tonight." I grabbed his fingers and twisted, pulling his fingers from the blade.

He cursed and tried to grab me with his other hand. I bent from his grasp and shoved the edge of my palm upward into his chin. His head flipped back with a crack. I turned to get away, but he was on me again.

"You can't leave, little one. You're too much fun to play with."

I growled and head butted him, fighting back a grin of satisfaction as I felt the back of my head connect with his nose.

He howled in pain and then started to laugh. "You aren't a human child." It was a statement not a question.

I faced him. "Surprise." I smirked. "What the hell are you?" My fangs pressed against my lips, ready to tear his throat out if necessary.

"This body is human, but his soul is no longer of this world. I've taken it over. My name is Izu. I am a demura. And this forest is my hunting ground."

I curved low, getting into a fighting stance. I had no idea what a demura was, but he should know that I was not his prey.

Opening my mouth, I released my fangs.

The man's blood smelled rotten. No way I would drink from him, but my fangs were razor sharp and made a great weapon.

"Izu, tonight is not your night." I lunged.

As soon as I landed on his back, there was a high-pitched squeal and then dark energy emerged from the man's body.

I watched it curl and coil into a shape with horns before it wisped upward.

"You haven't seen the last of me, vampire. Prepare yourself for suffering." The demura disappeared into the thickness of the forest.

With the ghost-like creature gone, the empty corpse dropped like a rock in a pond, taking me with it.

In seconds the body shriveled, the skin, muscle, and soft tissue disintegrated, leaving only the man's bones.

Shuddering, I untangled myself.

The dry bones clacked together like a musical instrument.

"Creepy," I whispered, standing up and brushing off my pants. I'd been studying supernatural creatures and magic and more my whole life.

That was what the Seven Magics Academy was for.

But this? I glanced over the direction the demura had gone.

The demura weren't in any books. Old or otherwise.

The sounds of the forest slowly returned. Crickets. Little animals rooting around in the dirt. An owl hooted in a tree off to my right.

Whatever the demura was, it was gone for now, leaving only the bones of the dead man.

I needed to tell someone.

Pops came to mind, but I didn't want to disappoint him.

If he knew I went into the woods, even after he asked me not to, he might send me back to Sharra. I wasn't going there.

Instead, I ran back to the house, up the stairs, and threw open Laeddin's bedroom door.

He sat up with a start. "What is it?" He blinked, bleary-eyed. "Was the party fun?"

"Well," I began, my breathing coming rapidly. "If that's how human parties really are, I don't want to go to another."

He pulled off the covers and sat on the edge of the bed. It was then

I noticed he wasn't wearing a shirt and his pajama pants were white with navy stripes.

Moonlight shone through the windows. It seemed strange to me the curtains were open instead of closed.

I wondered how he slept with all the light. But the light made his body gleam.

And his blood? Spicy sweetness with a tang of copper.

My fangs were still out, which made the smell even more delicious.

My mouth watered. It took every ounce of effort not to jump on him and sink my fangs into the pulse at his neck.

"What happened," he asked, seemingly oblivious to my thirst. He patted the spot next to him on the bed.

FANGS IN YOUR NECK

I RETRACTED my fangs and closed my mouth, holding my breath. Then sat.

He rubbed his jaw and I heard the scratchiness from his unshaven beard.

"Jasmine?" Laeddin really looked at me. "What is it?" He scooted closer.

Even with me holding my breath, his scent still had me drooling.

I covered my nose and my mouth, but that didn't help either.

Standing, I ran to my room, and slammed the door.

It was like I was five again and couldn't control myself. I knew I couldn't have his blood, but the fire burning in my throat didn't care.

"Jasmine?" There was a knock on the door.

"It's nothing. I'm fine." I could smell his blood through the door.

"Can I come in?" His voice took on a softer tone.

"Nooooo." I ran to my bed and flung myself on it before grabbing a pillow and jamming it over my face. There was a lingering scent of my mother. Or maybe I only imagined that.

Laeddin sighed but didn't walk away. "I'm opening the door," he said gently. He poked his head in. "Hey, tell me what's wrong."

"Everything." I rolled away, embarrassed.

The bed sank and I knew Laeddin sat down. He put a hand on my shoulder, but I shrugged it off.

"Jasmine?" There was exasperation laced within his concern.

"It's your blood," I blurted. "How am I supposed to talk to you when all I want to do is sink my fangs into your neck and drink and drink and drink." My voice was quiet and shaky.

"Ahhhh, now I understand." He pulled me so I was leaning against his chest.

"Are you trying to torture me?" I turned so that my lips nearly touched his jaw. It wouldn't take much to overpower him, grab hold of his neck and drink his blood.

"No, Jasmine. I would never do that." There was a hint of humor in his voice.

I wanted to show him he shouldn't be teasing a vampire, especially one such as me. My fangs came out again and grazed his neck. Blood came to the surface. It smelled so good I was almost in a frenzy.

Laeddin pulled away. "Hey." His face and tone were angry.

I stood, my breathing ragged. "Hey yourself, Laeddin." I licked the blood on my tooth. My eyes rolled back at the sensation and flavor. It was infused with a different type of magic than what I experienced before. Having tasted all seven of the magics, I searched to find which one his tasted most like. It was as though all seven existed inside him at once, but at the same time wholly different. I wondered what the genie's origins were, which reminded me of the demura called Iza.

Laeddin touched his neck at the place I grazed. Then flipped on the light and looked at his reflection. "How dare you?" He was angry, furious. His chest rose and fell heavily.

"I could say the same to you. You knew I wanted your blood. I just told you again how much it called to me." I covered my mouth, took a deep breath, and removed my hand. "Yet, you kept pushing. I needed you to see that I could take it if I wanted." I was angry too.

Laeddin swore. "Okay. You're right. I'll keep my distance - Unless you want to use your last two wishes?"

I swallowed and gave a rapid shake to my head. I didn't want him to leave. If anything, after tasting his blood, I wanted him to stay even more. Why couldn't he just let me have a little? I was about to ask him, but he left the room before I had the chance.

"Whatever." I slammed the door shut. Between the demura attack and Laeddin flipping out, I was done. Sydney told me to dress warm. She set me up. Did she and Drake know what was in the woods? Or were they just hoping whatever was out there would kill me? That seemed beyond harsh especially for normal high school kids. Living in the human realm was confusing. I thought it would be so simple.

I snorted. Definitely not simple.

Tomorrow at school I would confront Sydney.

Tonight though I needed the air and the sky. I changed out of my jeans, sweater, and jacket and into a pair of black PJs with teal polka dots. I loved the feel of the silky material against my skin. Then I washed my face and brushed my hair. Finally I went to the window, threw back the curtains, and opened it. Night sounds filled the silence and I relaxed against the light breeze.

From the window I saw the house next door. It was enormous. Lights illuminated the entire edge of the roof. I wondered what my grandfather was doing and if any of my uncles were still up.

I went to my closet to decide what I would wear tomorrow. I chose a pair of skinny jeans, red heels, and a white and red ruffled tank with a small red sweater. I was kind of short, so I really liked the heels. Plus they were patent leather and shiny.

I turned around and stifled a scream. A gray cat was perched at the foot of my bed. Its front paws were crossed, and it was watching me.

"Where did you come from?" I glanced over at the window. "Did you get in through my here?" Clearly.

It licked its nose.

"Well, you need to go." I walked over and moved to pick the cat up. A rumble came from its chest. "Are you purring?" I kneeled in front of it. "Don't do that." My heart softened for the kitty. "Fine." It moved closer. I reached out and scratched it between the ears. "If you're going to stay, you need a name." The cat rubbed its head against my hand. "Let's see - How about Clifford?"

The cat yowled.

"Okay, no." The cat rolled onto its back. I scratched its belly. It purred. "How about Isabel?"

It seemed to understand because he yowled again.

"Okay. Okay." I laughed. It rolled further onto its back. "Ohhh, you're a boy cat." He flipped onto his stomach. "Fine no more girl names. How about Jasper?"

He shook his head.

"Weird. I swear you know what I'm saying."

He blinked.

"Frank? Isaac? Bill?"

He settled down more firmly on the bed and covered his eyes with his paws. I leaned back, resting my heels on the backs of my legs. "How about I just call you Cat?"

"Gatsby. For the love of all that is good. My name is Gatsby, child." The frustrated words left the cat's mouth and I understood him perfectly.

That wasn't normal in the human realm, unless he was a shifter. "You spoke?" I backed away, afraid of what else he might be able to do.

"If I hadn't said something you never would've guessed." He licked his paw.

"Probably not," I agreed. "Now that I know you can talk, why don't you tell me why you're in my room?" I climbed on the bed and under the covers. Whatever surprise I first felt quickly vanished. Yet another supernatural living in the human realm. I wondered what was the draw? But I couldn't judge. I was drawn here too.

"This was my room long before it was yours, vampire." He blinked and a whisper of familiarity blew through me.

An O formed on my lips. "You were my mom's cat. I remember now. But that was a long time ago. You must be - " I did the math in my head. "Ancient."

"Evidently I don't age like normal cats." He hopped off the bed and walked over to the window. "I know why you're here and while I don't agree with your choices, I understand them. I'll be around." He sprang onto the sill and jumped out the window. I dashed over, thinking surely he couldn't survive the fall, but Gatsby was gone.

Alone, I went to my desk, and flipped open the laptop Laeddin provided as part of normal human experience. I turned it on and pulled up the internet. I typed in the word DEMURA. The only listing that came up was about a Japanese guy who was a karate master. That told me nothing. Neither did PARANORMAL MIST and DEMON MIST. The clock on the nightstand next to my bed said school started in four hours. I needed to get some sleep.

Yawning, I turned out the light and climbed under the covers.

MAKE YOU MINE

I ROLLED over and opened my eyes. It was still dark outside. Wind blew the curtains like teal butterflies in the breeze. My vision became blurry and the bedroom disappeared.

"What's happening?" I was spinning and falling through different colored rings of light.

Down.

Down.

Down.

My body hit bottom with a thud. A moan escaped my lips as I rolled onto my knees and then stood. "Hello?" I turned slowly trying to let my eyes adjust to the utter darkness. As a vampire my vision was exceptional, but wherever I was, it was of no use. "Hello?" I shouted again.

From a distance I could hear something beating against the air. It seemed to be getting closer. Fear turned my stomach and made my throat dry.

"Where am I?"

The beating stopped. "Hello, Jasmine."

"Who's there?" I squinted, hoping that would help me to see better.

"The one who will steal your heart and make you mine." His voice sounded close.

I reached out to touch him, but only air passed through my fingers.

"No you aren't. I am no one's. Tell me who or what you really are?"

"It pains me to realize you don't recognize my voice."

His voice did echo of familiarity, but I couldn't place where I heard it before. "Show yourself."

A deep laugh rumbled all around me. "Of course I could, but where would be the fun in that? Why don't you take a guess?"

Fear laced with anger bubbled within my body. "Why don't you come closer first?" If I could get my hands on him, I could overpower him, and drain him dry.

"Tsk-Tsk, vampire. Those contemplations aren't very becoming."

I blinked several times, trying to see something in the inkiness. He could read my thoughts. Had I still possessed the magic of the seven I could block his tactics.

"Very true, but thanks to the genie, I can hear every thought that goes through your pretty little head."

I growled in frustration and dove forward, hoping to tackle him to the ground with the element of surprise. My arms grabbed air and I face planted.

"How very graceful. I'll remember that move. Perhaps I can put it to good use."

"You can't do anything to me or with me or for me! I don't know you and I don't want to know you!" My chest heaved with furious frustration as I got to my knees. "Now send me back to my bedroom."

"Do you mean the one in Sharra? Or the one that used to be Snow White's? Choose wisely, dear Jasmine."

For the briefest moment I thought about returning home to my mom and dad, to Abrea, and the land of Sharra. But I wasn't ready to go back.

"Send me to my room in the human realm." I crossed my arms, forcing myself to take a deep breath.

"I see. You are the most extraordinary creature in the world yet instead of embracing what makes you special, you choose to bury it, wish it away, like it means nothing. You've chosen normal, or at least as normal as a vampire can be. I think you'll find normal is an insignificant term and highly overrated."

"You don't know what you're talking about." I turned away, unwilling to listen.

"You don't have to believe. Soon enough you'll come to the realization on your own. I just hope it isn't too late."

"Oh, it won't be. I know what I'm doing." I ground my teeth together, flexing my jaw.

"Fine, but before you go back to the human realm, and your pseudo life, let me leave you with something. Arms suddenly encircled my waist and I was pulled against a taut chest. A delectable aroma came from him, like apples baked in cinnamon and nutmeg. I thought about pushing him away, but my body disagreed. His lips came down on mine, soft but firm.

Let me go, I screamed in my mind.

His laugh filled every crevice until I thought I would die at the sound.

My body began to spin and just before I closed my eyes, two red orbs appeared directly in front of me -

OceanofPDF.com

A BAD DREAM

A SCREAM RIPPED from my throat and I shot upright. There was a thump outside my bedroom. I clawed at the covers, pulling them up around my chin.

The door burst opened and Laeddin appeared.

"What's going on?" His eyes frantically searched the room for danger.

"I - "

The worry on his face was replaced by irritation.

"Sorry. I had a bad dream."

Laeddin looked like he wanted to say something. He opened his mouth, but instead of words, he snorted and left.

"Man, graze a genie with fangs one time and the world ends." I lay back down and stared at the ceiling. Shadows slithered and danced. I thought about the demura and the way it left the body of that man like a shadow. Had it come into my room and given me the dream? I jumped out of bed, closed the window and pulled the curtains shut. My stomach twisted itself in knots. Strange sounds seemed to be coming from everywhere and nowhere. I flipped on the light and glanced around the room.

What had my mom done when she had a bad dream? Did she ever get them?

I walked over to the pictures of my mom, my dad and his brothers, and Cindy still hanging over the dresser. At first, I wanted to take them down, but when I actually started, I wasn't able to go through with it. I liked seeing my mom so carefree. A teenager. I was sure the younger version of her would agree with my choice. Staring at the smiling faces of my Uncles, Cindy, my mom and dad in photographs gave me the courage to turn off the light and go to bed. The dream was just that, a dream. Nothing more. Definitely not my first kiss.

WHEN MY ALARM WENT OFF, I got ready for school. With each task I worked to block out the dream. I put on the outfit I chose the night before and did my hair in a loose braid. I decided on thicker eyeliner and a sparkling red lip-gloss. When I was done, I left my room and walked past Laeddin's. The door was closed. I thought about knocking but decided against it. I didn't understand why he was acting this way. I knew I could've commanded him to come out, but that wasn't the kind of person I was. So I went downstairs and opened the fridge. There was a glass of blood just as the day before. I took it and chugged it down. I also checked for peppermint. I knew it had to be in there. I could smell it. I found it in the crisper. I took a bright green sprig from the bunch, pulled my braid over my shoulder, and tucked it into the ponytail holder at the end.

School started in twenty minutes, but I didn't know how I was going to get there. I could run, but there was a possibility I might be seen moving at faster speeds than were possible for a human.

I thought about going upstairs to ask Laeddin but paused on the bottom step.

Luckily, he came out of his room just at that moment. Wearing jeans low on his hips and a white shirt that still needed to be buttoned, leaving his very well-muscled chest exposed, and me feeling breathless at the sight of him.

My hunger for his blood rose up like a wave. I swear he was torturing me. "Hi." I waved, hoping his anger was forgotten.

"Hello, Mistress." He bowed before pushing past me at the bottom of the stairs. Opening the fridge he grabbed an apple, took his car keys from the counter, and held the front door open. "If you want to get to school on time, you'd better hustle."

My body sagged with sadness. If he was going to be mad at me the whole time we were here, my fun would be over before it began. "Wow, you hold a serious grudge. Did they teach you that in genie school?"

"Ha. Ha." Laeddin started the car, put it into gear, and roared out of the driveway.

We drove in silence until he stopped in front of the school. "I'll be here after school."

I got out. "Great. And by the way, I need a cell phone. It's part of the normal teenage experience and having one should be part of my wish."

"Very well." He snapped his fingers and an orange rectangular box appeared on the passenger seat.

"Any idea how to work it?" I asked, suddenly feeling incapable of using the technology.

"There are instructions. Turn it on. It'll work. Everything is ready to go, and a valid phone number is listed inside."

I picked up the box and tucked it into my backpack. "Thank you, Laeddin." I gave him a sunny smile, but he wasn't looking. His focus was straight ahead, the way it'd been since we left the house. "Ugh." I stomped away and up the stairs.

Before reaching the entrance, I wanted to check my schedule for class numbers. There was a concrete bench off to the side and I went to it. Sat and opened my backpack to find my schedule.

Today was an A day, which meant I had chemistry, Homeroom, accounting, lunch, English, and finally Spanish. By this school's standards I was a senior. Most of the twelfth grade classes were on the upper floors. Working to find happiness with my decision to be normal, I zipped my bag and hefted it onto my shoulder. Then went inside.

Students laughed, joked, and chatted while making their way up and down the halls and the stairs. All around me was normal, yet I couldn't grab hold. It was as though I had the word "different" on a sign around my neck, or that I was looking at life through glass. A few times people bumped into my backpack, knocking it off my shoulder. They didn't bother to stop or apologize. It made me wonder if they knew I was there. The coppery sweet scent of their blood was strong and enticing, but I kept my braid over my shoulder so I could smell the peppermint first.

"Hey, Jack." Cam fell into step beside me. Not an easy feat considering the number of students around. "Did you hear they found a bunch of bones on one of the trails leading into the forest earlier this morning?"

"Oh?" I gripped my backpack strap like I needed to strangle it.

"Yeah, the police don't know what to make of it."

"Odd," I said and swallowed. Sweat formed on my upper lip. I was nervous he would see the truth and discover what I was.

"It really is." He gave me a reassuring look. Cam was a good guy. Between him and Abby I felt lucky to have met two such nice humans in a short amount of time.

Cam knew how to dress too. Today he wore purple jeans and a tight short-sleeved white t-shirt. It stood out against his dark skin but matched his teeth perfectly. "You look really nice."

"Thanks." He pulled at his shirt and sniffed. "Fashion is what I live for."

"Well, it shows." I laughed, enjoying the easy camaraderie between us.

"You look damn good yourself. Where do you shop?"

I blushed at the compliment. "I got this outfit at Bloomingdales. In New York?" Surely, he heard of the store. I was from a whole other realm and I heard of the store.

"Yes, Jack. I know where Bloomingdales is." He patted my arm. "So what's your first class?"

"Chemistry with Heiner." I gave him a questioning glance, asking with my raised eyebrows if that was good or not.

He scrunched his nose and stuck out his tongue. I immediately understood it wasn't.

"Is it going to be awful?" Someone bumped into my shoulder, rocking me back.

"At least you're getting it out of the way first thing. Just hold your breath when he walks by. His stench is something kind of otherworldly." He walked me to the door. "Have fun. I'll see you at lunch."

"See you." I walked by the classroom, peeking at the teacher as I went by. He was a bigger man with thinning brown hair. The bottom half of his round face was covered in a beard. He wore a brown jacket with stains in the armpits. And his stench? Cam was right. He smelled - like a troll. His blood didn't have the same bouquet as the rest of the humans.

Mr. Heiner looked up from the book he held in his meaty fingers as I came in. Without stopping, I went over to the desks and down the first row.

The room was large. Individual desks were lined up in rows near the front of the room. Behind them was almost a whole other room. It looked like a laboratory. I took a seat in an empty chair.

The bell rang. Mr. Heiner was about to close the door when Sydney and Drake walked in.

I sat up straighter, my eyes following their every move. When they sat in two seats next to each other, I kept watch.

Mr. Heiner started to talk, but I didn't pay attention. I was too focused on burning a hole in Sydney's and Drake's backs.

They sent me into the forest in hopes I'd what? Die? I mean how could they be such jerks?

When the bell rang, signaling the end of class, I moved a little more quickly than humans could, too upset to control myself. I sat on

Sydney's desk before she had a chance to stand. "Hey Sydney."

Her blue eyes grew to the size of twin pools. "Jack?"

I crossed my legs and took on my most princess-like demeanor. "That's right. Alive and well." I kept my features serene - at least I tried to.

"What are you doing?" Drake asked, grabbing my shoulder.

I took his hand and twisted, making him stand, and his upper body lean sideways.

"Stop," he whined.

I turned so I could face him fully and glared. "Don't ever touch me again."

Tears caused his eyes to shine as he pleaded for release. "I won't."

"Good." I let go and turned my attention back to Sydney.

"So, great party last night, you two. Wow. It was like so awesome. I can't believe you guys missed it, especially since you invited me."

Sydney swallowed, clutching the side of her desk. Her heart raced, the blood pumping through her veins. Drake's too. The aroma of their blood wasn't as appealing as some, but it was most definitely human.

"I ran into - " I stopped midsentence, no longer in the mood to play coy. "Why did you send me out there alone?"

Like a puma, she pounced on my honesty. Her fear forgotten, she smirked. "Don't be a baby, it was just a little prank. You weren't hurt." She stood, hooking her sparkly backpack on one shoulder. "No harm done." She patted my arm.

"Yeah, it was just a prank. Get over yourself," Drake added, still rubbing his hand.

A low growl rose up in my throat as my fangs pricked my lips. Hands clenched into fists, I forced myself to let them walk away.

A NEW TREND

WHEN LUNCH fiNALLY ROLLED AROUND, I was beyond ready. I also had a better idea how to find my way to the cafeteria today. Zoe and Peter were kissing at the bottom of one set of stairs as I made my way down. They stopped when I passed.

I waved, embarrassed. "Hey guys. Didn't mean to interrupt."

They pulled apart, though they took the other's hand. "Jackie. It's nice to see you. How's your second day been treating you?"

"Uh." I pulled at the end of my braid, twisting it around a finger.

"What's this?" Zoe asked, indicating the wilted leaf in my hair.

"It's peppermint." I touched it lightly.

Zoe and Peter gave each other a strange look. I had the feeling they were communicating.

Peter patted my shoulder. "What a great idea." He leaned in to smell it.

"Yes, it is," Zoe said. "I think I'll wear some in my hair tomorrow, if that's okay."

"Sure." Maybe I would start a new trend.

They each took one of my arms. We went down the remaining steps and into the cafeteria like that. As soon as we entered, the cafeteria got quiet and everyone looked over.

"What?" Peter asked, stepping in front of Zoe and me. "Do I have something in my teeth? Or, something up my nose?" He wiped the tip of his nose with a finger.

Everyone laughed and went back to whatever they were doing. Zoe turned. "If you ever need a friend, I hope you'll consider me. Other than Peter, I don't know anyone." Her voice was soft and sincere.

"I'd like that," I said and meant it.

Cam appeared at my side. "Hey guys. We eating together?"

Zoe and I looked at each other and then said, "Sure," at the same time.

"Thanks for the invite, man." Peter clapped him on the back, kind of like a father would his son.

Cam chuckled nervously and rolled Peter's hand away. "Good. Good." He clapped his hands happily. "Let's get in line. I'm starving."

Peter, Zoe and Cam moved toward the food, but I stayed behind.

Zoe turned back. "You coming?"

I shook my head. "Not hungry."

Cam studied me. "You don't have issues with food, do you?"

"Of course not," I said, defensively. "I'm just not hungry." I hoped that was an acceptable answer because there was no way I was eating human food.

"You want to find us a table then?" he asked.

"Sure."

While Zoe, Peter, and Cam stood in line, I searched the room. In one of the corners, there was a round table with a lone person sitting at it. Her nose was in a book, while an untouched sandwich and water bottle sat in front. I knew instantly it was Abby and hurried over.

"Hey Abby."

"Jack," she said, closing her book without marking it.

"Mind if me and a few friends sit with you?"

She immediately closed herself off. "Who are these friends?"

I pointed toward the line. "Cam. Zoe. And, Peter."

She visibly relaxed. "I know Cam, of course, but who are the other two?"

I slid into one of the empty chairs. "Zoe and Peter are new to the school as well. I don't know much about them, but they seem nice."

She shrugged. "As long as it isn't Sydney and her nasty friends, I'm good with it."

"Great." I set my backpack on the ground and unzipped it. I wanted to get a handle on my new cell phone.

"Aren't you going to eat?" Abby asked, taking a bite of her food. It smelled like peanut butter.

"I'm not hungry. Probably nerves." I set the orange box on the table in front of me.

Abby got out of her chair and came to sit next to me. "Is that the new O-Phone?

"I think so," I said, her excitement fueling mine.

"Well, open it. Let's have a look."

I took off the top and placed it on the table. "Now what?" I asked, looking at her.

"Allow me." She took out a thick, light orange booklet. "These are your instructions. Don't lose this, you might need it."

"Okay," I said seriously.

Beneath that was a black screen. I guessed it was the actual phone. Abby took it out carefully. "Here it is. The best phone on the planet. It can do just about anything."

"Really?" I took it from her outstretched hand. It was light. The sides and back were orange, the same color as the box, with a silver vector image of an orange etched into the metal. "It's really pretty."

"It's more than pretty. It's awesome. The processor is faster than most computers. If another person has an O-Phone, you can talk to each other as holograms. When you search for content, if you want you can ask it to read the information for you as it shows you holographic pictures."

"Cool," I said, pretending I understood what she was talking about.

"Mind if I turn it on?" Her face was animated.

"Go for it."

She pressed a button on top and held it until an orange appeared on the screen. Then it flashed and a screen filled with different circles popped up.

Cam, Zoe, and Peter arrived at the table.

"An O-Phone. You're so lucky," Cam said.

We spent the rest of lunch figuring out how to work my phone. I noticed Abby, Cam, and Peter ate most of their food, but Zoe only picked at hers. She seemed almost as disgusted by the sustenance as I was.

When the first bell rang, we all stood up.

"Want to hang out after school?" Abby asked.

"I'd love to." I lifted my backpack and shouldered it.

"We could go over to my house and watch TV. I have all the seasons of The Vampire Diaries." Abby clutched her book to her chest.

"The what?" She wanted to watch a show about vampires. Had she guessed what I was? My heart beat wildly.

Abby dropped her backpack on the table. "Please tell me you've heard of The Vampire Diaries. I know it's kind of old school, but it's seriously so good."

I got the feeling saying no would be social suicide. "I mean I've heard of it. Of course. But I've never watched it."

That seemed to appease her. She wrapped her arm around mine. "Well, we are going to rectify that terrible tragedy starting this afternoon."

"Okay." She reminded me a little of Abrea. Kind. Busy. Energetic.

"I'm off to chemistry. Wanna meet at the front doors right after school?" She walked backward in the opposite direction of me.

"Sure." As I walked to class, I remembered Laeddin would be waiting. I didn't want to make him even angrier.

Oh, what do I do?

During Spanish I noticed a couple of students raise their hand and ask to go to the bathroom. I thought that was strange, but it gave me an idea.

I raised my hand.

"Si, Ms. Ryder." Mrs. Sanchez rolled the R in Ryder.

"May I go to the bathroom?"

"Si." She held up a colorful hat.

I lifted my backpack and walked to her desk. "Muchas gracias," I said taking the hat.

Out in the hall I searched for a bathroom. It was weird walking the halls without the crush of the other students, but eventually I found one down a ways and on the left. I pushed the door open and walked in.

My first experience with a public bathroom? Not great! There were three sinks and four stalls, a toilet in each stall. I chose the furthest stall in hopes that it would give me the most privacy, made my way past the mirror with a curse word scrawled on it in what I guessed was lipstick, and closed the door.

"Laeddin," I whispered. I had no idea if it would work but I hoped so. I needed to talk with him. After ten seconds he still hadn't shown, so I whisper-yelled his name again. "Laeddin."

He appeared within the stall, so close to me I could immediately smell his spicy sweet blood. "What is this place?" He crinkled his nose.

I took the end of my braid and brought it to my nose. "This is a bathroom at school."

"It's barbaric." He leaned back. "And crowded."

I took a deep breath through my nose. Peppermint. I only smell peppermint, I chanted internally. "I just wanted to tell you I'm going to a friend's house after school."

Laeddin glared. "You brought me into this smelly bathroom to tell me that?"

My insides shot with pain. Why was he acting so mean? "It's called consideration. I didn't want you to drive all the way to the school so I could tell you that I was going home with someone else."

"I appreciate your thoughtfulness, Jasmine." He gave me a look of complete disdain. "Just think, if you would've given me the same respect before biting me, our conversation might be less abrupt."

"You're a jerk. If you hadn't flaunted your delicious blood - " I pushed my finger into his chest. "I wouldn't have grazed your stupid neck." I flipped the collar of his shirt in irritation. "And get a cell phone so in the future I can call or text you."

"Call? Text?"

"Yes, it's all part of the human experience. Get yourself an O-phone and figure it out."

The door to the bathroom opened.

"Go," I mouthed.

His eyes flickered to the colorful hat I held in my other hand. He lifted a brow in question.

"It's nothing," I whispered.

He rolled his eyes and vanished.

I flushed the toilet and opened the stall door. A girl was applying mascara. "Hey." I turned on a sink and washed my hands.

She ignored me and continued what she was doing.

HOT GUYS

ABBY WAS WAITING by the front door, just as we discussed. "Jack, you ready to go?"

I bounced up and down on the balls of my feet. "Yep." I pushed open the front doors and stepped out, holding it open for Abby.

Drake rushed past, knocking Abby over.

I caught her before she landed on the ground. "Rude." I smacked him in the chest, sending him flying back. He tumbled into a group of students, knocking them over as he went, like the human version of bowling.

"Freak?" He held the back of his head. "Why'd you do that?" Drake's face was a mixture of shock and anger. Blood leaked from his eyebrow and he touched it tenderly.

The salty and coppery aroma snuck up on me. My fangs fought to break free, the sharp tips grazing my bottom lip. I wanted him, his blood. I dove onto Drake and licked the blood.

"Dude?" Drake grabbed my arms and pushed me back. He looked scared and a little fascinated. "What kind of crazy are you?' He glanced around at the other students and replaced his abhorrence with a smirk. "I can work with that," he said, his swagger returning.

I scrambled to my feet. Abby gave me a strange stare. Did she think I was crazy too? Probably.

But she stuck out her hand. "Get off the stupid teenaged boy."

I clasped her fingers but didn't need them and used my vampire power to get on my feet. "Let's get out of here." Drake was saying something, but I ignored him, and didn't bother looking back.

"Agreed." She ran down the steps and I followed.

Abby's car was a dilapidated old mustang. The body was like a patchwork quilt of parts and when I opened the door, it sounded like nails on a chalkboard.

When she turned on the car, music from the nineteen nineties thumped from the speakers.

"Get buckled," she said as she pulled on her own.

Once the belt clicked, she carefully backed up and we were out of the parking lot without incident. I had homework. So did Abby, but we decided to ignore it. When we got to her house, she grabbed treats and we headed upstairs.

Her room was decorated in pink, white, and black, and the wall across from the bed was wallpapered in cherry blossoms. A large window with a cushioned seat under it was on one side. On the other was a built-in desk with bookshelves along the sides and across the top. Her bedspread and carpet were white and decorative pillows in pink and black covered her bed. A walk-in closet was to the left of the door and a bathroom was on the right. Against the wall with the cherry blossom paper sat a dresser with a large screened TV hanging from the wall.

"I swear you're going to love this show. It's the best." She was giddy as she opened her laptop. We laid on our stomach's side by side on her bed. The next few hours were spent watching the first four episodes of The Vampire Diaries

Between us was a bag of candy. It was long and red and had cartoonish pictures of cherries on the front. It smelled nothing like cherries.

"Want one?" Abby asked, holding one of the red ropes out.

I wrinkled my nose. "No. Thanks."

"Okay, more for me." She took a bite and returned her focus to the show.

It was weird, watching a TV show about vampires. The rules of the show were complicated and strange. In my world, there was magic, and vampires called the originals, but that was where the similarity between truth and fiction ended. Probably the most distressing knowledge was that none of the vampires in the show had wings.

Maybe I really am a freak, I thought unhappily.

"You like this?" I gave her a sideways glance. It was obvious she did. Her body tensed and she hung on every word.

"Don't you?" She was incredulous. "It's got everything. Hot guys. Unrequited love. Vampires." She paused the show. "I mean vampires and kissing vampires and drama and angst and more drama. It's like the best show ever." She seemed serious. "Sometimes I close my eyes and pretend I'm Elena and Damon bites my neck and drinks from me." Her eyes danced with joy. "It seems so sensual, like the bond would be so powerful. I wish the government hadn't banned all supernatural creatures from our realm. Having a vampire boyfriend would be so romantic."

Who was I to disagree? "So far, it seems pretty good."

Abby searched my face, waiting for more.

"It is stupid that vampires aren't allowed in this realm. Seriously," I added, hoping I sounded like an angsty teenager myself.

"Right? I mean they could just ban the bad ones and let us keep the good ones." She got off the bed.

"Where are you going?" I hoped she wasn't upset I didn't share her passion for the show.

"I need a drink. You want one?" She walked to the door and paused, waiting for my answer.

I did want a drink. Of blood. Rich and thick and nourishing. I casually wondered what Abby would think if she found out I was a vampire, that like her favorite show, she had a friend who loved the dark and the taste of blood. Immediately I knew it would scare her. I also knew if I turned down a drink, she might get suspicious.

"Water, if you've got it."

She visibly relaxed. I hadn't realized how tense she was. "Sure. I'll be right back."

By agreeing to a human drink I calmed her, but my anxiety began to build. I never drank water before, nor had I tasted human food. In Sharra, my dad usually ate a blueberry bagel with strawberry cream cheese, his "go to" breakfast, although sometimes he switched it up and would have pancakes or eggs and bacon. Whatever he ate, he was normally done before I ever came down for my breakfast. What if I took a drink of the water and it burned or tasted terrible or made me puke? Could I pretend to drink it? The answer worried me. I waited nervously, considering my options if something strange happened.

It seemed to be taking Abby a long time to return. Using my unique hearing, I listened. Outside I heard birds, the sounds of small animals rummaging, insects buzzing and burrowing, a spider spinning her web, and a large family of rabbits. I turned my focus inside. There was breathing, though it was erratic. Was she scared?

I quickly left the bedroom and went in search of Abby. Her home was large, but easily maneuverable. I made my way downstairs to the kitchen, figuring that was where she would've gone for a drink. She wasn't there. But the refrigerator door hung open. That sent up a warning sign.

"Abby." I closed the fridge, walked out of the kitchen and turned down a small hallway. There were three closed doors. One on the left, one straight ahead, and one on the right. I pulled the one on the left open first. The room contained a washer and dryer. There were cupboards, a counter, and a sink. An ironing board and other laundry things. But Abby wasn't inside.

I opened the door straight ahead. It was a garage. It was dark, but I could see easily enough. She wasn't there.

I went to open the door on the right, but it was locked.

"Abby," I called again.

"I'm almost done, Jack. Sheesh, you scared me."

My fears immediately subsided. She was only using the bathroom.

"Sorry." I paused. "Did you want me to grab the drinks?"

"That'd be great. I'll be right there."

"K, what do you want?"

"A soda. They're in the fridge."

That reminded me the refrigerator door had been left open. "You sure you're alright?"

She didn't answer right away. That made me nervous. "Abby."

A low growl. "Give me some privacy. Jeez," she barked.

"Sorry," I said again, feeling embarrassed. I went back to the kitchen, grabbed a soda and a bottle of water, and then walked back upstairs to her bedroom.

I decided to see what the water tasted like while Abby was out of the room. Opening the bottle, I brought the liquid to my lips and took a sip. It wasn't bad, kind of refreshing. I took another. As the liquid went down my throat, it coated and sunk into my stomach. It wasn't filling or satisfying, but at least it didn't hurt.

That was good to know. I would start drinking water at lunch. Putting the lid back on the bottle I was about to place it on the bed to wait when I heard a loud thump.

"That's it."

I ran downstairs, past the living room and dining room, and into the kitchen. "Abby," I called.

She turned the corner. Her body looked the same, but I knew immediately there was something different, an odd bend in her body. Worse though, was the smell. Abby's blood, while it hadn't been as appealing as some of the other humans, now smelled rotten.

A sick feeling consumed my body. It was the same smell as the body of the man in the forest.

"That's right, Abby is gone." A cruel smile lifted Abby's lips. It looked wrong on her kind face.

My heart broke. "Abby was a good person." An uncontrollable rage built and filled my body. I hadn't known Abby long, but I considered her a friend. That this demura named Iza killed her and taken her body made my heart ache with fury and sadness.

"Whether she was good or not is of no value to me. I required her body, so I took it."

It seemed childish, but I asked anyway. "Why her? There are millions of humans in this world. Why choose her?" I wasn't prepared for the depth of emotion permeating my being at losing Abby. It was made worse that I had to witness the demura using her appendages and speaking with her voice.

"I promised you pain. Over the centuries I've learned it's far more effective to harm those that my victim cares for if I want them to suffer. It makes the game so much more enjoyable."

"But what am I to you? I thought the forest was your hunting ground."

"When you entered my forest you became my prey. It doesn't matter that you aren't still in the forest." Abby's body swayed back and forth as though moving to a rhythm I couldn't hear.

"Tell me what you want."

He crossed his arms and I nearly cried because he was doing it in Abby's body.

"That's easy. I want to continue doing what I've been doing for centuries. Making all creatures miserable, feeding on souls, destroying lives. Just the basics." He leaned against the doorframe, crossing one leg over the other. "So you're going to have to get out of my way."

"I can't do that." My fangs came out. I couldn't stand by and let any more people become corpses because of the demura. And although I didn't know anything about the creature, there was no way I would let it walk around using Abby's body. Just as with the man in the forest, I attacked it. This time it didn't release her body but used it to attack back. He wrapped Abby's arms around me and began to squeeze.

"You think you can't be hurt, don't you?" he asked with a hiss.

I smirked. "That's right. You can't hurt me."

In response he squeezed tighter. And shocker! I felt it. Like really felt it. The demura squeezed so tight that one of my ribs popped.

I screamed. Pain, worse than any I ever experienced cut through my body. Stars danced across my vision.

The demura didn't stop. Three more ribs broke. My body was shutting down, the pain beyond excruciating.

If the demura continued, my body would give up. I wouldn't die, but I would need time to heal. The only way to recuperate was blood and a lot of it.

"See, you aren't as invincible as you thought." Spittle landed on my cheek. I forced myself not to look away. He didn't deserve my fear.

The smell surrounding Abby's body was putrid, but if I didn't drink, I would be knocked unconscious or maybe even die. I didn't know. With those thoughts in my head, I did the unthinkable. I sunk my teeth into her flesh. Blood immediately poured into my mouth and down my throat. My body responded immediately to the blood, even though it was tainted, it also possessed magic of some sort. My ribs snapped back into place. I continued to drink, sensing Abby's body dying. It broke my heart, but there was no other way.

When her body was nearly dry, the demura let out a high-pitched squeal, and released itself from Abby, becoming mist once again. It floated upward and disappeared through the ceiling.

I disentangled myself from Abby and although I was devastated my friend was dead, I breathed a sigh of relief that the thing was no longer inside her. Sitting on the floor next to her, I placed her head in my lap. Her once warm eyes were lifeless and her body hung limp, like an empty balloon.

For the first time in my life I cried. Large tears rolled down my cheeks. They weren't like normal tears, but red with blood.

"Laeddin! Laeddin!" I shrieked his name until my throat was raw.

He appeared with apparent disgust that I bothered him again. Until he really looked at me and at my dead friend.

"I wish for you to bring her back to life. Please. I wish it. I wish it." I rocked back and forth, my hands cupping her face. Red tears fell and dripped onto Abby's cheeks, so it looked like she cried blood too.

Laeddin's contempt quickly turned to sympathy. "What's happened?" he asked, kneeling next to me.

I told him everything. About my first meeting the demura, and what happened this time, and then finished up with how I drank Abby's blood to save myself. "It's so awful," I cried, wishing I could take it back. "I'm awful."

"No, you aren't, Jasmine. I'm so sorry." His fingers stroked my hair. It felt good. I didn't deserve his sympathy and I pushed him away.

"Bring her back to life, please. I'm begging you."

He sighed. "I can't bring her back. For one thing it's against the rules an - "

"Break the rules, Laeddin! Please." I hugged her close. "Please."

He patted my shoulder. "What do you think she would be if I brought her back? Everything that made Abby, Abby is no longer in there." He pointed at her body.

I knew he was right. With every ounce of myself I knew it. But I didn't want to believe. I wasn't ready to let her go.

A noise rumbled from the garage and I realized in horror it was opening. Someone was home. The panic must've shown on my face. Laeddin gripped my arms. In the blink of an eye we were no longer in Abby's kitchen, but ours.

"My backpack," I cried. "It's still in her room."

"I'll get it." He vanished and reappeared carrying my backpack within seconds.

"Did - " I swallowed. Part of me didn't want to know, but the biggest part of me needed to hear his answer. "Did someone find her?"

Laeddin rubbed a hand over his face. "Yes," he said.

KISSED ME

THAT NIGHT I dreamed of the man I couldn't see again. He spoke of what it would be like to marry.

How many children he wished to have, and where we would live once we were together. He spoke of Sharra, the creatures there, and about how I drank Abby's blood.

I'd been humiliated by his words, but he kept talking anyway, explaining that what I'd done had been a survival instinct. He continued that I should be grateful I possessed such a predisposition.

Otherwise I would be dead.

I didn't want to agree, but a tiny part of my brain appreciated the support.

Most strangely, he spoke of my wings and how exquisite they were.

I hated to admit that while he talked the same part of my brain that appreciated his words also cherished them.

And just like last time, right before I woke, he took me in his arms and kissed me.

When my alarm went off, I wasn't as afraid of the man in my dream as I was the first time. I quickly got ready for school and went down to breakfast. Even though I'd drunk Abby nearly dry the day before I was famished.

There was blood in a glass just as there had been the last two days. I drank it quickly, silently wishing it was any blood but human. Even troll would be better. It was what I deserved.

Laeddin hadn't come down yet and I was grateful. Although he seemed less angry when he went to bed last night, he still wasn't the same guy I first met in the cave.

And now I was a murderer. Abby was dead because of me. If I hadn't wished away my wings and asked to be normal, I would still be in Sharra and none of this would have happened.

The wish seemed like a lifetime ago.

"Are you ready to go?" Laeddin asked, coming into the kitchen. He took an orange from the fridge. His scent swirled past my nose like the tail of a kite.

I quickly took a sprig of peppermint and put it in behind my ear. That helped a little, but not nearly enough. I didn't understand why his blood smelled so much better than any I ever encountered.

"Yes," I said, swinging my backpack onto my shoulder.

Laeddin took my hand. "If you don't want to go, it's okay."

I gave him a wary look.

"Everyone knows about Abby. I believe your friend Cam even texted you last night."

"Oh!" I took my phone from my backpack. I'd forgotten about it, too wrapped up in what happened.

He sent five different texts.

Did you hear about Abby? Call me.

Jack, I need to talk.

Abby is dead. Please text back.

They are saying her blood was drained from her body. It's vampires, I know it. Damn bloodsuckers aren't supposed to be here anymore.

OMG. Jack, you aren't dead too, are you?

"I better text back." I was new to the texting thing, but I typed my message out and sent it.

I'm so sorry, Cam. I didn't know her long, but I considered her my friend. Are you going to be at school?

He quickly texted back.

Thank God you're safe. I can't go to school. I'm too sad. Want to come over? We can be sad together.

I read Cam's text to Laeddin. "What do you think? Should I go over?"

Laeddin shrugged. He freaking shrugged. I never wanted to punch the genie so badly.

"Well, gee, thanks for your help." I dropped my backpack and shrugged onto the stool.

He leaned against the counter. "You don't need my help. You already know what to do. You just want confirmation."

My shoulders sagged. "No, I really don't. Part of me wants to go over because he needs me."

"This isn't your fault, Jasmine. The demura killed someone before you ever arrived it Salem. This isn't about you - "

Someone pounded on the door.

"Who's that?" I whispered.

Laeddin walked to the door and opened it. I lingered behind him. By the smell of blood, I knew they were human.

Two police officers stood on our porch.

"Hello, sir. Are you Jackie Ryder's father?" one of the asked.

Laeddin opened the door all the way. "No, her parents are in Las Vegas, and they've asked me to keep an eye on her until they've finished their business and can join Jackie here in Salem." He kept his voice casual and his features relaxed.

Both police officers scrutinized him. They were about the same height, but one was more muscular than the other. They both looked like they were in their early twenties. One had dark brown hair. The other officer had strawberry blond. They seemed to take their job very seriously.

"I'm officer Gand," the guy with strawberry blond hair said. Then he pointed to his partner. "This is officer Vick. Can we come in?"

"We have some questions for Jackie," officer Vick added.

"Sure," Laeddin said.

When they were inside, he directed them to the couch. "Have a seat."

I sat opposite them. "I'm Jackie." My heart raced and my lips were chapped. What did they want? Did they know I drank Jackie's blood?

"A couple of students saw you and Abby walking away from the school together yesterday. Is that true?" Officer Vick had a pad of paper and a pencil out, ready to write down whatever I said.

"Yes, that's true. I was there for a while. I'm not exactly sure how long, but we watched a show called The Vampire Diaries and then I went home."

Officer Vick nodded. "When did you leave?"

I glanced at Laeddin. "I don't know the exact time. We were watching and then Abby said she was going to go get us a drink. It took her a while, so I went down to the kitchen. Abby wasn't there so I called out to her and she answered from the bathroom that she was sick and that she was going to be a while." I shrugged and took a moment to take a deep breath. An image of Abby's broken body fluttered past my mind. Tears filled my eyes. "I told her I would see her at school tomorrow and left."

Both officers mumbled a reply as they watched me.

"You're new to the school. Correct?" Officer Gand asked.

"Yes," I responded, my voice a whisper. "Today would've been my third day. Abby and I had Creative Writing together. That's where we met." They hadn't asked for any of that information, but I gave it anyway.

"I see." Officer Vick eyed me suspiciously. "Did anyone seem to dislike Abby?"

I shook my head. "Not that I saw." I thought about Sydney and how she wasn't friendly. "I mean there are kids at school who don't hang out with each other, but that's just life, isn't it?"

Officer Gand and officer Vick gave each other a knowing look.

"Tell us the name of those students she didn't' get along with?"

I sat on the chair across from the officers and clasped my hands between my knees. "There's a girl named Sydney and then a guy named Drake. I don't know their last names."

Officer Vick wrote something down. Then he gave me a direct look. "Are you a vampire?" he asked bluntly.

I gasped. I hated to admit it, but my mom might have been right about me staying out of this realm. It was so different. "No." I looked to Laeddin for help again. He worked his jaw but didn't say anything.

"Did you kill Abby Carrington?" Officer Gand asked.

A sob ripped from my throat. My body shook with grief and pain. Finally, I shook my head. "No, I didn't."

The officers stood. Officer Vick patted me awkwardly on the back. "There. There," he said, and pulled a small machine from his back pocket. "We'll just need a sample of your blood to verify." His eyes were hard, and I realized neither of them believed me.

"My blood?" I gave Laeddin a pleading look.

He stood and put a hand on each of their shoulders. "She is not a vampire. Look at your test. It shows negative."

I put a hand over my mouth, grateful he was this all powerful genie.

Both officers blinked as whatever magic Laeddin worked on them took hold. Officer Vick checked at the machine. "Negative. Great." He was surprised and showed the result to officer Gand.

Officer Gand shrugged. "Glad we cleared that up." He cleared his throat. "We'll find whoever hurt your friend. You can be sure of that."

They walked to the door. Laeddin followed them.

"If she thinks of anything else, please have her call us." Officer Vick handed Laeddin a card.

"I will. Thank you." He shut the door behind them.

I jumped out of the seat and ran over to Laeddin.

He put a finger to his lips.

Once we heard the police car drive away, he removed his finger.

"Are you okay?" He pulled me to his chest in a hug.

My body still shook uncontrollably. I was devastated, sick inside, definitely NOT okay. "What do you know about the demura?"

He rested his chin on my head. "I've never heard that word before today. But I may know of someone who does." He pushed me back so he could see my face. "I'll need to be gone a few hours. Maybe a day at the most. Will you be okay alone?"

In response my teeth started chattering. I really wanted to go home. But I couldn't. Not yet. I needed to find a way to end the demura. It was the least I could do for Abby. "Yes."

"That's my girl," Laeddin said sweetly. Whatever anger he harbored over the scratch on his neck, was gone. Right before my eyes, he vanished.

I turned in a circle, unsure what to do next. My phone beeped. I looked at it and realized I had a text.

You coming over or not? It was from Cam. Before I could answer, he sent another. Never mind I'll come to you.

Do you know where I live? I texted.

Yep. Be there in a few.

Okay.

I put my phone in the back pocket of my jeans and went to sit on the couch when I heard scratching.

"What the - " I opened the door and there was Gatsby.

He sauntered in. "Close the door. I need to speak with you and there isn't much time. Your friend Cameron will be here soon."

DRANK HER BLOOD

I GREW UP AROUND UNICORNS, trolls, elves, and vampires. They all talked often, sometimes annoyingly so. But that was in Sharra. A talking cat in the human realm was completely different, probably because humans were normal here, as were the animals. They weren't supposed to talk. And a mist-creature wasn't supposed to invade human bodies either.

Gatsby jumped on the couch.

I sat beside him, working to get a handle on myself. "What is it?"

Gatsby curled his tail around his paws. His yellow eyes studied me carefully. "I know what happened to Abby yesterday."

I was stunned. "You do?" My hand found my way over my mouth.

"It's okay, Jasmine. You didn't do anything wrong."

My bottom lip quivered. "I drank her blood." My voice was barely above a whisper.

Gatsby placed a paw on my knee. "If you hadn't, the demura would've killed you."

Tears dripped from my eyes. I knew he was right.

"Don't cry. You're getting blood tears all over your shirt."

Crying tears of blood happened with me once in a while, when I was really upset. "Toadstools on toast!" I quickly wiped my eyes. Cam would arrive any minute and I didn't want him to see my face or my shirt. I pulled off my shirt and tossed it in the corner, ran to the mirror and wiped any remnants of my blood tears. "Gatsby, do you know what the demura is? What it wants?"

"Of course I do." He licked his paw. "But Cam is on his way. Comfort your friend, and I'll tell you about the demura tonight."

"But - "

There was a knock at the door.

I realized I hadn't put on another shirt and was only in my black camisole tank, but it was fine. I opened the door and Gatsby ran out.

Cam looked awful. His eyes were puffy from crying.

He sniffled. "Hey."

"Hi Cam. Come in." I walked him into the kitchen. "Want a drink or something?"

"Got any liquor? I'd really like to get drunk and pass out." He sat on a stool; his face buried in his hands.

I went over and rubbed his back. "I'm so sorry, Cam." It was true. I was sorry for putting Abby in harm's way. It was my fault. The demura said so. I was sorry I ever came to Salem. I should've stayed in Sharra and become the princess my mom and dad wanted me to be. I never should've wished to become something I wasn't. The worst part was, if I'd come into the human realm with all of my powers and my wings, I would've been able to stop the demura. I had no doubt about that.

Cam sniffled. "It isn't your fault, Jack." He glanced at me. "How are you holding up?"

I pushed away the tears threatening to drop. "I'm - " I swallowed. "I'm surviving."

"You two seemed to really hit it off. She told me you guys were going to hang out yesterday. Did you?"

"Yes. We watched The Vampire Diaries for a while until she got sick." I hated lying, but at least it was partial truth.

"Weird." Cam pulled a handkerchief from his pocket and wiped his nose. "Abby never got sick."

I told him how we ate licorice and then she went to get a drink. "Maybe the licorice made her sick?" My lips trembled and my shoulders shook. A sob caught in my throat. "Before I left, she said she would see me tomorrow at school." I swallowed back a sob.

Cam hugged me and I hugged him back. It was a sweet moment, a normal one, me hugging my friend, but it was marred by the fact that my face was against his neck. His heart pumped his warm blood through his veins. I longed to sink my teeth in his neck and - "I feel so bad for her family. They must be devastated."

"Yeah." He wiped his eyes. "Abby was close with her little sister."

I stopped listening at the mention of a sister. No one else was home when we were there. I was sure of it. But a part of me worried maybe that wasn't true. What if the little sister was home and saw something? Like me drinking Abby's blood.

"I didn't know she had a sister." I said, sniffling.

"She's like eleven or twelve. I'm not sure. Did you see her there yesterday?"

"No, I didn't. And the police didn't mention her either." I pulled away and walked over to the refrigerator.

"The police?"

"They were just here, asking questions." I pulled out a peppermint leaf, took a big sniff, and then put it behind my ear.

"What did they ask?"

I took the teapot from the stove and went to the sink. I didn't want any tea, but I needed something to do and I'd seen the cook in our kitchen brew it many times before. "Just whether I'd gone to her house. What we did. When I left."

"Ah, well yeah, you're probably the last person to see her alive." He sat up straighter. "I wish you could've gotten to know her better. She was so smart and funny and a great friend." A tear dripped onto his cheek.

I hurried over and hugged him. "You liked her?"

"Well, yeah. I did." Cam looked at me. "I mean not liked, liked her, but she was the best friend a person could ever have. When we were in junior high, she got in several fights trying to protect me, even though I could've handled it. She once told me she was like a mamma bear with her cub when it came to how she felt about me." He smiled at the memory. "I wouldn't have survived without her."

"She seemed amazing. The little bit of time I spent with her proved that." I took a bag of chamomile tea from a box and stuck it in a mug.

"Amazing is an understatement," Cam said.

"How long were you two friends?" The teapot whistled. I took it from the stove and poured water in the mug.

"Her family moved to Salem when we were in the third grade. We were in the same reading group. She was shy and always had her nose in a book. Our teacher challenged us to read the Harry Potter books. We read those books twice by summer vacation. She was a total book nerd, so we got along together perfectly. I used to say her parents moved to Salem for me because I needed her." His eyes filled with tears.

"Cam, I'm so sorry." I removed the teabag and handed the mug to him. "Here, drink this. It'll calm your nerves." At least that was what the box said.

He brought it to his nose and sniffed. "What is it?"

"Chamomile tea."

"You made me tea?"

I shrugged. It was something to do. "Yeah."

Cam squeezed my hand. "It's perfect." He took a sip. "Thank you, Jack. I'm so glad you moved to Salem. If I didn't have you, I - " An odd look twisted his features. "What do you know about those new kids, Zoe and Peter?"

"Not much." I dumped the remaining water in the sink, watching the steam rise. It warmed my face. "I've talked to them a couple of times and we ate lunch together. They seem nice."

"Hmmmm," he took another sip. "I'll bet a thousand dollars one of them is a vampire."

I felt my eyes get wide. "Really?"

"Abby was sucked dry. Definitely a vampire. Those two arrived and my best friend dies. I'm checking them out." Cam's brows scrunched together and he crossed his arms.

ESSENCE OF EVIL

CAM and I hung out for several more hours. After he left, I went upstairs to change into my PJ's.

Gatsby said we would talk later. He needed a way to get in, so I opened the window. Before I had a chance to open a book, he jumped into my room.

"The boy seems to be doing better. You really are a good friend, Jasmine." He hopped on my bed and curled into a ball.

"Um, thanks." I fluffed some pillows and stuffed them behind my back. Gatsby appeared to have fallen asleep. I cleared my throat. "Are you going to tell me about the demura?"

His eyes blinked open. "I suppose I should."

I crossed my legs and sat forward.

"I'm actually surprised your genie friend didn't tell you about them."

"Why is that?" I suddenly felt a little sick. Had Laeddin brought the demura to Salem?

"Well, because a demura is the essence of an evil genie." He blinked several times, waiting for that bit of news to sink in.

My heart pounded in my throat. "How can a genie be evil? Aren't they required to obey those who possess their lamp? Do they have a choice?"

Gatsby crossed his paws. "Let me start at the beginning."

I clasped my hands together and sank further into my pillows. For some reason I dreaded hearing the story. What if it put Laeddin in a bad light? As difficult as the past few days had been, I didn't want him to be evil.

Gatsby began, "More than two thousand years ago, twelve brothers were born to the king and queen of Debania. The king, being a selfish man, realized someday he would die and have to give up his throne. As the most powerful man in his kingdom he decided to find a way to live forever.

"The kingdom had a powerful sorcerer named Jaffar. The king went to the sorcerer and asked that he grant him eternal life. The sorcerer agreed, but only if the king brought with him twelve golden lamps and his sons.

"The king promised he would. The very next day he commanded the kingdom's blacksmith's create twelve beautiful lamps. Within the year all twelve were complete. Some were encrusted with gems. Others were gilded with diamonds. All were extremely beautiful and fine. He presented them as well as his sons to the sorcerer.

"Jaffar placed a lamp in front of each son and then cursed them all to an eternity of servitude. Once the sons were captive inside their lamps, he took the king's sword and stabbed him through the heart. While he lay dying, he asked why Jaffar broke his vow. Jaffar said, 'You will live forever through your sons. They will never die and for your selfishness, they will be required to serve others eternally.'" The effort of so much talking seemed to have tired Gatsby out. He rested his head on his paws and closed its eyes. "Laeddin is one of those brothers."

I closed my eyes too and thought about the story. Did that mean Laeddin was over two thousand years old? That was kind of creepy. And while I now knew Laeddin had eleven brothers and that a sorcerer by the name of Jaffar cursed them, I still didn't know how the demura came to be.

I sat up. "Gatsby, what about the demura?"

The cat yawned, his pink tongue curling as he flashed his sharp teeth. They looked a lot like my own. "Right." He climbed onto my lap and rubbed the top of his head against my hand.

"Fine." I chuckled and scratched him.

He purred. "After a thousand years, the oldest brother began his subjugation to a peculiar creature. It changed forms as often as it breathed. The oldest brother never got a sense of what it was, but according to the laws of the genie by which he was bound, he was forced to grant the creature three wishes.

The wishes were as unusual as the creature. The first wish demanded the brother give up his body and become dark smoke. The second wish was that the brother must possess humans in order to survive. And the creature's third wish was that the genie must destroy his bottle. The wishes didn't go against the three rules, so the brother had no choice but to obey."

"What was the creature, Gatsby?" I thought about the thing that kept appearing in my dream. I don't know why. But I was afraid.

"I have my theories, but don't know for sure." Gatsby rubbed his head against my hand since I paused in petting him. "The creature disappeared, and the oldest brother became the first demura or demon mist."

I stopped. "So there's only one demura and it's Laeddin's oldest brother?"

Gatsby pawed my hand. I began petting him again. "Over the next several hundred years the same creature found and took possession of all the brothers, demanding the same three wishes from each of them. There are now eleven demura. Laeddin is the only genie left who hasn't been turned by the creature."

My heart began pounding so hard I thought it would come out of my chest. "He's in danger?"

"Yes, he has been for several decades. That's probably why he was hiding in Sharra."

"Why is the creature changing the genies?"

Gatsby closed his eyes. His purring grew louder. "Most likely because he can."

"What like a game?" Sometimes when a creature could live for so long, it would get bored. I'd seen it time and again. That was why the great mountain in Sharra was filled with prisoners.

"Yes, exactly. If he or they are who I think they are, then they created this world and use the creatures within as their playthings." He shook his head and yawned.

"How do you know about the demura and the story of the genies?"

Gatsby chuckled. "I've been around a really, really long time. There isn't much I don't know."

"Except you don't know what's after Laeddin?"

"Not for certain, no. But I've told you more than anyone else ever could have. You should be grateful for what I've given you." He rose and walked to the edge of my bed.

"Sorry, Gatsby. I am," I said, crossing my arms.

The cat jumped off my bed.

"Don't go. I need to know how to stop the demura. What can stop them?"

Gatsby turned and sat, licking one paw. "They no longer have their lamps, which is why they must enter the bodies of humans."

I moved to the edge of the bed.

"So either we get rid of all seven billion humans - " That wasn't even a possibility. "Or?"

"I've thought a lot about this. As I said, not one hundred percent sure, but I believe if the demura had their lamps, they would return to their original form and no longer need humans to survive."

I fell back on the bed. "But the lamps were destroyed. That's impossible." Defeat sat like a bad taste in my mouth.

Gatsby jumped on my bed and then onto my stomach. He walked up so that he was looking directly into my eyes. "You're speaking with a talking cat. All sorts of impossible things become possible every day. A hundred years ago no one believed there would be a phone you could carry in your pocket, allowing you to speak to anyone from anywhere around the world, yet the impossible has happened. Fifty years ago, supernatural creatures were found only in myths and fairytales, now there are worldwide government agencies whose sole purpose is to protect humans from us." He yowled, irritated. "Nothing is impossible, Jasmine."

I leaned on my elbows, so we were almost cat nose to vampire nose.

"Thousands of years ago Sharra had her twin sister Silindra killed. Once she was gone vampires with wings no longer walked the Earth and it was believed they never would again. Yet here you are." Gatsby blinked. "Nothing is impossible." He jumped off me, went to the window, and landed on the sill. His yellow eyes studied me. "There is one other thing - but it's complicated and may not work."

"Whatever it is, tell me." I ran over to him.

"Jaffar cursed the brothers. If he removed the curse, then everything would go back to the way it was. The brothers would no longer be genies, which means they would no longer be demura."

I fell back on my butt. "Isn't he dead? I mean, it's been two thousand years."

Gatsby shook his furry head. For a cat, he was adorable. "I've been around more than two thousand years." He studied me like I was a mouse with eight heads.

"No way." I snorted, reaching out to scratch under his head.

He batted my hand away with his paw. "You were born of seven magics with the blood of Snow and Dorian. How can you question such things? I'm quite sure Jaffar is alive."

"Okay, where do I find him?"

"I suggest you ask your genie. He should know." Gatsby jumped out the window, into the darkness. I squealed, worried for him again, but the cat was gone. Something told me Gatsby was less cat and more something else, but I didn't know what.

I closed the window and went back to bed.

"Nothing is impossible." I thought about all the different stories I learned about the creatures of Sharra over the years. I thought about the story of Envy, the unicorn who gave her life to save Silindra and my mother. I thought and thought until I fell asleep.

THAT NIGHT the shadow man visited my dreams again. This time he took me into the forest of Sharra. It was surprising that he knew of my favorite place. We seemed to walk for a long time. I let him do the talking. He spoke nonstop, but I couldn't understand what he said. At first it was frustrating, but after a while, I relaxed, focusing on our surroundings.

It was new that I wasn't in complete darkness, but I still couldn't see the person talking to me. When I arrived at a clearing, a large quilt appeared out of the air and floated to the ground.

And suddenly I understood his words. "I took her into my arms, sank my teeth into her warm neck, and drank my fill," he said.

I turned to him, trying to see him. "You're a vampire?" The question left my lips before I realized I spoke.

"Oh, Jasmine. If only you would allow yourself to see." His arms were around my waist. I knew he would kiss me, just as before, and though I didn't see him, I didn't fight him either. Instead I sank into the kiss, allowed myself to enjoy it. Since this was a dream, and it was the only romantic action in my life, I kissed him back.

After a long while, he pulled back. "That was exquisite, Jasmine."

I sighed, unable to speak. The kiss had been amazing.

A sudden movement pulled my gaze from him.

There were several bound humans lying on the quilt. Their faces twisted with fear. Cameron was one of the prisoners. His dark eyes shone bright with betrayal. To him I was a monster. Shame burned my face.

"Drink from him first," my dream lover commanded.

I screamed.

LATE FOR SCHOOL

LAEDDIN STILL HADN'T RETURNED when I woke the next morning. His bedroom door was open, his bed still made. I dressed in jeans and a teal t-shirt, put my hair in twin tails, and put on a pair of teal Converse. They were my mom's favorite shoes. I'd seen her closet and the sixteen pairs she kept in there. She never wore them anymore, but she still loved them. I tried a pair on once and immediately understood why. They were super comfortable.

When Laeddin took me shopping at Bloomingdales, I knew I had to have a pair. For some reason wearing them made me feel closer to my mom. I missed her. And my dad too.

When I got down to the kitchen, I opened the fridge thinking there probably wouldn't be any blood, but it was there - a full glass of the red stuff.

I drank it and then picked up my backpack. How was I going to get to school?

Finally I decided there was no helping it. I needed him.

"Laeddin," I called.

He appeared immediately. "Jasmine," he said. He sounded tired. He looked haggard.

Even though the scent of his blood immediately entered my nose and made my mouth water, I ignored it and put a hand on his back. He flinched but didn't push my hand away.

I decided to tell him what I learned. Between the two of us maybe we could figure out how to bring back his brothers' lamps. "Laeddin, I know about your - "

"You're going to be late for school." He held the door open.

We walked to the car. I tried two more times to tell him what I knew, but he wouldn't let me finish. "I have a lot on my mind, Jasmine. Can we talk after school?"

We arrived at Salem Academy in record time. I got out. "I guess," I said. As I watched him drive away, for the first time I wasn't thinking about myself, but him. I hoped he would be okay.

Cam stood by the front door. He looked a little better than yesterday. The whole school seemed quieter, more subdued. Everyone was also dressed in black. I kind of stood out. Then I remembered that humans wore black to mourn death. Ugh. Stupid. It was too late to do anything about it though. Luckily my jeans were dark.

I went up to Cam and put an arm around his shoulders. "You hanging in there, Cam?"

"I'm - I can't go inside. Every inch of that school reminds me of Abby." He worked hard to fight back tears. His lips twitched and he kept wiping his eyes. Cam wore all black today too. Black pants. Black turtleneck. Black shoes.

"You can," I told him. "I'm here."

Some random girl walked by. She whispered to her friend. "That's the girl who was with Abby. My father said they sent Gant and Vick to question her."

They walked through the door into the school, but I could still hear and see them. The girl's friend looked back. "Did they give her the vampire test?"

"It came back negative, but I think the bloodsuckers can compel us - like that one show with the brothers - " She kept talking, but I lost track.

"Well look at her, she isn't even wearing black today. Totally cold." A girl with long blond hair gave me a once over, her features disgusted.

"You're kind of squeezing too hard, Jack." Cam tried to push my hand off his shoulder.

"Oh, I'm sorry. I'm just upset." I relaxed my hand at my side.

"Don't let them get to you. The truth is I came to school today for you. I have a feeling there's going to be another witch hunt and you're the witch." He gave me a sad smile.

I gasped. But noticed that all of the students were looking our way. Cam was probably right.

"Great. Should I go home?"

He shook his head. "The best thing to do is stand up to them. Don't let them know they're getting to you."

"Okay." I grimaced.

Peter and Zoe came down the stairs.

"Hey Cam. We heard what happened. We're so sorry." Zoe wrapped an arm around me. Peter patted Cam on the shoulder.

"We heard you were the last to see her," Zoe said to me in a whisper.

I twisted some of my hair around a finger nervously. Cam and I gave each other a look. We'd decided to get to know more about the two of them. "I guess I was."

Cam rolled his shoulders. "Thanks guys. We'll see you at lunch?" He tried to give them a smile.

"Sure." Peter took Zoe's hand and they walked away together.

"They're so in sync. It's like one can't breathe without the other." I gave Cam a disgusted look.

He wasn't watching me but staring after Peter and Zoe. "That's when you know it's true love. Those two will still be together fifty years from now." He sniffled. "Maybe even a thousand unless we do something to stop them."

I was horrified by Cam's comment, but also had to admire Zoe and Peter. They really were in love and at such a young age. It didn't seem possible, but their love was like a living thing. Almost visible. Definitely tangible. Intense. It almost reminded me of -

No way. Impossible.

AS I SAT through Creative Writing, one thought kept creeping into my mind: The demura said it would go after those I cared about. It had known about Abby. Would it go after Cam next?

Being friends with anyone was probably a bad idea.

When class ended, I made my way to the locker room. I forgot gym clothes again, but the ones Abby found for me were still in her locker. The inside smelled like her. I sat on the bench and tried not to cry.

Sydney came in. She glared. "Did you kill her?"

"Of course not." I bit the inside of my cheek. Anger filled my veins with a desire for revenge. "Did you?"

Of course I knew she hadn't killed Abby. The demura had. But something told me she knew more than she was letting on.

She threw her hands in the air. "Whatever," she said, going over to her locker.

The other girls in the locker room were more focused on us than changing.

I went over to Sydney and forced her to look at me. "You know something. I can see it in your eyes."

A brief flicker of fear danced across her face. "No, I don't. You're a liar. Freak."

Ugh. Name-calling. It was so juvenile, yet still seemed to work even in high school.

I let her go and quickly changed. There were several sets of eyes on my back, my tattooed wings, but I didn't bother to give a crap. They could look all they wanted. I had too much to worry about.

Today the teacher just had us walk around the gym because she understood we were hurting.

I walked alone, which was fine, though I searched for Troy. He wasn't here today, and I figured he either recruited his person for the Seven Magics Academy or felt like laying low. It didn't matter. I had a lot to think about. Gatsby said anything was possible. Internally I made a list of questions.

How do I bring back the destroyed lamps?

How do I keep Laeddin from becoming a demura? Is stopping it even possible?

How did I make sure the demura stalking me didn't go after Cam or Peter or Zoe?

It all seemed hopeless. When the bell rang, I was still no closer to finding any answers.

I took extra-long in the locker room, which meant I would be late to my next class. But I didn't care. Normal high school life wasn't working out the way I thought it would.

"Jasmine, I need to talk to you." Laeddin suddenly appeared in front of me.

I squealed and covered myself with my shirt. "What are you doing in here?" My cheeks burned hot.

Laeddin's eyes perused my undressed body.

I glared.

He turned around and I quickly put my clothes on.

"What do you want?" I asked when I was dressed.

He turned and his eyes softened. "Come on."

In the blink of an eye we were gone from the locker room and back in our living room.

ELEVEN BROTHERS

LAEDDIN PULLED ME INTO A HUG. "We need to talk."

The scent of his blood lit my throat on fire. Not to mention the way his skin smelled and felt. And the way he looked in his jeans and button up shirt. He was beautiful in every way.

I pushed him back. "I tried to talk to you several times this morning, but you wouldn't listen." I crossed my arms.

"I know. But there is something about me, about my family you need to know." He sighed. "It has to do with the demura."

I twisted some hair between my fingers. "Go on." I already knew thanks to Gatsby, but I'd give him a moment.

"You better sit down. It's kind of a long story." He led me over to the couch.

When we were sitting, he began, "Many years ago - "

"You mean two thousand years ago, don't you?" I crossed my arms and leaned back against the cushions.

Laeddin's brows furrowed. "How do you know?"

"Well, old man, if you would've let me talk this morning, I would've told you that I know everything."

"Everything?" He smirked.

"Well, smarty pants, I know about your eleven brothers. I know about your father and Jaffar, and the lamps, and the strange creature changing your brothers into the demura. And worst of all, I know you're next." My stomach fluttered like nervous pixilettes danced inside. I didn't know much about Laeddin, but I wanted to. And I definitely didn't want him to become a demura.

"Okay, you do know everything." His face turned serious. "Do you happen to know how to stop them?"

Before I had a chance to answer, he continued, "As soon as I realized what was happening to my brothers, I started searching for a way to change them back, but so far nothing's worked." He ran a hand through his hair.

"What about Jaffar?"

He gave me a strange look. "What about him?"

"Well, he's the one who cursed you to become a genie, right?"

"Yes." Laeddin leaned forward.

"What if you convinced him to remove the curse?" I clasped my hands between my knees, trying to remember all Gatsby had said.

He seemed to consider my words. "So your suggestion is find him - "

"It's been two thousand years. He's probably forgotten about his reasons for cursing you in the first place. I bet if you asked him to remove it from you and your brothers, he'd do it." I cleared my throat. "And if your brothers are no longer genies, they can't be demura either."

Laeddin stood. "That's not a bad idea, but I don't know - "

There was Gatsby's other idea. "Can I wish your brothers' lamps back? Undestroy them?"

Laeddin shook his head. "That sounds like a great idea, but it wouldn't work."

"Why not? All I'd have to do is say I wish - "

Laeddin placed a hand over my mouth. "Stop."

I pulled his hand away.

"You have to be careful with your wishes. If you wished that, time could reverse, or volcanoes could erupt. The world could split. Everything could change." His eyes were frightened. "Don't ever make a wish unless you talk to me about it first. Okay."

I sulked; irritated by the way he scolded me - like I was a silly child. Compared to him, I was.

He huffed. "I'm sorry. I didn't mean to be rude."

"But why would all of those things happen? It's just a simple wish."

"No, actually. It isn't. Destroying a genie's lamp, it takes the greatest of power. I'm sure my brothers had to move Heaven and Earth to obey the command of that creature. And reversing it could kill more people than we would ever hope to save."

"Okay. Okay. I get it. I'm sorry." I folded my arms.

Laeddin came forward and took my hands. "I'm sorry. I appreciate the thought." He shook them and then dropped them. His mind was obviously elsewhere, working on things he wasn't sharing with me.

"So let's go talk to Jaffar. The sooner he removes your curse the better."

Laeddin began to pace. "Give me a second." I tried to fathom what he was thinking, but I had no idea.

I picked up my phone and texted Cam. We were supposed to meet for lunch, but since I was no longer in school, I didn't want him to worry.

Hi Cam. I went home. Sorry.

He texted back immediately. Don't ever do that to me again!

Sorry, I texted back.

Will you be here tomorrow?

I thought about that. Who knew how long it would take us to find Jaffar and get him to remove the curse? And then once the curse was removed -

I slapped my forehead. If Laeddin were no longer a genie, would I remain wingless and without the seven magics? When I first made my wish, becoming wingless was what I wanted, but not forever. Just for a little while. Or, if Laeddin were no longer a genie, would my wish stop existing? Would I automatically return to the way I was? That would mean never seeing Cam again, or Peter and Zoe. Well, who knew with them. I supposed I could live with that last part as long as they were safe.

Jack??? Answer me.

I don't know, I quickly texted back. Then added, I need to work some things out.

Okay. Keep me posted.

Will do. I felt bad, but I would feel much worse if the demura took him over. So I didn't say anything more. Instead I went back into the living room. Laeddin was no longer pacing but seated on the couch. He looked miserable.

"What's wrong?" I wasn't nearly as eager as I'd been a few minutes ago.

"I still think your idea is great. It's just - " He ran a hand through his hair.

I sat beside him on the couch. "If you're no longer a genie, will I stay as I am now, or will I go back to the way I was before?"

He became more miserable. Had he not thought about that?

"The only way for you to return to the way you were is to wish it, but that is dangerous too." He turned to face me. "Have you already tired of normal?"

I snorted. "Not much has been normal since I arrived here."

"That's true." Laeddin tilted his head, observing me kindly. "Perhaps you've gathered that normal is a relative term."

"Yes, I suppose I have." I leaned nearer to Laeddin, drawn to his scent.

"Well the easiest way to handle this would be to have you wish to return to the way you were and then once you've returned home, I can go to Jaffar and ask him to remove the curse." He stood and started to pace again.

"Actually that won't work at all." I grabbed his hand, a strong need to comfort him overwhelming me.

"Why not?" he stopped and gave a wry smile.

"Well because." I pulled him down on the couch. "What if he tells you no? Then what? The demura will still feed on humans and you'll most likely become one too."

"But it isn't your place to worry about humans. There are the chayot, the angelic guardians of the human realm." He shrugged. "As soon as they catch wind of what is happening, they will do something." He forced a smile. "Besides, the only way the creature can change me is if it becomes my master and you're my master right now."

"I know what the chayot are. My uncle used to be the leader." Of course I knew what the chayot were. Did the chayot know about the demura? If not, it might be a good idea to tell them. "Should we share what we know with the chayot?"

"Probably." He took a deep breath. "But it might not be a bad idea to make certain." Laeddin patted my hand. "Any ideas how to get a hold of them?"

I jumped to my feet and ran to the door. For the first time in days I felt a little like myself again. It surprised me that I actually missed being myself. "Yep. Come on."

BLANKETED FEARS

THE NIGHT AIR WAS COLD, and the sky was so clear hundreds of thousands of stars were visible. "Isn't it beautiful?" I asked, making conversation.

"Beyond comprehension."

"Ri - " I glanced at him and realized he wasn't looking at the stars but at me. "Oh." My face burned with embarrassment. I was grateful for the darkness.

His hands were clasped behind his back. He nudged my shoulder.

I nudged him back.

"So where are we going?" Laeddin asked.

He was the most relaxed I'd seen him. The dark did that to people. It washed away worries and blanketed fears.

"If anyone knows how to find the chayot leader, it's my grandfather, Professor Pops." I pointed at the large house coming into view.

"You're going to reveal yourself to him? I thought you wanted to keep it a secret. Besides, are you sure he still lives here?" He pointed at the fancy sports cars and trucks with lift kits parked in the driveway.

"He already knows. He is my English teacher at school. And he positively still lives here." We were halfway up the drive when I stopped. "He knows the chayot and can tell us how to get a hold of them. Besides," I tilted my head at Laeddin, "I don't think I have a choice."

"I guess not," Laeddin said. I could swear I saw him smile.

I climbed the steps and knocked on the large door. The thump of music could be heard from inside. I was about to knock again when the door burst open.

"Hey," he said, smiling big. Then he saw Laeddin and his eyes narrowed in anger. "What's he doing here?"

"We need Pops' help," I said, flatly, pushing my way in. "And he's with me."

Troy's gaze flicked between the two of us a few times as though he were debating what to do. "Wait here. I'll go ask him." Troy disappeared down the hall, leaving the door ajar.

"Thanks. It's kind of urgent," I hollered after him, moving into the entryway and pulling Laeddin in too. I closed the door and waited, my nerves jangling like windchimes.

"Troy, who's at the door?" Professor Pops came into view.

"Hi Pops." I ran into his outstretched arms, burying my face in his chest. He smelled of cigar smoke and lemon tea. "This is Laeddin," I finally said. "We were wondering if we could speak with you privately for a moment."

He glanced at Laeddin and back at me before allowing his lips to curve into a grin. "Very well. Follow me." He went back the way he came.

Laeddin and I followed him through the kitchen and down the hall.

"Are you still going back to Sharra," Pops asked when he saw Troy. The guy appeared from a door just off the kitchen.

"Yes, sir." Troy pushed past us and went to the refrigerator where he grabbed a soda before slamming it shot. "See ya - Jack." He winked and went back to the entryway, probably to go up the stairs to the second floor.

"Bye." I couldn't get over how hot he was. Gorgeous.

Laeddin and I continued following my grandfather until we reached his office. Once we were inside, he closed the door. "Have a seat." He indicated two leather chairs. I took the one closest to the window.

Pops went around his desk, sat, and then steepled his fingers. "Now, how can I help you?"

I swallowed, suddenly nervous. Laeddin patted my hand, his way of encouraging me.

"Uh, where to begin - " I crossed my arms and my legs, feeling suddenly self-conscious.

"The beginning is always best." He smiled, causing the wrinkles near his eyes to crinkle.

It was strange, knowing grandfather was a vampire and seeing him in the human realm, looking very old and very human. I wondered how he made himself look that way.

Flustered, I studied my shoes, unsure where to start. Should I tell him about the genie? That seemed like the most logical beginning.

Pops gave a grandfatherly smile. "Let's see if I can help you out." He scooted forward. "Your friend here is a genie and you're here about the demura."

It felt like my mouth dropped onto the shiny black desk. "Yes."

He nodded. "Excellent. That's as I suspected."

"How did you - ? Are you - ?" I was astounded. I glanced at Laeddin who looked as surprised as I was.

Laeddin sat back in his chair.

"Sometimes I forget you're a vampire. You look so human," I added, admiring the gray in his hair and his wrinkles. I guessed magic helped him hide in the human realm.

His eyes twinkled with amusement. "You mean old." He chuckled. "That's the way I like it. I prefer the human realm over life in Sharra."

I could understand that. I'd made a wish to live in the human realm.

Professor Pops continued, "I want to live among them since I was born one, but if I were never to age, people would start to get suspicious. As it is, every fifty years or so I have to move just so people don't begin to wonder how old I really am. If I didn't, they would become afraid without realizing why, and I don't want that."

"That makes sense."

"Good." He shuffled some papers around on his desk and then gave me a serious look. "Now why don't you tell me what's going on?"

I crossed my legs under me, glanced at Laeddin, and told him. All of it. About the cave in Sharra. Meeting Laeddin. Wishing to live like a human and go to high school. I even showed him my wing tattoo. Laeddin interjected some, giving parts of his story.

I thought about mentioning Gatsby but changed my mind at the last second. It didn't seem like Pops or Laeddin needed to know that my mom's cat could talk if he wanted to.

Professor Pops listened intently, nodding at times, seemingly absorbed in my story. His kindness encouraged me to keep going. I rested my hands on his desk, leaning closer and told him about the demura, explaining what they were and what they wanted. I added that Laeddin and I thought it might be a good idea to tell the chayot.

I finished with, "I told Laeddin if anyone knew how to reach them it was you."

"Well thank you, Jasmine. That's very kind. They do need to know." Professor Pops leaned back in his chair.

"You'll tell them, then?" I moved to the edge of my chair.

"Of course, my dear." Professor Pops swiveled in his seat and pulled a book from one of the shelves lining the bookcase behind him, setting it on the desk between us. Nodding toward the book he said, "Is this what you encountered?"

I pulled the book closer. When Laeddin leaned in to see as well, I held my breath, fighting to ignore his beckoning blood.

The book had pictures of skulls with smoke coming off them, their eyes glowed red. Human bodies bent at strange angles. The pictures definitely resembled what I'd seen happen with the man in the forest and with Abby. Several different kinds of names were given, but demura wasn't one of them. There also wasn't any information on how they could be killed. "I think so."

"I gather you have an idea about what to do to stop these demura?" Professor Pops asked.

"Maybe," I said.

"Are you prepared for the consequences of what may happen to your brothers?" Professor Pops asked Laeddin. He seemed genuinely concerned.

I sensed the quickening of Laeddin's pulse. He swallowed. It must be so hard for him. Knowing it was his brothers doing so much damage. I felt certain if at some point they were anything like Laeddin, they would've been kind, good men. I finally understood why he hadn't wanted to show himself to me in the cave. Laeddin had been hiding, not from the world, but from the strange creature changing his brothers into monsters.

I reached out a placed my hand over his. He put his other hand over mine. "We - Laeddin and I - are going to find Jaffar and ask him to remove the curse." It made me sick to think about it. For some strange reason the idea felt wrong. Yet I couldn't decipher why or think of a better option.

"By removing the curse, the demura will no longer have the power of a genie. It stands to reason they will simply disappear." Laeddin's words were quiet and I suddenly understood something else. Something big. Something I didn't know if I was ready to deal with. If we got Jaffar to reverse the curse and Laeddin was no longer a genie, would he continue to live? As a man, he would've died long ago.

"Laeddin," I whispered, feeling an ache in my heart.

He cleared his throat. "If the sorcerer can remove the curse, whatever the consequences, it'll be worth it."

No, it wouldn't be worth it, my mind screamed. I didn't want to lose Laeddin. I didn't want to be without him.

Professor Pops pulled the book back toward him. "I will tell the chayot about your plan." His features softened. "Maybe you should let me tell your mom and dad too? Let them help?"

I shook my head. "No. I - we can do this." I gave Laeddin a quick look for verification that we could in fact do this. He bobbed his head once in agreement, so I continued. "I believe Jaffar will reverse the curse and then I can get back to normal." My shoulders turned in and I bowed my head. My wish to be normal seemed stupid, but I couldn't change how I felt. I wanted high school? Didn't I? Or was I just being stubborn? And didn't want to believe my mom and dad might have been right all along? I blew out my breath.

Professor Pops' face was grave. I figured as soon as we left, he'd tell them. I just hoped Laeddin and I could accomplish our goal before my mom and dad interfered.

"While the two of you are gone the chayot will make sure your friends are kept safe." He stood and went to his office door. Opened it.

Laeddin and I went to the door. Professor Pops clamped a hand on Laeddin's shoulder. "Take care of yourself." He turned to me. "And you, my granddaughter. If anything were to happen to you - " he trailed off. My stoic grandfather was choked up.

Seeing his emotions so close to the surface brought mine up as well.

"I will." Laeddin tried to smile.

"Please let me know when you've returned," Professor Pops said, wrapping me in a hug. "I love you, you know."

"Love you too, Pops."

Until that moment I'd never seen him be anything but calm and collected. I could tell by the strength of his embrace that he didn't want to let me go.

I hugged him tighter. Help from him and my parents probably wouldn't be so bad, but something inside wouldn't let me ask. I wanted to do this. I wanted to prove to them that I wasn't a child.

Still, I couldn't help wondering how my mom would handle the situation is she were me.

"I'll call when we are back," I said.

Laeddin and I followed Professor Pops to the front door. Someone watched us from upstairs. I glanced up and saw Troy. When he realized I caught him, he backed away. If my grandfather didn't tell my parents, Troy probably would.

"Thank you for stopping by." Professor Pops opened the door and we walked into the chilled night.

MAGIC CARPET

WE WALKED TOWARD THE HOUSE, but I got the sense Laeddin didn't intend to take us all the way back. "What's the plan?" I asked. The selfish part of me wanted to put off the confrontation with Jaffar for as long as possible. I didn't want to lose him just like I lost Abby.

If Jaffar even agrees, my mind whispered. And part of me didn't want him to. I kept going back to my wishes. I had two left. Couldn't I just wish the genies were no longer demura? What would happen if I did? Would all of them disappear? Did that include Laeddin? I wasn't ready to have him be gone.

Before Laeddin could answer, a golden carpet landed at our feet, shimmering in the moonlight. Laeddin stepped on and held out a hand for me.

"Are you serious?" I asked, holding my ground. Riding on something was not the same as flying with wings.

Laeddin smiled sadly. "A magic carpet is one of my favorite ways to travel."

I glanced around at the houses in our neighborhood. They weren't close together. Trees, shrubs, flowers, and great expanses of land separated one house from the next. "Won't we be seen?"

"No," he whispered. "That's part of the carpet's magic."

I hesitantly climbed on. Flying was my thing, but I hadn't ever done it without my wings.

"It's safe, don't worry." He wrapped his arms around my waist. As soon as I was on, the carpet took off. I couldn't help it, I squealed. Laeddin chuckled. "Do you want to sit?"

We zoomed up and out over the trees. In the distance were the lights of the city of Boston. The higher we went in the sky, the bigger the moon and stars seemed to become. We were flying fast, and the wind should've whipped through my hair, but it was as calm as if we were still on the ground.

"This is crazy," I said as we flew past a tall building.

He pulled me closer. "It is," he agreed.

"So where are we going?" I leaned over the edge, watching people and cars go by.

"Back to the home of my youth. Jaffar is still there. I want to try to sneak up on him. It's highly unlikely that'll happen, but maybe he'll be asleep." Laeddin brushed a piece of my hair out of my face.

"Okay." I gulped down a knot of pain. "If this is going to take a while, I may sit." I kneeled down, pulling Laeddin down too. His aqua eyes held mine. There was so much I didn't know about him; so much I still wanted to know. "What if I wished the world and everything but us just froze?"

Laeddin sat and crossed his legs. "What would be the purpose of that wish?" he asked, gently.

"We could have more time together," I said simply.

"That's not a bad wish. It's very sweet actually." He took my hands, weaving my fingertips with his. "But then what? We'd be together in a world held frozen in time until - "

"I know." I sighed, understanding the wish was greedy and completely irrational.

"No, I'm serious. It's probably obvious I have feelings for you. I've tried to keep them in check. When you grazed me with your teeth, it took every ounce of effort I possessed not to kiss you right then and there."

I blinked. "I thought you were angry."

"I was." He gave a wry smile. "Jasmine, I'm an old, old man and I was pretending to be your parental guardian. It felt like if I gave in, I'd be taking advantage of you, of your youth and your innocence." As he spoke, his thumb caressed the inside of one of my hands. It was distracting.

"I'm not that young and innocent," I said, trying not to sound too upset. I wasn't a child for goodness sake.

"You are, Jasmine - "

I started to interrupt but he put a finger over my lips.

"The truth is, I wouldn't mind spending several eternities with you."

"Really?" I smiled. That was the sweetest thing I ever heard.

Then Laeddin did something so completely unexpected. He leaned in and kissed me.

I didn't dare breathe, thinking he would remember that it was me he kissed, or he'd change his mind, but he didn't. His lips softened, caressing mine.

Flames of desire and need and hunger arose in me with abandon. I wrapped my arms around his neck and kissed him back with fervor.

His lips moved against mine, matching my need. Laeddin pulled me onto his lap and I wrapped my legs around him.

"Jasmine." He said my name, but I didn't know how. His lips never left mine. They demanded more. His tongue pressed my lips apart, exploring, tangling with mine.

When our lips finally parted, we both were breathing heavily.

It was my first real kiss.

"That," he began, taking my face in his hands, "was amazing."

I bit my lip, unable to speak. I wanted to do it again. But I wanted to taste him even more. I wanted his blood in my mouth, on my tongue, in my body. I wanted him.

He seemed to recognize my need.

"After," he said with a smile.

Immediately I knew he meant if we got out of this situation, if he didn't turn to dust, and we were able to be together, he'd let me drink from him. That alone increased my determination to somehow make sure he wouldn't die.

Suddenly the world around us shimmered and we shot through a hole in the sky. The darkness seemed to open up and swallow us and then spit us out again. I closed my eyes for the briefest moment, fighting dizziness. When I opened them again, we were in a totally new land.

"We're here," Laeddin breathed.

I untangled myself from him and stood. "Where's here?" The landscape was different than the human realm and that of Sharra. The colors seemed more vibrant.

The carpet landed in a deep green meadow. Laeddin took my hand and we stepped off the carpet together.

"This is the home of my youth. Welcome to Debania."

"It's breathtaking," I said, not sure where to look first.

Green ivy covered what I guessed had been a dwelling of some kind. It had crumbled with time and age. Colorful flowers bloomed everywhere on trees, bushes, and ground cover. The air seemed to cling to my skin, like the spray of perfume. It was heavy with spicy fragrance.

I walked over to a tree and plucked a fruit. The color was reminiscent of an orange. I peeled back the skin and sniffed. "What kind of fruit is this?"

"May I?"

I handed the fruit over. He finished peeling it, separated one of the sections and popped it in his mouth. After he swallowed, he said, "It's an orange palm."

"What does it taste like?" I'd never tried human food and up until that moment hadn't ever wanted to. But the smell was amazing. I thought if I were ever to eat human food an orange palm would be what I would want.

Laeddin smiled. It was large and full of joy. "It tastes like an orange and a pomegranate combined."

"Mmmmm," I said even though I didn't know what either tasted like.

Laeddin ate another piece as he walked forward. "That used to be the main house." He pointed at the building covered in ivy. "This was our fruit grove." He picked up the pace until he was jogging. I followed. "See there?"

"Yes." Another crumbled building was covered in more ivy.

"That was the servants' quarters. Behind that were the stables." He continued on.

I kept after him, enjoying his boyish excitement, knowing he was putting off our unavoidable meeting between Jaffar. If he did reverse the curse, it would mean Laeddin would be gone and I would be alone again.

"If we were to keep going another mile or so, we'd find an incredible cluster of waterfalls." He glanced at me and then in the direction of the falls. "Want to see them?"

I did. Terribly. It was wonderful seeing this side of him. "Are they close to where Jaffar lives?" I didn't want to bring it up, but I couldn't help myself. It was the reason we were here.

Some of the happiness left his face. "It is, actually." Laeddin took my hand. "That's why we're walking. If I don't use my magic, we will hopefully be able to sneak up on him, and maybe just maybe that surprise will be enough to convince him to reverse the curse." He said the words, but they weren't convincing. I guessed he probably already knew we were here. But Laeddin wasn't ready to face him yet and neither was I.

After a short time, it became apparent we had an audience. The creatures had dark brown fur covering their bodies. Closer to the head, the fur became the color of butter. Their faces were a robin's egg blue in color. When the sunlight struck the blue color just right, their faces looked like skulls.

They lined the trees, covering the branches and scaring away the birds. Like soldiers standing at attention, waiting for orders.

"What are they?" I whispered.

"Skull monkeys," Laeddin responded, squeezing my hand.

"I should've guessed."

Laeddin chuckled. "They are the keepers of the land. As long as we don't do anything they deem unworthy, they won't bother us."

I wanted to ask him if he had a list of items they would consider disrespectful, but I was too nervous.

The skull monkeys' presence didn't seem to bother Laeddin at all. As we walked along some unseen path, he pointed out the different birds, insects, trees, and flowers indigenous to this part of the world. The most interesting was a black flower that was bigger than my hand. Seven large leaves made up the base and there were several smaller flowers inside, like a large black cotton ball. Its center was red as were the veins within the petals, making the flower appear to be dripping blood. "What is that one called?"

He smiled, plucked one of the flowers and put it behind my ear. The aroma was deep and luscious. "It's a frevara au regalia." He leaned in and sniffed the flower he placed in my hair. "One of our gardeners created it for the Queen. In our language, frevara au regalia literally translates to the Queen of Hearts.

"I like that." I turned so our faces were inches apart. His scent was everywhere. His eyes flickered to my lips. "I've never seen anything so beautiful."

Laeddin leaned down, his breath caressing my lips. "I have." He cupped my face in his hands.

I shivered, and raised toward him, the desire to kiss him again overwhelming. For the briefest moment I forgot everything except my need for his lips on mine.

Until the screaming began. I gasped, my heart pounding in my throat. "What's that?"

Laeddin glanced to either side of us, stepping back. "The skull monkeys. Perhaps I shouldn't have picked the flower?" He grinned mischievously.

I looked in the trees. They moved like they were alive. "What are they doing?" I stood closer to him. "Should we be worried?"

"If you weren't a vampire and I wasn't a genie, I would say yes." He winked. "But I think we can take care of ourselves."

Laeddin grabbed my hand and ran the rest of the way to the waterfalls. When we came to a stop, neither of us was breathing heavily, but his hair was windblown, which meant mine probably was too. I didn't care though. The scenery was amazing.

"Wow." There were at least a dozen waterfalls, two of which were incredibly large while the rest were smaller. "This place is magical," I breathed.

"It is," he agreed, pulling me forward.

We continued hand in hand until we arrived at the base of the closest waterfall. Mist coated my body and wet my hair so that it hung damp in my eyes.

"Take off your shoes." As Laeddin spoke he removed his. They were loafers and just slid off. Mine were Converse and took a little more time.

When they were off, I followed Laeddin to the edge of the pool surrounding the waterfall. The ground under my feet was squishy and mud seeped between my toes.

"Hurry," he demanded, his eyes alight with joy.

I dipped one toe in and then another. It was tepid, like lukewarm bath water.

"Feels good, right?" He moved his hands along the surface of the water, splashing me.

"I can't believe you just did that."

He splashed me again. "Believe it, Jasmine."

"You're in so much trouble." I dove in, going for his legs, determined to knock him off his feet, and soak him. But as soon as my hands touched his calves, he lifted me out of the water.

"Heyyyy," I whined, until I took a good look at his face. "What?"

He pulled me to him. "Do not say a word. No matter what. He isn't to know what you are."

"But - " That didn't make sense.

"No," Laeddin barked quietly.

"Okay," I said, hearing the worry in his voice.

He let go and moved so that he was in front of me. His hand rested on my hip, keeping me firmly in place. I slowly turned around. The "he" Laeddin mentioned was tall. His skin was slightly tinted green and he was dressed from head to toe in black. In his right hand was a long staff tipped with a deep purple orb, which gave off an eerie glow. I knew immediately he was Jaffar.

Seeing him made me realize I wasn't scared, but suddenly very sad. If Laeddin convinced him to remove the curse, what would happen to him? What would happen to me?

"Laeddin. How long has it been?" His voice was at once loud and soft, melodic and grating.

A WICKED DEAL

LAEDDIN FOUND my hand under the water. He took it in his. "Two thousand years, Jaffar. You look well." I felt his shoulders shrug. "You look the same."

His thin lips curled into a smile. "So do you, youngest son." As he spoke hundreds of skull monkeys appeared behind him. They sounded like a cheering crowd. Jaffar raised his bony hand and the monkeys quieted. "Who is the girl you have with you?"

Laeddin's hand tightened around mine. I knew he was telling me not to say a word, so I kept quiet.

"This is Jackie. She's my newest mistress."

"Ahhhhh, well step out from behind the genie, child. Let me have a look at you." He waved his hand and Laeddin was forcefully pushed away.

I really didn't want to look at him, so I pretended to be shy.

"There's no need to fear me or the skull monkeys. We mean you no harm." He glided along the ground as though he were floating.

I didn't respond but peered at him from under my lashes.

Jaffar squinted shrewdly. "Interesting." To Laeddin, he asked, "Why have you come back to Debania?"

"Perhaps you can allow Jackie and me to climb out of the water and we can go someplace more comfortable." Laeddin's hand found mine under the water again.

"There's no need, Laeddin." His voice became more grating. "Unless I like what you have to say, you'll pay for coming back here."

Anger simmered in my heart. The sorcerer had better not harm him.

"We've come to ask that you remove the curse. It's been two thousand years." He raised the hand not holding mine out of the water in a pleading manner.

Jaffar began laughing, hard and sinister. Just as quickly as he began, he stopped. Snapped his fingers and the skull monkeys rushed us.

Laeddin turned and murmured to me. "They won't hurt us. Hold very still and say nothing."

I remained motionless as one of the monkeys lifted me out of the water and carried me over its head. It seemed incredibly strong. I dropped my head so that I could look behind and see what was happening to Laeddin. A skull monkey picked him up and was carrying him overhead as well.

Seeing that he was okay, I turned to see where the monkey was taking me. It walked a short distance and then stopped. I wanted to ask what was happening, but I held my tongue.

Jaffar was unexpectedly in front of me. "For your insolence I've decided to let you spend the next decade within the Caves of Vipers. If, after ten years, you've survived, I'll consider your request.

My skull monkey lifted me high above its head and I realized it was going to drop me. While Laeddin and I could easily last ten years down there, my friends didn't have that luxury. And what would my parents think if I was gone that long? They would be frantic. What would happen if they tried to come after me?

"Wait," I yelled.

The skull monkey froze. Jaffar stepped closer. "What is it? Do you wish to beg for your life?"

"If you throw us into the cave, I can just wish us free and then Laeddin will just ask again. Isn't there another way?" I hoped to reason with him.

Jaffar was standing directly above me. "You want something different than he does, don't you?"

I swallowed.

He continued, "Oh, this is wonderful. You want him. The genie has become important to you."

I lifted my chin defiantly. "So?" It was true. In my heart of hearts I wanted him to survive. That was the wish I held close. But it was so selfish.

"So, why don't you ask me what you want? Maybe I'll consider it." His robes swished as he moved.

"Is there a way to take the curse from Laeddin and his brothers without making Laeddin disappear or die?" As the words came out, I felt like a silly child.

"Did you hear that, Laeddin? The child has feelings for you." He touched my face and flinched. "You pulse with magic." He gasped. "You are a vampire." He turned me in the monkey's hands so that my back faced him. I didn't look at Laeddin. I couldn't. His fear reached out and strangled me. I couldn't see Jaffar's expression when he lifted my shirt, but I heard the sharp intake of breath. "You are an Original." He placed me on my feet. "This changes everything."

"It does," I asked, hopeful, adjusting my shirt.

"Of course." He snapped his fingers and all of the monkeys vanished. The sounds of birds and insects returned.

Laeddin took hold of my hand. "Knowing what she is changes nothing, Jaffar."

I snuck a look at him. His face was hard with resolve.

Laeddin was furious. I swallowed, ignoring the racing of my heart. He obviously had no idea how serious I was about keeping him in my life.

"Why does my being an original vampire change things, Jaffar?"

The slight grin he'd been wearing increased to a full-fledged smile. "There's something I want and only you can give it to me."

"Really?" I had no idea what that could be.

"Oh, yes. If you give me what I want, I will remove the curse from the brothers - "

I was about to interrupt him, but he held up a hand, knowing what I wanted to say. "And I'll make sure Laeddin returns to your time exactly as he is now." He peered down his straight nose. "I am a sorcerer of my word."

My heart lifted. I couldn't help it. That would solve everything. My human friends would be safe from the demura and Laeddin would still be with me.

What if he's tired of living, I asked myself. That was a possibility. But he just kissed me and told me he'd be willing to spend eternities with me. His words meant something, didn't they? I glanced at him. He wouldn't meet my gaze, but instead kept his focus on some unseen thing.

"Do we have a deal?" Jaffar stood so close I could smell him, a mixture of decay and bitter herbs.

"What do you want?" For some reason I was suddenly nervous.

"I want you to give me your wings in exchange for all that I have promised."

I gasped. "My wings?"

"Do not do it. We can find another way." Laeddin faced me, desperation now clear in his eyes. He took my chin in his hand and made me look at him. "No." His eyes softened. "Please. Don't."

I thought about what giving up my wings would truly mean. Never flying again. Never lifting into the air. Never feeling the breeze caress my body or whisper through my hair. A week ago I couldn't get rid of them fast enough. I'd wanted nothing more than a normal life. One without wings, like my mom and dad, my uncles and Cindy.

Not forever though. A hole formed in the pit of my stomach. If I gave them up, Cam and the other humans would be safe. Was it a fair trade?

"You don't know what'll happen to you if they're gone. Your wings are a part of who you are, Jasmine." Laeddin begged with his eyes, asking me to listen.

But I didn't. I pulled myself from Laeddin's grasp and faced Jaffar. "My wings are yours, after I have proof that the demura are gone and the genies are no longer cursed." My arms were at my sides, my hands in fists, and I tried to look like what I was doing was easy.

His lip curled in what I guessed was supposed to be a grin. "You have a deal."

OceanofPDF.com

DESTROY THEM ALL

LAEDDIN JUMPED FORWARD, grabbing his arm.

"She isn't from our realm, Jaffar. You can't make a deal with her. It's against the rules of magic."

Jaffar screeched, pushing him away as though he were made of paper. "I just did." He struck the ground once with his staff. A circular light shot from the ground and radiated across the land.

Laeddin fell to his knees. I watched, waiting for the tattoos around his wrists to vanish.

"Watch," Jaffar commanded. The scenery in front of me swirled like wet watercolors. And before my eyes was a new landscape. I watched a demura about to enter a body, but it suddenly stopped, glanced in my direction and then vanished. "That's one."

From behind I heard Laeddin gasp. One of his brothers had just been killed before his eyes. I wanted to go to him, hug him and tell him I was sorry. I wanted to take away his pain, but I couldn't. Not while Jaffar was there. Not while I needed to make sure all the demura were gone.

A similar scene to the first happened ten more times. With every death, Laeddin's pain grew so strong, it felt like an object I could reach out and touch. Would he be able to forgive me?

The final demura was the one in Salem. "That is Iza. He is stalking the young man. Do you see?"

The young man he mentioned was Cam. He carried a backpack and walked nervously down a trail in the forest. The demura hovered above, trailing a little way behind, like the tail of a kite. "What are you doing in the woods?" I whispered.

He seemed to hear and turned. "Jack, is that you?"

I covered my mouth.

The demura floated in front of Cam. "Can you tell me where your friend is?"

Cam tried to run backward, away from the demura, but he tripped over a tree root and fell.

The demura drew closer.

"Make it stop," I shouted.

Iza changed direction and headed my way. It didn't get far before it evaporated and disappeared just as the others had.

I sighed with relief. Cam was safe.

The swirling scenery faded, and I could no longer see Cam.

"There, you've witnessed the demura are gone."

I was afraid to look at Laeddin, but I had to verify his tattoos were removed. He told me they would vanish when we was no longer a genie. Sorrow etched his brow.

Laeddin, my mind cried, wanting nothing more than to wish his pain away.

Laeddin checked his wrists at the same time I did. The tattoos were still there.

"What about Laeddin? He still wears the mark of the genie."

Jaffar laughed. "I said I would free the brothers from the curse, but I didn't say which ones. You should be glad I reversed the curse on the eleven demura."

"That isn't what we agreed on." I stepped forward. If I had to, I would drain the sorcerer dry. Take his blood for my own and show him he was messing with the wrong girl.

"Oh, but it is, Jasmine." His eyes glowed the color of the orb on his staff. "Give me my wings, vampire." His staff struck the ground and a dark light rippled out. As soon as it reached me, it crawled up my body. Pain radiated from my back. It was as though Jaffar was tearing the wings from my back with his bare hands.

I screamed and screamed and screamed until my throat went raw. At some point I felt strong hands lift me and I wondered if it was the skull monkey preparing to throw me into the Cave of Vipers.

I didn't care. The pain radiating from my back was so intense I wanted nothing more than to die. Death would've been preferable to the agonizing ripping and clawing.

My mind swirled with shadowy creatures. They whispered and chattered. I strained to hear, but I couldn't understand.

Two shapeless shadows appeared in my mind. They dipped and swirled like dancing phantoms.

"She is close," one said.

"Yes, her end is near," the other added.

"This is better than we could've have planned."

"It's enchanting. The vampire will easily take her now."

WE WERE NO LONGER in Laeddin's realm. The scent around me changed. I knew I'd been brought back to the human realm, to the house that was my mother's. I wanted to open my eyes, talk to Laeddin, but my body wouldn't allow it.

Somehow, I was still connected to Jaffar.

I watched him fly through the night, using my wings. He was no longer clad in black but wore a blood red cape and a white shirt that contrasted sharply with my wings. He reminded me of someone, but as soon as I had the thought, it vanished.

I watched Jaffar attack a human. His eyes stared lifelessly into the night as he drained him dry. That caused my mind to reel with disbelief. Had my wings changed Jaffar into a vampire? When he finished drinking, he flew into the land of Sharra and descended on Titan's mountain.

Row after row of crypts lined the catacombs inside the mountain.

Jaffar roamed the crypts, until he found the one he wanted. Then he opened it.

A female vampire lay inside. Jaffar tore a gash in his wrist and placed the wound over the vampire's mouth. After several moments, the vampire corpse grabbed on to Jaffar's wrist.

"Drink, Velencia. We have much work to do."

As Velencia drank another vampire entered the catacombs.

"What are you doing here? I know you served under the new Queen."

The vampire bowed low. "I've seen the error of my ways and have come to realize Snow White is not the ruler we need. It is you."

Jaffar gave her an evil grin. "Well, Ciana, that you knew I was here and who I am tells me your loyalties are at least somewhat true. I may yet have use for you."

"Thank you," Ciana said, standing upright.

My already sickened heart sank deeper into despair. I believed Ciana to be my friend, almost like a second mother.

Jaffar's dark eyes found mine, as though he could see me through the vision, our connection that strong. He hissed, allowing his fangs to show. Shocked, I tried to back away. "You've seen enough." Jaffar snapped his fingers.

My mind went numb. Life no longer glinted in a kaleidoscope of colors. There was only gray.

LOUD VOICES ERUPTED all around me. They were arguing. I wanted to make them to stop, but I was too tired.

"If we don't take her back to Sharra, she'll die." It was my dad's voice. He knew where I was. He found me! I tried to open my eyes but couldn't.

"I can't let you. She is bound to me and I cannot disobey her wish." Laeddin sounded pained, like he ached to help, but my wish demanded I stay in the human realm.

"You have to let us. You must. It's been a week since the two of you returned from Debania and nothing's changed. She hasn't moved." Mom! She and my Dad knew what I did and they knew Laeddin.

"She's waking," Laeddin whispered. "And I can't let you take her back. Jaffar didn't break the bond between Jasmine and me. Jasmine still has two wishes and I cannot be separated from her until I grant them."

"You can come back too," Mom insisted.

"No, I can't. Her first wish still holds. She must remain in the human realm until she wishes otherwise." Laeddin's voice echoed with finality.

"Ugh! Fine," my mom snapped.

"Then I must ask you not to tell her what you know. We'll find a way to help her on her terms." That was my dad's voice. They were keeping secrets from me.

"Promise you won't tell her, genie. If you care for her the way I believe you do, you will do what we say. Clearly, her wish is important, even now. Perhaps if I would've been more understanding we wouldn't be in this situation," Mom said.

"Nonsense," Dad added.

"I won't reveal anything, but she must remain in the human realm. Do what you must, but I will not remove her from this house." Laeddin's voice was tolerant, but adamant.

"Very well," Dad said. "I hope she knows just how much we love her."

RIPPED AWAY MY WINGS

"Ms. Ryder? Are you listening?" Mr. Henry, my grandfather looked over the top of his reading glasses.

That was me. I, Jasmine, the only princess of Sharra was pretending my last name was Ryder and was sitting in history class, daydreaming.

Something I found myself doing a lot lately.

"Uh, sorry. What was the question?" As I spoke, I scrunched down in my chair.

Several students snickered.

Drake called me a freak under his breath.

My blood boiled, but I pushed it down.

A quick glance at the clock above the door confirmed history class would be over two minutes.

Two horrendously long minutes.

"Was the Civil War necessary to abolish slavery?" Mr. Henry came around his desk, removing his reading glasses and tucking them into the pocket of his tan sweater.

I would never tell him this, but the students at school called him Mr. Rogers. The description fit.

He always wore a sweater over a button down shirt and he always wore slacks with the same pair of loafers.

Personally, I thought it weird he was semi-retired from his teaching positions at Harvard and the Seven Magics Academy so he could teach high school in the human realm, but what did I know?

He was a vampire with a conscious, that was for sure.

But he didn't need the money. He just liked teaching.

"Well, let's see." I was still distracted.

Today was my first day back after being out of school for a month while my body healed after Jaffar ripped my wings away.

Cam told me this was Pops' first day back too.

I knew that, of course.

He came to visit while I was healing and told me one of his other adoptive sons, a guy named Jesse was in trouble, but didn't say why or how or what. Troy went with him.

I saw Troy at lunch and noticed a difference.

His smile was gone, and his eyes were haunted.

I wanted to ask him what happened but hadn't had the chance yet.

"Ms. Ryder?" Mr. Henry said again.

I snapped out of it. "Abolishing slavery was necessary. Equal rights for all is an intrinsic part of every human life. As for the - "

The bell rang. Thank the gods of all realms.

Mr. Henry returned to his seat. We weren't excused until he said so.

But I felt the tension in the room.

It was Friday and this was the last class of the day. Everyone had their books closed, ready to bolt as soon as Mr. Henry gave the word.

"All of you have a paper due next Wednesday on the very question I asked Ms. Ryder. If you haven't started, you better take some time this weekend. I want you to give me your honest opinion and back it up."

I heard several classmates groan.

I think I was one of them. I hadn't started my paper yet, though I had an idea about what I wanted to say.

Mr. Henry removed his glasses from his pocket again and slid them on his nose. "You are excused. Have a good weekend." He looked up and winked.

I waited for a girl I didn't know and her friend to pass by my desk. As I got out of my chair, someone hissed in my ear.

"Freak." It was Drake.

"Yeah, you said that already," I said, my voice heavy with sarcasm.

I didn't even bother to look at him.

My whole body shook with anger and some fear.

When Jaffar ripped away my wings he took so much more, including my vampire abilities.

I was exactly what I always wanted to be. I didn't need to drink blood. Couldn't even smell it. No more vampire hearing, seeing, moving, or anything else.

I was truly normal.

And it was horrifying.

Drake laughed and slapped me on the back. I jerked like he just branded me with a fiery poker. The black tattoo on my back was now red and scarred and still quite tender.

"Ms. Ryder, may I speak with you, please?"

The classroom was nearly cleared out, and I had a straight shot to my grandfather. He wasn't focused at me, but Drake and he didn't look happy. Scary was more like it.

Drake straightened, readjusted his book, and continued down the aisle. When he was at the exit, he glanced back and made the motion that I should hang myself.

"Mr. Smythe, one more like that and you'll have detention with me all week."

Drake gasped, his eyes getting big.

"What's it going to be?" Professor Pops asked.

"But you don't run detention," Drake said, trying to remain nonchalant. It wasn't working.

Slowly Professor Pops faced him. "Mr. Smythe, I'll make a special exception for you."

"Yes sir." Drake ran from the room.

When he was gone, Pops' expression softened. "Did you want to come over for dinner tonight? I believe Troy is making his famous steak and potatoes."

At the thought of steak my mouth watered. Troy was an excellent cook - at least when it came to his steak. It was really all he made. Since becoming normal, he cooked steak for me more than once and it was delicious.

"Hmmm, sounds good." I needed to do something besides hang out at my house. "What time?"

Troy walked in with Peter and Zoe right behind him. "Actually Pops I was just coming to tell you I won't be home until late tonight. I'm going out with Peter and Zoe."

My heart immediately lifted when I saw them, especially Peter and Zoe. I wasn't sure why I responded to them the way I did, but I really liked them. They were friendly, kind-hearted, and fun.

Zoe had short red hair, a gazillion freckles and grass green eyes. Peter was tan with dark hair and eyes that almost looked black, except when the light hit them just right. Then they were like water in oil, their color shifting from one end of the rainbow to the other. They were cool and reminded me a little of my dad's eyes. I'd said as much to him one night. Peter laughed and said that was awesome.

When I became fully conscious after my deal with Jaffar, it was Peter and Zoe's faces I saw first. Laeddin said the two of them somehow knew Professor Pops. They knew about the supernatural, and they wanted to help. I guessed they must be supernatural too. Since Zoe constantly wore peppermint like I used to, I guessed she must be a vampire.

And I envied her.

But the two of them had become permanent fixtures in my house and I didn't want it any other way. I adored them even if I knew nothing about them. In fact, even after a month of spending nearly every day with them, I still had no idea where they lived.

All I knew was they recently moved here from out of the country. It seemed super lucky they found each other. The chemistry between them was so strong, so powerful. I didn't need to have vampire powers to feel it.

"What are you guys doing?" I asked, trying not to sound sad they hadn't invited me.

Peter and Zoe gave each other a look, one that said they were having a conversation without using their mouths. Troy coughed. "Well, we're going to - "

"Why don't you take Jasmine with you?" Professor Pops said. "It might be good for her."

Zoe gasped. "I don't think that's a good idea. She hasn't completely healed yet."

Peter and Troy nodded in agreement.

"It's okay, Professor Pops. If they don't want me to go with them, I don't have to." An ache twisted my heart. It hurt not to be included. Even if I did appreciate why they didn't want me to go. I wasn't healed, but without my wings I didn't think I ever would be. I had to find a way to accept my new life.

Laeddin suggested I tell my parents, see if there was a way they could help.

Just after losing my wings and while I was still unconscious, I swore I heard my parents talking to Laeddin. Like they already knew what I was up to and all that happened. But when I brought them up, Laeddin just shrugged and mumbled something incoherent about dreaming and that maybe it was my subconscious mind working through how to tell them.

I thought that sounded like a bunch of bologna. After a week, I still couldn't bring myself to talk to my parents, and decided he was probably right. My parents would be so disappointed with my decisions. They wouldn't understand.

"I think it would be a great idea. Tonight is supposed to be a recon mission, right?" Professor Pops removed his glasses and stood. "Nothing dangerous."

Recon? Danger? I liked the sound of both, and my heart wobbled at the possibilities.

The three of them nodded as one.

Zoe's face seemed to be getting paler by the second. Even her freckles appeared lighter. Peter shrugged like he was okay with it, and Troy? Well he just looked the way I felt, like an empty husk. I wanted to talk to him at some point.

Professor Pops cleared his throat. He began organizing and gathering the papers on his desk. "She needs to know what's going on. You can't keep if from her any longer." He eyed Peter and Zoe. Peter shuffled his feet, uncomfortable. Zoe lifted her chin. Professor Pops turned his stony glare on me. "If there's one thing I've learned over the many centuries I've been alive it's that secrets don't protect, they don't save, or shield." He shook his head. "When secrets come out, and trust me, they will, they serve only to hurt, hinder, and create bigger problems." He put his briefcase on the desk, flipped the metal clasps, and opened it. An aroma of fresh wood immediately hit my nose. It was a good smell. He tucked several stacks of papers inside before shutting the lid.

I swallowed down the lump in my throat knowing he was right. The truth was I missed my parents terribly, but I wasn't ready to face them yet. Better they didn't know where I was. When they found out all hell would break loose.

I also missed Abrea. So, so much. If I went back to Sharra and told my parents then I could see her, even if it would be briefly since they would probably ground me for life or worse, put me on troll duty.

"Fine," Zoe said. "You can come." It was obvious she didn't want me to.

I shook my head, fiddling with the frayed edges of my history book. "Really, I don't want to put you guys out. Go do whatever it is you're going to do without me. I was thinking I'd watch a movie with Laeddin tonight.

At the mention of Laeddin, Peter's features became hard. "No. We'd love to have you hang with us instead of the old man." He ground his teeth together.

I studied him, working to decipher why he didn't like Laeddin.

"Yes, we do need a fourth," Troy added.

"Excellent," Professor Pops said, moving past us, and then standing at the door, indicating we should leave. Troy got there first.

"I won't be around tomorrow or Sunday," Pops said. His steely eyes found Troy's. I watched as something I couldn't understand passed between them. "I've got a few things to do, but I'll be back Monday."

Troy's shoulders slumped. "I understand."

"Good." He grasped Troy's arm. "Can you stay behind a moment? I need to speak with you privately."

Troy ran a hand through his hair. "Sure."

"See you Monday," Pops said, excusing us with a wink.

The three of us walked down the hall. The school was mostly empty. Debris littered the floor. White poster board covered in glitter and red, white, and black paint adorned the walls, announcing the coming Winter Formal. The theme was: A Sky Full of Enchanted Stars.

Peter kicked a piece of wadded up paper and caught it in his free hand.

"How was school today?" Peter asked, tossing the paper into the trash.

"Fine," I said, shrugging. "It was nice to be out of the house." I didn't add that it sucked not having my vampire powers and wings.

"You feeling any more like yourself?" Zoe asked.

I kept my eyes on the floor, blinking a few times so that I wouldn't cry. It meant a lot they cared. In the last week, Cameron stopped coming around.

As if he knew I was thinking about him, he appeared on the stairs from the second floor.

"Hey, Cam," I hollered.

He turned and raised a hand in greeting. Today he wore his curly black hair cropped super short, like he just got it cut. His brown eyes were sad against his handsome face, but his clothes were as fashion forward as ever. He wore pink jeans with a black button down shirt and black and pink suede shoes. "Hey, Jack." The diamond studs he wore on his ears sparkled in the light from the window as he turned back around and kept walking without stopping to talk.

"Can I catch up with you two at Pops' house later?"

"Okay. We're leaving at seven," Zoe said, her lips pursed tightly.

"I'll be there," I responded and then ran after Cam. I needed to talk to him. No time like the present to find out why he quit coming around or responding to my texts. "Cam," I hollered when he reached the bottom step. "Wait a sec."

He kept walking and my heart sank. What was up with him? Did I do something?

"Cam," I shouted again.

He stopped and whipped around. "I know it's your fault Abby's dead. Drake told me."

It felt like he slapped me. When did he start hanging out with Drake? Before I could respond, Cam took off. Two could play at that game. When he went out the front doors, I started running. I pushed open the door and paused, looking in both directions to see which way he went.

He was at the curb and getting into a suped-up red and black Camaro. Just before he slammed the door, his eyes met mine. They were angry but mostly sad.

"Ugh," I shouted, as he drove away, pounding my fists against my thighs and stomping one booted foot.

"Hey, freak. What'd those jeans ever do to you?" Drake snickered as he and his friend sauntered over.

I tried to push past them down the steps, but Drake grabbed the edge of my tee shirt and held on. My history book fell, spilling papers everywhere.

"Don't walk away from me, freak. Didn't your parents teach you that's rude?" His eyes glittered with anger.

I gulped down my fear. There was no one around, no one to help, and I no longer had my vampire strength. "What do you want?" I asked through clenched teeth, trying not to let the fact that I was scared show.

He sneered. "What do we want from the freak, Sam?"

The guy with him ran his hands down the front of my shirt, grabbing the loops of my jeans. "I think the freak should keep us company. She may be weird, but she's got a kick ass body."

Drake huffed. "Interesting." He seemed to be debating. "Go get your car and pull it around while I stay here with her."

"Sure thing, man." Sam went down the steps and took a left toward the student parking lot. When he was out of sight, Drake gave me a once over.

"I know what you are. You're disgusting and shouldn't be in this realm." Spit from his mouth hit my cheek while he spoke.

I wiped it away. "What do you mean?" I asked, even though I somehow knew he knew what I was. Even though it was impossible. And at the moment, I wasn't supernatural, but just like him.

He wrapped my tee shirt around his fist, pulling me closer. "I know you're a vampire. I can smell it on you."

That surprised me. "Like right now you can?" I didn't have my powers anymore, but maybe there were still there or something.

"Yes, you reek."

I don't know why but knowing that he knew made me happy. "Really? So what are you, then?"

His face got close to mine and I could smell his breath. It was a gross mixture of Mountain Dew and something else. I wasn't sure what. "I'm a chayot, Jack. Ever heard of us?"

I gasped. "Whoa. My uncle Gabe used to be the leader of the chayot."

"You know Gabe?" He leaned back a little shocked.

I shrugged. "We aren't close. He lives in a different realm now, but yeah, like I said, he's my uncle."

Drake snorted. "Your uncle is an idiot. Anyone who would give up leadership of the chayot and turn away from his calling deserves eternal - "

He was interrupted by the appearance of an elfin woman. I felt my heart lurch at seeing her. In the human realm. That was dangerous.

Midnight blue smoke swirled around her momentarily and then dissipated. She had blue-gray skin, ebony eyes, and long straight navy blue hair. Her clothes were steel leather. Black leather straps crisscrossed between her breasts, supporting what I guessed was a double sword harness from the look of the two sword handles that poked out behind either side of her head.

"Where did you come from?" Drake yelped. Even I heard the revulsion in his voice.

"The elven realm," she said, stepping forward so that she and Drake were toe to toe. She was as tall as he was, nearly six feet. Drake moved back, but she took hold of the front of his shirt, giving him a vicious glare. "You are chayot though not a good one. Evil flows through your veins." She inhaled deeply through her nose; her eyes narrowed into two slits. "I can see it."

Drake's mouth gaped open like a broken breadbox. "I don't - " His face began to turn red. It looked like she was suffocating him. Yeah, I wasn't a fan of Drake, but I didn't want him to die.

"Hey. Stop. You're hurting him." I grabbed her hand. But as soon as I touched it, a vision filled my mind. One where the world was covered in darkness and the only light came from one woman. She was a vampire. Beautiful. Cruel. Not at all like my mom, Snow White, the Vampire Queen. And worst of all, she had my wings. I screamed.

The elf turned momentarily my direction. "You. What a waste." She gave me a once over and clucked her tongue. "You'll be taken care of soon enough." She twisted my hand off hers and flung me away. I landed on the ground at the bottom of the stairs and the concrete dug into my already tender back.

Facing Drake she said, "The Mistress will enjoy feeding from your essence and turning you into one of her subjects." Drake's body went slack and crumpled like a puppet without strings.

"What have you done?" I stood on wobbly legs. My back felt wet, like it was bleeding. It was a sensation I wasn't used to. Physical pain was still new to me.

She turned back and smiled. "Don't worry, Jasmine. The Mistress has plans for you as well."

Drake's body seemed to disintegrate right before my eyes.

"He's gone to the Mistress. You'll see him again. Without question. And he'll be better than ever." She vanished the same way she came, with a whoosh.

I stumbled back, hitting the stair rail. Pain blasted through my body again, but I barely felt it. Shock over watching Drake die and turn to nothingness overwhelmed all my senses. I closed my eyes and took a deep breath, trying to gather my strength. Ever since Jaffar took my wings I felt like a waste of space.

"Hey, Jasmine. You alright?"

Without seeing him I knew it was Laeddin. A slight wind blew his scent toward me. I didn't crave his blood anymore, but he had a particular aroma - exotic spices and oranges - that was mouth-watering. I took another deep breath. "Yeah, I'm fine." I opened my eyes, drinking him in.

Laeddin was gorgeousness personified. His dark, slightly too long hair and aquamarine eyes against tan skin and a muscled body were like a digital painting.

Each of his wrists was tattooed in black tribal cuffs. To the general population the tattoos didn't say much, except maybe he'd gone through a rebellious phase. But to those who understood the supernatural world, the marks declared Laeddin was a genie.

Laeddin didn't wear the normal attire for a genie. He had on a faded pair of jeans and red tee shirt, the kind that cost six hundred bucks a piece. Behind him was his white Mercedes convertible. The top was still down due to the unseasonably warm weather we were having.

As Laeddin said many times, I was his master. I saved him from the same fate as his brothers, becoming a demura and then disappearing into the ether. But I hadn't freed him, and every time I saw his tattoos I was reminded of my failure. I meant to free him, but Jaffar played me. Laeddin and I couldn't be together while I was his master and he was my servant. At least that was what he said. It made sense. Really, I didn't know whether I wanted to be with him or not. He was over two thousand years old, though he didn't look a day over twenty. But we'd kissed and it was beyond memorable. Like sparks and heat.

"You sure?" He came forward and picked up my book and scattered papers. I debated telling him about the vision that had filled my mind when I touched the elf.

"Yeah." I tried to stand but fell back.

Laeddin dropped my books and ran over. "You are not fine, Princess." He put an arm around my waist, and I flinched. "What the jinn?" He touched my back. "Your shirt is soaked with blood." He helped me stand.

"Thanks," I whispered.

"Come on. Let's get you home." His breath brushed against my cheek. It was like a sultry night cruising through the sky on his magic carpet.

I leaned into him. "Sounds good."

He picked up my book and papers and then helped me into his car. When I was buckled, he started the engine and drove away.

I tried to get comfortable, but when my shirt caught against my back I cried out. Laeddin sped up, pushing the car to get home faster. I closed my eyes and imagined I was flying with Abrea. We chased a flock of blackbirds, diving through clouds and spinning through trees. Leaves whipped against my cheek. I felt the sting and my eyes watered. As we cruised along the babbling stream of Sharra, I stuck my hand in, allowing the cool water to tickle my fingers.

"We're here," Laeddin said softly. He turned off the engine. I opened my eyes and sighed. In reality there was no Abrea. No wings. No flying.

Ever.

Again.

A sob ripped from my throat.

Laeddin came around and helped me out of the car.

"Can't I wish the pain away? Or wish my wings back?" I pleaded with my eyes and my heart.

His arm brushed against my back. "Not without serious consequences."

"Well maybe I don't care about the consequences," I said, frustrated.

Laeddin let out a ragged breath. "I told you not to do it." He shut the car door and walked up to the house.

I froze. It occurred to me what I said. When I traded my wings away, it'd been to protect Laeddin. I hadn't wanted him to disappear like his brothers. Sure, they were no longer demura, but they no longer existed either - at least not in this realm. Jaffar agreed to keep Laeddin just as he was if I agreed to give him my wings. "Crap," I hissed, following him inside.

I found him at a cupboard in the kitchen. "I'm sorry, Laeddin. I didn't mean it," I said, falling onto a kitchen stool, letting my head smack against the counter.

"Yes, you did. And that's okay. I've been alive a long time. Lived my life. You shouldn't have agreed to Jaffar's deal." I heard him set something on the counter and looked up. It was a plastic tote full of bandages, ointment, creams, sprays, and other items I didn't know how to use.

"What are you going to do?" I asked, eyeing the tote nervously. While I never saw him use any of that stuff, my body flinched. Pain was in my future.

Laeddin set a can of something labeled antiseptic on the counter and went to the sink where he washed his hands with hand soap. Then he took a washcloth from a drawer next to the sink and turned the water all the way to hot. "We need to take care of your back before infection sets in." After a few moments, steam rose upward into his face, making his dark hair curl at the ends. I watched, fascinated. Once he was happy with the temperature, he got the washcloth wet, turned off the water, and wrung out the cloth. "This is going to hurt, but I need to clean out your injury and take a look at it."

I nodded, too scared to say anything.

"Take off your shirt," he said when he stood behind me.

It was crazy, but my face got hot. To cover up my embarrassment, I quickly pulled off the shirt.

"Unhook your bra. I would, but my hands are clean, and I want to keep them that way." His voice was tender.

My face burned. I reached back and unhooked it, hissing in pain as my bra released. I heard his breath suck in and had a thought. "Can't you just, you know, make it better with your genie magic?"

"I could," he began, "but if I healed your back with my magic without cleaning everything out first, I might seal in some kind of infection, or worse."

"Sure, but if that happened couldn't you just use your magic to fix that too." I thought about my magic. Since I was created by magic, surely my mom could have healed me. I could have too, if I had my wings. Using my wish to make my wings disappear took my magic. Jaffar ripping my wings out of me took all my vampire abilities.

"My magic isn't like yours. It doesn't come from the source. It came from Jaffar. So, while it's powerful, it's also deceptive, which was Jaffar's intention, I'm sure. The power I possess takes a wish literally and performs it exactly."

That made sense. "Okay." My body trembled, my nerve endings responding to the anticipation of the hurt I would feel. "I'm just not used to pain."

"I know, Princess, and I'm sorry." He pressed the washcloth gently against my back.

I let out a scream, my body intuitively trying to shrink away from the pain.

"Hang on," he said, his voice soothing.

I gritted my teeth. My instincts raged, demanding I turn around and end the genie because doing so would end the pain. But I held still. After a moment he started to pat at the open wounds and a whole new set of pain seeped through my body. I started to pant. "Please. Stop," I begged.

"Almost finished. Be strong," Laeddin murmured.

I slammed my hands into fists, watching them turn white as the blood left the area. I focused on them until Laeddin removed the cloth.

"There, I think I got it all." He tossed the bloody cloth into the sink's stainless steel basin. Then he picked up the antiseptic.

I couldn't take any more pain. I felt weak like I just ran ten miles. "Please," I said, my voice hoarse. "No more."

He touched my shoulder and I flinched. "I'm going to spray this on your back and then I'll feel comfortable using my magic to heal the rest. Okay?"

I clamped my teeth together more tightly as well as my fists. Nodded.

The spray was icy cold against my skin, but it didn't hurt. I felt muscles I hadn't realized were flexed begin to relax. When he finished, he set the can on the counter next to me.

"This next part shouldn't hurt at all, Princess."

"Good," I responded, allowing my jaw to loosen, ignoring his obnoxious need to call me Princess. It was my birthright, but it wasn't me.

I waited a few seconds, anticipating more pain. Instead warmth crept over my skin and my body responded like a flower opening for the morning sun. Relief swept over me. "That's better," I said, leaning my forehead against my fists.

"It's working," Laeddin replied. "Almost done."

I relaxed further, feeling like I could fall asleep where I sat. Images of my childhood fluttered across my mind. Of the day my dad and I went fishing in Peony Lake. Then my mind drifted again - to nothing.

"What the hell is going on?"

I sat up with a snap, knocking my head into something behind me.

There was a noise.

I turned toward the voice. It was Peter. He looked angry, like furious.

"Laeddin was healing my back," I said, mortification causing my cheeks to burn again. All that covered my breasts was the front of my dangling navy and hot pink polka-dot bra.

Zoe's eyes narrowed.

I bit my lip, quickly grabbed my shirt and tried to cover up. My face got so hot it felt like a furnace.

ACTUALLY HUMAN

"REALLY?" Peter said, putting his hands on his hips. He came closer, studying my back. "It looks about the same." He sounded accusing, not that it was any of his freaking business.

But I felt like I should explain. "I had a run in with Drake and an elfish woman. The wound reopened." I showed them the blood on my shirt. Tears pricked my eyes and before I knew it, I hopped off the stool, ran up the stairs and tossed myself across my bed. Yeah, not my finest moment.

I lay there with my arms tucked under my body, still clutching my bloody shirt, and forced myself not to cry. Sometimes, when I was super emotional, if I cried, my tears would be red, like blood. But since Jaffar stole my wings, I'd become so close to human it was scary. Perhaps I was actually human. I knew I was no longer me - a vampire created from the seven magics and the blood of my parents - that was for sure. I was a shadow. A shell. A husk.

The worst part about the feelings was that I was now exactly what I believed I wanted. A normal teenaged girl. Yet, I hated it. I wanted to rip off my skin. Shake myself from the body that no longer felt like it belonged to me. Tears pressed against my eyes and I let them come.

Screw it, I thought.

When the wetness fell against my comforter, I was saddened to see they weren't red. And that made me cry harder.

"Jasmine, we need to talk." The voice belonged to the cat, Gatsby. He'd been my mom's cat although she never mentioned he could talk. I don't think he talked to her, but when he was around me, he was quite chatty. Since I lost my wings, Gatsby hadn't come around again. Until that moment I thought he'd found himself a new home, especially since I never fed him.

"About what?" I asked, sniffling.

"The impending darkness. The Akuma. The woman who robbed you of your wings. Shall I go on?" The gray short-haired cat jumped on the bed and sat on my pillow.

I was surprised he knew so much, but he got the last part wrong. "It wasn't a woman, but a man. Jaffar."

"In Debania, the genie's realm, she wore a different body, but she's always been the same." The cat snorted. "Jaffar was and is Sharra, the old queen, and the vampire your mother took the crown from."

"How do you know all of this?" I sniffled, wiping my nose on my shirt.

"I told you I've been around a long time." Gatsby started licking one of his paws.

"Jaffar is Sharra. That's what you're telling me?" My heart pounded so hard I thought it might break bones. "But my mom - "

"She didn't kill Sharra, only wounded her deeply. In the last seventeen plus years, Sharra has been biding her time, waiting for the moment she could have what she always wanted."

"But my mom said Sharra didn't like the wings." My mom had told me about Sharra, of course. Plus, we learned about her in classes at the Seven Magics Academy. In a lot of ways, she was a legend. But we thought she died.

The cat blinked several times and I wondered if he suddenly went mute. He lay down so we were nose to nose. "Sharra preferred human bodies over her original. She didn't like that she looked more like the apes as a vampire. 'Humans were much prettier,' she said more than once. Giving up her wings in exchange for a human body was a tradeoff she accepted, but secretly she always missed them." Gatsby licked his nose and yawned, and I smelled kitty breath.

I pushed myself onto my knees and then sat. "You knew her?" I wiped my face with the sleeve of my shirt.

"First of all - " he paused, his head tilting. "You're about to have company. I'll come back later." He jumped off my bed and was out the window in seconds.

"Hey, Jack," Zoe said, knocking on my door. I wondered what Laeddin told them about the elf and Drake, about how I watched another person die.

I whimpered. "Go away." My mind was reeling with what Gatsby said. I needed to tell Laeddin and I might even need to tell my mom and dad. This was serious.

"Okay, I will. But - " The handle turned and she peeked in. "Hi," she said, smiling sheepishly.

"Hi," I replied.

"May I touch your scars?" she asked, entering my room and sitting on the edge of the bed.

That was a weird request, but I shouldn't have been surprised. When my wing outline had looked like a large black tattoo, everyone wanted to touch that too. Why should ugly, red scars in the same shape be any different?

"I guess."

There was the tiniest touch as Zoe traced a finger along the scars. "Laeddin told us what happened today. Well, the part he saw. About Drake. And the female."

I swallowed, desperate not to talk about it. None of it. I didn't like Drake, but I felt bad for him and for those who loved him. He was a chayot and I wondered what sort of help or repercussions would ensue become of his death. I realized I should probably tell Pops what happened. The chayot would want to know about Drake and the elf, too.

But as Zoe outlined my scars, I forced myself to relax, if only for a moment. The scars should've disgusted her. That was how I felt. I tried not to look at them if I could help it. In fact I saw the winged scars all of twice in the last several weeks. But as Zoe's finger skimmed across the thickened skin, I felt lighter. The dull pain that constantly plagued my back regardless of Laeddin's magic lessened. And my energy came back in full. I felt better. Stronger. I knew it wouldn't last, but for the briefest moment it felt like my wings had returned. Was she using magic?

I glanced at Zoe, wanting to thank her. I didn't know what she was doing with her finger, but l liked it. I appreciated it. She looked so sad though.

"I'm sorry this happened to you," she whispered. I wasn't sure if she meant the thing with Drake or was talking about me losing my wings, but I chose to believe she meant the latter.

"It isn't your fault. It's mine." I didn't want her to stop, but I needed a shower before I went with her, Peter, and Troy to do whatever we were going to do tonight. Pressing my shirt more tightly against my chest, I climbed off the bed and walked to the bathroom. "Did you still want me to go with you guys?" I asked hesitantly.

"Of course." She stood. "When you've finished showering, come down. We'll be waiting. I texted Troy to meet here instead of his house." At the door to my bedroom she paused and looked around. "I love what you've done with the space."

Before I could respond she closed the door. "Thanks," I whispered anyway.

In the bathroom, I turned on the water, undressing while I waited for the water to warm. For reasons I couldn't explain I turned my back toward the mirror, a sudden need to see the scarred whisper of the grandness that used to be my wings.

Just as before, they were raw and red. The scars looked fresh, like the wound just closed. Certain areas were swollen and puffy. But most of the pain was gone. So there was that, at least.

I quickly showered.

When I was finished, I rubbed the towel through my hair, especially at the roots, and then went to my dresser. I put on matching bra, undies, and socks in boring gray. I opened my closet doors to dress but stopped. I had no idea what we were doing. Professor Pops mentioned recon, so I figured it wasn't going to be anything fancy. It was warmer than usual outside during the day, but at night the temperature dropped a great deal. Making a quick decision, I chose a pair of loose jeans and a gray pullover sweatshirt. Then put on my favorite combat boots.

I decided against any jewelry, but still needed to work on my face and hair. I went into the bathroom, put some tinted lotion on my face followed by a quick brush of powder, and then lined my eyelids with black liner. I was about to apply some sparkling taupe gloss when I realized I hadn't brushed my teeth since that morning. So I quickly did that, applied gloss and a thick coat of mascara to my lashes. Finished with my face, I put a large dollop of mousse in my long wet hair and rubbed it in. Then I turned on the blow dryer and scrunched my hair with my hand while putting warm heat on it. The effect was messy, wavy black curls. As a final touch I took a comb and worked out any pieces that were too tangled and sprayed it with hair spray.

In the full-length mirror I turned back and forth, checking my reflection. I looked alright.

Grabbing my phone, I tucked it into my back pocket. At my dresser, I opened the fake gold genie lamp and took a twenty from inside, sprayed some of my favorite Tory Burch perfume on my neck and wrists and then opened my bedroom door.

In the hallway, I heard arguing. It was low, as though they were trying to keep what they were saying from me. Laeddin also had the TV on, which he hardly ever did. Something serious was up.

At the top of the stairs, I strained to listen.

"You are way too old for her." That was Peter. I guessed his words were aimed at Laeddin and that they were about me. It bugged me that he thought it was his place to decide who I should like, regardless of the age. We hardly knew each other.

Laeddin responded, but I didn't hear what he said.

Zoe's soft voice added, "We just want what's best for her."

Laeddin mumbled something else. I nearly shouted with frustration. With every fiber of my being I wanted to know what he was saying. Since Laeddin brought me back from his realm, there was a strange rift between us. We were cordial to each other, almost overly so, but we weren't intimate. Not like we'd been when he first took me to his realm. He'd kissed me for goodness sake. And it wasn't a sweet, chaste kiss either. It was deep, sensual, and passionate. A kiss to end all kisses.

I believed we'd moved to the next level. That maybe we might actually date, hold hands, something. But we hadn't done any of it. We talked over breakfast. He drove me to school. Occasionally we turned on a movie we both wanted to watch, but there wasn't any romance. There'd been zilch. It was like we went backward. Definitely not forward.

"Maybe she should come and live with us."

"I don't think so," Laeddin hissed.

"You can't control her, genie." Peter again.

"Of course not," Laeddin snapped. "She controls me, and I know her wish as do you."

I figured it was time to get down there and rescue Laeddin. Placing a large, fake smile on my face, I bounced down the stairs. "K, I'm ready," I said in a high singsong voice that sounded nothing like me.

Peter and Zoe looked up. Peter put a hand on Zoe's shoulder and squeezed. Their expressions were pinched.

Laeddin looked tired. "I don't like this," he said.

"I'll be fine." I stood next to him, pulled on his shoulder so that he was forced to bend down and kissed him on the cheek. "And thank you for taking care of my back earlier. It feels much better."

He bowed. "You're welcome."

Flustered by his actions, I turned to Peter and Zoe. "So what are we doing?" I wanted to change the subject. Get them to stop talking to Laeddin about me, about stuff that was none of their business.

Zoe's brows creased together.

Peter cleared his throat. "There's been some bizarre, um, activities happening around Salem since - " He pointed at me. I was surprised. It didn't feel right to have him be so tongue-tied.

I rested a hand on the counter, a vine of fear winding through my stomach. "Just spit it out, Peter." I said the words because I wanted to know, but I was also anxious about what he would say. Bizarre activities? What did that mean?

Zoe spoke up. "The first night you came back without your wings was when the first demonic creature appeared."

"Demonic creature?" I asked, even though I heard her right. I was repeating everything to hide the fact that I was freaked out. They were talking nonsense and I wasn't expecting it.

"We've learned the creatures are Akuma," Peter chimed in, crossing his arms.

"A-coo-ma," I said, wrapping my mouth around the odd word.

"That's right. Professor Pops spoke with his friend Kenmei and found out the word is Japanese for demon," Zoe added, shifting from one leg to the other.

"We have no idea who they're working for or what they want, but it seems they might be here because of you." Peter's voice wasn't accusatory, but his words sure felt like it.

"Because of me?" I wasn't surprised not after what Gatsby told me. And I remembered what the elfin woman said. "When Drake was being a jerk, the elf said that Drake was a bad chayot and that - "

"Hold up, Drake was a chayot?" Peter asked. He looked stunned.

"Yeah, the elf said evil flowed through his veins. She also said that she was sending Drake to 'the Mistress' and that he would return, better than ever." As I spoke, the dread that had begun infesting my stomach reached up through my ribs. It tangled between each bone, taking hold and squeezing.

"Did she say who the Mistress was?" Zoe moved closer, her eyes focused keenly on me.

"No, but I - " I paused. If I told them about Sharra, they would want to know where I heard such things. Then I would have to explain Gatsby, the talking cat. They might think me crazy.

"What?" Zoe peered at me, her eyes kind but also worried.

"Nothing. Never mind."

"And she just appeared in the front of the school?" Zoe asked, her head tilting in question as she took my hand in hers. I felt the warmth, the magic. But more than that, I felt familiarity. For not the first time I questioned not only who she was but also what she was.

"Yes, she did," I finally said.

"What about her name? Did she tell you her name?" Peter interjected.

"No," I said, wishing I could be more help, but I didn't know how to share my information yet. Plus, it stung to know the Akuma were in Salem because of me. If the government found out, this town would go from peaceful to unpredictable. "She did say I would be taken care of soon enough."

"Anything else?" Laeddin took my hand and curled it in his.

I wanted to melt, to fall into his arms, lean my face upward and feel his lips on mine. I wanted -

"Jasmine? Did the elf say anything else?" His words snapped me back to reality.

"Oh, gosh." I stepped back, feeling my face flame up at the thoughts I just had. "No. That's it." I turned away, going into the living room, focusing on the TV. The news was on. There was a picture of the sky and then numbers. I tuned out Laeddin, Peter and Zoe, and focused on the newscaster.

"Let me preface this by saying that there is no need to panic. The President is scheduled to confirm this later tonight, and he has assured us there is nothing to fear." The newscaster was almost too handsome, too perfect. He smiled into the camera. Perhaps to settle down the millions of people he just told not to panic. Even my heart was racing.

The newscaster continued, "Scientists are puzzled by the extraordinary phenomena that began occurring nearly five weeks ago."

That was right after Jaffar took my wings.

He was still talking, "It has been confirmed that Earth is losing five extra minutes of light per day. Scientists predict that at this rate darkness will completely consume the planet in one hundred and eleven days." He took a long pause, obviously for effect, to let it sink in. That was crazy. In less than four months Earth could be completely dark?

"They know it isn't the moon or a planet blocking the sun's light. Scientists have ruled out meteors, a dead star, or any other space singularities. Satellite data has also confirmed that the Earth, Sun, Moon, and surrounding planets are orbiting normally, that it's business as usual. As far as they can tell nothing from space is causing the darkness.

"For now they've turned their efforts inward, focusing on Earth itself. So far testing hasn't revealed anything unusual.

"At this time what they know for sure is that the sun is still putting off as much heat as ever. Usually with the dark comes cooler temperatures, but that hasn't been the case. In fact Boston and surrounding areas have been having an unseasonably warm winter.

"There is talk the darkness could be supernatural in nature. The chayot are working closely with government officials around the globe to solve the problem.

"That's all we have to report at the moment but stay tuned to KBTV for all the latest updates."

A commercial came on.

"Sweet unicorn blood. Hey, did you guys hear that?" I turned and saw Laeddin, Peter, and Zoe were directly behind me. "What does it mean?" I had a feeling I knew what it meant.

Zoe's face turned white as a newly bleached sheet. "I have to get back." She shimmered and vanished.

I gasped. "Where'd she go?" It took powerful magic to just vanish out of thin air.

"Back to Sharra," Peter said, slumping onto the couch.

"Sharra?" I sat next to him and rested a hand on his shoulder. "What do you mean?" Even as I asked, I knew. The reason Zoe's touch felt so familiar, the reason I had such a connection with Peter and Zoe was that somehow Peter and Zoe were actually my mom and dad. Snow and Dorian. "I can't believe it." I shook my head as anger and discouragement and even embarrassment overwhelmed me. "Dad, you tricked me? Deceived me?"

Disappointment stuck in my throat like too much bread. I went to the front door and yanked it open. I couldn't believe they thought it a good idea to turn themselves into teenaged kids and meddle in my life! It was the most awful thing parents could ever do. It was weird enough to think they were even teenagers in the first place, but going through it again so they could spy on me?

"I need to go for a walk."

Peter stood and looked ready to say something.

Laeddin moved like he intended to go with me.

I put a hand up. "By myself. Alone. Do not follow me!"

TROY IN A TREE

DARKNESS ENVELOPED me and I calmed a little. As a vampire, I loved the dark. When I reached the end of the drive, I debated whether to go left or right. Right meant I would head toward Pops' house. There wasn't any place else to go after that.

Left meant I could walk around the neighborhood. That was what I needed. But I couldn't make my legs move that way. My heart kept urging me to go right. I wanted to see Professor Pops. Maybe even Troy. They were good friends.

"Hey."

My heart jumped. The voice came from above. I looked up and saw Troy sitting on one of the larger tree branches quite high up, his legs dangling over the edge.

"Hey yourself," I returned, clasping one hand over my heart. "How did you - " Before I could finish, he jumped. I was momentarily frightened for him, until he landed with a thud on both feet, crouching slightly. There was a huge smirk on his face.

"I'll bet you ten bucks and a ride on my back that you need some time alone with me." He straightened. I had to tilt my head to see his face.

I snorted. "A ride on your back, huh? Sounds lame." I took a couple of steps down the sidewalk to the left. It took a lot of effort. I didn't want to walk away. Honestly, I hoped he stopped me. Yeah, I was playing games. Total teenager thing to do.

"Jack, you have no idea."

I stopped. "Like a piggy-back ride?" I asked, curious about why he would suggest a ride on his back.

He shrugged. "I guess that could be fun, but I was thinking more along the lines of a dragon-back ride." He winked, his eyes sparkling in the moonlight.

It was then I realized I hadn't known what kind of supernatural Troy was. Too much had been going on. All of it revolving around me. Gah! "You're a dragon?" I asked, not bothering to hide my shock. Of all the creatures I imagined that wasn't one of them.

"Correct." He took several steps into the darkness near the tree trunk. "Wait here a moment," he whispered.

I did, excited about the prospect of flying.

Flying.

Oh. My. Goodness. I was going to get to fly again. My heart sped up and I squinted, hoping I could watch him shift. The ground shook and a surge of hot wind struck my cheek. His shadow became enormous, his eyes like twin flashlights.

"Come here," Troy said.

"O-Okay." I was nervous. I'd never seen a real live dragon before. Mom told me of riding on Abernathy, but it wasn't the same as seeing one in real life. I moved toward him and let him step closer as well.

From out of the shadow came a gloriously large dragon. I was surprised. Pleasantly surprised. "You're awesome," I said, carefully stepping closer. His wings beat the air, causing leaves that should've fallen long ago to swirl about us. Some landed in my hair and I brushed them out.

Troy shook his head too, sending a few stray leaves to their doom. A puff of smoke curled from his nose. "Thanks."

"Can I touch you?" I reached out a hand curiously, wanting to know what his scales felt like, whether they were cold or warm, smooth or rough.

He responded with s quick snap of his sharp teeth. I screamed, pulling my hand back like he'd actually bitten me.

Troy laughed. "Sorry. Dragon humor. It won't happen again."

I smiled. "Funny." In the dark it was impossible to tell what color his scales were. They looked black, as did his eyes and his wings. Troy lay down, curling his tail around his body. "Climb on."

I stepped toward him and then stopped. "Um, how? I don't want to hurt you."

He chuckled. "Unless you're a lot heavier than you look, I'll be fine." He flicked his tail slightly. "You can use my tail as a stepstool."

"Okay." I carefully stepped up and then lifted myself onto his back. His scales were smooth and warm, but not hot. Only a few degrees hotter than my body temperature. When I was all the way on, I situated my knees so that they were around his neck, out of the way of his wings. I looked for a place to hold on and placed my hands under two of his scales. "Aren't you afraid that you'll be spotted? Like on satellites and stuff?"

Troy stepped out from the trees' shadow and then leapt into the air. I yelped at the sudden rush. Held on tight. I didn't want to fall off.

"To answer your question, no, I don't worry about satellites. Magic surrounds my dragon form and magic trumps human science any day." He beat his wings in one giant motion, heading higher and higher. The air became thinner and colder. It was a sensation I wasn't accustomed to. As a vampire I hadn't experience extreme temperatures. I was feeling it now though. I clamped my mouth shut, not wanting Troy to hear my teeth chattering.

It looked like we were going to fly to the moon. Troy opened his wings wide and the moonlight allowed me to see that Troy's dragon scales were bronze, like the color of a new penny. His wings were light copper, and the tips were silver. He'd been awesome in the dark, but in the light? His tail meandered behind him like a giant snake and his wings, like those of a giant bat, beat against the night air. He was amazing.

A giggle snuck out of me. It was the happiest I'd been in more than a month.

"Ready to have some fun?" Troy's head whipped around so I could see one eye. He winked.

"Sure. If you think you can have fun," I said in mock sarcasm.

"Psssssh. Hang on tight." He tucked his wings close to his sides and then spun us in a tight spiral, like a rocket shooting from Earth.

The feeling was amazing, and I laughed. "More."

He pulled us out of the spiral and then popped his wings. Like a kite caught in a sudden wind burst, we shot upward and then just floated. Where a moment ago we'd been going fast as lighting now we coasted, a bronze cloud in the night sky. It was nice. Relaxing. I knew I missed flying but until that moment I didn't realize how much.

Without thinking I rested my head against the top of his, closing my eyes, savoring the sensation. There was something like a humming deep within his body, almost like purring.

"This is nice," Troy said, after we'd been floating a while.

"It is," I agreed, taking a deep, cleansing breath. "Exactly what I needed."

"Tough day?" he asked.

"That's putting it mildly."

"Wanna talk about it?"

"I wouldn't know where to begin." I let my hands droop on either side of his neck.

"Just spit it out."

"Let's see. Jaffar ripped the very essence of who I am away when he took my wings. Drake and his gross buddy tried to hurt me after school. Then an elf woman showed up and killed Drake, like right in front of me. The guy I thought I really cared about is sweet, but we kissed - " I paused, remembering. It'd been wonderful, better than I imagined my first kiss could be.

"You and Laeddin kissed? Isn't he like a thousand years old or something?"

I smacked Troy, but doubted he even felt it. "Yeah, but it isn't like that. It's - Never mind," I huffed.

"Anything else?"

"Yeah. The elf lady told me that the Mistress is out to get me and the people I thought were my friends are actually my parents." At that, I shuddered. I still couldn't wrap my mind about it. The whole idea that they disguised themselves to stay close to me so they could keep tabs on me was creepy and way too overprotective.

Troy growled. "I'm glad you finally know. It was weird that I couldn't tell you."

"You knew?" I asked, surprised.

"Yeah, I kind of found out when I overheard Pops talking with them right after Laeddin brought you back. When I confronted them about it, they told me the truth. I wanted to tell you right away. It's wrong when adults think they need to keep secrets. In fact it pisses me off." He snarled and fire came out of his mouth.

"It sounds like you've had some personal experience. Want to tell me about it?" I knew something was up with him too.

He groaned.

"You don't have to. It's just I noticed you weren't yourself at school. Not since you and Pops got back from wherever the two of you went."

"We went to Utah to help a friend. While we were there, my brother Jesse was - " Troy paused.

I waited, feeling that he needed some time with his thoughts.

We coasted, heading toward the ocean. The air changed the closer we got. Troy took us along the shore, and I listened to the waves, enjoying the salty water spray and the smell of the brine and sand.

After several long minutes Troy finally spoke. "Jesse was sucked into another realm. I wanted to go after him, find a way to bring him home. But Pops isn't letting me, mainly because my father won't let him let me."

"You know your biological father?" That was surprising.

Troy let out another trail of fire. "My father is a dragon by the name of Abernathy, not that he's ever given a crap about me."

Whoa. I knew of Abernathy. Of course. My mom had only good things to say about him, though she mentioned he tended to keep to himself and stay out of magical affairs - unless absolutely necessary. "Oh," was all I said.

"Exactly. Without Pops I would've been killed or worse. He has given me a home, a place to live, a family, and a purpose. But I was kind of lonely. Until Jesse showed up. We clicked right away. And now that he's gone, I can't sleep, I can barely eat, and I have zero tolerance for stupid high school drama, if you catch my meaning. At the moment, I'm taking a break from SMA recruiting."

I swallowed. Jesse sounded like a brother as well as a friend to Troy. "I'm sorry, Troy."

"Me too. It's killing me not to do something to find him. The only thing that's helped is going out Akuma hunting with Peter and Zoe - your mom and dad. Without that I might have gone insane and eaten the local villagers."

I chuckled bitterly as he blew out a huge puff of smoke.

"But enough about me. What about you? How can we solve your problems?"

I crossed my hands on Troy's head and rested my chin on them. "No idea. And I think that's what has me so irritated. I'm the one who made the wish to be like a normal teenager. I'm the one who wanted to come into the human world. Now that I am like a normal teenaged girl, I feel sick. I feel - "

"What?" Troy urged.

"Wrong." Tears pricked my lashes, but I didn't let them fall. Instead I cleared my throat and went on. "And as much as I disliked Drake, I didn't want him to die. But he did, and there's no way to bring him back. With the Mistress woman - " I paused, debating whether to tell him what I thought I knew about her. Troy was a dragon. Surely, he wouldn't think I was crazy if I told him I got my information from a talking cat.

"What about her?" Troy asked, interrupting my thoughts.

"I don't know what she wants. Other than to kill me or use me or some nonsense. The thing with Laeddin wasn't even worth discussing. I didn't know what that man wanted. "And my parents?" I snorted in frustration. "What can I say about that situation?"

Troy began flying us inland, back to Salem. I watched the houses and cars and people flit by almost as though we were in a dream. "Here's what I'm thinking, if you want my two cents?"

"Yes, please."

"Do you know where Jaffar is?"

I hedged because I didn't know. "No. Laeddin has gone back to his realm several times. When he returns it's always the same. No one has seen her. No one knows where she is. It's like she disappeared. And trust me, if a woman with a creepy staff and my wings were flying around, her people would notice."

"Agreed. But tell me this. Why do you keep calling Jaffar a woman?"

Looked like I let the cat out of the bag. So I told him about Gatsby and what he told me. Troy listened. "Sharra and Jaffar are one and the same, huh? Let's put a talon in that. Finding her is a priority, but since we don't know where to start, we'll focus on something else."

"I guess." I was relieved to have told someone though.

Troy went on, "We know Sharra is connected to the Akuma, so why don't you come hang with us during nightly recon? Sooner or later one of them is going to know something."

That reminded me of the one hundred and eleven days until total darkness. I shared my thoughts on the subject with Troy. "I think it's possible the darkness is connected to her and the Akuma as well."

"You're probably right," Troy agreed.

"Okay. What about Drake?" I liked we were talking it out. Even if we didn't solve anything, it felt good just to voice the issues.

"There's nothing you can do about him either, right?" Troy spoke with finality. He was right about that too.

"True," I said. "Fine, smarty pants, what about my parents? What should I do about them?"

A deep rumbling shook Troy's body. "They are good people and as Peter and Zoe you have the chance to truly get to know them. I think it would be cool. If I had any kind of chance of spending time with my parents, I would."

I realized what a total jerk I was being about them. Troy was right. It was better to have them around than not at all.

I lifted my head. "You're right, I guess. If I can get over the invasion of privacy factor," I said softly, caressing his head. Telling him with my touch how sorry I was. The peculiar purring sound echoed through him again.

"Good. Then it's settled. You, me, Peter, and Zoe - "

"You. Me. My mom and dad," I corrected.

Troy laughed, filling the night air with smoke. "Let's call them Peter and Zoe though since you're going to school with them. Deal?"

"Fine." I slammed by cheek against his head.

Troy kept laughing. "We'll make our nightly rounds searching for Akuma, questioning the ones we find and capture. You'll try to find a guy to date that's around your age instead of one who's old enough to be your great-great-great-great-great-great. Well, you get the idea. The dude is old, and you need one who's closer to your age. And I'll try to stay calm and trust Pops knows what he's doing when it comes to Jesse. Maybe between the two of us we might be able to find some happiness."

We arrived back in our neighborhood. Troy landed and walked back into the shadow of the tree.

"Are you with me?" he asked.

I climbed off his back, sad the flying was over, but so incredibly grateful he'd given me such a gift in the first place. "Yes," I agreed, stepping off his tail.

Troy shook. "Cool. Now give me a few seconds to shift back."

"Oh." I blushed as I quickly turned away. The ground shook slightly.

"It's not like I have to get naked," he said. "You can turn around. I'm decent."

I did and immediately saw that he was shirtless. The green shirt he was wearing hung in his hand. "Serious?" I asked. "Waiting for me to compliment you on your perfect abs?"

Troy smiled big. "You think my abs are perfect?"

I blushed again. Then tried to cover it up with a shrug. "They aren't bad."

He winked. "That's good enough." He pulled his shirt over his head.

I kept my eyes on the driveway until Troy stepped into my personal bubble and lifted my face with one of his fingers. His eyes were hazel. His lips were gorgeous, just like the rest of him.

"Thanks for taking me flying. It was exactly what I needed." I spoke gently, licking my lips as I studied his face. My heart danced in a happy excitement at being so close to him like that.

"Thank you, Jack," he said, his voice hushed. He was so close I could smell his minty breath and the sandalwood scent of his skin.

"I didn't do anything," I shrugged.

"Oh, you did. I needed to talk to someone for a long time, but there just wasn't anyone who would understand. Until you." He leaned down and I instantly realized that he was going to kiss me.

Did I want that?

I didn't have a chance to debate it further because his lips were on mine. Soft and warm.

I thought I would be repulsed by a kiss from anyone but Laeddin, but as Troy's lips moved against mine, the barrier I'd built around my heart slowly began to melt and I did something I never thought I would. I kissed him back.

Troy responded by grabbing the loops of my jeans, pulling me closer.

It was different than kissing Laeddin, but in a good way. I was buzzed with feelings for him. Not only was he a hot guy, but he knew how to kiss.

When Troy finally lifted his lips from mine, he smiled.

For some reason I thought of the girl he made out with my first day of school. Their kissing wasn't like the one I just shared with Troy. Our kiss was chaste compared to theirs. But I still liked it.

He brushed his thumbs along my jaw. "I wanted to do that from the moment I saw you in Sharra."

I watched his mouth move and wished he would kiss me again. "Before I knew your name, you were Hot Guy," I admitted, biting my bottom lip.

We both laughed. "You aren't wrong." He released me and I was suddenly cold. "Flying with you rocked." He kissed my cheek and took off jogging toward his house. When he was nearly halfway there he turned back. "Totally rocked," he yelled and waved good-bye.

A huge grin spread across my face. I waved back, enjoying the view as I watched him run the rest of the way home.

When I could no longer see him, I headed toward my house. It was time I had an honest talk with my mom and dad.

"Jasmine?"

"Who's there?" I stopped, trying to see without my vampire abilities. It couldn't be Troy.

"It's me." Christopher stepped into view, the vampire who bit my mom all those years ago, the one who betrayed her. He was her Hunter and now the seventh member of the council.

In Sharra he always wore the common dress, which was brown or black trousers made of soft, breathable material, boots that went to his knees, a long-sleeved linen shirt and a leather vest. Tonight he had on jeans and a tight white tee shirt, which said he was just another teenager. Even though I knew he was older, born in the nineteen sixties, he was still gorgeous. If I hadn't been nervous about him being at my house, I would've been impressed.

"What do you want?"

"Something's coming. It's big. Last time," he paused and glanced at the ground, "I chose Sharra because I wanted power and I thought she would win. This time," he looked up, his features serious, urgent even, "I choose you. Since I met you on the road those many years ago, I've known we - "

"Jasmine?" Laeddin called from the front door. I hadn't heard it open.

"We what?" I asked.

Christopher's features looked pained, like he desperately wanted to say more. "Later," he said and took off.

"Coming," I hollered.

GLAD YOU ARE HERE

WHEN I GOT INSIDE, Laeddin was back in the living room with Peter. He had a look on his face that said we would discuss what he just witnessed later. The TV was still on and Peter was focused on it. I glanced around, then remembered my mom had left. The serious conversation I planned couldn't happen tonight after all.

I thought about her in Sharra, curious about whether she changed back and forth between herself and Zoe.

If not, she would totally freak out Ciana, the vampire who helped raise me. I loved Ciana. She'd taken care of me since I was little when my parents were working. We played together during my mom's long meetings.

In that moment, I remembered the vision right after Jaffar took my wings. She was flying and went into the mountain where all evil supernaturals were imprisoned. There she woke someone. A vampire she called Velencia. And Ciana had entered the tomb.

My nanny betrayed me.

Betrayed my mom and dad. Everyone. Our whole world. She was on Sharra's side. My mom needed to know what I'd seen.

She needed to know about Sharra and Ciana and the one called Velencia.

"I need to speak with Mom," I said, walking over to Peter.

"Okay." He pulled me into a hug.

I let him hold me for a long time. It felt good to have his arms around me, even if they weren't the normal dad arms.

"I'm glad you're here, Dad."

Peter sucked in his breath. "You are?" He held me away so he could read my face.

I remembered what Troy said and took his sincere words to heart. "Yeah."

A giant smile spread over his face. "That's a relief. We didn't follow you because we didn't trust you. Our only thought was keeping you safe." He shook his head. "We didn't do a very good job."

"Oh, Dad." I hugged him. "It wasn't your fault. It was mine. I thought I could do it on my own. I thought I knew better." The words caught in my throat. "I'm sorry."

He gave me a squeeze and shook my shoulders lovingly. "It's okay. We're going to get through this. Together. Deal?"

I nodded. "What about Mom? Is she gone for good?"

"I'm going to head up to bed," Laeddin said, interrupting. His eyes were shrouded, but he seemed pleased my dad and I were talking. Laeddin and I had unresolved issues, but they could wait. I wouldn't bring up our kiss or the divide between us while my Dad was around.

"Goodnight." I gave him a hopeful smile.

"Night."

I watched him walk up the stairs. When he was out of sight, I turned back to my dad, the handsome boy who looked nothing like my father. And I wondered how he did it. How he and my mom made it happen. Was it her magic? His? Both of them together?

Touching his face, I asked, "How is this possible? Is it an illusion?" I patted his cheek. It was scratchy. He needed a shave.

"It isn't an illusion. It's the magic of the seven combined with one of Aunt Cindy's potions."

"Ohhh." Aunt Cindy used to teach at the Seven Magics Academy. Gabe did too for a while, but when Cindy became pregnant, they decided to live in Polonias for a time. It was quieter, less volatile. She and Gabe had two children now. Elsa and Ana. I'd met them a few times. They were sweet, though one possessed much more power than the other. "How long will the spell last?"

"These are our bodies until we take Cindy's reversal potion." Peter patted his stomach. "It's nice to have a six pack again." He chuckled.

"So this could be permanent?"

He shrugged. "I suppose, though I definitely don't want this body to be mine for good. Six pack abs or not, I like my original body better."

I nodded. "Agreed."

Peter kissed my forehead. "I'm going to go speak with your mom. Find out what she's learned. Hopefully I'll see you tomorrow."

"K. See ya." I didn't mention the recon mission. We didn't go, but that was okay. Maybe tomorrow night. Before he opened a portal back to Sharra, I took his hand. "The three of us need to talk."

"We will. Get some rest."

Once he was gone, I went upstairs. At Laeddin's door, I paused and closed a hand in a fist to knock. But if Laeddin opened the door what would I say?

I kept going until I reached my room.

Sleep came quickly, though I kept waking up from nightmares.

I opened my eyes and immediately knew I was no longer in Salem, in my bed. All around me were the corpses of dead unicorns. There were hundreds of them. The land was dark, as though the realm were going through a lunar eclipse. Some light eked out. Enough to allow me to know I was soaring above, seeing everything from the air.

My gaze swept the landscape. I took in the unusual forest of magenta trees, several long valleys full of black flowers, and a large body of water.

I looked down and saw my reflection. The eyes staring back weren't mine. They were those of Sharra.

And as though she saw me, she smiled and started to laugh. "Young vampire, your end is near."

Gasping, I jerked awake. As soon as I was sure I was in my bed, staring up at my ceiling, I relaxed and fall back asleep.

The next morning was Saturday so I threw my hair up in a messy ponytail, put on lip gloss and a little mascara. Then dressed in charcoal yoga pants, a teal tank, and gray running shoes.

Downstairs, I went to the fridge. Laeddin, who was busy in the kitchen, glanced over. He wore his standard jeans and tee shirt. "What you making?" I asked, grabbing the orange juice and setting it on the counter.

"Fresh fruit and scrambled eggs with red peppers, onions, and cheese, and toast. You're hungry, right?" Laeddin eyed me knowingly.

"Starved," I said, grabbing two glasses from the cupboard and setting them next to the orange juice on the counter. He and I had created a morning routine, where he cooked, and I got everything ready. I took two plates down and set them on the counter next to the stove where Laeddin was cooking. Then I poured the juice, put the container away, grabbed the strawberry jam and the bowl of fresh fruit, and two napkins, and placed them all on the counter.

The toaster popped. Laeddin buttered two pieces of golden brown toast and put them on the plates. Then scraped the eggs onto one plate, leaving the other empty. That was because Laeddin didn't eat any kind of meat, including eggs.

I sat on the stool and waited while he brought the plates over.

"Let's eat." Laeddin scooped some fruit on to his plate and smeared jam on his toast.

I took a bite of scrambled egg. It was seasoned to perfection. And I savored the flavors. "These taste amazing," I said after swallowing. It was strange though. The food, while delicious, didn't seem to be nourishing. I drank all of my orange juice, but still felt thirsty.

Laeddin watched me, chewing a strawberry.

I put some jam on my toast but didn't take a bite. The food had lost its savor. "Are you alright?" It was a generic question, but I needed to start somewhere.

He glanced over. "Worried. About you." He took another piece of fruit and put it in his mouth.

I knew it was because of who he saw me talking to last night. Not Troy, but the Hunter. "That was Christopher. He came to warn me that something big was coming."

Laeddin swallowed. "And what exactly is that?" His tone said he already didn't believe whatever I would share.

"I don't know. You interrupted before he got the chance to tell me." I stabbed a piece of watermelon and put it in my mouth. Chewed and swallowed. It tasted like ash.

Laeddin glanced down at his food. "Think he'll be back?"

"Probably." I hoped so. Any information I could get would help us.

We ate in silence for a while. Well, I pushed around my food while Laeddin ate. I was trying to find the courage to bring up what I'd so rudely blurted out yesterday. Finally, I said, "What I - "

Laeddin put up a hand. "Don't start. What you said was one of the first honest sentences you've uttered since Jaffar took your wings."

"But, it isn't - "

"Stop it." He was abruptly angry. "I'm going to say this once. One time."

"Okay," I said quietly, staring at my food.

Laeddin set down his fork and turned his body to face mine. "I was there when Jaffar took your wings. I know you felt a lot of pain. I can't even imagine how awful it must've been, must still be." His eyes became glassy, brimming with tears. "But I had to watch it happen and could do nothing about it." He blinked several times.

I let his words sink in. Tried to think about what the situation must've been like for him. I hadn't done that before.

"He reached into your back and tore them from your body, through your skin. They fought, as though they didn't want to leave, but Jaffar was stronger. He was determined. And because you were willing to give them away, Jaffar finally won against them and pulled your glorious wings free. You passed out, which is understandable, but I had to listen to him talk about how weak you were, how disappointing it was that you had such an amazing gift and chose to throw them away so easily. I had to watch as he used his magic to force your wings onto his back." Laeddin paused and wiped a hand over his face. He looked pale. The memories shredding him.

"I didn't know," I whispered, slowly beginning to understand. The terror hadn't happened to him, but it did happen in front of him. I couldn't imagine what that must've been like, witnessing such a scene. "I'm sorry." I still needed to tell him about Jaffar. That he wasn't really a 'he' after all, but a she. And her name was Sharra. The same vampire my mom fought and believed she destroyed. Before I could think how to begin, Laeddin cut off my thoughts.

His face twisted back into anger. "You should be," he said through gritted teeth. "Not for what I had to witness, but for what you gave up."

Tears sprang to my eyes. He was right. So right. But it didn't matter. The damage was done. My wings were gone. And Laeddin was safe. Alive. That was worth something, wasn't it?

Laeddin leaned in and touched his lips to mine. It was a soft kiss, full of emotion, but it also felt like a last kiss, and I clung to him. Too soon it was over, and he leaned back. Then taking my face in his hands he wiped away my tears with his thumbs. "I'm really grateful you thought enough of me to do what you did." He closed his eyes and I sensed he was holding back some emotion he didn't want me to see. "But we're going to find a way to get your wings back from Jaffar." At his words, he opened his eyes. "Now why don't you finish - " Laeddin was interrupted by a knock at the front door. "You expecting anyone?"

I shook my head, still too emotional to speak.

"I'll get rid of whoever it is." He went to the door and pulled it open. "Morning," he said to whoever it was.

"I'm officer Gand. This is officer Vick. We were here a few weeks ago. We're with the SCPD. If you don't mind, we'd like to talk to Miss Jackie Ryder again. We have a few more questions for her."

I hopped off the stool and went to the door. I remembered them. They were the same officers I spoke with after Abby died. Both were around the same height. They didn't look that old, probably in their twenties. Officer Gand was the one with strawberry blond hair and officer Vick had dark brown hair. They were both dressed in navy uniforms.

When Officer Vick saw me, he smiled. Not a hey-how-ya-doin' smile, but an a-ha-now-we've-got-you smile.

"May we come in?" Officer Gand asked as he took a step into the house.

"Of course." Laeddin stood back so they could get by. "Have a seat." He indicated the couch in the living room.

"Thank you," Officer Gand said.

They sat on the couch, but only the edge. Officer Vick took out his pad of paper and a pencil. "Do you know a Drake Smythe? He's a student at the school you attend." As he asked, he looked me directly in the eyes, his liquid brown ones staring deep into my violet ones.

"Yes, I know him," I said, sitting in the chair next to the knick-knack shelf.

The officers glanced at each other.

"Did you speak with Drake yesterday, after school?"

That wasn't how I'd put it. The jerk manhandled me. "Yes," I said finally. I realized why the officers had come. Drake vanished into nothing in the front of the school. That meant he hadn't gone home last night. He was missing. And I was the last one to see him alive. Well me and his friend.

Officer Vick cleared his throat. "A Mr. Cameron Anderson told us that he saw you and Drake talking. Care to elaborate on what was said."

I clasped my hands together in my lap as the awful memories swirled through my mind. What Drake planned to do to me yesterday made me sick, but I could only deal with one thing at a time. "If you're asking what we talked about, it wasn't anything good. Drake was kind of a bully. He threatened me with bodily harm and other things." I hoped they would understand my meaning because I didn't want to speak the words aloud.

Officer Gand nodded. "I see. And what did you do?"

"Well, officer, there wasn't much I could do. He's a lot bigger than me and had my shirt wrapped around his fist and was in my face."

"And after that?" Officer Vick urged.

I shrugged. "Nothing. Laeddin showed up and called me over. When Drake saw him, he let me go, and I went home." While I spoke, I looked at Laeddin. He seemed to approve with how I fabricated the story.

"Is this correct?" Officer Gand asked Laeddin.

"Yes. Normally when I pick her up, I don't get out of the car, but I saw what that boy was doing to her and I thought I might need to step in. But as Jackie said, as soon as I called her, Drake let go, and she ran to the car. After that we drove home."

I watched officer Vick scratch notes on his pad with his pencil. Every once in a while he paused and look up. "It's odd that the last time there was an issue with a student at Salem Academy, you were involved. Before you arrived in town, the worst we had to deal with was some drunk and disorderly conduct." He gave me a shrewd look. "But since you've arrived, there's been a student who disappeared, one that was killed and now another one's gone missing."

"Care to comment on that, Miss Ryder?" Officer Gand asked without missing a beat once Officer Vick finished.

I swallowed. In both cases it was my fault. I had no excuse. "What happened to Abby is awful," I whispered. "I don't know about Drake."

That was the truth. The elf said Drake would be back, more evil than ever. But I certainly couldn't tell them that. They had supernatural sensory gear. One whiff that was what we were dealing with and things in Salem would get ugly. I didn't want to think about the consequences.

"What about you, sir?" He studied Laeddin. "Anything to add?" Officer Vick said, tapping the eraser portion of the pencil against his pad of paper.

"If I hear anything, I'll be sure to let the police know. But other than what Jackie and I have already told you we don't know more."

Officer Gand stood.

Officer Vick followed. "Very well."

They walked to the door and officer Gand opened it.

"Feel free to get in touch if you think of anything else." Officer Vick handed Laeddin a card.

"We will," Laeddin replied.

"Don't leave town," Officer Gand added.

"We won't," I said.

"Have a nice day." Officer Vick followed officer Gand out the door and down the walkway to their squad car.

Laeddin and I waited in the doorway and watched them drive away. When they were out of sight, Laeddin closed the door and turned to me. "We need to figure out who the Mistress is and what's going on with these Akuma."

"I know," I said, figuring now was as good a time as any to share about the talking cat.

"Where to begin is a good question." He popped another strawberry into his mouth.

I shook my head. Nervous about what to say, but Laeddin needed to know. "No, I mean I think I know who she is."

That got his attention. He took his plate to the sink. "You do?"

WORN LEATHER

AFTER I SHARED what Gatsby told me as well as what I witnessed just after Jaffar took my wings, we both decided it wasn't much of a leap to think the Mistress and Sharra were the same. With that knowledge in tow, we debated what to do with the information.

We had several heated discussions about what her plan was with the Akuma and the dwindling light, if she was causing it. We also knew we needed to tell Pops and we definitely needed to tell my mom and dad.

Before we talked to them, Laeddin wanted to see what information he could find in his realm's library. It was located in one of four circular towers that made up each corner of his family's castle.

When we arrived, I sneezed.

The castle library's air was dusty and smelled of old paper and worn leather. The books were on shelves that began at floor level and went all the way to the top in every direction, three-hundred-and-sixty degrees of books.

We each grabbed a tome and started reading, pouring over the thick volumes that held the histories of his realm.

Jaffar was all over in the writings. Some historians called him the equivalent to a saint or a prophet, though little was known of his personal life. He married young. His wife had a child. But nothing more. Nowhere did it mention his wife's or the child's name. It said nothing about his magical abilities or how he came to possess them.

There were also stories of "the benevolent priest" saving crops from pestilence, healing children with horrible flesh-eating diseases, and stopping wars before they began.

Other stories called him a wicked sorcerer, full of guile and mischievousness. They said he'd gone mad, that his only joy came from bringing misery to others.

The story of the king and his twelve sons was in the histories as well, alongside a story where Jaffar killed every last villager in a town called Ashanda for no apparent reason.

There was nothing to explain why Jaffar would desire wings, though thanks to Gatsby, I knew. Laeddin wanted to find something to back up what Gatsby said. There wasn't anything. Neither was there a mention of the Akuma or anything that would explain why Jaffar wanted to send the human realm into permanent darkness. And nothing about his true origins. Where he came from?

I kept going back to that. If Jaffar was Sharra, why did she see fit to live in the realm of Debania as well as the land of Sharra? Boredom? Arrogance? Both? It seemed her purpose was only sinister. Now that Debania was nothing more than an overgrown jungle, had she decided to move on to the human realm? Of all the creatures in all the realms, humans seemed to be the least likely choice. They possessed no magic. But maybe that was it. If she ruled over humans with her magic and my wings, she would seem like a god. It felt like I was onto something, but I hadn't quite reached it yet. It was still a big deal. The chayot would fight against her. And surely they would have the power to keep her from taking over.

There was also another reason. One less calculating. Revenge. My mom was from the human realm. Hurting that realm would hurt my mom.

"What if we are wrong about the darkness only happening in the human realm? What if it's happening to every realm? Laeddin looked up from the tan leather book in his lap.

I put aside my revenge theory. "How can we find out?" I closed my book and walked over to stand beside him.

Laeddin closed his book as well. Stood, and slid the thick volume back into its place. "Come on." He took hold of my hand and we were no longer in the library.

We were standing on a bridge made completely of stone. It was probably eight to ten feet wide and had a rock rail that went to my waist. The bridge began at one tower and arched over the tower directly across from it. We stood in the center of the bridge. I admired the courtyard below. I also noticed three more bridges just like the one we stood on connecting one tower to the nest. It was quite beautiful.

Below was a lush courtyard covered in wildflowers. Trees were heavy with fruit. A path wound in a circle toward the very center, where there was a large statue of a king, queen, and a child. The queen was looking down at the child she had in her arms. The king had his arm around the queen, his gaze also on the child.

"Who are they?" I asked, breathlessly.

"The king and queen are my grandparents and the child is my father."

"It's amazing." I glanced over and noticed he didn't look happy. "What's wrong?"

"Nothing." He let go of my hand and walked to the other side of the eight-foot wide bridge.

I followed; my gaze caught by a circular orb attached to the rail. On top was a dial similar to a sundial.

Laeddin placed all ten fingers in slight grooves along the edge of the dial and it began to move, making a whirring noise. After several seconds it stopped.

I waited for him to tell me what it did.

"The darkness doesn't seem to be affecting my realm." He spoke with surprise in his voice. "I really thought we were onto something, but everything appears normal."

I placed a hand on his back. "I thought so too."

He shrugged. "I'm going to send you back. I know Peter and Troy want you to go Akuna hunting with them tonight. I'm going to stay here and continue to search the histories."

I wanted to tell him not to worry. I wanted to ask him to come with us. But the look on his face told me he would say no. His mind was made up. "Okay," I agreed. He needed to do something here and didn't want to share with me.

A soft wind brushed against my skin and I was no longer with Laeddin but in my room. I quickly checked my phone. Troy and Peter both texted me, asking that I meet them at Professor Pops' house.

I stuck my phone in the inner pocket of my yoga pants and went down the darkened stairs, past the living room and into the kitchen. From the refrigerator I grabbed a water bottle and chugged the whole thing down. It was crazy but I still felt thirsty. Not just thirsty. Parched.

"Still longing for liquid refreshment, aren't you?" A male voice asked quietly.

I whipped around and gazed straight into glowing red eyes. "Christopher."

"That's right."

"You're the one from my dreams." As I spoke my cheeks warmed. He and I had kissed multiple times.

"Right again." He was so close, his breath brushed against my cheek. "Thirsty, Jasmine?"

I struggled to meet his gaze. "Maybe," I answered, feeling nervous. Memories of him flooded my mind. The way he kissed me. The way I kissed him back. With such abandon. My parents would be ticked if they found out. "You need to leave." My voice trembled.

Christopher stepped into the light. His eyes no longer glowed, making him less menacing. As he had the night before, he looked sincere. "You need blood, Jasmine."

"You're wrong." I shook my head, backing up. But as I said the words, I speculated whether he were right. I didn't have my vampire abilities and I missed them. And just this morning I found the taste of food to suddenly be lacking.

"I'm exactly right, but not just any blood will help you. It must be the blood of a Hunter. My blood." He lifted his wrist to his mouth and bared his fangs.

My pulse quickened at the thought of blood. But before he had a chance to give me some of his, there was a knock on the front door. Christopher vanished.

Taking a deep breath, I ran over and checked the peephole. It was Troy. "I'm so glad to see you," I gushed as he came in.

Troy was immediately on edge, obviously sensing my visitor though Chris was gone. "Where's the genie?" Troy skulked from room to room like a six-foot dragon ninja. He flipped on lights as he went. I figured it was for my benefit since his vision was probably excellent in the dark.

"He isn't here," I said as Troy checked my room.

When he noticed the window was open, he quickly closed it and gave me a disappointed stare. "That's just asking for trouble. Keep it locked."

A quick flash of Gatsby trying to get in came to mind, but I had a feeling if the cat really wanted to talk to me, he'd find a way. "Yeah, you're right." I sat on the edge of my bed and picked up a sparkly black pillow, hugging it to my chest. I was freaked for many reasons.

Troy opened my closet doors, peeked inside. "No one in here," he went on.

I could've told him that.

"Hey, this is cute. Why haven't you worn this?" He pulled out a white peasant top that came with a black and maroon checkered vest.

I shrugged. "Haven't had the chance yet."

"Makes sense." He pushed that aside and tugged on the shirt hanging next to it. "Nice," he said. It was red with black hearts on it.

It felt like he was stalling or something. "What are you doing?" I asked, feeling the tiniest bit frustrated. It was weird having him rifle through my clothes.

"Sorry, Jack." He closed the closet and sat next to me on the bed. "You ready to go hunt down an Akuma?"

"Sure." I had no idea what that entailed but I'd do just about anything to take my mind off things.

"Awesome, let's go." He took my hand and pulled me off the bed and I tossed the pillow as I followed Troy out.

We locked up the house and took his truck for the short drive back to Pops' mansion. Once inside, he walked me through the kitchen and down the stairs to the basement. I knew where he was taking me. To the Museum for the Supernatural. I'd never seen it before, but I heard about it.

Even though I knew, when we got downstairs and Troy flipped on the light, my breath still sucked in. It was nearly bare. Troy explained there was recently some trouble and Professor Pops was reassembling the magical creatures, but he didn't give more detail.

We weren't there for the purpose of studying the creatures anyway. Troy walked toward the back and unlocked the door to what appeared to be a weapon's room.

"Pick your poison," he said, flipping on the light. It buzzed and flickered the way old lights did.

I picked up the weapon closest to me. It was a brushed onyx bow. A quiver of arrows sat next to it, though the feathers on the ends weren't feathers at all but made of thin strips of metal. I gently brushed the tips of my fingers along the stiff fibers. While still in Sharra, the bow had been a weapon I practiced with. But I wasn't good enough at it to make it my weapon of choice. Heck, the only weapon I ever needed was myself.

Not now though.

"We've found only one way to kill the Akuma," Troy said, picking up an axe and twirling it in his hand. "They must be beheaded." He set the axe down. "So keep that in mind when choosing."

The idea of cutting off the head of a creature, even an evil one, filled me with dread. "Maybe this isn't a good idea," I said, placing the bow and the arrows back on the table.

Troy lifted a broadsword and pulled it from its scabbard. "What we're doing is important, Jack. We need to find out who the Mistress is, what she wants, and why the Akuma are being created. Plus, the Akuma are already dead. They are soulless."

"You're sure?" I asked, selecting a katana. The sword had a black handle wrapped with silver thread. I would tell Troy what I knew, but decided to wait until I could tell him, and my mom and dad and Pops all at once.

"Yes. Whatever soul they had before the Mistress got a hold of them is gone. We find the Akuma mainly in graveyards because they feed on corpses.

I shuddered. "But how do you know their souls are gone?"

Troy set down his sword. Then he took the one I held and placed it on the counter next to his. "I'm half dragon, Jack."

"I know," I said, wondering where he was going with the comment.

Troy took my hands. It surprised me and my heart raced. "One of my dragon abilities is that I can sense the soul in a creature." He shook my hands playfully. "Like yours," he began looking deep into my eyes. "I know you're feeling displaced without your wings, your magic, and your vampire abilities. I can't imagine losing so much so quickly. But the part of you that has remained the same is your soul. Still vibrant. Still warm and kind and giving."

"Thanks, Troy." I looked away, embarrassed by his compliments.

"But you're also sad and that makes me sad. So we need to figure out what's going on."

I nodded.

Peter, aka my dad, walked into the room. His jaw was clenched, and I realized he was upset that Troy was so close to me, that he was holding my hands. "You two ready to go?"

I pulled my hands from Troy's and went to my dad. "Is Mom coming back?"

"Not tonight." He took a sword from the table covered in all sorts of weapons, removed it from its sheath and buckled the sheath over one shoulder and across his chest. Then he slid the blade into the sheath along his back. "Load up. Let's go."

Troy buckled a thick leather belt around his hips and slid the sword into place.

"Can't you just become the dragon and fight that way?" I asked as I watched.

"If it comes to that, I will, but it's better if I don't. I tend to destroy things when I'm in that form and we don't want the government getting more suspicious than they already are." Troy picked up the katana I'd been holding. "You gonna use this?"

It was that or nothing. "Yeah. I buckled the leather sheath across my shoulders and around my back, casing my sword the way my dad had. Peter walked out of the weapons room first. I followed and Troy brought up the rear, turning off the light and closing the door behind us. As I walked past the Museum for the Supernatural, I tried to decipher the creatures that must've been down here. It was difficult since they were gone and I wondered what happened but figured now wasn't the time to ask.

We climbed into Troy's truck. "What happens if we get pulled over by the cops?" I pushed his large sword out of the way and scooted into the seat next to him.

A smidge of the Troy I first met came back. He smirked. "We don't."

"Good."

"What brought that up?" Peter asked.

I told them about the police officers showing up at the house and asking me questions.

Peter growled. "This is getting much too dangerous," he said.

Troy agreed.

I was sorry I brought it up. Since my dad didn't look like my dad, but a teenaged guy from high school, it was easy to forget who he was.

Troy started his truck and pulled around the circular driveway. When we passed my house I glanced over and couldn't help an overwhelming feeling of sadness.

Since I met Laeddin and made that first wish my life had changed. A lot. Peter and Troy seemed to comprehend my melancholy at the same time. They each patted one of my thighs, realized what happened, scowled at each other and then looked away. It was humorous but I couldn't bring myself to laugh.

"Where are we going?" I asked.

"Harmony Grove Cemetery," Troy said.

"I was thinking we'd hit St. Mary's tonight. It's been a few days since we were last there," Peter said, staring out at the darkened night.

"Nah, I'm feeling Harmony Grove, man." Troy gave Peter a quick look. "I mean, sir."

"Fine." Peter rolled his shoulders and leaned his head against the rest.

Troy turned left onto Bridge Street. We drove a little and then he made a right on Friend Street and another onto to Harmony Grove Street. The cemetery was gated, with a large brick column on either side of the entrance and a wrought iron gate that was closed and locked.

"Uh, how are we getting in?" I glanced from Troy to Peter.

"Easy." Troy threw the truck in Park and shut it off before he climbed out and helped me jump down.

Troy and I walked around the front. Peter was already at the entrance and climbing the iron gate. At the top, he grabbed the edges, pressed himself into a handstand and then flipped off onto the other side, landing on the asphalt with a light thud.

"Show off," I said.

Peter smiled and for the briefest moment I saw my dad. "Come on. It's easy. You can do it. It doesn't matter whether you're a human or a vampire or an original, you're still you and you've been training your whole life."

"I don't know." I shook my head worriedly even though he wasn't wrong.

Troy walked past me, climbed the gate and jumped over. "Your turn," he said.

I pulled down my shirt and started up. Before I'd given away my wings I could've just flown over. I never realized how much I used my wings until they were gone. By the time I reached the top my thighs were shaking. "I can't do this," I said.

"Can. Can. Can," Peter said.

Troy moved so that he was just below me. "Jump, Jack. I'll catch you."

"I don't know." Nervous butterflies danced in my stomach. What if I fell and broke a bone?

Neither of them were focused on me.

"Definitely not you," Peter said. "If anyone is going to catch her it'll be me."

"I'm a dragon, it should be me," Troy scoffed.

"I know what you are, and I don't care. Step out of the way, boy."

I could tell the guys were about to get into a fight when I heard a noise. It wasn't a growl. More like a whinny-grunt. I followed the sound as a unicorn moved into view, stomping its hoof and shaking its mane.

"Dad?" Growing up, I'd met many unicorns. They were generous and sympathetic creatures. My mom explained it had to do with their nature. A unicorn's strongest magic was grounded in the power to heal. This unicorn must have missed that last part because it seemed determined on destroying instead. I was frozen as I watched it lower its head, pointing its sharp horn directly at my dad's back. There was a malicious gleam in the unicorn's black eyes.

Peter and Troy turned toward it. Keeping his eyes on the creature, Peter said, "Get my daughter off that fence. I'll go after the Akuma."

"Got it."

The unicorn was Akuma? Great!

I watched my dad pull his sword from its scabbard, bend his knees and assume a fighting stance. He held the sword like a baseball bat. I figured it must be a good head-chopping position.

The thought made me sick.

"Jack, I want you off that fence and in my arms. Now," Troy ordered.

I looked down into his handsome face, saw his strong chest, his muscled, outstretched arms and did the unthinkable. I jumped. Troy caught me easily and set me down.

"Thank you," I said as he set me on my feet. I was relieved and at the same time worried. Because in order to get out I was going to have to do that again.

"Troy. Jasmine. Get over here," Peter shouted. His words were garbled between the sounds of clanging metal and huffing.

I searched the area where my dad stood a moment before but couldn't see him. There was very little light, only what was coming from the moon and a couple of lights near the gate. I missed my vampire vision. "Da - " I started and then thought better of it. "Peter. Where are you?"

Troy took off like he knew exactly where Peter was. I followed the best I could, my katana at the ready. Gravestones were everywhere. I carefully stepped around them, crossed a paved road and continued through the neatly clipped lawn past more gravestones.

Troy was long gone.

I tripped over a gravestone and fell to my knees. "Crap," I cried, frustrated with myself. I wanted to help. I didn't want to disappoint my dad and Troy. Fighting noises were coming from deeper in the cemetery. I needed to get myself up off the ground.

"If you drink my blood, Jasmine, you'll be able to do so much more than fight. You'll be strong again."

It was Christopher. The Hunter was relentless. "Go away," I said, working my way back to standing. Then picked up my sword and held it out in the direction I thought his voice had come from. Without my vampire abilities I wasn't sure where he was.

He came forward. The moonlight allowed me to see his shadow but the only feature I could make out was his eyes. "I can't. Even if I wanted to, it's in me to protect you."

"That makes no sense!" And it didn't. I'd barely said fifty words to him over the course of my entire life.

"Really? Consider this." He moved closer. "You were created from your mother's blood. She drank from me. You were also created from the seven magics. So my blood created you too."

I started to walk away. "You're nuts, just like my mom said."

Christopher growled. "Maybe. Maybe not. But I know what you need. I can sense it. My magic comes from blood and yours is singing with need."

His words caused me to stop.

"Lies," I whispered, but wasn't committed.

"I'm not lying." He moved like lightning and was unexpectedly standing in front of me - so close, too close. His scent was powerful, like apples baked in cinnamon and nutmeg.

I jumped back, nicking his neck with my blade. My eyes were mesmerized by steady trickle of red. I licked my lips. Was he right?

"I told you normal was overrated," he said, taking my chin in his hand.

I looked away, surprised by the intensity coming off him. It also bothered me to realize that he was no longer just a random man with the red eyes from my dreams. But Christopher. The Hunter. And I had looked forward to his kisses.

He raised his other hand and I followed it with my gaze as he tore a gash in his wrist with one of his fangs. "You need my blood. I know you need it. So, before it's too late, drink." He forced his wrist against my mouth.

I resisted, squeezing my lips together, but he pressed harder and his blood got in. As soon as the tang touched my tongue, my heart raced. It beat so strong I thought it would rip through my chest. I drank. And swallowed some more. His blood tasted incredible. It didn't take long to realize he was right. I'd been parched for weeks. Literally dying of thirst. Not for water or any other liquid a human required, but for blood. His blood.

I dropped my katana and took hold of his wrist with both hands, pressing it deeper into my mouth.

"That's it," he said, his voice soft like he was coaxing a baby animal.

In that moment, I didn't care. My parents had refused to let me drink from him. I thought it had to do with his betrayal. Whatever the reason, as his blood filled me like no other had, I thought the reason had to be completely stupid.

His blood soothed my throat, basically brought me back to life. An exquisite combination of power and sensuality. With each pull, my body became stronger. I could've kept drinking until the vampire was dry, but I knew that wouldn't do. I released his wrist and looked up.

Christopher smiled. "You look better already," he said, brushing some hair off my face.

What could I say to that? I knew he was right. I felt better. Not a hundred percent - I still didn't have my wings - but I no longer felt like a shell of the person I used to be. "I don't understand. No blood has ever effected me like yours. How? Do I have my powers back?"

Christopher winked. "I would think so." He picked up my sword and held it out. "Go find out."

I smiled, taking a deep breath. And knew. Immediately. I could smell everything.

His blood.

The scent of the soap he used to shower, a light dusting of cologne, and so much more.

I stretched my abilities further and realized I could smell Troy's blood and my dad's.

I did a little dance.

Christopher laughed.

I probably should've been embarrassed, but I wasn't. I couldn't help it. I'd never been so happy.

I could see, even in the dark, the color of his eyes. They were dark green.

"Hurry," he said. "Your dad and Troy could use your help."

"Right," I said remembering why I was here. I moved in the direction of them, but stopped. I wanted to thank the hunter. "Hey, tha - " But I stopped, looking around.

The vampire was gone.

I had no doubt I'd see him again. He still needed to explain why he thought we belonged together. My mom and dad would never allow that. Ever. My dad would kill him before he allowed Christopher and me to be married. If he ever found out I'd drunk the vampire's blood, or worse, kissed him, my dad might kill him anyway.

And my mom? I shuddered involuntarily at the thought. Christopher would probably wish for death after my mom finished with him.

I'd deal with that later. First, I had to go help Troy and my dad.

AKUMA

WE DIDN'T CAPTURE any of the Akuma. Troy, Peter, and I decapitated them all. There were five in the cemetery. The unicorn led Peter and Troy deeper into the cemetery to ambush them. But we cut off all of their heads. As soon as the head severed from the body, the Akuma fell apart, shriveled up and dissipated.

Emotionally, it was difficult to kill, but I got over it quickly when it was us or them.

Christopher's blood pumped through my veins and the more I fought the stronger I became. If I thought it was appropriate I would've cheered. My vampire abilities were back in force and I used them to their full potential, grateful I could actually help.

Troy and Peter noticed too.

After the last Akuma was beheaded, Troy came over. "Jack, you kicked ass." He held up his hand for a high five. I didn't leave him hanging.

"There's my girl," Peter said, pulling me into his chest for a hug.

"Thanks," I said, enjoying the compliments. When I pulled back, Peter squinted, staring at my mouth. "You've got blood," he pointed, "right there."

"Oh?" I wiped it away with my shirt, knowing it wasn't any of my own, or the Akuma's. They didn't bleed. That meant the blood was Christopher's.

"Let's go," Troy said. "I need a shower. I've got Akuma dust everywhere."

Peter nodded. "You two go ahead. I'm going back to Sharra. I should check on Snow."

I squeezed Peter's hand. "Tell Mom I love her, please?"

He squeezed back. "Of course." Then he was gone. Without even a portal. I had no idea how he did that. He wasn't a vampire. He was no longer human. Again I questioned what sort of creature he'd become.

"Jack?" Troy called, interrupting my thoughts. He must've noticed the flush on my cheeks or the happiness radiating from my eyes.

I could feel the difference at having Christopher's blood beating through my veins.

"You're different. What - " Troy started.

"Race you back?" I took off, my vision crystal clear in the darkness and my speed at full throttle. I didn't want to lie to Troy, but I didn't want to tell him what I'd done either.

"Dude." He was surprised.

"Hurry." I laughed and kept running.

He was gaining so I stepped it up, hurtling and dodging tombstones. I was going to win. I knew it.

But a name engraved on a large gravestone seemed to jump out as I passed, and I slid to a stop.

ABBY JONES

I moved to stand in front of her grave. Thankfully the dirt and grass in front hadn't been disturbed.

The Akuma elf who killed Drake said the Mistress sought out evil.

Abby hadn't had an evil bone in her body.

Her honey brown hair, dark hazel eyes, and freckled face came to mind. I hadn't known her long, but we'd become friends.

She loved to read and had hooked me on The Vampire Diaries. I was beyond heartbroken she was gone.

Troy came up beside me. "Jack, what are you? Oh." His hands rested on my shoulders. "I'm here, if you need someone."

"Thanks, Troy." I appreciated his nearness and leaned into him.

He stayed with me at the gravesite until I was ready to go. Then he dropped me off at home. He put his truck in Park, got out, and came around to open my door. "This is totally odd timing. School is crazy. The world is going to crap, but I had a question." His face was dirty, his short hair rumpled, but his hazel eyes were hopeful.

"What?" I asked, hopping out of the truck.

Troy seemed nervous, but he took my hands. "You know how there's the Winter Formal coming up at school in a couple of weeks?"

"Um, I've seen the posters. I thought you were taking a break from pretending to still be in high school?" I hadn't thought about going.

Laeddin wouldn't go.

And I hadn't considered going with anyone but him.

Plus, I figured no one else would ask.

I was the school freak after all.

"Well," he smiled. It was a goofy half-smile that sent my heartbeat into an unexpected rhythm. "I always have a job to do. And Salem Academy seems to attract a lot of Supernaturals. Probably it's history, or whatever." He ran a hand over her hair, shaking it. Dust fluffed out around him. "Anyway, I wondered if you'd go to the dance with me."

"Really?" I was genuinely surprised.

"Yeah. I'll dress up in a tux. You'll wear a pretty pink princess dress."

I snorted. "No effing way."

Troy winked. He was teasing.

I didn't wear pink.

Over the past several weeks he'd come to know that.

"You'll wear a lovely dress. We'll take a limo. Go to dinner. Then hit the dance. Maybe take Pops' yacht out and watch the sunrise from the ocean." He shrugged nervously. "The whole thing. What do you think?"

It sounded really fun, especially the part about the sunrise on the ocean. That was a sight I'd like to see. "Yes. I'd love to."

Troy let out a big breath. "I'm so glad you said yes. Plan B was going to be a whole lot less cool, but way more entertaining."

"Oh, what was Plan B?"

He smirked. "I pull the dragon card and steal the pretty girl."

I laughed out loud. Couldn't help it. Troy was funny. "Well I guess I'm glad I said yes then too. I would've hated to pull the vampire card and been forced to kick your dragon ass."

Troy's eyes danced with joy. It was good to see him cheerful again. "After watching the way you fought tonight, it might be possible."

"Yep." I flicked him in the stomach.

He flinched, catching my hand in his. "I'm not sure whether you took some sort of vampire pill or if it's magic, but I'm glad you're acting more like yourself. You seem better."

"Almost," I said quietly. There was still the issue with my magic and my wings.

"Wanna talk about it?" He gave me a serious look, one that said he cared.

"Yes. I do. But not right now. I need a shower." I was covered in Akuma remnants too, and wanted it off. I started toward the house.

"You really do." He waved a hand in front of his nose.

I laughed again, noticing the smell of his blood. It was fragrant, like sandalwood and copper. My mouth watered. "See ya, Troy."

"Later, Jack."

After I closed and locked the front door, I went upstairs and took a shower. While I towel-dried my hair I went back downstairs and turned on the news.

Big mistake. It looked like people had gone bonkers. I hadn't seen any kind of crazy in Salem but then the town seemed pretty laid back.

In the bigger cities, like Boston, people were rioting. Breaking into stores, stealing stuff, demolishing cars, and hurting each other. There had also been a serious surge of murder and random muggings and beatings, all kinds of crimes. It was awful and horrible to watch. The chayot were working in conjunction with the government officials, but they seemed at a loss as well.

To make matters worse, the local station had a countdown button. It was in the upper left hand corner of the screen. A glaring reminder that in one hundred nine days, twenty-two hours, eight minutes, forty-three -

Forty-two.

Forty-one.

Forty seconds. The Earth would go completely dark. That was serious. Weird. And lots of people were scared. Rightly so. Humans were behaving just as Sharra wanted them too.

At the thought, I started. How did I know such a thing?

Grinding my teeth, I thought of Troy. Maybe doing something as ordinary as going to a Winter Formal was a bad idea. A lot could happen in two weeks. The school might cancel the dance.

Last night, the President of the United States had addressed the nation. He'd stated that America as well as several other countries around the world had teams of people working tirelessly to get to the bottom of the problem, that they would find a solution, and all would be right with the world. He told people not to panic, which was a bad idea.

Apparently not a lot of people believed him.

How could they? They knew about the supernatural. It had to be scary to feel so out of control. I was a supernatural creature and even I couldn't believe something so scary could be fixed.

Total darkness.

There was chaos now, at just the idea of eternal night, but if it really happened? If the world went dark? The thought of what would become of the creatures of every realm filled my soul with terror. I knew the consequences would be immeasurable.

"Church groups are calling all people to repentance, claiming God is punishing us for our sins," the newscaster went on.

I couldn't watch any more. Shutting off the TV, I went up to bed. Turning on my beside table lamp, I climbed under the covers. Pulled the comforter tight around my chin. I hated that I was in the house alone.

"Laeddin?" I whispered.

He didn't appear. I knew it was because he was still in his realm and that I shouldn't bother him. But I needed him.

I thought about using one of my wishes to make him appear, but I immediately discarded the idea. Who knew what the penalties would be? So I turned off my light, closed my eyes, and tried to sleep.

It was impossible.

I tossed and turned.

There was a tap on the windowpane.

I froze. My first thought going to the Akuma. Had they hunted me down?

"Jasmine. Open up. I need to speak with you."

It was Gatsby. I let out a relieved sob, jumped out of bed and slid the pane open. I'd never been so happy to see an animal in my whole life. "Gatsby."

"I thought we agreed to leave the window open, vampire." Gatsby came in, darted off the sill, and walked arrogantly over to my bed. He jumped up and proceeded to curl himself into a ball on my pillow.

I shooed him off. "We did, but Troy said to keep it shut because of the Akuma and the Mistress."

At the mention of Troy's name, Gatsby's ears perked.

I got under the covers and lay back down. "You know who Troy is, don't you?"

The cat yowled. "Of course I do." He climbed on my chest and lay down. I was about to tell him to get off but decided against it. Gatsby didn't weigh much. And the way his eyes searched mine, I had a feeling he needed my comfort as much as I needed his. "How is the boy?" he asked.

I tucked my hands behind my head so I could see him better. "He's good. He asked me to the Winter Formal, a dance at our school."

"Oh? And what did you say?" It was apparent the cat had a special interest in Troy.

"I said yes."

"Hmmmmm." He rested his head on his paws. "Is that wise given the way you feel about the genie?"

I hadn't thought about it. "I think so. It doesn't really matter how I feel about Laeddin anyway. He's made it clear nothing can happen between us while I still have wishes to make. Besides, I like being around Troy. He's nice. We have fun together."

"I see. Just know Troy has had a lot of sadness in his life, especially of late." Gatsby closed his eyes and began to purr.

The cat's need to protect Troy was surprising. "Did you need something?" I asked.

He opened one eye. "In the morning. Right now I want sleep."

I watched him a while, enjoying my newly reacquired vampire vision, until my eyes got droopy.

"I'm glad your abilities are back. It's nice to feel some joy coming off you but be careful how often you drink from the Hunter."

My lids flew open. "How did you know?"

"Easy," he began. "There was no one else who could've restored your abilities."

"Oh?" That had my attention. What did Gatsby know about Christopher's blood?

"Besides I can smell his blood on you."

"That's creepy." I tucked my arms under the covers.

"Creepy or not, it's the truth. Your parents will be none too happy when they find out."

"But why?" I slammed my hands against the mattress. Gatsby opened an eye and glared. "His blood brought back my powers," I said, checking my anger. "It's because of him that I can see you without a light on. You'd think they'd want me to recover my abilities."

"First of all, I thought you wanted to be a normal teenager?" His other eye popped open.

"I - "

"Second, the Hunter exists to mark the Chosen. That was why Sharra created him and Hunters in general. His blood is meant to seduce and please. It's meant to deliver deception."

I sat up. I'd tasted those very things, felt those exact emotions while I drank from Christopher.

"Before your mother, Christopher had the ability to walk in the sunlight. Other than hunters, only the originals possessed the power. When they bred out their wings, that ability vanished as well, unless the vampire queen bestowed it upon them. Until you. You have all of the originals' gifts and you look human. If an original vampire were still alive, she would probably desire that above all else." He looked at me knowingly and I understood he meant Sharra. She didn't just want my wings and my power. She wanted me. To be me.

"What about Pops and Kenmei? They are no longer hunters but could still walk in the sunlight." I asked the question while I thought about Sharra.

"True, but they were hunters who overcame Sharra's power. They are truly special vampires. Elect in their own right, which is why they've managed to stay around so long." He yawned, flashing all of his cute, sharp teeth. "But that is neither here nor there," he said.

"I know you're trying to tell me about Sharra."

"I am, child." Gatsby closed his eyes. "We'll talk more in the morning. I need to rest."

"Fine." I closed my eyes, but sleep was a long ways off. I had too much to think about. Sharra. Christopher. The Akuma. My mom and dad. Troy. Laeddin -

---

I WAS flYING. As soon as I realized it, I giggled, glad to be in possession of my wings again. Spreading them wide I made a point to experience everything. The wind caressed my feathers. The air whipped against my face and through my hair.

"I wondered when you'd be back."

Her voice. I recognized it even though I didn't want to admit it.

"Who's there?" I asked, despite the fact that I knew. I just wanted to be wrong.

Sharra laughed. "We're connected, Jasmine. Your wings have created a bridge between us. You and I are a part of each other. It's a side effect I hadn't counted on, but I like it. It will serve me well."

My wings, I thought, feeling my heart beat faster.

"Sharra." I said her name just to make it real.

"Yes, I suppose I am. But that's not all."

My elation at flying quickly disintegrated.

I studied my surroundings and realized I was home, in my land of Sharra, and flying toward Titan's mountain.

At one time the mountain had been a secret hub filled with supernatural creatures studying ways to prevent disease and other, less helpful experiments. It'd been destroyed many years ago and transferred into Athwana Meyana, which was an old elfish term for Dark Soul's Sleep. Most everyone called it The Cave of Lost Souls. It was easier to say.

I had no desire to go in there again. The last time, she'd awakened Velencia. At the memory, I wondered what became of the vampire. I thought of asking but changed my mind when she drew us nearer to the mountain. Even though I tried to stop, it was useless. I wasn't in control. Sharra was.

Or am I somehow in her body?

I didn't know.

We flew down and into the cave. Row after row of crypts lined the catacombs inside the mountain. She seemed to be searching for something.

"A particular vampire," she responded having read my mind.

"Who?"

"Don't worry. You wouldn't know him or his name. He was before your time."

I still wanted to know. His name might give me a clue as to what she was doing. "Tell me," I said.

The tip of my wing brushed against one of the crypts, knocking her off balance. She was still getting used to my wings. "They'll never fully belong to you," I said with more confidence than I felt.

Sharra cackled but I could feel she was angry. "Maybe not, but at least I have wings. You wished them away. They're mine now."

I growled.

Sharra laughed louder. "Stupid vampire girl." She stopped in front of a crypt and opened it. Inside was an extraordinarily handsome vampire. Slightly emaciated, it was still easy to make out his brown hair and perfectly sculpted face. His clothes were old, like those from the crusades. The front of his blue tunic was embroidered with three gold crowns. He wore black pants and matching boots. A long sword was strapped around his hips.

Sharra slit an incision in her wrist and placed the bleeding wound over his mouth.

"Drink, Arthur. We have much to do, you and I."

Nothing happened for several long seconds.

Then there was a loud gasp and suckling as Arthur pulled against Sharra's wrist.

I watched his already handsome face fill with a healthy pink glow. He drank and drank and drank until I believed he would drain her. I even felt her body grow weak with blood loss. Finally she shoved him off.

He sat up, searching his surroundings. "Why have you wakened me?"

Sharra got close. "Look into my eyes, dear one. It is I, Sharra, Queen of the Vampires, and soon-to-be almighty ruler of the entire world.

Arthur studied her a moment and then smiled. "It is you." His eyes closed a moment and he bowed his head. "My queen."

COMBAT BOOTS

SUNDAY MORNING, I got up and immediately craved Christopher's blood. Laeddin still wasn't home and Gatsby was gone. I hoped he was okay. Last night he promised to tell me about Sharra, but he wasn't around.

The dream or vision or whatever still lingered in the back of my mind. I wasn't sure what to make of it. Was I seeing what was truly happening or was it all a lie? I had a feeling it was similar to what happened between Christopher and me. It was real. If that were true, and I believed it was, the whole thing scared me.

After I dressed in jeans, my combat boots, and a plain black tee shirt, I went to the window. Sunlight peeked through the clouds. A light wind blew. Leaves that should've turned brown and died weeks ago rustled in the breeze. I tapped the glass, trying to decide if I should listen to Gatsby and leave the window open or do as Troy suggested and close it.

Finally I decided to leave it open. For now. If the cat hadn't returned by tonight, I'd close it. Especially if Laeddin hadn't come back either.

Breakfast consisted of toast and orange juice. Well, I took a bite of toast and immediately realized that it tasted like ash. I was a vampire again. Christopher's blood changed me back. But just to make sure, I took a drink of juice. It was tasteless.

My transformation was definite. I was once again on a blood only diet.

Yay!

I cleaned up and then decided to do something totally normal and start my homework. I checked my cell phone to make sure no one had called and was surprised to see a missed call from Cameron. And two texts from him as well. I smiled in excitement. Maybe he was coming around.

I clicked on the texts. The first said: You may have the police convinced ur innocent but I know the truth.

The second: I know ur a murderer and a liar. My face fell. My heart twisted in fresh pain. We hadn't known each other long, but why not talk to me instead of listening to Drake? I saved his life. I'd given up so much to protect him. Not that he knew that. But still. It really hurt to realize he believed I was a freak like the rest of the school.

Am not, Cam. I texted, wounded.

Lie all you want. We are no longer friends. Lose my number. Got it? Otherwise I'll have my parents' lawyers slap you with a harassment lawsuit.

My kind? What did that mean? Did you know I was a supernatural?

Fine, I texted back and tossed the phone on the counter.

My phone beeped. I ignored it. The Civil War paper for my grandfather's class wasn't going to write itself.

Another flipping beep.

Then another.

"Grrrr." I picked up the phone, expecting more rude texts from Cameron. But they weren't.

They were from Troy.

The first: Any ideas on the color of your dress?

Second: You need to decide soon.

Third: Jack? You there?

I smiled as I texted: I was thinking black. It's my favorite color.

Okay. What's your second favorite color?

I laughed. Teal.

Ooooh. Good color.

Why do you want to know? My homework was completely forgotten.

Just planning stuff for the dance, he responded.

So it had to do with the dance? I was still shocked he asked me. Excited, too. I laughed. Come on. Spill the details. If I'm going to the dance with you that kind of makes it my business.

It has to do with flowers and my tie. You know, so we match.

You're such a girl! I texted with a snort.

Don't make me come over there and show you just how un-girly I am.

Oooooh. Promises. Promises. I got off the bar stool and went to the couch, a perma-grin on my face. Once I hit send I realized that sounded kind of flirty. Did I want to be flirty? Talking with Troy was fun. But what about Laeddin? I just didn't know anymore.

There was a knock at the door. I placed my phone on the counter and opened it.

Troy swooped in and caught me in his arms. "Jack," he said, dipping me.

I gasped. He took my breath away.

His green eyes danced with mischief. His body pressed against mine while his arms held on tightly. One of his hands gripped my neck under my ponytail and my skin prickled at the sensation.

"Troy," I said when I caught my breath. His name came out sounding eager, which was totally embarrassing, but whatever.

He smirked, kicked the door shut with his foot and leaned so that we were nose to nose. When his lips touched mine, my world tilted. It wasn't the sweet kiss of the other night but a slow burn. I felt it everywhere, especially in my lower belly and thighs. He moved his lips, gently caressing, slowly opening. I melted against him, my hands grabbing hold of his arms.

Our lips and bodies took control. He turned, pinned my back against the door. "Jack?" he panted. His eyes searched mine.

"Yeah?" I asked between breaths, leaning in and kissing his chest through his shirt. I felt his heart beating strong. Smelled his blood. It smelled so good.

"Not. Girly," he said, trailing kisses from my ear, down my neck. I tilted my chin, allowing him access. His breath was warm against my throat. His hands went around my waist and under my shirt.

"No," I agreed kissing along his shoulder until I reached his neck. As soon as my lips touched his warm skin, I paused. The vein there beat strong and he smelled beyond appetizing. I doubted his blood would taste as incredible as Christopher's, but I wanted to find out. I'd had dragon blood before. But it was a very small amount from a very old dragon. Troy was young and fresh. What sorts of things would his blood do to my body?

That I desired blood directly from the vein was out of place for me. I never tasted the blood of a creature straight from their source before Christopher. My parents hadn't allowed it. And up until this moment, I'd never had such a strong desire to.

Now though.

I wanted to.

Bad.

My fangs extended and I grazed his neck. Tasted his skin with my tongue. Troy's body shook. "Jasmine?" He lifted his face, his eyes meeting mine. His were filled with urgency, need. "You have your fangs back? How?"

I tried to cover up the obvious as I nodded.

"You are so sexy." He pressed against me.

I swallowed, trying to focus on something other than my desire for his blood in my mouth. "So are you," I admitted nervously.

He smirked. "Are you ever going to say I'm girly again, Jack?"

"Well, I - "

He kissed each of my fangs.

It was the sweetest thing anyone had ever done. With that one small act, I believed being a vampire was good enough. Better than good. And I realized that perhaps what I wanted wasn't normalcy but something completely abnormal. Something extraordinary. Love and attention from one I loved and admired. That could never be Laeddin, could it? "No. Never," I said softly.

He touched one of my fangs. "You want me, don't you?" His smirk didn't deter the truth.

"Yes, I do."

His eyes got dark. Hungry. "My blood might taste gross, you know. Being only half dragon."

"Doubt it. You smell delicious." My mouth watered. I dragged the tip of my nose against his skin as I inhaled. "So good."

Troy chuckled darkly. "Go on, then." He tilted his head out of the way, exposing his neck and the blood pulsing from the vein.

My fangs grew longer. I grabbed hold of his arms with my hands, needing to hold onto something. My breathing sped up in anticipation.

Gatsby meowed at the front door. Loudly.

We both stopped.

And then laughed.

"I'd better go. I was in the middle of chores when I took off." Troy kissed my forehead, running his thumb along my collarbone before opening the door.

Gatsby ran in.

"See you." I covered my mouth with my hand, waiting for my fangs to go away. I waved as he ran across the lawn and onto grandfather's property.

When I closed the door, Gatsby climbed up on the counter and appeared to be reading my homework assignment.

"What do you think?" I asked, sitting down in front of him.

"It's a total snooze fest, vampire. Why don't you put some blood and guts and dragon fire into it?"

I huffed. "Seriously. That's rude." Surprised, I added, "And why dragon fire?"

"Why not?" He arched his back. "And what's rude is that you almost drank from Troy. What if you'd hurt him or worse killed him?" Gatsby sat on my paper and started licking the fur on his front legs.

"How do you know about that?" I yanked my paper from under his butt. "And why do you care?" I tried to work out the wrinkles by rubbing it back and forth against the edge of the counter. "Plus, I wouldn't hurt Troy. I like him."

Gatsby made a sound like a sneeze. "You like him?"

"Yes. I do."

"Until Laeddin decides to give you his attention. Then what? You'll discard him like smelly shoes?" Gatsby moved over to my opened history book and lay on it. "Or what about Christopher? You like him too?"

"Sheesh, Gatsby." The cat wasn't wrong, and I felt suddenly silly. "Get off my book," I said, irritated. "But no. Troy is sweet and he's my friend first. I don't just dump friends and then forget them." I thought about Cam.

"Really? What about Abrea? It's been six weeks and you haven't said a word to her. You didn't even say good-bye and she was supposed to be your best friend." He closed his eyes and started purring.

"You - " I didn't have a comeback. Gatsby had a point. "You're right. I should speak with her."

"Yes, you should. And soon. But first we need to discuss Sharra."

I felt my eyes get wide. "You have more information?" I crossed my arms and rested my elbows on the counter.

Gatsby yawned. Licked his paws and wiped his whiskers.

"Spill it, cat," I said, my homework once again forgotten. I was never going to get that paper done.

"The Mistress, as you've been calling her and Sharra are one and the same." He brushed at his ear, grooming himself.

"I knew that already," I said, shaking cat hair off my book, even though there wasn't any.

"I see." He blinked, watching me a few moments.

"What I don't know is how Velencia and Arthur fit." I caught him up to speed and asked Gatsby what he thought.

He didn't respond right away and I waited.

I couldn't un see the vampires' faces when Sharra raised them from the dead with her blood. I returned to my seat. "Well?" I prodded.

"Velencia's part is already done, I believe. Sharra would've used her to create the Akuma." He walked in a circle several times before settling into a ball on the counter, though he didn't rest his head, but kept his eyes trained on me.

"Do you mean Velencia is dead?" I was shocked. I don't know why. But it was weird.

"Not exactly. Velencia was a powerful witch before Sharra changed her. Of course she had ulterior motives. Sharra hoped Velencia would be so happy with the change that she would allow Sharra to use her magic - to use her. When that didn't work, they had a falling out." He rested his head against his paws. "Creatures took sides, as they do. But Sharra wasn't having it. She coerced Velencia's mate into betraying his love, in exchange for power and what vampires coveted most. The ability to walk in the sun." Gatsby closed his eyes.

"And?" I prodded, hoping to hear the rest of the story.

He opened one yellow eye. "That's why Velencia was in the tomb. The betrayal worked. Velencia was captured, starved, and then laid to rest."

"So when Sharra woke her, Velencia knew it wouldn't end well?"

How awful. Sharra was a monster.

"I think Velencia hoped, but in the end, her permanent death was imminent. Sharra killed her own sister. She has no qualms killing, destroying, taking and doing whatever it takes to get what she wants." He stretched a paw, revealing his sharp claws. "You'll do well to remember that. Sharra cannot be reasoned with and she will not stop until she has what she wants."

I closed my eyes, letting his words sink in. All of this was out of my league. I was still a teenager for crying out loud. Gratitude washed over me. How grateful I was for those in my life, especially my parents. "How do I stop her?" I finally asked.

"I'm still working on that," he said and tucked his face into his chest.

HUNTING

AFTER GATSBY LEFT, I texted Troy: We need to talk. Are my mom and dad back?

No. Has Laeddin returned? Troy replied.

No. And I'm starting to worry. I can't go back to his realm without him, either.

Peter and Zoe just showed up. They need to speak with you too. We're coming over.

K.

Dress for Akuma hunting. We're going again tonight.

Got it.

I ran upstairs. Since I was already wearing jeans and a tee shirt, I left those on, but changed into my favorite black boots. Then I grabbed a black hoodie. The back had a teal skull sporting a pink bow. I thought it quite appropriate for what we would be doing. I swiped some gloss over my lips and fixed my ponytail, then went back downstairs to wait.

Not too many minutes later, someone knocked on the door. I opened it, expecting my mom, dad, and Troy, but it wasn't them. It was a woman with long red hair, striking blue eyes - exactly like my mom's - and the creamiest skin I'd ever seen. It was almost transparent. She wasn't very tall, and she was thin.

The woman smiled. "Hi Jasmine."

"Uh, hi." A nervous flutter jolted my insides even though I thought I knew who she was.

"I'm Ariel, dear. Your grandmother." Her beautiful smile got bigger.

"It is you." I'd never met her, but my mom talked about her a lot. "I thought you were still in Mizu."

"I was." She stepped forward. "Do you mind if I come in?"

"Oh my gosh. I'm sorry. Yes, please come in." I held the door open and then directed her to the couch after I closed it.

After she sat, she said, "I thought I might find your mother here. She wasn't in Sharra. Do you know where she is?"

I went to the kitchen. "Can I get you something to drink?"

"No thank you." She patted the seat and I went over, sitting beside her. "Mom is on her way over. Is everything all right?"

Ariel leaned back, pulled her legs up and crossed them underneath her. "Not really. That's why I need to speak with Snow."

"What's wrong?" I faced her more fully, thinking we couldn't handle another problem.

"It's Mizu. Our city is dying, and I need to find a safe place for the people to go."

"That's terrible. But how is such a thing possible?" My mom told me about Mizu and her mom as well as the adventures she and Cindy and the others experience when they were young. Before that moment it was just that. A story.

"The magic that created Mizu was designed to keep us safe during Sharra's reign."

My heart began beating harder. "But it's stopped?"

Ariel nodded. "Mizu was supposed to disappear as soon as Sharra was no longer the vampire queen, but it's held up the last fifteen years. Really well, in fact. And my people didn't want to leave. But over the last six weeks Mizu has slowly begun to die. I figure it has another three months, four at the most, until it will no longer sustain life."

"I think I know why." My heart beat rapidly. The consequences for my actions were farther reaching than I ever would've guessed.

"You do?" Ariel questioned.

"Yes," I said, and was about to tell her everything when the door opened and Troy came in followed by Peter and Zoe and a heavy dose of warm air.

"Hey," I said, standing.

Ariel stood too.

When Zoe saw her, she ran over.

Ariel put up her hands in a position of defense. "Hey there. Easy. I don't know you."

Zoe slid to a stop. Shocked. "Mom?" Pain slashed across my mom's face.

Her reaction sent a stabbing pain through my heart, until it occurred to me what was happening. "Mom, you don't look anything like yourself, remember?"

Relief washed over Zoe's face. "You're right!" She reached over and hugged me. "Sorry for scaring you Mom, but it's me. Your daughter."

Ariel squinted and tilted her head to one side, searching for a sign her daughter was telling the truth. "Why do you look like that?" she finally asked.

While my parents explained what they'd done and why they were now Peter and Zoe, I went over to Troy. "Hi," I whispered, feeling shy.

His arms were crossed an amused expression making his already gorgeous face even hotter. "That's Snow's real mom?"

"Yes, she's been in Mizu for a long time. This is my first time meeting her too." I watched him watch my family and couldn't help the lurch of joy at having him nearby.

"What do we know about her?" he asked, pressing his lips together. He reminded me of a bodyguard.

I shrugged. "Just what my mom told me over the years." I placed a hand on his forearm. "She's okay. Mom would've said if I couldn't trust her."

He lifted a brow. "Things change. People change," he went on.

"Troy. Jeez, paranoid much?" Zoe glared from across the room.

Then she hugged her mom.

"Fine. Just checking. I want Jack safe. That's all." Troy's body relaxed, though he didn't uncross his arms.

"Who's Jack?" Ariel asked, squeezing Zoe.

"I am." I laughed. "It's the name I go by in the human realm."

Ariel shook her head. "You're all so complicated. Different names. Different faces. How the H-E-double crab legs am I supposed to keep up? I'm old." She made a face. There wasn't a single wrinkle to prove her age. She could've been twenty or two hundred and twenty.

Her comment lightened the seriousness in the room, and we all chuckled.

"Agreed," Mom said, and winked. "Why don't you explain why you think Mizu is dying?" Mom sat and Ariel joined her.

I remained standing next to Troy while Peter sat on the floor in front of his wife.

"As I said, it has to do with the magic. It was meant to give out years ago," Ariel said.

Mom took Ariel's hand. "I didn't know," she said. "But if Mizu's magic is giving out, we will find them a place to live."

"Thank you, dear." Ariel pressed a kiss to my mom's cheek.

"Sharra's back," I blurted.

Mom and Dad both stood like they'd been electrocuted.

"How do you know?" Dad asked, working to keep his face calm, but his hands were balled into fists.

"She's the Mistress. She's Jaffar. They are all one and the same." I bit the inside of my cheek and flinched. Blood oozed from the wound, but only briefly before it healed again.

"Well, go on, Jack. Don't keep us in suspense." Troy said the words, but it was obvious everyone was thinking the same thing.

"Okay," I began and then stopped, nervous. Because we all sort of guessed what was happening to the realms had to do with me giving my wings to Jaffar. But they really had no idea. I wished Gatsby would return. He was the one with all the answers. I only knew what I'd been told.

I went over to a lone chair and sat.

"How do you know?" Mom asked.

Gatsby never said I couldn't tell everyone he was a talking cat. I told Laeddin and the cat hadn't gotten upset. Taking a deep breath, I told them all of it. About Sharra using Velencia to create the Akuma, about Arthur. Everything Gatsby told me, I shared with them.

When I finished the room was silent. "All of this from Gatsby?" Dad asked.

"A cat?" Ariel reiterated.

"So Jaffar was a disguise. He was always Sharra?" Troy asked quietly.

Mom's eyes were glazed over. I left the chair and knelt in front of her. "Mom?"

"My cat told you this?" she finally said. She didn't meet my gaze, but seemed to be elsewhere in her mind.

"Yes. I know it sounds crazy, but I believe him." I took her hands in mine.

"What makes you think such a thing?" Peter asked. He seemed to be the calmest of the group.

"I do. Between the dreams I've been having and what he said, it all fits together." I stood, turning so I could see each of their faces. Different shades of incredulity and disbelief shown through.

"And you're sure she woke Arthur?" Snow asked.

"That was the name she called him."

"But the one called Velencia is dead," Ariel said. "She used them to create something called Akuma?"

Peter quickly explained what the Akuma were. Ariel nodded. "Great."

"Yeah, they're freaky," I said. "But from my dreams, I also learned that Ciana is on Sharra's side. She isn't to be trusted." It hurt to say those words, but mom needed to know.

"You're sure," Zoe said, tears pressing against her eyes. "I wondered where she went. No one has seen her in weeks." Her features got angry and she gritted her teeth. "I believe you," she said, softly.

Peter nodded. "So do it." He wrapped an arm around Snow. "But I'm not clear about how she created the Akuma? Why use the vampire?"

"I think Sharra used Velencia to torture the vampire. But Sharra also used Velencia's magic against her. The Akuma are creatures with evil tendencies. She changes them, knowing they will be loyal to her. Because she changed Velencia into a vampire, but she wasn't loyal to Sharra." I hoped that made sense. It felt clearer in my head.

"Makes sense to me." Troy dropped into a chair.

"How do we stop her?" Ariel asked. It wasn't her problem. She had Mizu to worry about. But I appreciated her willingness to be supportive.

Zoe shook her head. "I thought I destroyed Sharra years ago." Mom's voice sounded haunted. She turned away. Peter put his arms around her and said something only she could hear.

Zoe shook her head.

Peter rubbed Zoe's back. "It'll be okay. We'll figure it out." He glanced at me and I nodded.

She faced my direction. Worry flickered across Zoe's face. "Did you see Christopher? Has he joined Sharra as well?"

I felt my face get hot. Now probably wasn't the best time to tell her that I not only saw Christopher but I drank from him as well. "No. He isn't with her." That wasn't a lie and I took a little comfort in that.

"That's a relief." Zoe leaned into Peter. "I got the feeling he changed his ways over the years, but with him - " Her voice trailed off. "You know for certain?"

"I think so," I said, looking away. I'd heard the story of the way he betrayed my mom, but everything worked out in the end. She was with my dad and that had been their destiny. But the knowledge didn't change the fact that Christopher hurt my mom.

"I don't think we can trust him," Peter growled, his eyes trained on me.

I swallowed, nodding. Yeah, now definitely wasn't the time. They would freak when I told them Christopher believed he was my betrothed.

"What about the other vampire Sharra woke? Arthur. What is his part in all of this?" Troy asked.

"I don't know," I said.

"What's her end game?" Dad asked. He seemed to be thinking through different scenarios in his head.

"Gatsby said it's revenge. She wants to punish Mom and everything and everyone that means something to her. Beyond that, if she is the only light and the rest of the world is in darkness, then they will need her, and she can easily rule." I kept my voice even, though I felt sick. Over the course of the histories I read, I knew many creatures had done horrible things for a whole lot less than was Sharra's reasoning.

Mom cleared her throat like she ate a frog and forgot about it. "If she succeeds in putting the planet and all realms into darkness, she might get her wish. Those in the land of Sharra are already fidgety. They're scared and angry." She clutched Peter's hand. "It was the pixilettes who noticed the darkness first. Before the reporter from this realm shared that the darkness was falling over the human realm, I was inclined to think the darkness in Sharra was nothing to worry about. Many of the creatures there want to leave and return to their own realms and I don't blame them." She looked dejected and my heart broke for my mom.

"I understand your concern," Ariel said, patting her hand. "But it isn't your fault."

Mom ground her teeth. I could hear it. "Actually, it is. I should've destroyed Sharra when I had the chance."

"You couldn't know Sharra was up to this. You are not to blame," Ariel tried again.

Zoe smiled. "I held a council meeting last night and shared what I knew about the darkness and the realms." She shook her head sadly. "There are those on the council who don't believe I didn't know. They think I've been keeping secrets too."

"Then they don't know you at all," I said savagely. Knowing my mom would never keep something so important from the realms.

"As the queen I'm inclined to let those who wish to leave do so, but I'm worried for them too. Worried about what that evil vampire will do next." Zoe shrugged. "To all of us, really."

"I say we stick to the plan. Go Akuma hunting and hope one of them will talk." Troy was determined. The glint in his eyes told me he was beyond ready to kick some Sharra ass.

Laeddin appeared in the middle of the room, startling us all.

Ariel drew a small knife from a hiding spot on her pants.

"It's okay," I said, holding up my hands.

Ariel moved out of her fighting stance and went over to Snow.

"Laeddin," I said, relieved he was okay.

"I think I've figured out how to stop her," Laeddin said, searching the room, and taking us all in.

"Really," Ariel said, tucking her knife into a stealthy pocket.

"Who's this?" Laeddin asked, giving her a peculiar look.

"She's my mom," Zoe said.

He raised an eyebrow. "Hello. I'm Laeddin. A genie and Jasmine's servant."

He spoke so matter of fact; it was embarrassing, and I blushed.

"You - " I began but didn't finish. What would I say?

Ariel gave me a secret smile. It made me blush. "Well Laeddin, it's lovely to meet you," she said. "I didn't know genie's were a real thing. Thought that was one fairytale story that was completely fiction.

"Nope." He took Ariel's outstretched hand. "Good to meet you too." Laeddin turned to me, his aqua eyes sparkling with an emotion I hadn't seen in him in weeks. Hope. "And I think I found a way to get Jasmine her wings back."

My heart stopped. Was it possible?

"How?" Troy asked. I wasn't sure if he was upset it was Laeddin who found a way to help or that the genie was back.

"It isn't going to be easy, but if we all work together, we can do it." He gave Ariel a pointed look. "Including you."

"Whatever you need," Ariel said, clasping her hands behind her back.

"Together, I think we might have a chance at beating her." Laeddin took in my face and I bit my bottom lip.

If Laeddin had hope, then so would I.

For the next several hours we discussed a plan to defeat Sharra. Arguments sprung up. Troy mentioned he wished Pops was here, but he'd gone in search of Jesse and Troy didn't know when he'd be back. Mostly we discussed deep into the night our plan.

Only a small worry niggled through my veins. What would happen when they found out how I got my powers back?

TRIBAL TATTOO

THE fiRST STEP in our plan was to capture an Akuma. Alive. Everything else hinged on that. We would set up traps and hunt without killing. I didn't think it was possible, but we all agreed to try.

It was two in the morning. We were back at the Harmony Grove Cemetery since there were so many Akuma on our previous hunt. Ariel took the northwest corner. Peter had the northeast. Zoe kept eyes on the southeast. Troy had the southwest. And Laeddin and I had the center.

"What's going on with you and Troy?" Laeddin asked. We were standing near a fancy monument complete with concrete stairs leading up to it. To the right was a gothic style church built in nineteen hundred and five. At least that was what I was told.

The church had a tall, pointed spire that rose from the center, along with four smaller spires, one at each corner. The carvings were intricate. Some might call it gaudy, but I thought it was amazing.

"What do you mean?" I turned away from Laeddin, not sure how to talk to him about Troy.

He came around to face me. "Something's different." He ran a hand through his dark hair, and I caught a flash of his tribal tattoo. That was part of the plan too. I would use my second wish, but at the right time. A time Laeddin specified. It once again had to do with consequences.

"He asked me to go with him to a dance at school." I said, working to sound nonchalant and kicked at a tall chunk of grass.

"That's nice," Laeddin said quietly.

I looked up. His face was impassive. I couldn't read what was going on in his mind. "It should be fun. I've never been to a dance in the human realm."

"Yeah, it definitely fits into your plan for a normal teenaged life, right?" His words were light but tinged with sarcasm.

I lifted my chin defiantly. Wasn't it okay to try to enjoy whatever I could? "Exactly," I snapped. He was the one who said we couldn't be any more than friends while I still had wishes. It made sense, I guess. But he knew I wanted more, yet we barely talked, except when he wanted to. That wasn't how a relationship worked. At least not for me.

Laeddin sighed. "Jasmine, I'm sorry."

I gritted my teeth. Sorry meant nothing if he didn't have the actions to back it up.

"Look at me. Please." He tilted my chin, so I had no choice. "I - " He stopped. "You have your vampire abilities back?" His eyes flicked back and forth as he used his magical abilities or whatever to decipher the truth.

"I do," I admitted, waiting for him to get upset.

"How?" He came in closer. "I can see it. On your skin. In your eyes. I can even smell the difference. You aren't quite the same as before. Something's different." He dropped his hand and stepped back and I knew he knew what I'd done. "Whose blood did you drink?"

I closed my eyes. "I had to," I said, crossing my arms, sad and feeling sorry for myself. I couldn't seem to do anything right.

"Did you?" He eyed me shrewdly. "Your mom had you drink from the different magics to fortify the magic within that blood. Elf blood enhances your eternal sight. Troll blood improves your strength and so on. That's why human blood, while satisfying, doesn't enhance your magics." Laeddin stopped talking and I opened my eyes. He was afraid. "But this. Whose blood did you drink, Jasmine?"

"I - "

A person walked out of the old church though he wasn't moving right. "Laeddin. Behind you."

Warily, he turned around.

"Is it one of them?" I asked.

"Yep." Laeddin move closer.

I took my phone from my back pocket and sent a group text. It was one word: Akuma.

Then I pocketed my phone and found my center. Facing the Akuma tonight would be different. This time I had fangs.

Laeddin took some rope from his pocket. I had some too and pulled it from my hoodie. Peter, Zoe, and Troy had the same kind of rope as well.

Before heading to the cemetery, Zoe infused some magic into each of the ropes. It was supposed to allow the cord to seize and hold any lower magical creature. Since we weren't sure what magic had been used to create the Akuma we didn't know whether it would work. But we would find out now.

"I'll go left. You take the right side," Laeddin hissed, our conversation forgotten.

"Got it." I moved, keeping my focus on demon creature. He didn't smell human. I realized that first thing. He smelled like a corpse covered in perfume or dried potpourri. That was it. He smelled like vanilla potpourri. It was so strong I wondered how I hadn't smelled it on the elf even without my vampire senses.

"Hey man," I said when I was close enough that I was sure he could hear.

"Hello," he sneered. "You're just the vampire I was looking for. Sharra would like to speak with you."

I tightened the rope. "Really? What does she want?" The others were coming. I could hear them and knew they were getting closer. The idea was that we would all go after one Akuma at the same time. Six against one put the odds in our favor.

The Akuma tilted his head as though listening, and I wondered if he could hear the others moving as well. He smiled. "You're predictable," he sneered. "She said you would do this." He closed his eyes, lifted his arms and tilted back his head. Then just stood there. As though he knew what we intended and was waiting, accepting his fate.

I glanced at Laeddin. He seemed as confused as I felt.

Troy, Zoe, and Peter showed up.

"What's going on?" Troy asked. He glanced from the Akuma to Laeddin and then my way.

"I think the Akuma is waiting to be captured," I said, but it came out as a question.

"Excellent." Troy took a few steps forward. We were all waiting for the Akuma to pounce or do something, but it didn't. Troy wrapped the rope around the Akuma's neck. I took his waist. Zoe and Peter wrapped their ropes around each arm. Laeddin nodded as Ariel showed up.

"I should make my wish now?" I asked Laeddin.

"Yes," Laeddin answered, encouraging me.

My question seemed to wake the Akuma up. He opened his eyes. I saw his body shimmer and knew immediately he was getting ready to do whatever new power he possessed to vanish - just the way the elf had.

"I wish - " I began, but a whirring sound cruised past my ears and then the Akuma's head was unexpectedly gone. A small sword fell to the ground beside his body. The Akuma dissipated.

Zoe gasped, stepping back.

"Who did that?" Troy asked, searching the perimeter.

I turned as well, trying to find the offender. Whoever it was spoiled our plans.

"What happened?" Ariel asked. "One minute he was here and the next, poof." She used her hands to talk, which I found endearing.

I pointed at the sword. "Someone severed its head."

"Dammit," Troy hollered.

"It's okay," Laeddin began. "I'm sure there will be another."

There wasn't.

We spent several hours waiting for more, but none came.

Finally I went inside the church, looking for the spot where the Akuma came from. My mom couldn't sense any magic within either.

Finally, just before the sun began to rise, we called it a night.

OVER THE NEXT two weeks we went Akuma hunting. But they were gone. As quickly as the Akuma appeared they'd vanished. We found empty graves, so we knew Sharra was still creating Akuma, but we saw none of the demon creatures.

Sharra was planning something else. It was the calm before the storm and I was antsy.

My mom and dad were frustrated. Laeddin returned to his realm, certain he would find an answer if he kept searching his people's histories. As much as I wanted him to stay, I couldn't force him. He was trying to help and if that meant he had to be away for a time, then so be it. Ariel left too. She went back to Mizu to give her people an update.

My mom and dad were still around. I saw them in school and each night when we hunted, but they spent a lot of time in Sharra as well. A lot was happening there, and they needed to keep tabs on the realm. My mom explained she searched the Cave of Lost Souls and discovered dozens of vampires had been awakened.

And Troy? Well he was my sanity. We spent nearly every moment after school together. He helped with my homework, watched The Vampire Diaries with me, and even slept on the couch downstairs so I wouldn't be alone.

The President of the United States had declared martial law until either the darkness took over or the problem was fixed. That meant Salem and every city in America had an influx of military keeping watch over the streets. A nationwide curfew of ten o'clock had gone into effect. Every store was guarded. Water and food were dispersed according to government specifications.

Despite all this Christopher continued to show up secretly every couple of days so I could feed from him. It wasn't anything sexual, though I had to admit I'd grown fond of him. Not in the same way I felt for Troy or even Laeddin, but I cared for him. I trusted him. Most importantly, I needed him. His blood.

No one knew I drank from Christopher though now that it was a regular occurrence, I began to notice slight changes. Like my hair growing again. It'd stopped when I turned twelve. And my fingernails and toenails were growing again too. There were other changes as well.

Like my cleavage.

At fourteen my body had fully developed, and I'd come to terms with my A cup bra size. But in the last two weeks "my girls" had grown to where I was filling out a B. My waist had tapered, and my face lost its babyish appearance. It was harder, sharper. My features seemed to be etched more deliberately into my face.

The biggest change though were my dreams. They weren't the same as my visions - the ones where I saw Sharra flying around with my wings.

These were different. Sensual in nature, if I were honest.

They left me feeling unsettled.

If anyone detected the changes, no one said anything. And I didn't know how to bring it up. My mom and dad hadn't questioned the return of my powers. Either they knew it was because of Christopher and didn't want to discuss it or they were just too involved in all that was going on to notice.

At school everyone seemed uptight and on edge, including the teachers.

The one bright light was that the school was still holding the Winter Ball. Troy and I were still going.

And I was looking forward to it.

ABREA

SINCE MARTIAL LAW had been put into effect, I hadn't been able to go shopping. It would have been nice to buy a new dress and wear it to the dance, but I would be fine. At least we were having the dance. In Salem, for one night only, martial law didn't affect us.

I checked the time.

Troy would be by in two hours.

We were going to dinner first - at his house. Professor Pops had hired someone to cook for us. After that we would take a limo to the dance. Peter and Zoe planned to meet us there. When the dance was over, we'd been given special permission to take Professor Pops' boat out but not far and only until sunrise. Then we would be escorted off the water.

Overall it sounded like a blast and I was really looking forward to it.

"If I only had a dress," I said to my reflection in the bathroom mirror.

"I might be able to help with that."

I jumped, grabbing hold of the sink before spinning around. My best friend fluttered in. "Abrea," I gasped.

"Hey traitor." Her arms were crossed, and her lip was out. Pouting.

"I know." I stuck out my hand so she could land on it. Her long violet hair that so perfectly matched my eyes had been put up in a bun.

"How could you?" Abrea's wings fluttered almost violently.

"I'm so sorry." I shook my head. "I was only thinking of myself when I made my wish." I walked into my bedroom. "But I did think of you since then. This would've been so much better if you were around." I meant every word. I had missed her.

"You mean it?" She uncrossed her arms and her features softened.

"Of course I do. You're my best friend." I sat on my bed, crossing one leg over the other.

Abrea flung herself at me, putting her tiny arms on my neck. I carefully hugged her back. Tears rolled down my face. I really had missed her. Terribly. And I was so glad she was here.

"How did you find me?" I asked.

Abrea flew backward so she could see my face. "Your mom gave me the coordinates. She's letting anyone who wants to go to his or her own realm. As long as they stay out of the human one. But she made an exception and said I could come and see you."

"Well I'm glad she did. I'm glad you're here."

"So am I." She studied my face. "You seem different."

I lay back on the bed. "I am different. No wings. No magic. Up until two weeks ago I was without my vampire abilities too."

"That totally sucks." She fluttered over so I could see her from my new position of lying down.

"Yeah, it does. But it could be worse. Tonight I'm going to a dance with Troy."

Abrea studied me a moment, seeming to detect the changes in my body, but she didn't say more about it. "Who is this Troy?" She hovered above my head.

I sat up, excited to talk about him. "He works as an Academy recruiter. He has blondish hair. Gorgeous eyes. And, he's half dragon."

"A dragon?" She sat on my bedside table, crossing one leg over the other.

"His dragon form is so freaking cool. And he's really nice, too."

"Can't wait to meet him," she said, her voice sounding like tingling bells.

I smiled. Couldn't help it. Thinking about Troy put a smile on my face. You'd think after spending so much time together we'd get sick of each other. But that hadn't happened. Instead I looked forward to seeing him. I talked to him about anything and everything. "You're gonna like him."

"Probably." She flicked a piece of lint off the table. "Talk to me about your dress. What do you want?"

I shrugged. "There hasn't been a lot of time to think about it. The dance's theme is A Sky Full of Enchanted Stars. And it's a winter formal," I said, hoping that helped.

Abrea tapped a finger to her lips. "Hmmmm, okay. Stand up, please."

I rolled onto my side before hefting myself off the bed.

She flew over and touched my nose then backed up as a violet dress appeared on my body in place of the clothes I already wore.

"What?" I went to the mirror and took in my reflection. The dress had spaghetti straps with see through sleeves that were reminiscent of butterfly wings. "It's so pretty, but you know black is my favorite."

She harrumphed. "You should wear this color just to appease me, you know. After all I've been through because of you. I was worried sick. And then when I knew you were okay, I was sad. Then I got mad. You owe me."

"That's true," I said with a sigh. "And I am really, really sorry."

She groaned. "Ugh, fine." She touched my nose again and a black dress appeared.

"Abrea! This is amazing and so - me." I turned back and forth in the mirror. The bodice was black, strapless and looked like butterfly lace. The skirt was teal, hit the middle of my calves and was made of tulle and cotton. It laced up the back with long black silk ties. On my feet were teal pumps. Crystals covered the five inch heels and along the sides.

When Abrea noticed I was checking them out, she smiled. "Those are diamonds not crystals, in case you're wondering."

"I love them," I breathed, happily

She smiled. "I'm so glad."

I bent over and removed my heels. They were already pinching my toes. My combat boots would've been preferred, but then like Abrea said, I owed her.

After setting the shoes on the bed, I went back to the mirror. "What should I do with my hair?"

"Easy." She touched my hair and it lifted and shifted until it was swept up into a loose bun. Abrea had darkened the teal streak in my hair too so it was pronounced once again.

"Thanks, Abrea," I said, admiring her handiwork. Zenny had always helped me get ready in the past, but it was obvious Abrea had an eye for fashion.

"I'll do your makeup as well." She clasped her hands together and makeup appeared on my face. In that moment, I wondered why I ever wanted to be normal. My lashes were long and thick. Eye liner lined my upper and lower lid. Deep blue shadow made my eyes pop.

"Zenny would be proud," I said, touching my face.

"Hey, I take care of the seedlings around the castle. I know how to enhance beauty."

"Of course you do."

TROY SHOWED up in a large black limousine. He got out and came up the path, carrying something in his hand.

"Hi Troy," I said when I opened the door.

His mouth opened slightly. He seemed to realize it and snapped his lips shut. "You look amazing, Jack."

"Thanks," I said, stepping onto the porch.

"I brought you a flower bracelet." He opened the container. A lovely aroma wafted upward. They were real flowers in teal, white, black, and a yellow. There were hydrangeas, daisies, roses, and forget-me-nots. He slid it on my wrist. "Hope you like it."

I brought it to my nose. "It's beautiful, Troy. Thank you."

He stuck out his elbow. I took it. "Let's go." We walked to the limo. Troy opened the door. I stepped inside followed by Troy.

"You look really handsome," I said, adjusting my dress.

Just before Troy closed the door, Abrea whooshed in. "Jasmine, I can't believe you." She was angry again and I couldn't blame her.

"Sorry. Sorry." I covered my eyes. "I was distracted."

Troy smirked. "I'll take that as a compliment."

Abrea looked at Troy for the first time. "Holy buckets of hot sauce. He is gorgeous."

I'd blushed at Troy's compliment. At Abrea's words though, I felt like a raging fire burned my cheeks.

"Oh, you like me, Jack, you really like me." He batted his lashes and rested his head on my shoulder.

"Yeah, I do," I laughed. "Maybe."

"So are you going to introduce us?" Abrea asked. She rocked back and forth in the air.

"Sure. Troy, this is Abrea, my dearest friend in Sharra. Abrea, meet Troy, the coolest guy in the human realm."

Troy stuck out his hand. "It's great to meet you."

"You too," Abrea said in a sing-songy voice. She landed on his hand and curtsied.

"Did you want to come to dinner with us? I know the cook made plenty." He winked.

"Sure. I mean, you know Jasmine won't eat anything. She likes blood. Unless?" Her eyes got big. "She might eat you." Abrea covered her face in her hands. "Sorry Jasmine."

"It's okay." I laughed. "He knows I'm a vampire." I gave Troy a sideways look.

"I know she wants to taste my blood." He took my hand and squeezed it. "Tonight I might let her."

"Troy." I slapped him on the thigh. "I can't believe you said that."

He snorted. "Me either." It looked like he was turning red.

Abrea flew out of the limo, then poked her head back inside. "I'll be here when you get back, Jasmine."

"Kay. See ya. And thanks for the amazing dress, Abrea." I blew her a kiss. She plucked it out of the air and pressed it to her cheek, then flew off.

When she was gone, Troy closed the door. "I think I embarrassed her."

"You embarrassed me," I said softly, enjoying the blazing tension between us. My thoughts were still on his blood. I drank from Christopher a couple of days ago and was in need of more. Still, the hunger wasn't bad. So I pressed it down, forcing myself to concentrate on his handsome face instead. He always looked good, but there was something incredibly sexy about a guy in a tux. Especially one that fit as well as his fit him. Wow.

Troy tapped on the privacy glass. "We're ready."

The glass slid down and a man said, "Very good, sir." The glass slid back into place.

"You look really nice," I said, straightening the knot on his teal tie.

He clasped my hand between his and his warmth raced along my arm.

"So do you." He leaned in, pressing a kiss to my neck.

I shivered. Tingles rode on waves over every inch of my body. When he leaned back, I noticed his eyes were hooded, filled with desire.

Troy.

Gorgeous, incredibly sweet Troy. He wanted what? Us to kiss?

Definitely. I could sense it. And I wanted him to.

I scooted close, my eyes never leaving his, and tilted my head up, waiting for him.

"Jack." His thumb brushed across my lower lip. He tenderly kissed the spot he just touched.

The limo moved and we drove less than a minute before the limo stopped in front of Troy's house. The driver got out and held the door open for us. I didn't want to get out.

Troy took my hand and got out first. Then he held on, his eyes taking in my dress.

"We'll be ready to go to the dance in forty-five minutes," Troy said to the driver.

"I'll be waiting."

Troy held my hand as we went up the stairs and through the door into the entryway.

I wasn't cold, but as soon as we got inside, goose bumps prickled my skin.

"You're cold," he said.

"A little," I replied, unable to come up with a better excuse.

He took me down the hall and into the small library. It was cozy. Books lined the cherry wood shelves covering every inch of the walls not occupied by the fireplace, a door or a window. On the floor was a thick Persian rug. A few weeks ago Troy had shared that the carpet was a replica of a prayer rug. It was deep red with diamond shaped designs, and what looked like four cups in the very center. There were muted golds, greens, and natural colors as well as black.

On the far wall was a fireplace with a wooden mantle over the top. Next to it was a cast iron box full of chopped wood. And beside that were the fireplace tools. On the mantle were books, framed pictures, and a box of matches.

There were two high-back chairs in front of the fireplace. An end table placed next to each chair and an ottoman in front of the chairs. They were the perfect chairs to sit in and read.

Usually they were the only furniture. Tonight though, a small table with two chairs had been placed in front of the window. A black tablecloth covered it. A centerpiece of flowers just like my wrist corsage decorated the center. One place setting of white china with black and gold trim had been set. A linen napkin wrapped one set of silverware. There were two wine glasses.

Interesting. What did he have planned? I thought.

"This is beautiful. Did you do this? Or did you have someone else?" I asked, walking over so I could touch the flowers.

"Thank you. And no, I set this up myself." He pulled out the chair and I sat.

He leaned down and kissed the place where my shoulder met my neck.

I swear my heart skipped several beats.

"I'm going to tell the cook we're ready."

"Do you want me to come?" I asked, glancing over my shoulder.

"Stay. Relax. I'll be right back."

Before he could go, I grabbed his arm, and tugged him down so we were at eye level. "You really didn't need to go to all this trouble." Then I turned his face so I could whisper in his ear. "You know I don't eat - " The vein in his neck beat rapidly. I was mesmerized.

Troy kissed my cheek, letting it linger. "I know what you need, Jack."

He left the room.

I glanced out the window.

The light in the room was low.

That along with my vampire vision made it possible to see into Pops' back yard, past the still green grass to the tennis courts, and beyond them to -

Something moved, at the tree line that separated my yard from Troy's.

I squinted, trying to make out exactly what it was. It could've been a deer.

We saw a lot of those.

But whatever moved was on two legs instead of four. Instinct took over. I needed to find out who it was. I opened the window and climbed out, pushing myself off the edge so that I wouldn't ruin my dress. Landing quietly, I kept to the shadows and made my way around the edge toward whoever it was. The closer I got, the easier it was to see. The person was squatted down between two butterfly bushes. He faced my house. I'd left my light on for Abrea.

Disgusting perv.

I grabbed him by the shoulders and whipped him around.

He gasped in surprise and then smiled.

It was Drake.

He'd come back.

Even in the low light I could see his eyes had changed. They were dark like the elf woman's had been. And he didn't smell human any longer. Instead the scent of vanilla potpourri surrounded him. He was an Akuma. Crap!

"Drake," I said, shocked.

"Yep. I came back for you, Jack."

"What do you want?" I stepped back at the realization that coming out here alone was a stupid idea.

"I want what Sharra wants. And she wants you." He reached out to grab me, but I sidestepped him.

I could've killed him, but the plan Zoe, Peter, Troy, Laeddin, Ariel and I had come up with demanded that we capture an Akuma. We wanted to talk to it.

Drake was the first one any of us had seen in two weeks. I didn't know when I'd get the chance to see another and time was running out. If I could capture him and talk to him, maybe I could figure out how to stop the darkness. When the six of us had come up with the plan to capture the Akuma two weeks ago, it involved me making a wish.

"What does she want?" I asked, trying to stay calm. I needed to get the whole wish out before he disappeared. That had been what the enchanted ropes were for, but I didn't have mine.

Drake's crazy smile fell slightly. "She wants to capture you. If she has you, the - "

I heard the whistle of a soaring blade too late. Drake's head was severed from his body.

"No!" Drake disintegrated before my eyes. Anger boiled through my veins. "Whoever did that better come out and face me. Right. This. Minute." I was ticked. My one chance demolished.

Footsteps sounded in the crisp grass, but I couldn't see anyone, even with my vampire sight. Who or whatever it was kept coming but they were invisible.

"Show yourself," I whispered, hoping I wasn't losing my mind.

Christopher appeared, like he stepped from behind a curtain with exactly the same landscape painted on it as was Pop's yard.

"How the - "

He bowed. "I've come to feed you." He spoke softly, almost reverently.

Had he been invisible? I didn't know Hunters had that kind of magic. "I-I don't - I can't - Right now isn't a good time." The truth was I really wanted to feed. His blood rejuvenated my body like no other.

"You can. Here." He lifted his wrist to his mouth.

"No," I said. "Tomorrow." I was about to ask if he'd thrown the sword, but he bowed again and disappeared back behind the invisible curtain.

"Jack! Jack." Troy stuck his head out the window, looking around searching for me.

"I'm here," I called, walking back to the house.

"What are you doing?" He jumped out the window and ran toward me.

"I saw someone watching my house. It was Drake," I said, my disappointment evident.

"Did you capture him?" Troy was hopeful.

I sighed heavily. "I was about to when someone through a blade, severing his head."

"Dammit." He punched one hand into the other.

"I know. I'm sorry."

"No need to be," he said. "Where did it happen?"

I took him over and showed him. He touched the ground where Drake had been standing. Picked up some dirt and sniffed it. Then he reached into the bushes and pulled out the blade. It was short and gleamed in the moonlight.

"If we don't catch a break soon - " He let the words hang in the air.

I knew what he meant. Time was running out.

"Let's take this inside. Maybe Pops can tell us something about the sword."

I followed him around, wondering how much Pops knew about the situation. He hadn't been around when I told everyone about Sharra. Had Troy filled him in?

The front door was unlocked, and we went inside.

Pops was heading upstairs. "Where'd you two come from?" he asked, when Troy shut the door.

"We found this." Troy showed him the knife.

Pops took it, studied it. "I'll check my books tonight, but you two don't need to be here for that. Go to your dance."

Troy nodded. "Thanks, Pops." They clapped each other on the back in a bro hug. Pops moved away from the stairs and headed for his office. "Oh, and Jasmine, you've got something on your face." He touched his cheek.

"Oh, thank you, grandfather." I wiped at it. It looked like dirt, but it was probably Akuma dust.

"Sure thing, my dear." He went into the kitchen.

"Mind if I use your bathroom?" I asked Troy.

"Nah, come on." Troy let me hold his arm as he walked me up the stairs.

I was grateful. My heels were really high. "Thanks," I said when he turned on the bathroom light. "I can freshen up while you eat. I don't want you to be hungry at the dance."

He sidled up to me, wrapped his arms around my waist. His face was directly above mine. So close, I could smell his cologne and the minty freshness of his breath. "What about your hunger?" His voice was low and sexy.

"I'll be fine," I said, staring at his lips.

His head came down, his lips brushed against mine.

Freshening up was forgotten. The dance, the Akuma. Everything but his lips on mine scattered from my mind.

I ran my hands up his arms and into his hair. I loved his short hair, loved the feel of it between my fingers.

He pulled back a moment, removing his jacket and hanging it on the bathroom doorknob before his lips were back on mine again. I had the briefest thought that his lips belonged there before he groaned, lifting me into his arms. I wrapped my legs around his waist. His lips pushed mine opened and he explored my mouth as he carried me across the hall and over to his bed. When he sat, the bed squeaked, and we looked at each other. I didn't want to stop.

"I love kissing you," he said, and I knew he didn't want to stop either. He lay back, pulling me on top of him.

I yanked at his tie and undid his shirt, longing to feel his skin next to mine, to taste his him on my lips. His blood in my mouth -

"Troy. Jasmine."

Pops stood in the doorway; his features contorted in irritation. "I have information about the knife. I'll meet you downstairs in the office," he said and was gone.

Troy swore. "Sorry," he said the words against my ear.

My cheeks got hot. What followed were ten of the longest, most awkward seconds of my life as I untangled myself from Troy and readjusted my dress. In the bathroom, I quickly fixed my hair as he pulled on his jacket.

Troy turned off the bathroom light. "That was fun," he said with a smile.

I blushed hotter. "Yeah, up until Pops caught us."

He chuckled. "Let's go see what he found out."

CAVE OF LOST SOULS

WE WALKED in and Pops looked up from the knife. He held the hilt in one hand and had the tip against one of his fingers. It wasn't a huge sword in length, but it was thick.

"Have a seat."

Troy took the one closest to the window and I took the one closest to the door.

"What'd you find?" Troy asked, leaning forward, picking up the knife.

"It's old. Dated back to the Crusades."

Pops handed over the knife when Troy held out his hand.

"The craftsmanship is exquisite," Pops continued. "Not many in that time possessed skill required to make something like this."

"Was this someone you knew?" Troy handed Pops back the blade.

"There is one who could have made it, but he's long gone. Sharra put him to rest."

I started at the sound of her name. "What's his name?" I asked.

"Arthur Pendragon." Professor Pops took the short sword from Troy and placed it in the top drawer of his desk.

My body began to shake.

"What's wrong?" Troy asked.

Professor Pops clasped his hands together. "Jasmine?"

"Was Arthur laid to rest in the Cave of Lost Souls?" I asked.

Troy caught on. "Could he be the same vampire?"

"What am I missing?" Pops asked, searching our faces. "Seems I've been away too long and need to get caught up." He clasped his fingers together, waiting, his eyes on me.

Between the two of us, we told him everything. When we finished, Pops sat back. "I don't know what Sharra is up to, but from experience I can tell you it will be worse than what you think you can imagine."

"Great," I said, feeling terrible and sinking down in the chair.

"I'm sorry, but it's true. After Silindra died, Sharra was basically alone. In time she had one regret. It wasn't that she killed her sister or that she bred out original vampire traits. It was that she lost her wings. But by the time she realized the error of her ways it was too late. I think it's why she went mad." He spoke softly, but was adamant.

I had no doubt Pops was telling the truth. With each word, I shrank further down, feeling guilty and full of my own regrets.

Professor Pops went on. "Only now there is you."

I gritted my teeth, sick inside about what his words meant. To me. To Sharra. And to the whole world.

"I think she's been planning this for quite some time. You gave her exactly what she wanted, Jasmine. And now that she has them back, she'll do anything in her power to keep them."

I wanted to lash out. Tell him he was wrong. Explain that even though he hadn't said everything was my fault, I knew it was true. And I wanted to fix it. Somehow. If I could.

"Pops," Troy said when the tension in the room had grown thick enough to bite, "I don't think there's anything more we can do about this tonight. We are going to the dance. Don't wait up." He stood and pulled me up with him.

The professor nodded. "Try to enjoy yourselves." He paused. "But not too much," he added.

I followed Troy down the hall. Lost in my thoughts. Nearly drowning in shame. If only I listened to Laeddin.

Sure I saved the genie, but at what cost? Now the whole world, and all of the other realms were in danger.

Troy helped me into the limo.

He sat down, keeping my hand in his. We didn't speak and I was grateful. I needed time to collect my thoughts and figure out what I was going to do.

THE WINTER FORMAL was a grand affair for the Salem Academy students. It was held at the Ritz in Boston, a thirty-minute drive from town.

I stared out the window, keeping my focus on the dark water and the twinkling lights. It was beautiful. Quiet. Peaceful even.

Once we reached the Boston city limits, we were met by a National Guard security unit. Our limo driver rolled down his window and handed the uniformed man some papers.

"Open the back," the soldier demanded.

Our driver got out and did as he was told.

The man in uniform stuck his head inside and gave us a smug glare. "You kids been drinking tonight?"

"No," Troy answered. I could hear his pulse racing, his heart pumping wildly. I knew he wasn't happy about being stopped.

"What about you?" the uniform asked.

"No," I said, pulling my hand from Troy's and glancing away.

"Should we do a breathalyzer? You seem a little unsure." The guy looked like he wanted to climb into the limo with us to check.

"I haven't been drinking." I looked directly in his eyes this time, not wanting to be the cause of more trouble for Troy.

The uniformed guy searched the vehicle, probably looking for alcohol or drugs. When he was satisfied, he closed the door. "They're clean. Let 'em through," he said, waving his hand.

The driver shifted the limo into gear and began driving again. I should've been excited. I tried, but I kept seeing Sharra flying around with my wings, kept hearing her laugh. She was ruining my night.

Troy took my hand back. Squeezed. But said nothing. That was one of the main reasons I liked him so much. He knew what I needed, usually before I did.

At the hotel entrance, the driver let us out.

"We'll be done at midnight," Troy said.

"Yes, sir." The driver gave us a nod as he drove away.

Hand in hand we walked into the dance.

As soon as we entered the building, my spirits lifted. Techno dance music was easily heard coming from further down the hall.

The ballroom was exquisite. The ceiling had snowflakes and icicles hanging from it. To one side was a winter wonderland, complete with fake snow, a large red sleigh, and a photographer.

Several dozen couples were on the dance floor, including Cameron and a girl I'd never seen before. That surprised me. I thought he was gay. He and the girl seemed to be close though. They had their heads together and were talking about something.

There was a DJ and lights and a buffet table filled with all sorts of yummy-looking treats.

"Let's dance, Jack." Troy walked us onto the floor. The song playing was All of Me by John Legend. I put my arms around Troy's neck, and he put his arms around my waist. "The rest of the night is going to be about you and me and fun. Deal?"

I gave him a sweet smile. "I'd like that." I rested my cheek against his chest as we swayed back and forth. When the song ended, another started. It was also a slow song, so we kept dancing.

After that one ended, we checked out the buffet table. Troy got himself a drink. He'd missed dinner and I knew he was hungry because he kept shoving cubes of cheese in his mouth.

"Sorry you didn't get to eat. What did the cook prepare?"

He chewed quickly and then swallowed. "It was Beef Provencal with twice baked potatoes topped with sautéed mushrooms. For dessert the chef made chocolate mousse with sugared raspberries and fresh whipped cream."

I could practically see his mouth watering. "That sounds yummy," I said even though it all tasted like ash to me now that I had my vampire powers back.

Troy laughed. "You're a terrible liar." He nuzzled my ear. "I know what you crave."

I got weak in the knees and my stomach fluttered.

"I'd be careful with her if I were you." It was Cameron. He stood beside Troy and picked up an olive. "Get too close and you might end up dead."

"You better watch your mouth," Troy said. I felt the tension rolling off him. It melted my heart that he wanted to defend me. Not that I needed his help, but it was still sweet.

Cameron chewed on an olive. Swallowed. "It's the truth. Being friends with her equals disaster. Just watch it." He walked away.

Troy started to go after him, but I held him back. "Don't bother. I get why he's scared. I would be too."

He shook his head. "That doesn't give him the right to be disrespectful."

I cupped Troy's face in my hands and smiled. "Wanna dance?"

His features softened. "I would love to."

We danced to slow songs and fast songs until a light sheen covered Troy's forehead. When we took breaks, people came over to talk to Troy. He knew everybody, not that I was surprised. He had an easygoing way about him. Kindly, he introduced me to everyone. Some were really nice. Others weren't. I tried not to focus on it since worrying wouldn't do any good.

Even Zoe and Peter showed up for a little while and it was fun seeing my mom and dad so happy, so carefree. But it was short-lived. They ended up leaving probably an hour after they got there.

"Enjoy yourself," my mom said right before she left.

I hugged her. "I will."

Troy and I danced some more. We had our picture taken on the sleigh and then one where we stood under the mistletoe. They turned out really cute. Troy really was movie star hot and the dress Abrea created was amazing. We looked good together, he and I.

At exactly midnight my first official school dance ended.

I hugged Troy. "Thank you so much for asking me to go with you. It was as amazing as I hoped."

He pulled my body close and I breathed him in.

"Thank you," Troy said. "I've been to a few of these over the years, but I've never had more fun than tonight. Probably because you didn't leave to go check your hair with your friends every five minutes."

"Oh no. I totally forgot about that. How does my hair look?" I giggled at the look on his face.

He smiled. "Gorgeous, like the rest of you."

"Thanks."

He took my hand and we walked outside. Some of the couples were standing at the elevator. Apparently, they had rooms. I didn't want to contemplate what that meant. Troy was older, but I'd just experienced kissing and my first dance. No way was I near ready for what getting a room at a hotel implied.

Outside our limo driver waited his turn and then pulled up in front of us. He got out and held open the door.

"You still intend to go to the yacht?" the driver asked Troy.

Troy looked over. "You still want to watch the sun rise from the water?"

"Most definitely," I said with eager anticipation. I definitely didn't want our date to be over.

"You heard the lady. Definitely."

"Excellent, sir."

He drove us to the pier where another National Guard unit checked us in and then waved us through.

At the edge of a long dock, the driver stopped. The yacht was white and lit up like a Christmas tree. Fog had rolled in making the lights on the yacht glow like dozens of phantoms. We got out. Troy thanked the driver and gave him a large tip.

The air was thick and gave off the scent of brine and salt. Waves lapped against the boat. Without my vampire vision I doubted I would've been able to see the ocean.

Troy and I walked down to where the captain and several crewmembers welcomed us as we came aboard.

"There's shrimp cocktail in the dining area," the captain, whose name was Nick Bordeaux, said.

"Thank you, Nick." Troy took my hand.

The gesture put a smile on my lips. It seemed to be a thing with him, his need to be close. I didn't mind. The truth was I liked it.

We walked along the deck, came to a long set of stairs and climbed. The dining area was luxurious, complete with a chandelier and at least a dozen tables surrounded by four times as many chairs.

My eyes were drawn to the gleaming bar. The back wall was covered in mirrors. Alcohol and various types of glasses lined glass shelves. Black leather barstools were tucked under a U-shaped counter. On either side of the counter were double swinging doors with round windows in each. I guessed the kitchen was back there.

Troy dashed over to the shrimp cocktail. "I'm starving," he said, dunking an extra-large shrimp in cocktail sauce and tossing it in his mouth.

I smiled, watching him chew. The boy could eat.

The floor was a gleaming white and black leather sofas lined the windowed walls. A baby grand piano stood in one corner.

Troy ate more than half the shrimp before sighing and patting his stomach. "Much better."

"You full?"

"No, but I'm no longer ravenous." He chuckled and took a bottle of water chilling in an ice bucket, opened it and chugged it down. After tossing it in the trash, he took my hand. "Come on."

I swallowed, wishing I had taken Christopher up on his blood offer.

We walked out of the dining area, down the stairs, and then along the side of the boat until we came to another set of stairs. This time they went down.

"Where we going?" I asked.

He opened a door and flipped on a light. It was a bedroom complete with a bed and four walls. "You wanna change?"

"Into what?"

"I have sweats. Those will be comfy." He pulled open a drawer I hadn't noticed because it was flush with the wall.

"Cool."

He smiled, taking out a heather gray pair of sweatpants and a matching sweatshirt.

"You want me to look like a dirty cotton ball?" I asked, wrinkling my nose.

He burst out laughing. "As a matter of fact, yes. Yes, I do."

"Mmmm-kay." I grabbed them from his hands.

"You can change in the bathroom, right over there." I went inside and closed the door.

"Don't come out until I say. I'm going to change too."

"Fine." I took off my shoes and untied my dress. A quilted white hanger hung on the door and I used it to hang up my dress.

The bathroom was beautiful, like the rest of the incredible yacht. The bathroom floor consisted of peacock-colored tiles that also went halfway up the walls. The top half was painted white. The countertops were a sand color and had crushed seashells embedded in them as well as the double sinks. Next to them was a stand up shower with frosted glass doors. Another door led to the toilet.

I put on the sweats, worried they would be too big, but was surprised to realize they fit. And they were comfy.

Leaning against the counter, I took the pins from my hair, letting the curls fall down around my shoulders.

"I'm done if you are," Troy hollered from the bedroom.

I opened the door.

"Wow. I think you might be sexier in sweats." His eyes roamed over my body.

"You're joking," I snorted, thinking he looked freaking amazing in sweats too.

He tilted my chin. "Am not. You're gorgeous." He touched the place between my breasts where my heart beat. "Inside and out."

My stomach quivered. "You're just saying that," I said trying to be funny, but his features were serious.

"No. I mean it. Jack, I - care about you. A lot." He brushed some hair off my face. "My best friend Jesse is missing. I don't know where he is. My father and Professor Pops are trying to find him, but not helping him was killing me. Until you. Getting to know you. Spending time with you." He leaned down and kissed my forehead. "It means so much to me."

I swallowed, nervous about the intensity of his words. "I care about you too."

He nodded. "Want to have a Vampire Diaries marathon until sunrise?"

"Heck yes."

"Cool. I need snacks. Be right back."

We were watching in his bedroom? I searched the room. "Where's the TV?"

He picked up a remote sitting on the bed and pressed a button. The wall across from his bed slid back revealing a large flat screen. "Make yourself cozy." He ran up the stairs.

I climbed on the queen-sized bed and fluffed the pillows so I could lean against them while I watched TV. I kept one out and held it against my stomach. It smelled like Troy and I brought it to my nose.

He came down just as I was inhaling. "Oh, you got it bad, don't you?"

I hid behind the pillow, mortified. "No." I giggled.

He tossed a bag of licorice on the bed and then jumped on me, yanking the pillow from my hands. "Yes, you do." His nose touched my neck just below my ear. "You forget I'm part dragon. I can smell it on you." He slowly licked my neck. "Taste it." He let out a purring noise that caused my thighs to tremble. "Feel it," he said with a groan.

We were face to face. His eyes searched mine. I wondered what he was thinking. His body was on fire. Mine responded. All I could think about was that I wanted him.

"Isn't this a surprise? I thought you had a thing for the genie, vampire? I know he cares deeply about you." I recognized her voice from me dreams. It was Sharra.

Troy jumped to his feet, facing her. I sat up, my heart racing. "What are you doing here?" I asked, trying to cover up my trembling voice.

Sharra took a step toward us, but stopped, her gaze on Troy. "You aren't human." Her scrutiny turned maniacal.

"I'm half-human," Troy growled. I noticed his skin ripple, the dragon underneath itching to get out.

Sharra roared, angry. "I'll be back." She vanished.

"That was scary," I said, taking a deep breath, trying to calm the fear that had risen in me.

"Who was that?" Troy turned.

His question surprised me. "That was Sharra." Of course he didn't know what she looked like. "She wasn't happy to see you."

Troy sat and I scooted next to him. "If I'd been alone, she would've taken and killed me." I knew that for certain.

"I won't let that happen." He was in shock. She appeared and disappeared in less than twenty seconds.

I was reeling too. "I know," I whispered. Grabbing his shoulders I lay back, pulling him down.

His eyes searched mine. Silently I begged him to kiss me.

He answered my silent request, pressing his lips to mine.

We were already filled with adrenaline and it seemed to fuel our desires.

My kisses were no longer just kisses. They were gestures of gratitude. Promises. And hunger. I wanted him. All of him. I pushed his sweatshirt over his head, revealing in his tanned, rippled muscles. My hands roamed his chest, down his stomach, and around his back.

His hips pressed against mine and I gasped as my blood boiled and my fangs pressed against my lips. I wanted him. His body and his blood. "Take it," he said gruffly, pressing his neck against my mouth.

I didn't hesitate. My fangs extended, pricking his skin.

"Princess." Laeddin popped into the room.

Troy swore and roared with frustration.

I sat with him, readjusting my sweatshirt. It had risen up to my chest. "Laeddin. Get out!"

"I need to speak with you." He eyed Troy. "I'll wait upstairs."

I blinked several times, standing. "I should go see what he wants."

"Jack?" The way Troy said my name nearly broke my heart.

I went over to him, throwing my arms around his waist. "I'm not choosing him over you. But the way he popped in, it's obvious he has something important to say." I kissed him firmly on the mouth. He hugged me tighter. I didn't want to leave, but urgency forced me out of his arms. "Meet you up there?"

Troy examined my face, probably checking for the truthfulness of my words. I knew what he would find. My heart, where it once rested with Laeddin was firmly planted. It knew where I belonged. And that was with Troy.

"I'll be right behind you." He shooed me out the door.

I nodded and ran barefoot up the steps.

KOMONI TREE

I FOUND Laeddin on the upper deck, staring out at the churning water. "Sorry about that," I said, coming to stand beside him. It wasn't that I was sorry about kissing Troy. Only sorry Laeddin had to see it.

He shrugged, running a hand through his thick hair. "It isn't your fault. I didn't think; I just came." He shoved his hands in the pockets of his jeans. Laeddin was wearing the same clothes he left in more than a week ago. He looked haggard, his face scruffy, and his dark hair mussed.

I touched his arm. "What's going on?"

Urgency returned to his face. "I found something. An artifact. A crown actually. Made of elven magic and the branches of their sacred komoni tree."

"Ko-mon-e?"

"Right. It's a tree that can only be found in their realm and there is only one." He didn't look at me but continued to watch the ocean.

"What's so special about this tree?" As the yacht tilted and swayed, I watched him, wondering what it would've been like if we just met without the whole genie and master scenario.

"It's special because there's only one and the elves consider it a deity. They believe the tree is the place where the seven magics originated. And when a creature of the seven dies, their soul is returned to that tree."

"Okay." From all I studied at the Seven Magics Academy, it was certainly a possibility.

"Some of the elder elves believe without the tree all elves would die."

"Okay, so what does this crown do?" I crossed my arms, wishing for a jacket.

"It's said to possess the same power as the tree."

"So it - creates life? I don't understand." I rested my hands on the rail.

"And it can take life."

That wasn't creepy at all. "The crown can take life, but it can also create it?" I didn't see how that would help us.

"Yes," Laeddin said. "The story goes that thousands of years ago, the seven kings of the elven realm started a war with each other. The reason was each believed their kingdom should have guards protecting the komoni tree. Before and during the war only the high king's guards protected the tree and the other six heard rumors that the high king was secretly using the power of the tree for his personal gain. They thought the high king was the richest and most powerful because he took the power of the tree and harnessed it for his own selfish desires."

"Was he?" I asked.

"I don't know. The story didn't say. But after decades of fighting, the high king finally agreed to share protection of the tree. By then the other kingdoms weren't satisfied with that. They each wanted to be allowed to take possession of the tree for a period of fifty years.

"After several more years of discussion the high king came up with a plan. They would have the most powerful sorceress from each of the kingdoms come together to create a crown. Each king would be allowed to wear the crown for fifty years and during that time that king would be in charge of the tree's protection and privy to whatever power he could harness."

"I think I know where this is going." I sighed. It seemed power was at the root of all war. A person or a country believed they should have all of it and that everyone should be subjected to it.

"Maybe not." Laeddin shook his head. "The crown was created. The high king was given the right to it for the first fifty years and then he passed it on to the next king, and the king after that, until finally the seventh king received the crown.

"He'd had three hundred years to debate what he would do when given the crown. He spoke with his sorceress, used torture on prisoners he secretly captured from the other kingdoms, until he gained a full understanding of the influence of the crown. And as soon as the crown was placed on his head, he began creating. But it wasn't treasures like gold or silver or gems. He formed more elves until his kingdom was great beyond measure. They all swore allegiance to him. If they refused, the king used the crown to destroy them. When his fifty years were up, he had an army of three million elven warriors.

"Instead of returning the crown to the high king, he sent his three million warriors into the high king's land and had everyone in the kingdom killed. Then he took possession of the dead king's land for himself.

"When the other kings heard what he'd done they realized the crown was too much power for any one person. After much discussion, the remaining five kingdoms sent five assassins foraged in magic. They were to destroy the king as well as the crown and return the power to the tree.

"The five succeeded, slaying the king. They did as ordered and took the crown to the tree, but the tree rejected it, ripping the crown into five pieces.

"The assassins didn't want to take the fragments back to their kings so they each decided to take their piece and hide it, agreeing they wouldn't tell the others where they were going or where their piece was hidden. They also agreed to tell the kings the crown had been destroyed.

"Over the centuries stories of the crown's existence began to surface. Folktales popped up saying that even just having part of the crown gave the owner great power. I checked human histories too." He snapped his fingers and a hologram of a crown appeared directly in front of us.

"Impressive," I said, gripping the railing more tightly.

He smiled. "This is what the elves believe the crown looks like."

It was white with bright red berry-looking things randomly placed around it. At the front were five gems, representing five magics. The crown was simple. Unassuming. It certainly didn't look like it possessed any kind of power.

But I was confused. "It's in pieces, right?"

"Yes. And, look." A picture of Octavian Augustus, the first roman emperor appeared. Laeddin pointed to something on his robe. "It's a piece of the crown.

I peered closer. "It's possible."

Another person appeared. Laeddin pointed to what looked like a piece of the crown. "Look."

Another appeared. And another. And another. He showed more than twenty photos of men and women with what looked like the same piece of crown attached somewhere on their person.

I had to agree the thing he pointed out, whatever it was, did look the same in every picture.

"So a piece was hidden in the human realm? Or not so hidden since it seems lots of people have taken possession of it over the years."

"Right." He sent the hologram back into the ether where it came from. "Even in pieces, the crown has great power. Over the centuries kings and queens have used it." He faced me.

"Okay, but - " I shook my head. "Even if we find all the pieces, how can the crown stop Sharra? She was created first. Shouldn't her power be stronger?"

He flinched, perhaps taken aback that I didn't understand. "The wearer of the crown can create and destroy life. If you wear the crown, you would have the same power."

"I'll use it to destroy Sharra." I nodded my agreement.

He took my hands. "You were created by the power of all seven magics. And even though you don't have your wings, your DNA holds that magic. Plus you are an original vampire. As you said, they have more power. If you possessed the crown, you wouldn't only use it to destroy Sharra. You could use it to create more vampires. Just. Like. You."

The gravity of what he said pressed heavily against my chest. More vampires, with wings and powers, like mine. I wouldn't be alone. There would be others. I pressed my hands against my head. The prospect was both terrifying and exciting.

He took hold of my shoulders. "Alone you may be no match for Sharra but think if there were dozens or hundreds like you. She wouldn't stand a chance. Her power is strong, but not that strong. Not even close."

I nodded, feeling a little sick inside. "How do we find the pieces?"

"Are you out of your freaking mind?" Troy stood at the top of the stairs, his hands in fists. I didn't know how much of the story he heard but I guessed by the furiousness on his face, that it was most if not all of it.

"What? It seems like a good plan," I said moving over to him. "I can use the crown to destroy Sharra and create more vampires like me."

"Got any better ideas?" Laeddin growled out, shooting daggers at Troy with his gaze.

"I can tell you it isn't giving Jack a crown so she can create more original vampires. That's the craziest thing I've heard!" Troy was breathing heavily.

I stared; not sure I heard him correctly. Not sure I understood what he was saying. Because I thought he liked me for who and what I was.

"Why? What are you saying, Troy?" I tried to keep calm, but my body was reacting to the thoughts running through my mind.

He thinks you're a freak too.

He thinks you're a freak too.

He thinks you're a freak too.

"You think I'm a freak," I said, voicing my deepest fear.

He immediately backed down. "No. No. That's not it at all," he said, shaking his hands and his head. "It's just - you remember the stories of Silindra and Sharra. Life wasn't great for humans when the originals roamed the Earth." Like a knife, his words twisted. Cutting and slicing my heart into bright red ribbons.

"I - You - " I clamped my mouth shut and turned to Laeddin. "Can you get me out of here?"

"With pleasure." Laeddin took hold of my arms.

WHEN LAEDDIN LET GO we were back at my house. Upstairs in my room. Abrea wasn't in my room and I had a brief moment of panic. But I relaxed. She could take care of herself.

My phone beeped. A swift glance informed it was a text from Troy. I didn't even read the words before I sent back my reply.

Just leave me alone, Troy. I don't want to talk to you. There was nothing he could say or do that would make up for his hurtful words.

Sorry, he texted back.

Laeddin immediately began to pace.

"What is it?" I asked, trying not to think about Troy and my broken heart.

"I know where to find the first piece of the crown."

"You do?" I stood in front of him, making him stop.

"It's in Connecticut." His eyes seemed far away as though he were there already.

"That's an odd place to hide an elven relic." I put my phone on my bedside table.

He shrugged. "True. But there's a rock house in Guilford, Connecticut that was built in 1639 by Henry Whitfield - "

"I've heard about the house." My aunt Cindy mentioned it during our conversations about how witches came to the human realm. Witches were something of an enigma. One of the teachers even called them mutts. The reason was their magic was an infusion of several different types. Usually at the Academy ceremony, we discovered which of the seven magics gave a witches magic the most weight. Cindy's came from her father, Abernathy. Dragon magic. At the thought, I cringed. Stupid Troy!

"Did you know there are tunnels beneath the house? And within one of the tunnels a piece of the crown is buried." He crossed his arms, waiting.

"How did you find all of this out?" I wasn't fully focused on Laeddin or our conversation. I was still hurting from Troy.

He glared, blowing out a breath in frustration. "While you've been making out and who knows what else with Troy, I've been researching, hoping to stop all of this nonsense."

"I - "

But Laeddin wasn't done. "While you've been playing house, I've been trying to figure out a way to save you, to save everyone." Laeddin went over to the window and stared out. He seemed exhausted. "If I say it's there, it's there, Jasmine."

"Fine," I said through gritted teeth. "Shall I wish us there?"

"No. He shook his head. "We have to find all five pieces. And we have to hope we can still capture one of the Akuma. The only way to do that is with a wish. You need to save them." He went to the bedroom door.

"When do you want to leave?" I carefully sat on my bed.

"First thing tomorrow morning." Laeddin left my room and I heard him enter his and turn on the shower.

Moments later, Christopher showed up. "Busy night," he said, his eyes falling to my lips.

"Hey Chris." I rested my chin to my chest, feeling exhausted myself. But spending time with the Hunter was easy.

He sat beside me, putting an arm around my shoulders. "You're hungry."

"Yeah, I am. Starving, actually." The scent of him already had my mouth watering.

Today he wore a green long sleeved button down shirt and a tan pair of slacks. His blond hair was mussed, but it looked great. He kept flipping his bangs out of his eyes. They were hooded and - "Are you hungry?" I asked casually, not really thinking about it.

Christopher scooted closer. "Are you offering, Jasmine?" His fangs grew, scraping his bottom lip.

Was I? "Sure," I said. What would it hurt?

"Oh, Jasmine." He leaned in, his focus on my neck.

I tilted my head to the side, moving my hair out of the way with my hand. His hands tenderly gripped my arms and he sank his fangs into my shoulder near the curve of my neck. I immediately gasped as a bolt of desire rocked me. I fell back on the bed, taking Chris with me. He adjusted himself so that he wasn't squishing me. My hands roamed his chest and I unbuttoned his shirt, pushing it off. Christopher helped, without moving his fangs from my throat.

After several minutes, he removed his mouth from my neck. His eyes roamed my face. A drop of my blood stained one side of his mouth. "Feel better?" I whispered. I barely contained my need for his blood.

"I feel amazing, Jasmine."

I blushed, wondering if he knew he was the first to drink my blood. I had a feeling he did.

"Your turn." Christopher rolled on his side, tilting his head so I had easy access to the vein on his neck. In the past I only drank from his wrist. Tonight would be different. Tonight I would forget about Troy and Laeddin and just let myself feel. I positioned myself above him. My fangs grew. I gave him a curious look, wondering if he minded. "Do it," he coaxed.

I sank my fangs into his throbbing throat and sucked. I tasted my blood mingled with his. It was amazing. Incredible. Delicious. It was all I could focus on. And I wanted more.

Chris wrapped his arms around my waist, pulling our bodies close. In that moment, with his body and blood mingling with mine, there was no one and no place else I wanted to be. Ever.

Everything made sense.

I knew who I was. Not a normal teenaged girl. I was a monster. A vampire. And most important of all, I was Christopher's and he was mine.

OLD HUNTERS

I WAS flYING AGAIN, and I carefully settled into the dream. Vision. Whatever it was. This time I knew I was inside Sharra's mind so I kept quiet, hoping she wouldn't notice I was there.

"It's easy to tell when you're with me, vampire." She clucked her tongue. "Now I just need to get a hold of your body." She laughed into the cool night air. "The dragon you were with was a surprise. I wasn't prepared for him. But no matter."

I didn't respond, hoping to get a glimpse of where she was and scanned our surroundings. The terrain was familiar. Not Sharra but Salem.

She circled Professor Pops' yacht.

Troy leaned against the railing, staring out at the agitated water.

Sadness caused me to wonder what he was thinking. I wanted it to be me, but there wasn't a point. How could I be with someone who didn't believe I should exist? Sure, I was stretching.

Troy seemed to sense Sharra even if he couldn't see her. "Get out of here." His features were confident as though he believed he could physically remove her if it came to that.

"Hello, son." Professor Pops climbed the steps and walked over to Troy.

"What's this?" Sharra asked. "One of my old hunters? How nice." There was joy in her. I felt it. She had cared for my grandfather at one point. At least in her own way.

Sharra flew us in closer. But Pops sensed us as well and looked directly at me - at us. His eyes appeared to pierce right into my soul.

Sharra shuddered. I remember you, her mind hissed.

Professor Pops threw out a spell with the wave of his hand and a few whispered words. Then he turned his attention to Troy. "I have news and needed to share it right away," Pops said.

"What is it?" Troy was sullen, his eyes glazed over.

"Jesse." Professor Pops clapped Troy on the shoulder. "I know where he is."

That perked Troy up. He seemed to immediately forget what he'd been brooding over, his attention totally on Pops. "You do? Where? Let's go get him."

"That's why I came. Your father has agreed to let you come, but we must leave immediately. With the darkness spreading, I want Jesse home sooner rather than later. And the realm he's in?" Professor Pops shook his head. "I'm worried about him."

"I'm ready now." Troy walked toward the stairs.

"Did you want to say good-bye to Jasmine?" Professor Pops asked.

Troy's face softened. "I hurt her. I didn't mean to, but I - " He shook his head. "It's better if I give her some space. She'll understand. Let's go."

Troy, my heart whispered over and over.

"All right, son. Let's go get your brother back." He followed Troy down the stairs.

"That boy is truly amazing. If only he were the tiniest bit malevolent," Sharra said, breathing in through her nose like she could smell whether a person was good or evil. Then she flew us away from the yacht and headed inland.

I didn't respond, pondering Sharra's words. She was right. Troy wasn't bad or evil. He hadn't meant to hurt me either. Guilt filled my heart. Regret too. I jumped to the poorest possible conclusion with Troy. And it made the whole thing worse that it took someone as evil as Sharra to show me the error of my ways.

Sharra landed on one of the lower spires of the gothic church inside the Harmony Grove Cemetery. She turned in a circle, searching.

"Ah, there they are." She focused on a group sitting on the ground in a circle. They were kids from Salem Academy. Each had a lit candle placed in front of them. They were holding hands.

"It's so much fun to watch the wicked work. Especially when they have no idea what they're doing."

Fear spread like a thick blanket over my insides. "What are you going to do?"

"Watch, dear Jasmine. See what your wings, your magic, and my vision for the future can do."

She landed in the center of the circle, appearing like an apparition. "Hello, my pets."

"Holy crap," one of the girls said, crossing herself.

I realized it was the girl who went to the Winter Formal with Cameron.

"Witch," another said, standing. It was Cameron.

I wanted to shout at him to run.

"Oh, you know this one," Sharra said aloud even though she was speaking to me. She lifted Cameron off the ground by his neck.

"Who are you?" Cameron choked out, his feet swinging as he tried to get his feet on the ground.

"I am she whom you called while performing your ritual." She flicked her finger and made the flame on the candles flare up. "I am your Mistress."

There were seven who were in the circle. Two tried to run.

"Bup. Bup. Bup. Stay. Enjoy the fruits of your labors." Without touching them, the boy and girl turned back around and stood in the circle. They seemed to be fighting the movements, but Sharra's magic was stronger than their fear.

"How can we serve you?" Another girl asked. Her clear brown eyes were terrified.

Sharra cackled. "Oh, you humans are much too easy." She took a deep breath and blew yellow smoke into Cameron's face. His eyes rolled back in his head and his body went limp. Then she twirled in a slow circle, blowing the smoke at each of the remaining six.

They crumpled to the ground. Sharra dropped Cameron and he landed in a heap.

"Are they dead?" I was horrified, praying they weren't dead.

"That depends on your idea of death."

Their bodies disintegrated.

Sharra pulled a silky red pouch from beneath her robes. The rope that held the bag shut looked like pixilette hair. She pulled the top of the bag open and took a pinch of deep red powder and sprinkled it over the soil where the bodies had been. As she scattered the powder, she spoke in a language I never heard before, but somehow felt familiar. Like I should know it. Like it sat on the edge of my memories.

After the powder seeped into the ground, we waited for several minutes. I wondered if Sharra had lost her mind. The ground was covered with red powder and her red pouch was totally empty.

"Sharra?" I asked, trying to gauge the soundness of her faculties.

"Patience," she answered.

She stood back.

The bodies of the kids from school began to reappear.

"What's happening?"

Sharra cackled and began to dance. The waltz, I think. Watching the bodies resurrect was like watching a flower grow in fast forward. The skeletons emerged first, the bones growing and connecting. Next came the muscles, veins, and skin. Then their insides seemed to fill up. With what, I didn't know.

Cameron's eyes opened first. They were black. And he smelled like vanilla potpourri.

"I'm so sorry, Cameron."

"Don't worry, unwanted vampire. You'll see him again really soon."

"JASMINE."

A tiny voice broke through the darkness and woke me.

My eyes blinked opened.

Abrea was hovering directly above my face.

"Hey," I said rolling onto my side.

"Laeddin is up already and he's downstairs wearing a path in the living room floor waiting for you."

Last night came back in a rush.

Abrea made an amazing dress.

Dancing with Troy.

Kissing Troy.

Going to the yacht.

Kissing Troy some more.

Laeddin appearing.

Hearing the story of the sacred crown.

Troy's words.

Coming home.

Letting Christopher drink from me, and I him - those thoughts sent my stomach fluttering. The experience was amazing. Had it been real?

And then there was the vision and what I experienced with Sharra.

"Cameron!"

I threw off the covers, sending Abrea tumbling backward. "Sorry," I said, rushing into the bathroom.

"Don't worry." She shook her head and flew in beside me.

I held out a hand and she landed on it. I leaned in and kissed the top of her head. "I'm so happy you're here."

"Me too," she said, flying over to the mirror.

"I need a shower. Be out in a few, Kay?" I asked, needing to hurry.

"Oh, fine. I'm going outside. I need some fresh air." Abrea flew out my window.

I closed the door and took a hurried shower then dressed in jeans, a red tee shirt, and my combat boots. My hair was still wet and since I wanted to hurry, I braided it before applying some gloss. Grabbing my phone, I ran downstairs.

Laeddin was in the kitchen eating an apple.

"Hi." I sat on a barstool. He looked better. Showered and shaved. He changed too. He wore clean jeans and a black button up shirt, the long sleeves rolled past the elbows. His hair was still slightly wet. He didn't say anything when I came in. Just kept chewing.

"What time did you want to leave? Are we flying by magic carpet?" I wouldn't mind that. Flying with him when we went to his realm the first time had been amazing.

Before he could answer, someone knocked on the door. I pulled it open and hid a groan. It was Officers Gand and Vick. Again. Could I wish them away?

"Should I start setting places for you at the table?" I asked, trying not to let my irritation show.

Officer Gand ignored my question. "Mind if we come in? We have a few questions."

I pushed the door wide. "Not at all." As I closed the door behind them, I noticed a military truck parked out front.

"Laeddin?" I pointed toward the driveway. He glanced out the window over the kitchen sink. I knew he'd seen the truck by the way his jaw clamped tight, but he didn't say anything. Just nodded.

I faced the officers. "Did you bring back-up?"

Officer Gand smiled. "They were there when we arrived."

He and officer Vick went over to the couch. Officer Vick pulled out his notepad and paper.

"Tell us about Cameron Anderson."

I sat in the oversized high back next to the glass cabinets. "He's a good guy. I met him my first day of school. He showed me around. Helped me find my way."

Officer Gand gave officer Vick a look. It sent my heart into my stomach. I knew they were asking about him because he was missing. As were six others.

"Right. And what about his date for last night's dance. A Gemini Felix?"

"I saw Cameron with her at the dance, but I don't know her." I twined my fingers together, resting my hands in my lap.

Officer Vick gritted his teeth. "What about Ashley Hood?"

"I don't know who that is." I felt bad. I wished there was a way to tell them what happened. But I knew without a doubt that if they didn't think I was a crazed teenager making stuff up they would think I killed them.

"David West. Steven Pollock. Hannah Coolridge. Trisha Zamora." Officer Gand's voice raised with each name and his face became red with rage.

Each name felt like a knife in my heart. Their parents. Their families would be devastated. "No. Sorry. I'm new to the school and don't know a lot of people."

"When's the last time you saw Cameron?" Officer Vick asked.

"At the dance. Last night." I swallowed but kept my eyes on him.

"What time was that?" Officer Gand continued.

"The dance ended right at midnight. I saw him and a girl get into a limo. I'm guessing the girl was Gemini, but I don't know for sure. Then they drove away." Looking directly in Officer Gand's eyes, I continued, "I haven't seen them since." I leaned forward. "Are they okay?"

"We don't know. They're missing." His eyes pierced through me.

"They are teenagers and they went to a dance. Jasmine saw them at midnight. It's barely eight in the morning. What makes you think they're missing and not just holed up in a hotel room sleeping off last night's fun?" Laeddin asked, coming to stand next to my chair.

I appreciated his support.

"You have a point. And normally we wouldn't be worried. Except a groundskeeper found three purses with IDs inside and seven candles at the Harmony Grove Cemetery early this morning." Officer Vick's mouth formed a hard line.

"After calling the kids' parents and checking nearby hotels, we've verified they are in fact missing.

"That's terrible," I whispered, my pulse quickening.

"Yes, Jasmine. It is," Officer Vick agreed. "Any idea where they might've gone."

I shook my head. I honestly didn't know. "No. I don't."

Officer Vick sighed heavily. "For some reason I don't believe you."

"Are you accusing her of something?" Laeddin growled out.

"No sir. Of course not," Officer Gand said, but the words came out sarcastic.

"We will find out what happened and when we do, if it's discovered you had anything to do with it," Officer Vick pointed his pen at me, "we'll be sure to punish you to the full extent of the law."

Laeddin walked over to the door and yanked it open. "I'm going to have to ask you gentlemen to kindly – get out."

The policemen left. Officer Vick stomped down the stairs and to his car.

Officer Gand hesitated before getting into the squad car. "We just want to know what's going on and for some reason your name keeps coming up." He gave Laeddin a pointed look. "Sorry for any inconvenience."

"Fine," Laeddin said curtly.

We watched the officers drive away.

"Why do you think the National Guard is sitting in our front yard?" I asked.

CIRCUS TENT

LAEDDIN WENT out to speak with the uniformed men sitting in the green truck. They didn't say much except there was some "suspicious activity" in the area and advising us to "stay inside unless leaving was absolutely necessary". That was all the information they gave us.

I told Laeddin the truth about seeing the kids in the Harmony Grove Cemetery and I explained about Sharra. "What are we going to do?" I asked when he didn't say anything.

"You said she spoke and sprinkled red powder over the spots where they'd been?" Laeddin finally asked.

"Yes." I thought about what I'd seen and remembered another bit of information. "Also, before they disappeared, she blew yellow smoke in their faces."

"That sounds like something Sharra would do. She's always had a thing for the dramatic." He pulled a water bottle from the refrigerator and drank. Laeddin walked up the stairs. I didn't know where he was going but I followed.

When we reached his bedroom Laeddin opened the door and went inside. "When you talk to her, can you sense anything?"

"Sometimes," I said, unable to stop myself from checking out his room. It was neat as a pin and had been changed recently. It looked like his genie bottle after he'd revealed it to me all those weeks ago. It felt like a lifetime since I met him and made my first wish.

"Interesting." He picked up an old book from off a bedside table. "We need to go to Connecticut, but after what you told me, I want to make a quick trip back to my realm. I'm pretty sure I know exactly where to find the spell she placed on those kids. And if I can find out how she did it, perhaps I can reverse it."

"That's a great idea," I said, though I was sad he was leaving me again. "You think it's possible? Can you reverse the spell on Cameron and the others?" I forced myself not to hope.

"Perhaps. I'm going to check the histories. Find out. Okay?" He touched my shoulder kindly. "I'll be back soon and then we'll go by carpet to Connecticut." He smiled sweetly.

Why didn't he ask me to go with him? I sighed. "Please hurry."

"I will." He snapped his fingers and was gone.

I spun in a quick circle, knowing I should leave his room. His bed was made, the white comforter thick and billowy. The four-poster bed had mosquito netting draped across it, like a circus tent. Only the netting was white and easy to see through.

Without really thinking about what I was doing, I pushed back one of the curtains and climbed on his bed. His pillows smelled like him - oranges and exotic spices. I lay back, staring up at the ceiling.

My mind drifted. I went over what Laeddin had said. About the crown and how it could create life. I thought about what that meant. Generating new life from my DNA. Designing vampires like me. They would possess all seven magics and have wings. I wouldn't be alone. No longer a freak. No longer different.

I remembered the look on Troy's face when he heard. He'd been horrified. Terrified. Was I really that scary? Would dozens of original vampires really be that bad?

I really thought about it and tried to look at the question from his point of view.

They would possess a great deal of power, be nearly impossible to contain or kill or control.

And what if they chose evil? If Sharra got a hold of a vampire like I was and used it to do her bidding, well that would be really, really bad.

The skin on my arms prickled and my senses heightened. Someone was here. I'd been so deep in my thoughts, I'd allowed myself to be caught off guard.

I opened my eyes, thinking Laeddin had returned. "Hey, sorr - "

It wasn't Laeddin and there wasn't just one person either. There were seven. The same seven Sharra turned into Akuma last night.

"Cameron?" I sat up, scooting close to him, hoping I could reason with him. I was strong. I had my vampire abilities once again. And if I had to tear his head from his body to free him from whatever Sharra had done to him, I would, but I didn't want to.

His dark eyes gleamed. "All alone?"

"How perfect," Gemini said.

"She was right," another of the boys said.

"The Mistress will see you now," Cameron added, reaching out for me.

"Please, Cam. Don't do this. Please." I scooted out of his grasp, and using my vampire speed rushed by them all and went to the door.

Laeddin was trying to find a way to fix Cameron, to reverse whatever spell Sharra had put on him and the others.

"Get her," Gemini screamed.

The seven Akuma came at me at once. They were as fast as me and had their arms on me before I could flee.

So I fought, growling as I kicked Gemini, sending her flying backward and into my mom's dresser. A guy and girl grabbed my feet, pulling me toward them. I grabbed the guy by the hair and twisted off his head. His body fell back. I tossed his head. It caught in the netting and rolled on the bed. His surprised features frozen in place, until he disintegrated.

The girl screamed as though she were in pain. She grabbed hold of one of my arms. With my other I yanked her long ponytail and wound it around her neck, choking her. Then used my feet to push her body away. Her head came off with a pop.

I threw the head.

Someone ripped the netting and used it to bind my arms. I snarled, flashing my teeth and putting his head into a vice grip. But it was Cameron. "Cam," I whispered. "Please."

That few seconds I was distracted was all they needed to bind my hands and feet. They were as strong as me too. And the five remaining Akuma held me fast.

Whatever magic they were given infiltrated my system. Like a poison, it leaked into my veins. It was familiar. Immediately I knew why. It was my magic. She'd used some of my magic to create the Akuma.

I choked on a sob, slashing at the netting with my fangs. I tore a hole in it, but the five Akuma wouldn't be deterred. "Laeddin," I shouted, trying to think of a wish. One that wouldn't have consequences. One where I could get out of this mess and not hurt anyone else. It was so frustrating.

By the time I had a wish formulated I was no longer in Laeddin's room. I was somewhere else altogether.

It was dark and hot and smelled of brimstone.

Had they taken me to Hell?

"Not Hell, Jasmine." It was Sharra. "Welcome to my home. It isn't much, but after your mother nearly killed me, this was where I went to hide and to heal. What do you think?"

I shuddered. "I wish - "

Invisible hands stronger than steel clamped over my mouth and held my tongue. "No. No. No wishing for you, pretend vampire. Laeddin will come, but it must be of his own choice and not because you wished him here."

I glared. There was still another way. I could wish with my mind. Maybe? Couldn't I?" It wouldn't hurt to try. I closed my eyes.

I wish, I thought.

But my mind inexplicably softened, like butter melting in the hot sun. I couldn't remember what I'd been about to wish for. I opened my eyes.

Sharra stood in front of me her dark eyes gleaming with evil mischief. Her lips red as blood. Her skin white as snow.

"No thinking for you either." She was so beautiful it almost hurt to look at her for too long, but she was also aging. I saw the signs. Before my mom thought she destroyed Sharra, the vampire had wanted my mom's body for herself. To use for another hundred years.

Sharra stepped back and I noticed what she was wearing. It was made of velvet. The collar was high in the back and low in the front, exposing an immense amount of cleavage. The bodice was black and laced down to her waist. The sleeves were long as was the skirt. It was black and violet. Her black hair had been piled high on her head.

And my wings? My beautiful black wings cascaded down her back like inky waterfalls.

Tears stung my eyes. "Why are you doing this?" My head lolled to one side and I took in the room.

There wasn't much to it.

Large.

Black.

But it sparkled like diamonds.

What really caught my attention were the hundreds of Akuma packed inside. There were humans, elves, trolls, fairies, unicorns, and so many more.

"What do you intend to do with them all?" The words slurred out of my mouth.

"Whatever I want," she said slyly. "Why don't you sleep, false vampire?" She opened her mouth and blew. Yellow smoke drifted into my face. I tried to hold my breath, but it still went up my nose and penetrated my mouth. I felt it in my pores too. It smelled like sulfur and vanilla, not a good combination. "When you wake, you'll be all mine."

UNSTOPPABLE

I WOKE to the sounds of hooting and hollering and stomping feet and whistling. It was like a stadium full of spectators at a football game. I kept my eyes closed, trying to figure out what was happening without giving away the fact that I was aware.

"Laeddin, so nice of you to come."

My heart raced and my mouth went dry. Laeddin was here. Sharra said he would come, and he did.

"Release Jasmine now, Sharra," Laeddin said.

"Of course, genie. I will. Just as soon as you give me what I want."

"And what is that?"

"Your power, of course," Sharra said matter-of-factly.

The room went wild again.

"Why would you want it? You have great power already. I can feel it." Laeddin whispered.

"Awwww, did you hear that?" Sharra glanced around at the Akuma who laughed and jeered. She went on, "While that may be true, I don't have enough. With your powers I'll be unstoppable."

Laeddin had incredible power. I knew that. And so much more. As quickly as it came, the fuzziness in my brain cleared up. As though my original vampire DNA fought and destroyed whatever magic she placed on me. My mind sharpened and I was myself once more. I would've sighed in relief, but it was too soon. I needed to figure out a way to save Laeddin and get us out of here.

"Fine," Laeddin said. "Take it. As long as you set Jasmine free."

The cheers in the room became louder than ever.

"That is my promise," Sharra said. The mocking grew.

I chanced a peek at the room and saw Laeddin. He had no emotion on his face. He was being led to an altar made of sparkling black stone by two Akuma.

I watched as several more Akuma forced him onto his back on the altar where black ropes appeared and bound his arms, legs, and head.

"He's ready," an Akuma said. It hurt to realize it was Cameron. He'd been right to stay away from me, but it hadn't done him any good. Even after all I sacrificed to save him, he still became a demon.

Sharra went over to the altar, her eyes focused on Laeddin. "I first realized you hid in that cave in Sharra around the same time Jasmine was born. It didn't take long to recognize the opportunity that had been laid in my path. Having the two of you together was fate. Not yours, but mine. At that moment I knew you would die and give me your power. And that you would do so willingly, in order to save her. How sweet that you love the little vampire, especially since she doesn't return it." Sharra glanced at me. Our eyes locked. Hers were filled with surprise. Mine I'm sure were full of fear.

I quickly closed my eyes. Too late.

"It seems Jasmine has wakened. Just in time. Bring her over."

Cameron and Gemini rolled my iron prison that looked like a lion's cage over next to Laeddin. Sharra smiled. It almost looked genuine.

"You will witness what it means to sacrifice for the one you love. Then I'll take your body and become the vampire I was before your idiot mother came along. What do you think?"

I opened my eyes, pretending my brain was still mush and forced myself to have an empty expression. One totally opposite of the way I was feeling." Oh, silly me. You can't think." She laughed. The Akuma joined in. Then her features became deadly serious. "Let's begin." A silver dagger with red markings appeared in Sharra's hand. She focused her attention on Laeddin, raising the dagger high above her head.

As she began to speak words in a language I didn't understand, the dagger glowed red, vibrating and shaking almost like it wanted to be free of her grasp.

Sharra's words grew louder.

The red radiance on the blade got bigger so that it consumed her hands and arms up to her elbows.

I glanced at Laeddin. He was focused on my face, his features still empty of emotion.

The cheering and clapping of the Akuma found a rhythm, like a bass drum keeping time to a beat only they could hear. The room shook. Black sparkles rained down from the ceiling.

The end was coming. The very air crackled with its imminence. If Sharra took Laeddin's power, there would be nothing to stop her.

I wanted to give Laeddin some comfort, tell him everything was going to be okay, but I couldn't because it would've been a lie.

Sharra's chant rose over the roaring crowd. Her entire body was surrounded by the red light.

A sob tore through my chest and I babbled for her to stop. She didn't listen and I wasn't surprised. She had what she wanted and would take it without remorse.

"Jasmine." Laeddin said my name so quietly I was surprised I heard it. But I did, like he'd spoken it in my ear.

I gave him my full attention. Tears leaked onto my cheeks. I knew they would be red again, but I didn't care.

"I love you," he said. The words penetrated through the noise and deep into my soul.

A sob ripped from my throat. He wasn't saying the words out of fear or because he was sad. He meant them. I could see it. Feel it in my heart and soul.

"Laeddin." I loved him too, though it wasn't the kind of love like my parents possessed. Still, it was strong. I wanted to protect him and would do anything to keep him safe. But what?

Laeddin smiled. It was small, secret. Meant just for me. "It's okay. Everything will be fine."

I smiled back, appreciating the lies he spoke, wishing we could have more time.

And that's when the idea came.

There was an easy solution.

Make a wish, my mind whispered.

It was supposed to be saved and used for capturing an Akuma. That was what we all planned. But the plan wouldn't matter if Sharra killed Laeddin.

The idea of no longer having him in my life struck deep.

It was as though I was being asked to give up my wings for him again. A new opportunity. If I had the chance to do it again, would I make a different decision? Would I give up Laeddin and keep my wings?

The answer was a resounding no. I would make the same choice over and over.

Tonight I would save him - like I did before. He was worth it.

I would make a wish!

I didn't have time to debate how to word my wish. Nor did I have the option to ask Laeddin for help. There would be consequences, but I couldn't debate what they might be. My only option was to save Laeddin. The knife in Sharra's hands was on its descent. If I didn't act now, it would be too late.

"I wish Sharra would use the dagger on herself instead of Laeddin." My words cut through the Akuma's noise and went straight into Sharra.

Laeddin blinked, startled.

Sharra's mouth fell open as she faced me, death in her eyes.

Immediately the knife changed course. It no longer headed downward but angled and went straight into Sharra's chest. The sound, like a blade forced into a honeydew melon, rang through the room.

An eerie hush fell over the Akuma.

Sharra gasped, shock permeating her features. "What - " She swallowed, looking down at the blade. It was buried deep in her chest. Her eyes filled with pain. " - have you done?"

The bands on Laeddin's wrists, ankles and neck loosened. He jumped off the altar.

The red light glimmering around Sharra grew bigger. I didn't know what I'd done exactly, and I didn't want to find out.

"You haven't seen the last of me Jasmine. You can bet on that!"

I swallowed, knowing I wounded her, but hadn't ended her.

"Let's get out of here." I held out my hands for Laeddin.

He took them, clutching them tightly. And we were no longer in Sharra's peculiar kingdom.

We were home.

89 DAYS UNTIL TOTAL DARKNESS

FIVE DAYS ago I made my second wish.

It was that Sharra would use her magical dagger on herself instead of Laeddin.

She had to obey and Laeddin and I escaped her lair.

That's the thing about the genie's magic, it's more powerful than the most powerful vampire ever and that's why Sharra wanted it.

We returned to my home in the human realm and hoped she was dead.

It didn't take long to know that hope was in vain.

My wish didn't even destroy the Akuma.

The days continued getting darker.

Akuma kept coming.

On top of that was something else.

A pestilence had fallen over all realms.

To most creatures, they appeared to be nothing more than large grasshoppers, but with my eyes - original vampire eyes - I saw the truth.

Not only were the bugs eating their way through all the world's crops, they were eating their way through all creatures as well.

When bitten, regardless of gender or species, they became Akuma.

Sharra's lackeys.

The chayot got involved and tried to smite the pestilence away. It slowed the bugs down, but didn't kill them off.

My aunt Cindy as well as those at the Seven Magics Academy were working on a spell to rid the realms of the awful bugs. Nothing worked yet.

Abrea, my pixilette friend had returned to Sharra in order to help keep the realm from becoming a wasteland.

Since pixilettes were in charge of the changing seasons as well as plant life there, she had her hands full.

National news in the human realm, which continued to post the countdown to total darkness, was filled with reports of crazed animals and even more demented humans and supernaturals alike.

Several church groups believed the world was in the midst of the apocalypse. I could see their point.

It was my fault. Again.

The plethora of Akuma and the pestilence were consequences of my wish.

I saved Laeddin and pissed off the oldest and vilest vampire the world had ever known.

Of course Laeddin was angry with me.

Grateful too.

I felt that from him.

But mostly he was mad.

Could I blame him? No.

Would I make a different choice given the opportunity? Not in the slightest.

That left us at a stalemate, a barely talking or tolerating each other impasse. But at least we were working together.

We had to. Laeddin still believed that if I possessed all five pieces of the crown, I would have enough power to destroy Sharra once and for all and, most importantly, have my wings and my magic returned to me.

I wanted to believe he was right, but I wasn't sure.

My confidence was waning, and I felt alone.

I trudged on though.

At the moment, Laeddin and I were in Guilford, Connecticut, at the house of Henry Whitfield.

Well, more specifically, we were under the house, in one of the many tunnels used in the eighteen hundreds.

It was our third day searching and I wasn't thrilled about it. The tunnels were not sturdy. Quite the opposite, actually. They were crumbling. Some even caved in.

Laeddin used his genie magic to strengthen them, which helped, but I was still terrified to be so deep below the ground.

We learned rather quickly some of the tunnels led to rooms while others let to more tunnels. We hadn't travelled them all yet because we had to meticulously search every crevice, even dig.

Inside some rooms we found hidden treasures, including money, buttons, and even letters to loved ones.

I was in another of the seemingly endless rooms, sulking. I was tired. Worn out. And our search felt hopeless.

Laeddin had left me alone, sensing my frustration and went to search further down in another room.

I was on my knees, digging around the edges of a rusty box, knowing it was probably just another blasted button collection.

The room smelled like the others too - like wet dirt and mustiness.

"You love the genie, don't you?" I jumped at the sound of Christopher's voice cutting through the silence.

"Of course I do," I snapped, my heart racing.

The hunter had scared me.

"I understand. And what about me? And Troy? And - " He paused.

I brushed some hair that had fallen from my high ponytail out of my face and looked up.

"Have I missed anyone?" His hands rested on his hips as he studied me.

I glared before yanking the box from the ground, flinging damp dirt everywhere, including my eyes.

They watered from the pain. "Damn it." I tried to wipe at them with a clean portion of my arms and finally resorted to flipping the under part of my shirt up and using it to dab my eyes.

Christopher knelt beside me. "I'm sorry. I'm being insensitive." His features softened. "And I sense you're thirsty. Go on. Take what you need. That's why I'm here."

I didn't say a word. Just yanked his black golf shirt away from his neck and sank my fangs in deep.

He gasped, grabbing hold of me under the arms and pulling me close.

I readjusted so I had a firm hold. His amazing blood flowed quick, filling my mouth and throat. I sighed at the instant rejuvenation.

Who needed a nap when there was hunter blood?

After several strong pulls, I sighed again, but I didn't want to let him go.

In his arms I felt safe, at peace even.

He seemed to sense that and wrapped his arms around me.

I retracted my fangs but didn't move my mouth. Just left it there in the crook of his warm neck.

"You're going to be fine, Jasmine. I promise," he cooed, rubbing my back.

It felt wonderful and a sense of relief simmered across my skin.

It was then I realized I was crying. His neck was wet, soaked with my tears. I couldn't respond though. Just sniffled and nodded.

"I mean it. You'll figure it out. If there's one thing I've learned over the years, it's that the good guys always win."

"Thanks, Chris," I mumbled.

"Hey, Jasmine. I - "

I turned toward the sound of Laeddin's voice just as he walked in the room.

In one hand he held what appeared to be dirty silk scarf. It fell from his hands when he saw me in Christopher's arms.

"What the jinn?" His features contorted in rage.

I untangled myself from the Hunter, watching him smirk before he vanished.

"What?" I asked, going back to the rusty box I found.

It was obvious Laeddin expected an explanation, but he wasn't going to get one, not unless he asked.

Laeddin pick up the dirty material he'd dropped.

"This is all I've found today." He sounded defeated, like he'd given up. And that wasn't good. He was always so hopeful.

"What is it?" I didn't look over but continued to work on opening the box made of thick, old metal.

"Someone's scarf," he returned, kneeling beside me. "What about you? What did you find?" His words came out soft.

I knew he loved me. He told Sharra as much. I loved him too, but our love though I wanted it to be romantic just wasn't.

Laeddin intended to ignore what he just witnessed.

I was okay with that. Actually more than okay. I didn't want to explain myself to him. Not again. I was tired of it.

The latch on the box had a small, corroded lock holding it in place. I crushed the metal in my fist and flipped the lid open.

A strange scent immediately struck my nose and I held my breath a moment.

The interior of the box was filled with jade-colored petals.

They were thicker than those of a regular bloom and felt like the shell of a pea pod.

"What is it?" I asked, reaching inside. They were soft, like the petals on a freshly picked flower.

"No, don't," Laeddin hissed, smacking my hand away, but it was too late. His movements caused several of the petals to sail out of the box and onto the ground.

My hand brushed against a piece of broken metal with a large gem encrusted at the top. It sparkled with red and white diamonds.

I thought.

"Don't touch it," Laeddin said, closing the box.

Before my eyes, the petals that'd fallen onto the dirt floor began to burrow down and disappear. In their place black smoke billowed up. It was thin at first but began to thicken and take shape.

Laeddin took hold of my arm and yanked me back against the farthest wall.

"What's happening?" The thick smoke touched the ceiling and started to fill out.

First a head and shoulders, followed by a torso, and legs. Hands and feet came after that. And finally features appeared on its face.

"It's a man?" I asked it like a question, squinting. Like that would allow me to understand what it was I looked at.

"I was stupid. I should've known they were real and not just a fairytale ploy meant to keep treasure hunters from searching." He blew out his breath. "We shouldn't be here. He is one of the legendary five assassins."

"Cool."

"Not cool if he tries to kill you."

I made a clucking noise with my mouth. Since I had my vampire powers back and drank from Christopher, I was stronger than ever. The assassin couldn't hurt me. Aside from that was the knowledge that if I wakened one of the elven assassins, then I'd found a piece of the crown.

VAMPIRE HUNTER DIET

THE CREATURE STOOD SO the top of his head nearly reached the ceiling.

He opened his eyes. They were the same color as the flower petals. "Who dares awaken me from my slumber?"

Strapped to his back were two swords. He was covered from head to toe in a uniform that reminded me of a ninja. The only part of him showing was his eyes. Even his head was covered in a thick black hood.

Remembering my upbringing, I cleared my throat. "Good sir, my name is Jasmine." I gave him a small curtsey.

If my mom could see me now, I thought.

"I've come to claim the piece of crown you guard," I went on.

His eyes started to glow. "That is not possible, Jasmine. If you try to take it, I'll be forced to destroy you."

Crap! I glanced back at Laeddin. He shook his head, took hold of my hand, and we were suddenly back at my house.

"Why?" I pulled out of his grasp. "What if he moves it? Or worse, actually destroys it?"

"He won't. He can't," Laeddin said, shaking his head.

"Are you sure?" I was so angry I wanted to punch something. Him, actually. I really wanted to punch him. Arrogant genie jerk.

"Of course I am." He went to the refrigerator and grabbed an apple. "Want one?"

"No."

"Oh, that's right. You're on a vampire Hunter diet." He slammed the door causing the condiment bottles to rattle. "How do you think your mom and dad are going to feel about that when they find out?"

I glared. "I'm not going to tell them. Are you?" The memory of the conversation I heard between my mom and dad while still out of it came to mind. Did they already know?

"I should, but no," Laeddin said. "I am your servant. Even if I wanted to, I couldn't." He sipped some water. "I'm going back to Debania. I need to find out how to kill the assassins."

"You don't know already?" I asked, my words dripping with sarcasm. Seemed like that should've been high on the priority list.

His shoulders dropped and he closed his eyes. "Not yet." His voice was barely above the whisper. "I have failed you."

"Laeddin." I was tired of fighting, tired of feeling on edge around him, and beyond tired of his anger.

He rubbed a hand over his face, and my eyes were drawn to the tattooed cuffs around his wrists. Proof he was still my servant. Not a man of the world, but a slave to my whims. That must be awful.

My soul pled with me to release him. Even the words, Laeddin, I wish you free, came into my mind. But I couldn't utter them. My mouth wouldn't open. Guilt washed over me as I realized what a selfish person I was. Death would probably be better than being tied to me. I sighed. "I'm so sorry. Can we start over? Can you forgive my choices and accept that I did what I thought was best?" Tears pressed against the back of my eyelids, but I held them at bay.

He opened his eyes. "There's nothing to forgive." As he spoke, he came over. "But understand this. I don't need saving. If I die, I die. You've already sacrificed enough. Okay?" His hands rested on my arms. "I'm sorry I've been so irritating, Princess."

I swallowed, forcing myself not to start sobbing. "Okay."

He seemed relieved and I was glad of that, but if it came right down to it, I would use my final wish to save him again. It seemed sacrificing for those I cared about was in my DNA.

"Good." He pulled me into a hug.

I resisted at first, but finally allowed myself to hug him back. He smelled delicious as usual, especially his blood. It wasn't nearly as tempting as it had been when we first met, but I still desired it.

Laeddin's chest was taut and warm. I snuggled in. He rested his cheek against the top of my head.

We stayed like that a long time. I allowed my thoughts to wander. My heart felt like a Ping-Pong ball or a yo-yo. I kept going back and forth between Troy and Laeddin. And don't forget Christopher, my mind whispered. What was wrong with me? Until a week ago I believed Troy was the guy for me.

But he was gone. Without even saying good-bye. The reason I knew where went was because of Sharra. I'd been with her and overheard Professor Pops telling Troy he found a lead. I understood why he left. Troy had told me about Jesse. The two of them were like brothers. And Jesse had been sucked into another realm. I got it, but he could've texted. Especially since the last time I'd seen him he was a jerk about me getting the crown. I intended to use it to destroy Sharra and get my wings back, but there was more. Laeddin had said I could use the crown to create more vampires like me - like I'd been. An original vampire possessed of wings and magic. Then I wouldn't be alone. But Troy thought that was a bad idea.

And then there was Laeddin. He granted me my most desired wish, became my friend, and I briefly thought even more. But since our kiss he'd been cold, and mostly angry.

I sighed, secretly wishing things could be different.

Laeddin cleared his throat. "Your hair smells like mildew," he said into my hair and we both laughed.

I stepped back and tucked my hands into my back pockets. "I guess I should shower."

He nodded. "Will you be okay while I'm gone?" He held me at arm's length and examined my face. "I shouldn't be long."

"Why don't I come with you?" I asked, hoping our moment of peace could continue.

He shook his head. "You need a shower and some sleep."

At his words I was suddenly tired. Not physically, but mentally and emotionally. "Fine but hurry back."

He was gone before I finished speaking.

After I showered, I dressed in pajamas, climbed into bed, and fell asleep as soon as my eyes closed.

FOOLISH GIRL

"YOU DIDN'T LET me kill the genie and now you're going to suffer more than you believed possible. Even at this very moment Ariel is dying or dead. See?" Pictures of dozens of Akuma attacking Ariel in a strange city appeared and I watched while they ripped her apart.

"Noooooo!" I screamed and sat up, opening my eyes. I was in my room. Sweat dampened the sheets. I climbed out of bed and went to the window. How could I find out if what Sharra had shown me was the truth? Without my wings and my magic I couldn't just return to my land. A shadow crawled across the yard and I jumped back, frightened.

"Laeddin," I whispered and waited, my mind unable to let go of what I'd seen happening to Ariel.

It wasn't Laeddin, but Gatsby. The cat suddenly appeared outside my window. His yellow eyes stared through the glass.

"Let me in, vampire," he said, lifting his paw and patting at the window.

It was odd the cat could talk, even weirder that he seemed to know so much, but beyond that, he was adorable, a shorthaired gray cat with yellow eyes.

"Gatsby," I said, taking a deep breath to slow down my heart. After unlocking the clasp, I slid up the window.

"Hi yourself." He sounded grumpy.

"What's wrong?" The air had a slight chill, but there was no wind. It was crisp and smelled of roses. I stood back as the cat jumped off the sill, onto the floor and up onto my bed.

Once he was settled, I came over. "Gatsby." He hadn't been around much lately.

"Nothing." He closed his eyes. "Have you found the first piece of the crown yet?"

"We did," I said, and paused. It still irked me Laeddin hadn't let me at least try to claim it.

Gatsby opened one eye and stared. "And? Where is it?"

I clasped my hands together, frustrated. It seemed unlikely the cat could help, but still -

"Well?" he added, smacking his lips together.

"We weren't able to take it. There was an assassin sworn to protect the piece. He appeared and said he would have to kill me if I tried.

Gatsby snorted. "So why didn't you take the assassin out? He was created to protect it, but that doesn't mean you couldn't have destroyed him."

That was what I thought. "Well, Mr. Smarty Pants, I didn't know how. Neither did Laeddin. He's actually back in his realm right now trying to find a way." I sat on the bed beside him.

"It's easy," he said, licking one of his front paws.

"Really? How then?" I turned on the bed, crossing my arms and debated whether to share my dream about Ariel. He closed his eyes and I blew out my breath and decided just to blurt the information about my grandmother. "Ariel is in trouble. I think she might be dying."

That got the cat's attention. "Why would you say that?"

I explained what I'd seen from Sharra. Without a word he hopped off the bed and went to the window. "Come on." He jumped. Not down, like one would expect from a cat, but out, like he could fly.

"Gatsby." I ran over to make sure he was all right.

Instead of a cat there was a gigantic golden dragon. The force of his enormous wings beating against the air blew my hair back. He landed and then looked up, blowing smoke at me. "Well what are you waiting for?"

The smell of brimstone filled my nose and I guessed it came from the dragon. Something about his eyes was familiar. They reminded me a little of Troy's, but they were too bright and too yellow - like the cat's.

"What did you do with Gatsby?" I asked, thinking I already knew.

He shook his head, flapped his wings once before they settled at his side, and curled his tail around his body, the same way Gatsby did with his tail. "I am Gatsby, you foolish girl."

"No you aren't. Gatsby is a cat." He looked like Abernathy, the dragon. The same one who also happened to be my aunt Cindy's dad.

He opened his mouth. Fire built in the back of his throat before he roared. Then shook his head again. "In cat form I am called Gatsby, but I have many forms, including that of a dragon, in which case I am called Abernathy. Now get down here and let's go. We haven't much time if you want to save your grandmother."

"It is you." I studied him a moment longer, feeling only a little weird. Had my parents asked him to spy on me too?

"Hurry up." His head was bigger than my window, but he brought one eye down, so it was level with me. "Don't make me ask you again."

I could've tried to climb on his back from my window, but without my wings I didn't have the same confidence. The realization shocked me, but I pushed the thought aside and dashed down the stairs.

Outside, I locked the back door and took the steps down into the back yard.

"About time," he said, and lowered his head. "Climb on. You can use my tail."

As he spoke, I used my vampire abilities to traverse his tail and get on his back the same way I did with Troy. Situated in front of his wings, near his neck, I patted his head.

"You act like you've done this before." He stood and with one giant beat we were in the air.

"I have," I responded without thinking. "With your son, Troy."

"I can't believe it," he said with a growl.

Was he upset I took a ride on Troy? For some reason I thought of the dragon deep within the sea. The one who granted Sharra and Silindra a wish to see their parents. That thought sent me on a tangent. Were sea dragon and genie power connected? It made sense. "Why can't you believe it?" I asked, curious but also nervous. Had Troy broken a rule?

"Never mind." He clamped his mouth shut and I knew that was the end of our discussion about him and his son.

As we sailed through the air, my hair whipped back, out of my face. Flying was like a little piece of heaven.

"Jasmine, I'm not upset with you. It's just Troy isn't supposed to be revealing himself in the human realm. Period. Between the chayot helping the humans and their continued technological advances, I worry," he said.

"I guess," I said, not bothering to state the obvious. If it wasn't okay for Troy to shift here, then why was it okay for him?

He snorted, sending a large puff of smoke into the air. "Good. Now hang on." Abernathy jolted forward and upward and the same time. Like a rocket he soared higher and higher into the night sky. I held on to the tendrils of his thick mane and forced myself not to scream.

A GIANT WHALE

SO HIGH UP, the stars were bright and beautiful, and amazing.

A coil of sadness snuck its way around my heart. Even though I tried to push it away, the truth was I missed my wings, missed them more than I ever believed possible.

Like my pinky fingers, they seemed like nothing more than a small addition, one I could live without, maybe even do better without, but that wasn't the case.

My wings weren't just a small addition. They were a part of me.

Without them I didn't feel whole.

"How long will it take us to get there?" I shouted against the wind, knowing he was flying us to Mizu.

A deep rumble filled his throat. "No need to yell, vampire."

"Sorry," I hollered again.

Without warning, Abernathy dove. We were over an ocean and I realized we travelled a great distance in a very short amount of time. The dragon picked up speed and we went faster and faster.

"What are you doing?" I asked, suddenly terrified, bracing myself against the impending collision with the water.

"Hold on tight."

I didn't say anything, just closed my eyes and tightened my grip on Abernathy's mane like my life depended on it.

When Abernathy's head hit the water, I felt it. There was a whooshing sound and I opened my eyes. A bubble surrounded him, which included me. I knew I didn't need air to breathe and I figured it was highly unlikely Abernathy needed it either.

As a giant whale swam by, I realized the bubble had more to do with keeping away possible issues than anything else.

I'd never been underwater before. The experience was surreal. Abernathy took us deep and swam fast, but I caught sight of several schools of fish, dolphins, whales, and even and group of hammerhead sharks. In no time, the city of Mizu came into view. A gigantic bubble surrounded the structures. It was like a giant light up snow globe at the bottom of the ocean.

"This is Ariel's home?" I asked, curious about how far we'd come.

"It is. I thought that was obvious." Abernathy almost seemed like he was in a good mood.

"Which ocean are we in?" The answer might let me know where we were.

"Oh, interesting." He turned back and winked at me with one of his gigantic yellow eyes. "You are a curious girl."

I smiled at the almost compliment. "Are you going to tell me?"

He thought a moment. "I guess according to the current maps of the world it would be the Indian Ocean, about a hundred miles south of Africa."

"Cool." I wanted to be more excited about seeing the city under the sea, but I was nervous about my grandmother.

"Not really. It's actually quite warm this close to the Earth's core."

I knew he was being flippant and wasn't going to argue with him about the slang I used.

The closer we came, the easier it was to see something wasn't right about the city. "Hurry," I urged, jabbing my knees into his neck.

Under different circumstances I think Abernathy might have fought me on my comment, but his jovial spirits gave way to tension. I felt it within his scales. He lowered his head, said some words I couldn't understand, and we went through the bubble and into Mizu.

Orange, red, and yellow flames licked the sky and smoke swirled around us and pushed against the bubble. Like a deranged magical fire burned. The sky rained gray ash. Buildings crumbled, shaking the world as the strange rocks crashed to the ground. If I'd ever stopped to consider what Hell might look like, I would've imagined the scenery around us, except it would be less of a reverse fishbowl and more a vast, endless wasteland.

"What should we do," I shouted. Different species and creatures screamed and ran in every direction. It was pandemonium. I didn't know where to look or who to help first.

"They're running from Akuma I can't believe her magic even reached here." He paused a moment in shock. Then continued, "We must find Ariel." He tilted his head as though listening, then circled until he landed on the roof of a building still mostly intact. "She's three floors down," he said. His weight caused the floor to shudder. I clung to him, my hands grasping at his warm golden scales.

When the building settled, I slid off Abernathy's back and landed on the shell-encrusted roof. The floor shook, sending bits everywhere and I put my hands out to steady myself and took a moment to search my surroundings.

From the building directly across from us I noticed a large shadow beginning to take shape. It reminded me of - "But that can't be," I whispered. Aquamarine eyes glowed from the wispy body and a double sword formed on his back. The assassin from the tunnels? "Not possible." I took a step toward it, squinting, unable to believe it was real, that it wasn't some trick of the thick smoke. "Abernathy?"

"I doubt this building will hold for long. Hurry up vampire!"

He was right. I didn't have time for what I thought I saw. Ignoring my fear, I rolled my shoulders and nodded. "Okay, but - the others." The citizens of Mizu were in agony; their cries seemed to crawl inside my head.

"Rescue Ariel and we'll go from there," Abernathy's voice boomed making the floor shake again.

"Got it." I ran to the shimmery door made of shells and tugged the handle. It was locked, but I crushed it in my hand, breaking it as I yanked open the door. Darkness engulfed me and the smell of death was strong. Thankfully I didn't need light to see. I ran down the stairs, listening for signs of Akuma.

When I got to the correct floor, I opened the door and ran into a group of Akuma. I knew because of their scent. It was like death mixed in with formaldehyde trying to be covered by potpourri. Not pleasant, not at all.

"Hey, little girl." A male that looked like a cross between a human and a sea horse grabbed my arm. He drew back his lips to show me his teeth in a growl. I punched him in the throat and waited for him to collapse. When he was on the floor I jumped over his body. "Ariel!"

"In here. Please help."

Several other Akuma appeared in the hall. One had a head like an octopus with eight tentacles surrounding its neck. Another had a crab face with pinchers where the ears should be. I saw an eel and a shark Akuma too.

Never in my short life had I been more grateful for the training my parents put me through as a child. I went through them quickly, knocking them down, and whirling out of the way before they could get their hands on me. Then I kicked open the door to the room where I heard my grandmother's voice. She was tied to a spindly chair.

"Ariel." I just couldn't bring myself to call her Grandma. I didn't know her well enough. "Are you okay?" With my bare hands I shredded the rope the color of seaweed.

"I think so. As long as she doesn't come back." Ariel rubbed her wrists.

"She who?" I asked, hugging her when she stood.

"I'm not sure who she is." She buried her face in my neck. "How did you get here?"

"A dragon," I said.

She straightened. Tears stained her cheeks. "I'm glad you came,"

she said, swiping a piece of hair off my face.

"Me too."

"You two are so sweet." The voice was Sharra's. I'd know it anywhere.

Turning, I gritted my teeth. Angry fear shot through my gut. I had my vampire abilities, but I didn't have my wings. She'd stolen them from me. In fact she was wearing them. Flaunting them. Ugh. I wanted them back!

"Get behind me," Ariel whispered. Even though she didn't know me well, her protective instinct came out. A moment ago, she seemed weak. Now she looked like a warrior princess.

I shook my head. "No." My grandmother may look twenty, but she wouldn't stand a chance against Sharra. "Let me handle her." I wouldn't stand a chance either, but I had to try. So I faced her, pushing Ariel behind me. "Why are you here?" My eyes went to the place where I watched her stab herself with the silver dagger. If I hadn't watched it happen with my own eyes, I'd never be able to tell she'd been mortally wounded.

"All realms will be mine, including this little city. And I did promise I would destroy everything Snow White loves. That includes this one." She shrugged gracefully. "In a few hours there won't be anything left but my loyal Akuma." She raised her hand and opened it. Glittering red dust appeared on her fingers. She lowered her head, pursed her lips, preparing to blow it in my face.

There was no way I could move fast enough to get away. I'd almost resigned myself to what would happen. I would become Akuma as well. But suddenly the walls began to tremble and buckle. Debris rained from above.

"What?" Sharra glanced up.

I grabbed Ariel around the waist, picked her up like a rag doll, and ran her to the door. All around us it sounded as though something gigantic was tearing through the building. Suddenly, the roof vanished, and I turned in time to see Abernathy's large head appear. Relieved, I took a breath.

"You!" Sharra's already pale face went deathly white.

Smoke curled out of his mouth and nose. "Guard your grandmother, Jasmine," Abernathy growled, focusing one golden eye on me.

"I will." I ran with her into the hallway just as Abernathy released a stream of fire. I didn't see it, but I felt the heat even from a distance.

"Stupid dragon! It's going to be fun watching Arthur destroy you," Sharra screamed. The air crackled with electricity.

Abernathy sent another wave of fire into the room. Flames licked the doorframe and I tucked Ariel into my chest.

The dragon's head appeared above me. "She's gone. Let's leave before she returns."

I ran with Ariel back into the room as Abernathy forced his body down far enough that we could climb on.

I stepped on his tail and shimmied up onto his back. Then held out my hand for Ariel to take. Once the two of us were situated, Abernathy jumped through the hole in the roof and out into the hazy sky.

DEATH HAPPENS

WE SCANNED the burning city of Mizu for survivors. If only there was a way to change them back.

"They've all been turned, but I know how to help them," Ariel shouted, seeming to read my mind.

I faced Ariel, pushing several pieces of hair out of my face. "You do?"

"Yes," she said, her blue eyes glistened with determination. "We need to get to my office. Head north, Abernathy. Go that way!"

"No, we must leave, Ariel. Once Sharra has turned a creature into an Akuma, there is no going back. The soul has been burned out of them, leaving only a shell. At this point they are nothing more than Sharra's puppets. They do her bidding without conscience, remorse, or understanding."

"That can't be true. I have a spell that can reverse even the most - " Ariel started, but Abernathy cut her off.

"I cannot allow you to remain here a moment longer," he growled, sending a stream of fire into the bubble protecting Mizu. The fire wasn't like the normal red and orange flames. It was gold, black, and blue and it melted an enormous hole that blackened and burned around the edges despite all the water that unexpectedly began pouring inside.

"What are you doing? You're going to kill everyone," Ariel shouted, trying to jump off Abernathy.

"No. You can't." I held her fast.

"They're already dead, Ariel. I swear it," Abernathy said with a loud roar.

I started to shiver. Not from the cold or being wet, but because of all the death roaring in the city below.

It's my fault.

I did this.

It's my fault.

My grandmother cried behind me, her head resting against my back. I felt so bad and wished I could crunch myself up in a ball, become invisible, even disappear. Not from those around me, no. Then I would still be stuck with the memories of the consequences of my action, my stupid wish. No, I wanted to disappear from existence. Maybe then the world could heal and become whole again.

I peered over Abernathy's side. Mizu looked like a snow globe someone had shaken and dropped. "I'm so sorry," I said over and over, patting Ariel's hands.

Using his magic, he left Mizu another way. I turned back a moment, watching the water flood into the city. It was heartbreaking on many levels. Thousands of creatures were destroyed because of Sharra.

Guilt washed over me thick and heavy.

Abernathy had said their souls were burned out of them. An image of Camden came to mind. He'd been my friend. It seemed that befriending me was deadly, just as he said. My heart ached for him and for all creatures who became Akuma because of my wish.

How could I fix the mess I'd made? I didn't know, but somehow, I had to figure it out, and put the human realm back the way it once was.

His magic was strong. Stronger even than mine had been when I had my wings, maybe even stronger than Sharra's. If that were true, then why hadn't he done more to stop the evil in the world? The dragon seemed willing to help, but only to a certain degree and that bothered me. Could he destroy Sharra permanently? And if so, why hadn't he done it already?

It was several minutes before we exited the water and then another several more and we were back at my house, the house that'd once been my mom's.

Abernathy landed in the back yard.

Ariel climbed off and fell to the ground, crumbling into the fetal position. Her cries growing louder by the moment.

Abernathy glanced over at her, then at me. "If there was a way to save those citizens, I would've done it, but there wasn't. There isn't. Understand?"

I nodded, numb.

"Sharra wants to break you so you will give her your body willingly. She wants to rule all the realms. He shook his head. Smoke plumed from his nostrils. "Destroying Mizu accomplished two things. It showed you her power, and let you see her with your wings. She cares nothing for those she destroyed. All she cares about is power." He took a step toward me and lay down so I could see both golden eyes. "She means to kill your family and everyone you love. And she'll kill anyone who stands in her way."

I shook my head, even though I knew he was right. Of course he was.

Abernathy went on, "It's a sad shame, but there isn't time for you to give up or back down or start feeling sorry for yourself. Guilt has no place in you. Understand?

I tried to swallow. My eyes seemed dried open and they felt scratchy.

"You need to be strong," he went on. "You need to let Sharra see you aren't going away and you will not let her win without a fight." He snapped his jaws shut, sending spittle flying.

He seemed to know what I was feeling. "That city - " I began. "Do you know how many thousands were down there? And now they're all dead." It hurt to say the words aloud.

My fault.

All mine.

"I know." He gave me a serious look. "And now you know what is going to happen to your land, this land, and every other realm out there if you don't stop her. No one else has the power."

"I don't have any power. I'm a child without my magic or my wings. I can't stop her." Anger boiled through my veins and I clenched my hands into fists. "Why don't you do it? I know you can." I smacked him on the nose. One of his teeth, which was bigger than my head, sparkled in the moonlight, but he didn't flinch.

"What I can or cannot do doesn't matter. It isn't my place. Dragons aren't warriors. We are soul keepers. That's it," he said letting the words die in his throat. "Even Troy isn't cut out for fighting though he likes to think otherwise."

I knew Abernathy was Troy's real dad, but it was weird to have the dragon talk about his son. If he cared, then why wasn't he raising Troy? Why have Pops do it?

The dragon closed his eyes. "If I stepped in every time evil rose up, I'd never get any rest and quite frankly, my dear, I'm exhausted." He jumped into the air and circled so that we were still facing each other. "The reason it has to be you is because she chose you. You and she are the only original vampires left. She gave away her wings just as you did. If anyone knows what you're going through, it's her and she'll use that to her advantage."

"But - I - " I couldn't finish. He was right. I wanted to sulk, to wallow in the truth of what I was - a selfish, no good vampire.

"You are who you are, little vampire, and you're right where you're meant to be." He blew smoke in my face and then flew away.

ASH LINED HER FACE

"AR - GRANDMOTHER, let me help you inside." Now was as good a time as any to start calling her what she was. I helped her to her feet. My mom shared many stories with me about the sad woman in my arms. She'd made Ariel out to be tough. A fighter. After what Sharra had done to her city, she seemed tiny, not strong at all.

"Mizu," Ariel said between sobs. "All of my people."

"I know. I'm sorry." I helped her up the back stairs. She leaned heavily into me and I practically carried her inside and up to my room. "Lie down."

She did as I said, crawling across my bed and resting her head against the pillow. I took a blanket from the bottom of the bed and covered her.

Ariel was filthy. Black ash lined her face and clothes. She smelled like smoke. She appeared so insignificant. But she was more than that. She was my grandmother. My mom's mom. I would do anything for her.

"I'm just going to rest for a minute." She closed her eyes. Her shoulders relaxed and I knew exhaustion overtook her.

"Take as long as you need," I whispered, walking from the room and closing the door.

At the top of the stairs, I paused, allowing my eyes to rest shut a moment. The house was so quiet. Not for the first time since I'd been staying here, I tried to imagine what it had been like for my mom to grow up here, with her dad and step-mother. I couldn't quite do it. When I looked at my mom all I saw was Snow White, the Vampire Queen, the woman who ran the realm of Sharra with ease. It was hard to think of her as a girl my age. My dad said she'd been klutzy and a total tomboy at one time. That girl didn't exist in my memories and I couldn't conjure her.

I took a deep breath and thought I could almost smell her shampoo. Had she laughed a lot? Aunt Cindy said they spent lots of nights in the room where Ariel now slept, having fun together. I tried to listen. Maybe the walls could tell me their secrets.

"Are you alright, Jasmine?"

"Mom." I opened my eyes.

She stood at the bottom of the stairs, her hands on her hips. She didn't look like my mom but my friend, Zoe. "Are you okay?" she asked again.

I nodded, but I wasn't. My eyes stung with the need to shed tears that wouldn't come. My mom held out her arms and I ran down the steps and into them.

"What happened? Where have you been?" She cooed into my hair.

I swallowed, unsure how I could explain all I'd seen and how difficult it must've been for Ariel to watch her beloved city be destroyed. "It's Ariel. Uh, I mean your mom. She's upstairs."

"What? Why?" She ran up to what had at one time been her room.

I pushed past her. "She's sleeping. Don't wake her. She's been through a lot."

She opened the door silently and peeked inside. Once she saw that her mom was actually resting, she closed the door and I followed her back downstairs. "I say again, what happened?"

I started to sit on the couch but remembered I was covered in ash too. Instead I went over to one of the bar stools in the kitchen. "It was awful," I began, watching Zoe walk around the room, like a guest in her own house.

"Tell me." She took the barstool beside me.

As I shared, I cried. She held my hands, wiped my tears, and listened. I even told her about the shadow and what happened in the tunnels. It was one of the few times I felt truly close to my mom. But I still couldn't tell her the real reason I cried. Because I knew I did this. I killed everyone. I started the darkness and brought the Akuma. I killed my friends. My selfishness would destroy the world and that was my burden to bear. Alone.

When I finished talking, my mom cleared her throat. "I can't even imagine how difficult that must've been. For you, and for her. I'm so sorry you had to be there for that. And I can't believe Abernathy admitted he could save us, if he were so inclined, but apparently the damned dragon isn't going to."

"Yeah, he's insufferable," I spat, staring at nothing as my mind held onto the scene of destruction in Mizu.

"Agreed."

"So what should we do?" I asked, blinking the carnage away.

She shrugged. "Quite honestly, I'm not sure."

That shocked me. My mom always had the answers.

"Of course I have ideas," Mom began. "Like we could - "

Laeddin appeared then. He looked tired. And even though I knew he was immortal; the genie was obviously in need of some rest. "I'm glad you're here, Queen Snow," he said to my mom, bowing slightly.

"What did you find?" I asked, jumping off the chair, clenching my hands together.

The smell of his blood sang to me and I realized how parched I was. I needed to feed, and soon.

Laeddin smiled, his eyes dropping to my lips.

My face warmed and butterflies danced in my belly. Did he want to kiss me? Before I could really think about that, he said, "I know how to stop the assassins, but we need some ingredients." He glanced at my mom. "I was hoping you'd be willing to help."

"Of course. Whatever you need, genie." She came over and rested her hands on our shoulders. "Tell me."

THE SPELL LAEDDIN talked of creating would be used to form a weapon. Complete, the weapon would bind with the user. The materials included the scale of a dragon, the eye of an elf, a piece of unicorn horn, the pinkie finger of a troll, a fairy heart, the essence of a vampire, and the blood of a slaughterer.

"Something from each of the seven magics," my mom said, giving me a sideways glance.

"But gross," I added. Pieces and parts of different creatures to create a spell. I knew we kept donated parts down beneath the Academy, but mostly I tried to forget about that.

"Can you collect them again?" Laeddin asked, ignoring my childish comment.

"Of course. It'll take some time, but I'll hurry." She kissed my cheek and disappeared before I had the chance to say good-bye.

"What should we do while we wait?" I asked, watching him. He seemed less stressed and that had me curious.

Laeddin gave me a once over, his eyes raised in question. "I think the first thing you should do is get cleaned up."

I glanced down at myself, noticing the dirty ash covering my clothes and skin. I'd momentarily forgotten I was a mess. "You're right." I climbed the steps and listened at my bedroom door to see if Ariel was awake.

There was a thump and I worried Ariel had fallen out of my bed. Quickly I opened the door. Sharra was there, standing over my grandmother. "Sharra!"

She held the silver dagger in one hand, the blade covered in blood. It was the same blade I wished she stab herself with. A wicked gleam shone in her eyes. "Too late, little vampire. Tell your mom," she said and vanished.

"No. No. No. No. No. No. No. No." I went over to Ariel and fell onto the floor beside her. Blood spread from the wound in her chest like spilled red ink. "Ariel! Grandmother!" Pain ripped from my throat.

"Laeddin, help!"

He was beside me instantly.

I knew what I wanted to do. There wasn't even another thought in my mind. "You have to save her. I wish it," I said, my voice hard.

Laeddin felt for a pulse. "It's too late." He swallowed, shaking his head. "I'm sorry, Princess, but she's already gone."

"No, Laeddin." I pressed my hands against her wound, trying to hold in the blood, because if it stayed inside then she had to stay alive. "I order you! It's my final wish. And I want you to do it." I glared at Laeddin. He had the saddest look on his face, and that made me angrier.

"I can't. It isn't even an option."

I was crying so hard; my eyes were blurry. What would my mom do when she found out I'd gotten her mom killed?

Oh no. She'd never forgive me for that. If only I'd never been born. Laeddin had to fix this. "There must be something you can do. What if you took my life and gave it to her? Wouldn't that work?" I lifted my dirty tee shirt and wiped it across my face. I didn't care.

"That isn't how my magic works. I could wish you into her body, but she still wouldn't be there. The woman you knew as Ariel is gone, Jasmine. Her soul has moved on. And there isn't anything you can do to bring her back."

I didn't want to accept it, didn't want to believe. "She can't be!" I brushed the curtain of hair that covered her face, revealing her open eyes. "Mom's never going to forgive me," I whimpered. "I need to tell her." I so didn't want to, but there was no getting around it.

"I'll bring her back."

But he didn't need to. I still don't know how it happened, whether my mom and her mom were connected somehow or if it was coincidence, or something else entirely, but my mom appeared in my room.

"Mom?" Still on my knees, I held out my hands. They were covered in blood. Maybe she would end me. I had no doubt she could do it. Other than Abernathy and Sharra, I believed she was probably the most powerful magical being in all the realms.

"Mom! No. Mom!" She fell to her knees beside her mother and did what I'd just been doing, placing her hands over the injury. "How did this happen?"

She looked over at Laeddin.

"I believe Jasmine can answer your question," he said tenderly.

Mom turned and looked at me with such anguish, I fell back on my butt. "Jasmine?" she pleaded.

"It was - It's - " I crawled away from her, unable to remain so close to her pain.

"Are you hurt?" She came over.

"No. I'm fine. Just fine. I'm alive while everyone else seems to be dying. But me, I'm fine! I'm fine. I'm fine." I was losing it. There was no question.

"Jasmine. Sweetheart."

Great. She wasn't mad. That was worse. She felt bad. For me. The person responsible for killing her mom. "Don't try to make me feel better. I did this," I said. "She's dead because of me."

"Jasmine, that's not true. You know that's - " she tried.

But I couldn't listen and shook my head. "No! Don't try to make me feel better." I stood, feeling like I would be sick. "I can't be here." I ran out of my room, down the stairs, and out the front door.

NOT A MONSTER

AS SOON AS I hit the fresh air, I physically felt better, which made me feel worse.

"Hey, Jack. How's it going?" Troy stepped from the shadow of the tree in our front yard. He wore a plain black tee shirt and a dark pair of jeans. His sandy blond hair seemed to have grown longer since the dance.

At the memory of our last time together I cringed. He'd said that more creatures like me was a bad idea. He thought me a monster and he was right. "What do you want, Troy?" I bit the words out.

"Nothing. Hey," he said, taking my arms. "Talk to me about what's wrong."

"Get away from me, dragon boy." I pulled from his grasp.

"Dragon boy? Ouch." He took me by the wrist and held it up. Blood shone in the moonlight. No doubt he could smell it too.

I heard his heart pick up speed and watched his eyes grow big. I pulled away. "That's right, Troy. I'm a monster. You were right. Stay away from me." My fangs extended and I growled. I could've run. I was fast, but there was a part of me desperate for him, and I hated that about myself.

Troy held up his hands. "You're not a monster, Jack. I'm sorry for what I said before. On the boat. I didn't mean it." The sincerity of his words was evident, but I couldn't quite believe.

"You did and that's okay," I said, but my ferocity was running out of steam. "It's true. More like me would be a mistake." Without waiting for a response, I ran as fast as my vampire legs would take me. I didn't know where I was heading until I got there.

The one on Harmony Grove Street. "A vampire in a cemetery.

Perfect." I laughed because otherwise I would've cried or screamed or worse, ate someone. "Ugh."

"Jack. Jasmine."

"Go away, Troy. Get away from me while you still can." I didn't face him, too disgusted with myself to do anything.

"Damn, girl. I leave for a while and come back to find you having a full-blown pity party. It's a good thing I got here when I did." He came up behind me and touched my shoulders.

I couldn't bare his touch. I didn't deserve any comfort. I needed pain. If I could've blinked myself from existence I would have. Shrugging him off, I walked over to a bench near the quaint church and sat, tucking my feet underneath me and crossing my arms. "Did you find Jesse?" I asked, changing the focus from me to him.

He hung his head. "Not yet. We're getting closer. Pops thought he found him, but it was just another lost cause." He flung himself on the bench beside me. "The longer it takes though the more I worry we'll never find him."

"Hey," I say reaching out to pat his arm, noticing the dried blood on my fingers, and pulling back. "You'll find him. Unlike me, you aren't a monster."

"Oh, Jack. You really need to knock off whatever doubts you're having about yourself."

"It's not about me, it's about what happens when people are around me." I scooted to the other side of the bench. "People I care about keep dying." What if I let Sharra take my body? My soul would be gone. I would be gone.

"Come on, Jack." He took hold of my chin and forced me to look at him.

My eyes dampened and filled with tears. I pulled away. "It's true. Camden, Abby, and now my grandmother. It's only a matter of time before Sharra comes after my mom and dad. If you stick around, she'll come after you too." Now that I started spilling, I couldn't stop. "I wished away my wings and my magic all for the chance to be someone I'm not." I hiccupped and covered my mouth a moment. "Now I know what a stupid wish that was, there isn't a thing I can do about it." I pulled my knees to my chest and rested my head against them. "If she took my body, at least I wouldn't be a problem for anyone anymore," I finished.

"Shut the freak up!"

I flinched at the heat behind his words but didn't move.

He went on, "So, what? You're just going to give up? Let the darkness take over. You're going to let Sharra win?" Determination lined his face. "You can do something about your problem. Are you going to face her or fail before you've given yourself the chance to try?"

"Troy. I don't - "

"Jack!" He stood and rubbed his hands through his hair, making it messy. I thought he never looked better. "Stop being such a child. Stop blaming yourself for stuff that's out of your control. Stop thinking you're a victim and start doing what you know is right." He knelt in front of me. "Jack. I believe in you. Whatever it takes, I know you can do it."

I tried to fake a smile, but it wasn't happening. "Thanks, Troy." I still didn't believe him. It was easier to believe the bad stuff. He thought I was a monster. Did Abernathy feel that way about me too? I shook the question away as Troy came in close, his stomach touching my legs.

Without realizing, I lowered my legs, so I straddled him. I couldn't help it.

"Jack," he whispered, his warm hands cupping my face. "You are the most infuriating person I've ever met." His hungry lips crashed into mine and I reciprocated, grabbing hold of his shoulders and gripping him close. His teeth grazed by bottom lip before he kissed me deeply.

I moaned, wishing I could be closer to him. It was the kind of kiss I only ever dreamed about, the kind of kiss I always wished for, but figured I would never get. I panted eagerly, my breathing coming out in jagged gasps. And all sorts of feelings rushed to the surface, for him, for those who died, for my grandmother, for my mom, and for all that still needed to happen. They gurgled through me like molten lava.

And I knew what I needed to do.

Troy seemed to sense the change in me and pulled back. "You ready?" His hazel eyes flashed back and forth, searching mine.

I nodded.

"If I knew all it would take to get you fired up was another one of my awesome kisses, I would've done that first thing. Skipped all the apologies and headed straight for your mouth."

I grinned. "Never change, dragon boy." I kissed him quick.

He got to his feet and pulled me up with him. "You're done pouting?"

"Yes."

"You gonna kick some Sharra ass?"

"I am." I kept my focus on him, knowing with him in my life, I could do anything.

"Good." He kissed my cheek and then made a face. "Shower first, would ya?"

I laughed. Couldn't help it. "Okay, I will."

He let go and we started walking through the cemetery.

"What's your plan? You going to keep searching for Jesse?" I asked, hoping he wouldn't leave me again.

"Of course."

I took his hand, twined it with mine. "He's lucky to have a friend like you."

He smirked. "I'm your friend too, Jack."

Without knowing why, I sped up, desperate to get started.

He came up behind me and swatted my butt.

I gasped and turned. "Seriously?"

"Get it done, vampire girl."

Before I could say anymore, he ran past me and shifted, then shot into the sky. For the briefest moment he blocked out the moon. It made me think of Batman - except Troy was better. His big, bronze wings shone in the moonlight. One eye glanced down at me.

"Race you home?"

"Deal."

HANG ON PRINCESS

WHEN I ARRIVED BACK at the house, I waved goodbye to Troy and then went inside.

My mom was gone, as was my grandmother's body.

The room that was my mom's once upon a time was clean and the bed had been made with fresh linens. A strong scent of disinfectants lingered, burning the inside of my nose and making my stomach turn.

Mixed emotions swirled through my heart.

I was grateful my mom took Ariel with her, thankful I didn't have to talk to my mom right now since I didn't know what to say and devastated that I hadn't been able to say goodbye to my grandmother.

But mostly I was angry. Frustrated beyond belief that Sharra had killed my grandmother. Not hurt her but ended her life.

It was time to make Sharra pay.

I rapidly showered before dressing in jeans, my black combat boots, and a black hoodie. Brushed my hair, braided it, and wrapped it in a bun. Then I took a deep breath and went down the hall to Laeddin's room. Knocked softly. I didn't know for sure whether he was still in the house, but it seemed likely since his door was closed. So I waited.

There was rustling and the sound of his throat clearing.

He opened the door wearing only navy blue pajama bottoms. I couldn't help myself as I scanned his chest and torso. And the smell of his blood? It smelled divine. I almost couldn't resist grabbing him and drinking without permission. The hunger. It had come on suddenly and without notice. I needed Christopher, his blood.

"Are you all right, Jasmine?" His eyes were heavy with sleep.

I shook my head. "No. The only way I'm going to be able to stop Sharra once and for all is by finding all the pieces of the crown and putting them together. So we need to get the ingredients and do the spell so that we can destroy the assassins."

One side of his mouth lifted in a small curve. "Glad to hear it." He opened his bedroom door all the way and indicated the overflowing desk near the window. "Your mother gathered them already. She said the hardest item would've been getting a dragon scale, but Troy gave it to her before she left."

I figured the hardest object for my mom to obtain would've been the Hunter's blood. I wondered if she had it on hand, if he was still giving her a supply, and it'd been in our storeroom. That was probably the case.

But I only thought about that for a moment and instead let my mind travel to Troy. He was always looking out for me, even when I didn't realize it. "Great. What do you do first?"

Laeddin glanced at his bedside clock. "It's late. Don't you want to get some rest? You look tired."

I shook my head. "Every second I waste with mundane things like sleep only gives Sharra more time to make her plans. I don't want to wait."

"Okay, let's get started then." In the blink of an eye, everything except the desk and the things on it were gone, leaving the wooden floor bare. He snapped his fingers and a black seven-point star surrounded by a circle appeared in the center of the room. "Place an ingredient on each of the points, keeping them inside the circle." He took the eyeball between his thumb and middle finger and gently set in on one of the points. I picked up Troy's dragon scale and squeezed it in my hand as I hugged it to my chest, sending out a silent thank you.

For the next several minutes, Laeddin and I worked quietly together, placing the ingredients until all seven were at the points, but within the circle.

When we finished, he said, "You must stand inside the star, in the center."

I carefully stepped inside and without touching the lines moved until I stood in the middle. "Here?" I asked, looking around me to make sure I wasn't on any of the lines.

"Perfect." He picked up a black book and turned the pages until he reached the one he wanted. Then he looked at me. "Stay still. Don't move."

His words didn't exactly fill me with courage, but I was in this until the end, no matter what. "I won't."

He cleared his throat. "Jasmine, before I start, I just want you to know that I think you're amazing. In every way. And I know you can do what has to be done." He nodded.

"Thank you, Laeddin." It was easy to see he meant his words and I really appreciated them, him, all that he'd done. None of what had happened was his fault.

His eyes crinkled as he smiled. "Ready?"

"Yes." I clutched my hands into fists, unsure about what was going to happen, but trying to prepare myself.

Laeddin began speaking. His words were soft and foreign. I didn't understand what he was saying, but I immediately felt as if I was being tugged in seven directions, as though I was being pulled into the points. I felt my eyes grow wide with fear. What was happening? But I didn't move, staying still just as Laeddin asked.

The longer he went on, the stronger the pulling became, until I believed I would be ripped into pieces. Part of me wanted to run away, but that was the old me. I wasn't moving until Laeddin told me it was safe to do so.

After several minutes, I realized whatever he was saying, it was the same thing over and over, like a chant. I began to recognize the words and I focused on them, on the sound of his voice. It was soft and deep, like water. I closed my eyes, sinking into the sounds.

"Hang on, Princess."

I heard Laeddin speak, but couldn't answer, not even if I'd wanted to. The pulling from the seven ingredients seemed to have stopped. I no longer felt separated from them, but as though I'd become one with them.

I was still in the center of the star, but somehow within them as well.

Still holding still, I allowed the newness within me to shift and organize.

Before they fully settled, like a rubber band, each piece pulled away, taking the piece of me within them along.

They took me through the air and past the edges of the world into the infinite expanse that was the heavens, including all of the planets and stars.

I saw everything, felt everything, tasted, smelled, and became everything. It was darkness and light, and so many things in between, things I couldn't explain, but somehow had become a part of me, until the portion of myself I recognized was tiny in comparison to everything else.

Then as abruptly as they pulled away, they were back and it was just me standing in the middle of the seven pointed star.

"Princess?"

I opened my eyes at the sound of Laeddin's voice.

He gasped.

"What?" I asked, crossing my arms nervously.

"See for yourself."

"I can move?"

"Yes, as far as I can tell, the spell is complete."

Tentative, I glanced around, noticing that the seven objects were gone. Except that wasn't right. They weren't gone, just moved inside of me. I stepped from the circle and went to the full-length mirror.

The most noticeable difference was my eyes. The irises kept changing color. One second they were gold, the next they were green. The longer I stared in the mirror the more colors I saw, including blue, brown, red, silver, and indigo. "The seven magics," I whispered, understanding dawning on me.

"That's right." He stood so I could see his reflection in the mirror. "Not only that, but look." He turned me around so that I had to look over my shoulder to see my back.

"What?" At first, I didn't see anything, but then my eyes adjusted, and I was seeing with my vampire vision. And there they were, the transparent outline of a new pair of wings! "How is this possible?" They weren't feathery like my original pair, but more webbed, like that of a dragons. And then they were gone. "Where did they go?"

"I'm not sure. I'm guessing them appearing has to do with the way the incantation infused you with the seven magics. Even though Sharra took your wings and your magics, they are still a part of you." He gave me a big smile. "I mean you were created by the seven magics. You were already a part of them, and the spell just reawakened them within you - at least that's what I'm thinking."

I nodded. "That makes sense, I guess. But what about the weapon needed to kill the assassins. Did that part not work? Is it because I didn't have my magics to start with?"

"I don't think so, but I don't know. Maybe you have become the weapon." He shrugged. "The spell did say the user and the weapon would be bound."

"Was there anything else?" I was worried. Had my choices once again created a problem that couldn't be fixed?

Laeddin rested his middle finger on my forehead. "Close your eyes."

He closed his, so I went along with it.

A light seemed to dig its way around my mind, looking for something. I guessed the weapon.

After several long seconds, I noticed the light come upon something dark and powerful. It didn't seem to have a shape but was just a great stretch of nothingness.

Laeddin pulled back, dropping his hand to his side. "The weapon is in there, without a doubt, but it's being protected by a power not even my magic can penetrate."

"I saw it too." I crossed my arms, trying not to be afraid of whatever it was I'd seen. "Let's go back to the tunnels, find the box and the piece of the crown, and test the theory, see if the weapon will work.

"Now?" His face contorted in worry. "I really think you should rest."

I shook my head. "There isn't time. Let's go."

FROG IN MY THROAT

WE POPPED into the tunnel immediately. Even without a light I knew we were in the room where we left the container.

Laeddin produced a light as I knelt and then turned back the lid.

As before, I pushed past the jade petals that felt like pea pods and their sickly sweet smell.

And as before, the elven assassin appeared.

He stood until the top of his head nearly reached the ceiling and opened his eyes.

They were the same color as the flower petals.

"Who dares awaken me from my slumber?"

"It is I, Jasmine." I sounded like there was a frog in my throat and I cleared it. "I'm here to claim the piece of crown you guard."

His jade green eyes flashed in anger. "I cannot allow that." He crossed his arms over his shoulders and removed the swords. "Prepare yourself for destruction."

I wasn't sure how to respond. Laeddin and I saw that a weapon was inside of me. Whatever it was, I hoped it would appear as soon as possible. "I will not die. I can't. It's my destiny to take the crown and save the Earth." As I spoke the words, twin blades exactly like the assassin's appeared in my hands. Red lightning crackled all along them. Their emergence surprised the assassin. They surprised me too. And Laeddin. I could tell by the expression on his face.

"I see you have come prepared." The assassin lunged forward, sending his swords down as though he would destroy me with one blow.

I wasn't ready. Thankfully the swords seemed to know exactly what to do. They brought my hands up and crossed the blades, so the assassin's came down on them.

He wasn't deterred but spun and attacked from below.

The swords in my hands parried, blocked, and then struck him in the thigh and across the stomach.

Shocked, his eyes widened.

The swords were comfortable in my hands now, and I took advantage of his moment of weakness, going in for the kill. With one movement, I crossed the blades through his neck and stepped back in time to see his head fall from his body, hit the dirt and roll. His face was fully fleshed out and revealed empty defeat.

The blades in my hands vaporized as though they knew they were no longer required. I stared at my fingers. "Did that seriously just happen?" Awed revulsion was evident in my voice.

"If I hadn't been here to witness it, I wouldn't have believed it." Laeddin came around and took my hands. They were warm, and I instantly relaxed. "You did it," he said shaking my fingers lightly.

"I did it," I repeated, blinking several times.

Laeddin released me and picked up the box. "Claim your crown," he said softly.

My hands shook in disbelief, but also hope. I reached out to touch the broken piece of crown. As my fingers caressed the metal, a white electric current surged from the crown and grabbed hold of my finger.

I tried to release it, but the current held me fast. And the crown piece moved out of the box on its own and crawled into my palm. "Whoa," I said, glancing at Laeddin.

His eyes were as big as mine felt. "Look."

The piece of crown burrowed into my skin, like an insect.

I screamed and tried to dig at it, afraid of what was happening. "What's it doing?"

Laeddin joined in helping me, but it was no use. Red and white electric currents bubbled and gurgled under my skin as the crown creeped up my arm.

It wasn't necessarily pain I felt, but it was still odd, like cold water hitting my stomach when it was empty. I tried shaking my arm and even extended my fangs and tried to bite it out of me, but the piece of crown would not be deterred.

"Does it hurt? Are you okay?" Laeddin was especially distraught but was unable to do anything. He even used his magic to make it come out. It didn't work.

"It isn't painful, it's just freaky." By that time it reached my shoulder, I let out a haggard breath, accepting whatever would happen. It moved along my collarbone, up my neck, and past my cheekbone. When it reached my eye, there was a flash of red and white light, but only for the briefest second before it settled in the center of my forehead.

I touched the spot where it stopped and could feel it, but only for a moment before it seemed to melt into me and vanish.

"It's gone," Laeddin said, when I couldn't feel it anymore.

I removed my fingers and dropped them to my sides and then fell to my knees, suddenly so exhausted I couldn't move.

"Princess? Jasmine?"

"One down. Four more to go," I said, falling forward. My cheek smacked the wet, smelly dirt, but I didn't have the strength to move. I couldn't even keep my eyes open.

"I've got you," Laeddin said.

I tried to thank him, but nothing came out.

I DON'T KNOW for how long I slept, but when I woke it was light outside.

Birds sang happily in the trees beside my house. That wasn't the loudest noise though.

There was a purring and it seemed to be coming from inside my head.

I opened my eyes and searched my room for the source.

Rather quickly I realized Gatsby was curled into a ball on my stomach.

I sat up and pushed him off.

The cat came awake with a start, his claws digging into my skin through the blankets as his hair raised straight and he yowled.

"What do you think you're doing?" I asked, but the sudden fear dissipated as quickly as it came.

Fully recovered, he gave me an irritated look as he yawned and stretched. "Protecting you, ungrateful vampire." He jumped off the bed and then hopped up on the windowsill. "But I know when I'm not wanted. I'll go."

"Wait. Gatsby." I liked him better as a cat than a dragon.

He turned to study me. "You've been through a lot. I'm glad to see you're okay." He blinked and then jumped out the window.

I pushed the covers aside and went to the window, hoping to see him, but he was gone. Sighing, I went into the bathroom and saw that the crown piece hadn't disappeared completely. Smack in the middle of my eyebrows and about an inch up was a small diamond. It looked like someone had glued it there for decoration. I tried to force it off, but it wouldn't budge. "Great. That's going to difficult to explain."

After showering, dressing, and braiding my hair, I opened my bedroom door and listened for Laeddin.

"He's gone," Christopher said.

I jumped, my heart sticking in my throat. "Chris," I said, whirling around.

Standing in my bedroom, beside my window, he was breathtaking, and I realized quite similar in physical appearance to Troy.

"What do you want?" I grumbled, but my fangs pressed against the inside of my mouth. Because I was suddenly starved.

His eyes left my face and lingered on my throat. I let him drink from me before, but something told me not to let him again. Not while I had the weapon within.

"You startled me," I said, moving closer to him without realizing it. One thought drove all my instincts. Hunger. I needed to feed, and I wanted to feed on him.

His eyes locked on mine. "Why are you different?" He inhaled deeply through his nose. "Your blood doesn't smell the same."

I nodded, looking away, focusing on his neck. "A spell," I said, grabbing his shoulders, and standing on my tiptoes.

"What kind of spell?" His voice was hoarse with emotion.

"Laeddin found it." I opened my mouth, allowing my fangs to extend, but I wasn't quite tall enough.

"What's it for?" He lifted me into his arms and carried me over to my bed.

My breath hitched. I couldn't think of anything but his blood. "I need to defeat - " When he sat, I straddled him. He tilted his head, giving me easy access to his neck. I sank my fangs in deep and sucked from him like I hadn't eaten in years instead of days.

As soon as his blood hit the back of my throat something unexpected happened. I began to see his memories as I drank. At first it was disconcerting, like watching a movie backward and on fast-forward. Except I could hear everything too, including he'd been the one to tell my mom about Ariel's death.

When I got to his teenaged years and saw him carving the bear, I pulled away.

"Feel better? There's color in your cheeks again." His eyes sparkled with lust.

"Yes, thank you," I said, wiping the corner of my mouth. A flood of heat rushed through me at the thought of his memories. They lingered in my mind like his blood did in my throat.

He arched an eyebrow. "What's the matter?"

I thought about telling him what I saw, but I didn't want him to feel uncomfortable and I didn't want to stop drinking from him. His blood filled me better than any other ever had. "Nothing."

He wrapped his arms around me, and I let him, allowing him to hold me and comfort me. I needed it. After not very many seconds his head tilted to one side and he stood, taking me with him. "Laeddin's back. I must go." He vanished, sending me crashing to the floor.

YOU LOOK BETTER

LAEDDIN BURST INTO MY ROOM. "PRINCESS?"

I adjusted myself and stood. "I'm fine. I - uh, just fell."

His hands roamed my body as though he were feeling for broken bones, even though that wasn't possible. "What's this?" He touched the diamond on my forehead.

I shrugged. "I'm not sure but I'm guessing it has to do with the crown."

"You're probably right." He pursed his lips in a grim line. "You sure you're all right?"

"Yes. I'm good."

Laeddin stepped back. "You look better. Rested." He went over to the closet and opened the doors, then faced me. "Which is good because you need to go to your grandmother's funeral."

At hearing his words, my heart sank. "Is it today? Usually funerals take days and days to plan."

"You've been asleep for three." He took a dress from my closet and showed me.

I shook my head. "Three days?" I ran to the window, like the sky could tell me the date. In some ways it could, since the darkness was getting closer and closer. "Why did you let me sleep so long? We still have four more pieces to find." I turned to face him and crossed my arms.

He had another dress in his hands.

"No," I said, and he put it back.

As he flipped through my clothes, he spoke. "I know, but you needed to rest. And trust me, I tried to wake you up more than once, but you wouldn't have it. Your body needed the sleep."

"Okay."

He pulled a long, black dress from my closet. "Get dressed and I'll take you back to Sharra for the funeral."

"Actually," I moved toward him. "Is there any way you could take me now. I have a dress there I want to wear, and I need to see Zenny."

"Sure." He hung the dress back up before placing his hands on my waist. "Hold on."

"I wrapped my arms around his neck."

Instantly we were back in my room in the castle.

I was in Sharra. Home!

A bright happiness tingled through and over me. There was sadness, sure. I wasn't here for a good reason, but the familiarity of being in the place I'd grown up, with so many fond memories, warmed me in ways I hadn't thought possible.

Laeddin nodded. "Get dressed. The funeral starts in an hour. Your mom and dad are expecting you."

He vanished from my room. For a brief moment I wondered where he went and if he was upset, but I didn't have time to brood over Laeddin. I needed to get to work.

Running a hand along my bedspread and wall and anything else I could touch along the way; I went to my closet. Everything was just as I left it, everything in its place. I went to the dresses and dug through the black ones until I found the one I wanted. It was long with a tight, lace bodice that buttoned up in back and came up to just under my neck. I removed it from the hanger, held it against my body, and went to the mirror.

Zenny appeared in the bottom right corner of my mirror.

"Zenny," I said, bending down to his level. His eyes were puffy, and his nose was red. Normally he dressed in bright colors, but today he'd chosen a black suit, with a gray vest and bow tie. His usually flamboyant hair was now a soft white.

"It's so good to see you," he whimpered. "If only the circumstances were better."

"Agreed," I said and stood. "Hang in there, Zenny."

He sniffled and wiped his nose with a handkerchief. "Once you're dressed go to the powder room and I'll do your hair and makeup."

"Thanks, Zenny." When he left, I changed out of my jeans and into my dress. It was impossible to button and I didn't know how the magics I'd been given would respond to a simple request like buttoning a dress, so I didn't try to do them myself.

Instead I held it to my chest, went into the powder room, and sat in my chair. A sigh escaped my lips before I could stop it and I bit my bottom lip. I didn't know grandmother well, but I hurt for my mom.

Zenny clapped his hands as he walked into the mirror. "I've missed you." He came in close and peered at me over his thick, round glasses. "You're different. What happened to the violet in your eyes and," he gasped, covering his mouth with his hands. "Your wings. Oh, sweet pixilette pickle juice, where did they go?"

I forced myself not to cry or sob or throw a tantrum. "They're gone," was all I said.

"I can see that," he tut-tutted with the click of his tongue. "Poor, sweet thing, where did they go?"

While he worked on my hair and makeup, I caught him up. Sharing what happened with my wishes, and my wings, and Laeddin, and Troy - Everything except Christopher. I couldn't bring myself to tell anyone about him. Laeddin knew of course, but not because I told. He found out on accident.

While I talked, he worked his magic on my hair and makeup. When he finished, he clapped his hands. "Your story has inspired me. And my, but don't you look beautiful."

I peered at myself in the mirror. "Zenny," I breathed, turning back and forth.

"You like it?"

I barely recognized myself. I seemed older. Maybe it was my eye color or the shape of my face. Zenny had lined my eyes with black eyeliner, used a shimmery white eye shadow that sparkled like the diamond in the center of my forehead for the lid. Above it, in the crease he used a smoky brownish gray color followed by more of the shimmering white shadow. My lashes were thick and a dark black with tiny red rubies at the tip. He'd given my cheeks a little color and then darkened my lips, so they were blood red. My hair had been loosely curled and then swept up in a loose bun, leaving out my long, teal bangs.

"You've outdone yourself. Thank you." I got out of my chair and turned. "Can you help with the buttons?"

"Of course." They buttoned all at once and he went a step further and tied the bow at my waist.

I checked my reflection in the full-length mirror. "Amazing. Zenny, thank you so much."

"Anything for you, princess."

THE FUNERAL WAS BEING HELD in the largest ballroom.

The windows were covered with thick white draperies while the normally black and white checkered floor was changed to a white marble and the roof had been removed so the bright blue sky could be seen.

My grandmother's body rested on a blanket of blood red water lilies, which starkly contrasted against her white dress.

Her skin was pale, her eyes were shut, and her long black lashes made shadowy half-moons on her face. Her lips were stained red and curved up slightly, so she appeared to be smiling.

They placed her hands on her stomach, one on top of the other. And her feet were bare. Under the flowers she lay on was a pyre.

Aside from our immediate family, those select few who'd been invited to my grandmother's funeral included the leaders of the seven magics as well as my mom and dad's close friends and the Academy teaching staff.

Professor Pops and my dad's brothers were there, excluding Gabe, as were the members of their families who knew about the different realms.

Kenmei came as well as a young man I never met before.

They were both dressed in black and white suits.

Troy had come too.

He stood beside Professor Pops.

When he saw me, he nodded an acknowledgement, his face somber.

Having him at the funeral warmed my heart.

He looked especially handsome in his crisp button up white shirt, gray tie, and black suit. I also noticed he seemed especially sad and wondered if he was still worried about Jesse.

My best friend, the pixilette Abrea fluttered in wearing a lavender and black gown and hovered near my dad's ear.

Her eyes brimmed with sadness and she kept sniffling.

When she saw me, she flew over and snuggled against my cheek.

"Oh, Jasmine. I'm here if you need me." She dropped onto my outstretched finger.

"Thanks, Abrea. I do need you."

GOODBYE GRANDMOTHER

"WELL I'M HERE." She flew to my shoulder and landed there, settling in for the duration.

Aunt Cindy stood on my mom's right. She'd come with her assistant from Polonias, a giant talking leopard by the name of Violet.

She wore a short black dress without sleeves. The leopard's wiry glasses kept slipping down her nose until they sat so close to the edge, I wondered how they hadn't fallen off.

Cindy wore a black dress with iridescent blue gauze around the waist, cuffs, and hem. It came to the middle of her calves and she had on black high heels with a bow at the ankle, ever the most stylish person in the room.

My parents had taken the potion to change back into their rightful bodies.

Dad had on a white suit with a water lily pinned to his lapel and my mom wore a red dress, the color of her mom's hair.

"Come. Stand between us," my dad said, when he saw me. I slid into place and peered sideways at my mom. Was she mad? Could she stand me any longer? Or was I just a person to forget?

She gave me a brief smile and I returned it. I wanted to tell her I was sorry, and I would when the time was right.

It seemed everyone who mattered was there.

There were two noticeable absences: Laeddin and Christopher.

I figured since Christopher was on the council he would have to be here, but maybe my mom asked him not to come.

My heart ached a little at the thought. What did Christopher do when he wasn't around? What kind of life did he lead?

I didn't understand why Laeddin wasn't here. It saddened me to think he didn't feel like family.

But I couldn't dwell on it more because my dad began to speak.

"Thank you all for coming. We're here to mourn a tragedy but I'm beyond grateful to see each of you. As we say goodbye to a mother, a sister, and a friend, I hope you'll take a moment to share a fond memory or two." As he spoke, he made eye contact with each person in the room.

I hadn't realized my grandmother knew everyone here.

A troll stepped forward first. "Ariel was an honorable woman, at least according to my mother, the great Esther. My mother spoke fondly of a time when she and Ariel had been sent on a scouting mission together many, many years ago. It was early morning and the mist lined the valley below so they couldn't see anything farther than a foot in front of them. They spotted a group of rogue trolls during the night and wanted to make sure they weren't causing trouble. So they were on edge.

"My mother said she closed her eyes for a moment and all of a sudden something thumped her on the nose. She screamed, which caused Ariel to scream and they both jumped to their feet. Turned out it was just a pixilette that'd gone to sleep in the air and had fallen from the sky and landed on my mother's nose. Instead of yelling at my mother, she patted her on the back and they both had a good laugh." He pressed a giant fist to his chest and tossed the water lily he held in his other hand onto the pyre in front of Ariel.

It went like that for the next hour as each of the seven leaders spoke. Then Cindy shared the experience she had in rescuing Ariel from Mizu. Professor Pops and Kenmei each told stories about her that I heard before.

By the time it was my dad's turn, we were all laughing and crying. He stepped forward. "Before I married Snow, I spoke to Ariel. It was the most terrifying moment of my life, even worse than when I saved Snow from the blade and the Unknowns."

I shuddered as I remembered the story.

"But I'll never forget what she told me." He swallowed down the emotion in his voice before going on. "She said, 'Dorian the secret to a great marriage is - ' and then she stopped. I waited, thinking maybe she forgot." Everyone in the room held their breaths until my dad went on, "I finally asked, 'What is the secret?' She gave me a sneaky look and then clucked her tongue. I thought maybe I missed something. But she punched me lightly on the arm and said, 'There is no secret, silly. It boils down to love. Make sure you give her all of yourself, all the time, every moment and every second. If Snow does the same for you, your marriage may be bumpy, there will most definitely be ups and downs, but love will never leave your lives and your marriage will only grow stronger.'" My dad stopped, unpinned the lily from his lapel and tossed it onto the pyre before stepping back in the circle. My mom reached across me, grabbed his hand and clung to it. I glanced at him and saw the tears on his face. I'd never seen my dad cry and my eyes misted at the sight.

Their sorrow is your fault, my mind whispered.

My mom took her turn. She spoke of the first time they met after thinking Ariel was dead, for years, and then of the day I was born.

"Jasmine was immediately smitten with my mom," she said. "It was by watching her I learned what it meant to not only tell a person you love them, but to show them. She carried Jasmine around everywhere those first two weeks and then when she had to leave - " A hard sob tore from my mom's throat and I lost it.

"I'm so sorry, Mom. I didn't mean for this to happen," I cried, not caring that my tears would ruin my makeup. "If there's anything I can do, just name it." I wrapped my arms around her waist, clinging to her. "Please forgive me."

My mom carefully spun in my arms and then lifted my chin. Her face was hard, and I steeled myself for the harsh words she would say.

"Jasmine, sweet girl, this isn't your fault." She wiped away my tears and kissed each of my cheeks.

Her kindness only made me cry harder, because it was my fault. If I hadn't been so selfish, if I hadn't wished away my wings like they were nothing, my grandmother would still be alive.

"It's Sharra's fault," she went on. "If you want to direct your sadness or anger at anyone, point it at her." She kissed my forehead right on the spot where the diamond was. "You, my daughter, are not to blame."

She hugged me and I would've stayed like that until she pushed me away, even though I had a feeling she never would. My dad came up behind me and hugged me too. So did Troy and Cindy and others. I couldn't tell for sure, but it felt like everyone.

Finally the troll leader cleared his throat. "It's time, your highness."

We all untangled ourselves from the big group hug and I looked up. It was completely dark now and the moon shone full and bright in the night sky.

Fire appeared in my mom's hand. "In love and in fondest memories, we return your body to the ash from whence it came." She threw the fire onto the pyre. My father did the same. An orb of fire appeared in my hand without me even trying and I tossed it onto the pyre as well.

As everyone took their turn adding to the fire, the flames became enormous, consuming my grandmother's body.

In moments, she was ash, which then turned to small red rubies that floated out of the room and up into the night sky.

I watched until every last one had ascended. "Good-bye, Grandmother."

ONE BY ONE the others left. I listened as my mom and dad thanked those who came. Abrea still sat on my shoulder, crying, sniffling, and blowing her nose.

I hugged Professor Pops, my dad's brothers, Kenmei, and the others as they said their goodbyes, until the only people left were my mom and dad, Cindy, Gabe, Violet, and Troy.

He stood beside me and took my hand. "You doing all right?" he whispered in my ear.

I wasn't, but I nodded. "Fine. Thanks for coming. It means a lot to have you here."

"Hey." Troy turned me to face him. His eyes were intense and searched mine. "I'll see you soon. Hang in there." He leaned down and kissed my forehead. "By the way, I like the diamond addition." He winked, squeezed my hands, and kissed my cheek.

"Thanks," I said again, lamely.

He went to the entrance where I noticed Professor Pops still waited for him. They left together.

Cindy and Gabe said good-bye next. She promised to take me shopping soon. I smiled at that. It was one of the reasons I loved her so much. Even with all our worries about the darkness she wanted to make me smile.

Abrea left reluctantly after I told her to go, that I needed some time alone with my mom and dad.

When it was just the three of us, we held each other a moment. "Love you, my queen," my dad said sweetly, wrapping an arm around her.

She let go of me and pressed herself fully against him, stifling her sobs against his neck.

He held her close, pressing his cheek against the top of her head and letting her cry. My heart broke at seeing them like that, so sad, yet still so committed to each other.

My fault, my mind whispered.

Someone coughed behind me. I guessed it would be Laeddin, that he'd come to offer his condolences. Upon turning, I saw it was Christopher. At the sight of him my mouth watered, his blood calling out, pushing away every semblance of decorum. Only that it was my mom and dad in the room did I resist.

"I know you asked me not to come, but I felt I would be remiss if I didn't offer my sympathies for the loss of your mother."

My dad's head lifted; his features turned furious. "Leave. Now. You're not welcome here. This is a private matter."

Christopher's shoulders fell. He looked so dejected. I wanted to reach out and comfort him. In some ways I understood his feelings. He betrayed those he cared for out of selfishness. As had I.

He glanced at me.

I gave him a small smile.

"I'll leave as soon as Jasmine asks me to go," he said gruffly.

I sucked in my breath. Was he seriously going to go against my dad? That seemed dangerous.

My dad let go of my mom. "I won't ask you again, Hunter." His strange eyes flashed heatedly.

I stepped between them, facing Christopher. "Thanks for coming, but I think you should go." I told him with my eyes how urgent it was he leave, but he just smiled.

"I'll go as soon as you tell your parents the truth about us," he said smugly, crossing his arms.

I nearly died of embarrassment. "Why are you doing this?" I asked, shocked.

My mom and dad were suddenly on either side of me, protecting me.

"What's he talking about?" my dad asked, glancing from me to Christopher.

"It's nothing. Don't worry about it." I crossed my arms, keeping my eyes on the floor.

"How do you think she got her vampire abilities back after Sharra took her wings?" He was angry and I couldn't blame him, but this didn't seem like the time. Not that there would ever be a good time to talk about it.

My mom gave me an incredulous look. "You didn't!"

"How dare you?" My dad was on Christopher in seconds and grabbed him by the collar of his shirt. "She's a child. My child. I told you once that I would kill you if you ever gave me a reason. The time has come. Touching my daughter is more than reason enough." His voice shook with anger and my knees quaked. Never had I heard my dad like that before. Energy seemed to pulse from my dad and into Christopher.

The Hunter's arrogant face became scared and his face turned gray, the color of ash. I hadn't believed it was possible, but whatever power my dad possessed, it was killing Christopher.

"Dad. Stop!" I shoved against his shoulder. Somehow, I was stronger than I realized, and my dad sailed to the floor. "Sorry." I went to him and stuck out my hand to help him up. "Sorry." Tears blurred my vision. "Please, no more death," I said adamantly.

My dad shook his head. Disappointment evident on his face. "What's gotten into you?" He got up without my help. "You're drinking from him?" He pointed at Christopher.

I glanced at the Hunter and saw he was on his hands and knees, panting.

"He betrayed your mom, tried to kill her. He worked for Sharra, the same evil vampire who stole your wings and killed your grandmother. How could you?" His eyes bored into me. "I'm beyond disappointed."

That was the worst. My dad's disappointment. "I know. I'm sorry. It's just - " What excuse could I give him? I didn't have one.

"Jasmine, there's a reason we never allowed you to drink Christopher's blood," my mom began. But she was unable to finish.

MOMENTARY FEAR

"AHHHHH, it's good to be here once again." Sharra appeared in the ballroom out of thin air, my glorious wings beating lightly at her back.

My dad didn't hesitate, but went after her, grabbing her by the throat. He was so quick, he shocked all of us.

"I had a feeling you'd show up." His fingers dug into her neck as he forced her to her knees. "You'll pay for the pain you've caused and when I finish with you, you'll be completely gone from this Earth."

Sharra blinked several times and then touched my dad with the tip of the staff she carried.

His body became stiff, like he was frozen. Sharra pulled from his grasp. "Stupid boy!"

"Dad!" I ran to him. Sharra sent a black current at me. It struck and I fell to the ground.

"That was too easy," she cackled, her wicked eyes scanning each of us. "How dare you lay your hands - " Sharra said.

Before she could finish, my mom had Sharra's neck in her mouth, her fangs biting down.

Sharra's eyes became wide with momentary fear, but she recovered when she touched my mom with her staff, and it rendered my mom immobile.

Christopher lunged at her as well, but she held up her hand. "If you don't stop right there, I'll kill you without thinking twice." She glanced at me and then continued speaking. "You wouldn't want that, would you, Hunter?"

Christopher shook his head.

"Very good. Run along then."

He stalked from the room, his footsteps echoing off the floor and my heart fell. He was still a coward. Even after everything that happened.

Sharra laughed as she walked over to my dad and picked him and my mom up like they were nothing more than rag dolls. How could she do that? Why? What made her so powerful?

You gave her your wings and your magic. It's your fault.

"No," I called out. "Don't - hurt them." I tried to lift a hand in supplication but couldn't move.

She came over. "You think I'm going to make them Akuma like the others, but I'm not. Oh, no. What they're going to get is so much worse."

I wanted to make the swords appear, but they wouldn't come. Whatever Sharra had done, it'd made it so I couldn't call forth anything except fury.

"Toodles, Jasmine. Thanks for the wings. They're amazing, better than mine ever were," she said and disappeared, taking my parents with her.

I lay on the floor, wishing I could cry, but still partially paralyzed by whatever Sharra had done to make it happen.

It felt like hours or longer, but it was just minutes before Christopher returned.

"Get. Away. From. Me." The words came out choppy, but I heard them leave my mouth.

"Look, I'm sorry I acted like a coward, but how can I help you if I'm dead?" He ripped open a vein in his wrist and let the blood drip into my mouth.

I wanted to close my lips against his blood, but some went down my throat and sadly it helped. The paralysis began to subside, and I grabbed his hand, pulling his wrist further into my mouth, drinking deeply until I no longer felt the effects of whatever Sharra did to me.

Once again in control of my faculties, I pushed him away and scooted back, smacking against something. I looked up and saw Laeddin.

His presence suddenly made me angry, like I-couldn't-contain-myself violent.

I jumped up and punched him in the face.

He took it without a word.

"How could you? Why weren't you here? You should've been here." I hit him again. "You could've saved them." I kept pounding on his chest, but no longer meaning it.

"I had a feeling something might happen, and I couldn't let you use your final wish," Laeddin said, his voice indulgent.

"Why? If it could've stopped Sharra, then why?"

"Because." He wrapped me in a bear hug.

"Because why? Tell me, damn you." I hit him again and again and again.

"Princess," he grabbed my wrists. "You know the rules. I can't kill anyone, and you aren't ready, not even close."

All the air seemed to go out of me. There was no fight left and I sank to my knees in front of him. "Fine, then find out where the next piece of the crown is so we can go get it."

"I already have. It's in the gargoyle realm."

"You're sure?" I asked, blinking back the tears.

"Yes." He released my hands. "I'll take you there as soon as you're ready."

"I'm going too," Christopher said, coming to stand beside me.

I'd forgotten he was still here.

"No, Hunter, you're not. The further you stay from her the better we'll all be." Laeddin's voice sounded adamant.

Christopher roared in frustration. "Stop keeping me from her. She's mine. She belongs with me and only me." He sounded like a child and I felt sorry for him.

"Chris," I said, using his arm to stand.

He ran his hands through his hair. "You don't understand. I have to stay near you. We belong together."

"Then explain it. Why is it so important that we stay together?"

He shook his head and I noticed tears in his eyes. "I can't, not with the genie still around."

"Well I'm not going anywhere," Laeddin said.

Christopher glared at the genie like he wanted to kill him with his stare. "Take this." He yanked a carved bear from his wrist and placed it in my hand. "Please, don't ask questions, just do me this small favor."

I nodded. It was the least I could do. "Sure, where did you get it?" I knew the answer because I'd seen it in his memories, but I wanted to see if he'd tell me the truth.

Christopher tied the soft leather holding the bear around my wrist. "I made it. Before I became a Hunter, I enjoyed making things like this." Once it was secure, he sighed. "Thank you."

"Your wel - "

With a twinkle he vanished.

I studied the weathered wooden bear. A deep reddish brown stained parts of it and I knew it was blood. But whose, I wondered.

You'll get him killed too, I thought and then quickly pushed it away.

Laeddin came up behind me. "You aren't going to keep that thing on, are you?"

"I am," I said, acidly. "You got a problem with that?"

"No." He sighed heavily. "Let's go."

"To the gargoyle realm?" I asked as he took me in his arms. His exotic scent filled the air around me.

"Not yet. First there is something you need to see." He took me around the waist.

I knew we were travelling but it wasn't quick like usual. This time it took more than a few moments. When we stopped, I stepped away from him and looked around. "Where are we?"

"1428. France." Laeddin said.

"What are we doing here?" I was confused.

"It's time you see how Professor Pops became who he is. Hopefully it'll help you when you have to defeat Sharra." He came close, his eyes flicking back and forth as he studied me. "I'm going to touch your forehead. When you wake, you will be inside Joanna Reesa d'Arc's mind. Listen and learn." He reached up to touch my forehead.

"Wait," I said, grabbing his wrist. "Where will you be?"

"I will be inside Professor Pops' mind."

I swallowed, nervously. Even the air smelled different. "So this is France, huh?"

"Yes, it is during 1428, anyway." His eyes danced with amusement.

"And we're back in time?" I licked my lips, confused and scared.

"It's going to be alright. Just listen and learn." He touched my forehead and suddenly everything was different -

PROFESSOR POPS PART ONE

BEFORE I BECAME A VAMPIRE, I was just a man with simple needs and one desire. Her name was Joanna Reesa d'Arc. I called her Red because of her deep auburn hair. She always wore it down her back in a long braid.

Red was beautiful in every way. Strong. Courageous. Devoted to her country and family. To a stranger she might appear weak and helpless, but she was none of that.

She was five feet of fearlessness with deep convictions toward her visions of what God wanted France to become.

The first time I saw her she was in her eighth year.

In her tiny hands she carried a pail full of water.

A serious expression, one I would learn meant she was thinking, hung on her lovely face. She wore a white bonnet along with a hunter green frock the same color as her eyes.

Joanna was the daughter of the town constable. The d'Arc family was the closest thing to royalty the town had, and they acted like it too.

When I was young, I wanted to know her, to be near her.

By the time she was sixteen I knew I loved her and would follow her to the ends of the Earth if she asked.

Much later in life I would recognize it was her destiny to lead armies and it was mine to love her -

"Adam, stop taking it easy on me," Joanna said with irritation. "If I'm going to be any kind of swordswoman I mustn't be coddled."

"Very well, Red." I transferred my sword into my stronger hand.

She stuck out her tongue sarcastically. "Bon. Let's go again."

For the next thirty minutes she and I practiced.

She was so good, better even than I, but she always wanted to learn more.

"Are you going to Chinon tomorrow?" I asked her the question even though I knew the answer. She would go and I would accompany her.

We were inseparable and I wouldn't leave her alone.

"Of course. The king needs me." She jabbed and parried.

"Are you sure?" I stepped forward and swung my sword.

She blocked and gave me a winning smile. "If I didn't listen to my God, what sort of servant would I be? Without me, the king cannot win. Unless you think Saint Michael is a liar?" She lifted her eyes in question curious about what I thought.

"More than anything, I believe you aren't a liar." That was the truth. She was many things. Beautiful. Fiery. Amazing. Definitely not a liar.

"I'm glad because it wouldn't do if the man I loved didn't trust in me."

"I do. With all my heart." I paused, placing my hand over my heart.

She came at me with her sword, a laugh on her lips.

I blocked, our swords clanging. In the distance a rooster crowed. It didn't matter the time of day, the thing crowed constantly.

"God is with us. Know that, Adam," she said, her eyes pinning me in place.

I beamed at her confidence. She wasn't arrogant. Joanna just knew without a doubt what needed to be done and nothing could deter her. "You're so full of yourself," I joked.

She spun around, sending her green dress ballooning out around her legs. "And you are a tease." Her face glowed.

"I can't help myself. I enjoy seeing you riled up." As I spoke, I pulled her against my chest. "It makes your green eyes sparkle like early morning dew kissing newly grown grass." I took in her subtle lips, hungry to taste her.

We were practicing behind my father's shop with the swords I recently made for the two of us.

The sun had been down for hours and the moonflowers scented the air in my mother's garden.

"What would my father say if he knew?" she asked but leaned into me and lifted her face so I could see her mischief.

Every night for the last fourteen months we met to train with swords - except for a few weeks ago when we took those strangers to Chinon.

Thoughts of that quest filled my mind and I cringed.

It was a time I mostly wanted to forget.

Except the parts with Joanna.

Her and I? I hoped we would never end.

She was the love of my life and I would do anything for her.

"I pray he'll agree to let you become Mrs. Joanna Reesa Henry," I finally said and winked, knowing my love for her would only increase.

She glanced away and I knew why.

Her father wanted her to marry another man.

"Don't worry. No matter what, I won't let Ansel lay a finger on you," I said softly, kissing each cheek.

She ran her free hand through my hair. "I believe you."

"My sweet Red. I am very glad."

She chewed on her lip, her face turning serious.

I brushed a strand of hay off her cheek. "God knows how much I love you. We will find a way to be together. That other man is nothing to us." I worked to keep the irritation out of my voice.

Ansel Grafton was an awful man. Sure he saved a little girl from being eaten by a bear one year, but he'd been the reason the bear was there in the first place.

The jackass killed the baby and mama bear wanted to exact her revenge.

Joanna's father also didn't seem to care that Ansel spent way too much time drinking.

I kissed her lightly. "I promise, it's you and me forever."

"Good." She wrapped her hands around my neck. "Because you are the only man for me, mon cher."

I WAS up before dawn the next morning. Our small group would travel to Chinon so Joanna could speak to the king.

She no longer wore her lovely green dress, but sturdy armor over brown pants, a brown shirt, and a burgundy cape.

Even dressed like a man, she was the most beautiful woman I'd ever seen.

"Let's get this over with," her uncle Durrand shouted.

He kicked the sides of his horse and it jolted forward.

The man made it known he wanted no part of her crusade but was doing what she asked out of respect for her father. That went for the rest of the convoy as well.

We rode for several hours, and I worked to stay calm, but it was difficult knowing the last time we traveled this way, there had been vampires, a dragon, and wolves to contend with.

Joanna and I discussed what had occurred on our last journey a few times.

With her, there was never a worry.

Me on the other hand? I worried all the time. But I kept it to myself.

The land was covered in mist and fog, making our traveling wet and uncomfortable.

Despite that, the men's spirits were light.

They joked and laughed until we stopped to stretch our legs and eat some bread and cheese. It was during that break I noticed something off about the land around us.

Usually there were the sounds of animals rustling in the underbrush.

But the road and the surrounding forest were eerily quiet. Not even a bird twittered its warning song.

Something hunted us.

I had no idea what, but I needed to find out and destroy it.

"Durrand, I'm going to stay behind. Make sure all is well." I plopped the last bite of cheese in my mouth.

"Fine," he replied, without care. "Do whatever you must."

I knew I wasn't anything to him, but his opinion didn't concern me. Red meant everything, and I would do whatever it took to keep her safe.

"Adam," Joanna whispered.

She didn't want the others to see her feelings for me.

To her, those feelings were weakness. I was a disadvantage they could use against her.

"It'll be all right. I want to check out the surrounding area, make sure you're safe."

She gave me a look that said she'd rather I remain with her. "Be careful of the wolves and - " She paused and glanced around at the rest of the group. "Be wary of other creatures as well."

I knew exactly what she was thinking. "I'll return before nightfall, I promise." I smiled encouragingly.

"D'accord." She took a deep breath and climbed on her horse. "Until tonight."

"Move out," Durrand yelled.

I watched them ride away.

Had I known all that I know now, I might have made different choices.

As soon as she was out of sight, I knew my life would never be the same.

Felt it in my bones the way my father's twitchy knee felt a storm coming.

I mounted my horse and doubled back, listening for anything that might explain what pursued us.

My first thought was it was Ansel, that perhaps he believed himself being loyal by following after us.

But there were neither hoof prints nor footprints.

There were no tracks at all and that didn't sit right with me either.

"What is going on?" I whispered into the wind.

Nightfall came as I returned to camp.

Joanna and the men had pitched their tents.

They sat around a fire, the men laughing and talking loudly.

Joanna sat away from the others. She seemed miles away, lost in thoughts I couldn't even imagine.

"Bonjour." I hailed them. "It is I, Adam Henry."

As soon as Joanna saw me, she stood, and my favorite smile lit her face. "Adam," she said.

My heart raced at seeing her.

I could almost smell the honeysuckle scent of her hair.

Red. My beautiful Red. How I longed to sweep her up in my arms and kiss away her troubles.

Instead I just nodded.

She had a momentary lapse in decorum.

If I responded in kind to her words, she'd be upset with herself and me later. I wouldn't let that happen.

I loved her too much.

I climbed off my horse but kept my distance.

Until they appeared.

Like wraiths they stepped out of the darkness.

At least a dozen of them dressed in black hooded robes.

It wasn't wolves, but these characters looked worse. They were vampires.

"Run," I shouted.

Joanna started, alarm replacing the faraway look in her eyes.

Before she could move, a woman in a blood red cape appeared in front of her.

One moment she hadn't been there and the next she was.

Electricity filled with air, like just before a thunderstorm. It crackled and snapped.

"Are you an angel?" Joanna asked.

She showed no fear and I cried out in frustration. My Red didn't fear anything, not even a fire breathing dragon.

"I'm your angel," the woman answered. "My name is Sharra." She removed her hood, revealing long black hair and skin the color of un churned milk.

Joanna's hand found her sword, but the woman shook her head. "Your blade is of no use to you, Joanna Reesa d'Arc." She stepped closer. "I'm in need of your body. You are strong, beautiful, and powerful. If you allow me to merge with you, we can become the ruler of this country if that is your wish."

"Blasphemy," Joanna hissed. "I would sooner die."

A wounded growl ripped from my throat. "Be gone, bloodsucker," I shouted.

She turned to me. "You know what I am? How quaint," she said, appraising me. "Leave Joanna to me and I'll let you live." Her lips turned up in a sly smile.

"I cannot do that. Step away from her now." Anger boiled through every part of my body. I would stop the vampire or die trying.

"That is too bad." She touched Joanna's forehead and my love's eyes closed before she fell to the ground as though she were dead.

Anguish ripped from my throat and I lunged at Sharra. With the wave of her hands, I fell to the ground, unable to move.

"Do not touch him or the girl. I want both," Sharra said to the others.

The men of our convoy sprang into action, drawing their swords.

It didn't escape my notice that those under the hoods were all women.

Except one. His heritage was unknown to me, but his skin and eyes were dark as the night around us.

Without giving him another thought, I tried with all of my might to fight against my frozen limbs, but it was no use.

I watched in horror as the woman in the black robes fell on the men as though to embrace them, but the men screamed in pain.

"As for you." She looked me over. Lifted her hand and my sword yanked out of my grasp. "You cannot kill me." She flicked her wrist and I unwillingly rose to my knees. "I know you love the girl," she said, coming to stand directly in front of me.

I glanced around her, checking to make sure Joanna was still on the ground.

Sharra went on, "I saw you in her mind, you know. Joanna loves you, though she knows the two of you can never be. She believes her life is destined for so much more than becoming your wife and bearing you children. The girl intends to lead France's army against the English. To her death if needs be. She believes that is her divine calling." Sharra brushed a piece of my hair off my face. I shuddered at the chill in her fingers. "But I have greater plans for her."

"You. Will. Not. Touch. Her," I bit out, clenching my teeth.

"My dear, I'll do whatever I please." She opened her mouth and fangs, like the canines on a bear, grew in her mouth.

"Keep your filthy mouth away from me," I hissed.

"Oh no. I will taste you and the girl." She tilted my head and sank her teeth into my neck.

In that moment, as the edges of my vision faded into darkness, I believed my life was over. My only regret was that I hadn't saved my love, my Joanna.

PROFESSOR POPS PART TWO

I CAME to and heard Sharra talking.

"I know you believe in your visions, but where is your God now, when you need him most. Don't you think if you were meant to lead your country to victory, he would rescue you?"

"You speak blasphemy against my Lord. It may not be today, but you will suffer for your irreverence." Joanna spoke with quiet certainty, without a shred of horror in her voice.

Sharra grabbed Joanna's face. "Highly unlikely, little one."

I opened my eyes and saw Joanna was chained to a wall. It appeared we were in a dungeon of some sort. It stank of rotting flesh and wet dirt.

"Release her. You can contend with me but leave Joanna alone," I tried to shout, my voice groggy and my throat parched.

Sharra sauntered over. The material of her dress rustled against her legs. "I wondered when you'd wake. You've been asleep a long time. Days in fact. I didn't take that much blood. Perhaps you're weaker than I first believed."

I ground my teeth together, but didn't respond.

"My love," Joanna said, reaching out to me. The cuffs around her wrists jangled.

My heart raced with desperation. That anyone would dare to treat Joanna so disrespectfully stormed through my body.

A quick look around revealed I was chained to a stone slab. "Either kill me or free me, but know if you do not kill me, I will find a way out of these chains and end you painfully." I strained against the bonds, but to no avail.

My clothes had been removed, except my trousers. Sweat streaked my hairline.

It was hot like the workshop when firing metal for a sword.

The smell of sulfur stifled the air, making it painful to breathe.

"You are a rare treat, Adam Henry." With one of her nails, she cut a shallow straight line down my chest, leaving a streak of blood in its wake. "If Joanna didn't need to drink your blood, I would drain all you myself."

"Leave Joanna out of this," I said, forcing my wrists against the chains until they cut into my skin.

She watched me breathing heavily several long minutes. "You discovered what Arthur was, didn't you? And that is how you know what I am?"

"You aren't that special, bloodsucker," I spat.

"Oh, but I am." She patted me on the cheek. "And bloodsucker is such a primitive name." She wiped her finger in my blood and tasted it.

I cringed. The man I'd seen earlier stepped toward Joanna, distracting me from Sharra. "Stay away from her. Don't lay a finger on her." I whipped my head from side to side, desperate for escape.

He ignored me and tilted Joanna's head. Fangs pierced Joanna's soft skin and a drop of blood ran down her neck.

Never in my life had I felt such helpless, hopeless agony. "Please," I begged. "Don't do this. Please." I knew I sounded pitiful, but I didn't care. If anyone was to die, it should be me, not my beautiful Joanna.

Joanna's head rolled back. She moaned, and pressed her neck further into the man's mouth.

"Joanna?" I couldn't believe what my eyes beheld.

"You see, Adam Henry, the bite of a vampire, especially that of a Hunter is sensual and irresistible." She bent and licked my chest. When she straightened, I saw my blood on her tongue. "If it makes you feel any better, Joanna cannot help herself. She longs for him the way a lion longs for the lamb."

"Stop. Please. Do not do this. Take me instead," I said, my words came out in gasps. I didn't understand what was happening but I needed to stop it.

Sharra pushed my head to the side. "Your blood is all I need. All Joanna needs." Sharra glanced at her. "You'll live as long as it takes for Joanna to become a vampire and then she'll be mine. She'll do my bidding, fight for my causes, not the pitiful needs of a whiny king and his dreary country."

THE TORTURE WENT on for days as we remained chained in Sharra's dungeon. There were no windows, no light other than that of the candles around the room.

We were brought food at random times. After a while Joanna stopped eating and her eyes turned from their lovely green to a blood red.

"It won't be long now," Sharra said to Joanna when she appeared out of thin air. "If you don't feed soon, you'll die." She spoke to Joanna.

"I would rather die than drink the blood of my love," Joanna said, her words soft but firm.

Sharra growled. "Why must you be so stubborn? I will force you if I have to."

"You can try, vampire." Joanna's voice shook with emotion, but her body sagged against the chains that bound her.

I lifted my head. "Red?"

She turned toward me. "Do not worry, mi amour. The worst she can do is kill me and if I should leave this world, fear not, for I will see my Maker and there is nothing but joy in that." She took a deep breath and I realized how close to death she really was.

Sharra snapped her fingers and a golden cup appeared. She grabbed my hand with a strength I couldn't believe she possessed and cut my wrist with one of her nails. I watched my blood drain into the cup like water from a fall. "Perhaps you should tell her that death isn't the worst I can do."

"What do you mean?" I asked the question, but I really didn't want to know.

"Kenmei," she hollered.

"Yes, my queen." He emerged wearing all black and dragging a woman beside him. There was a burlap bag over her head.

"No," I whispered.

Sharra smiled. "Oh, yes." To Kenmei she said, "Remove the bag and let our dear Joanna see whom I've brought for her to taste."

Kenmei removed the burlap sack and revealed what I already suspected. It was Joanna's mother.

The lady's eyes were wide with terror. "Joanna, what is going on? What is the meaning of - "

Sharra snapped her fingers and the woman stopped talking. "Quiet, old woman!"

"Mother," Joanna muttered. Pain etched her gaunt face and she cried in silence.
